Just before going into the engagement at Mission Ridge the General told Captain John —, one of his staff-officers, that if he should fall in the engagement he should take his sword and keep it in remembrance of him. Very soon, in the heat of the action, when our brave boys were driving the enemy at every point, General M., riding along the lines, enjoying the conflict, fell suddenly from his horse, wounded in the head. Captain John —, seeing his beloved commander fall, rushed to the spot, threw himself from his saddle, knelt down by the prostrate form, and began an examination to find whether indeed it were lifeless, when the General, recovering a little from the shock, opened his eyes, and seeing the Captain, who was fumbling about his sword-belt and uniform to loosen them, raised his hand as if in remonstrance, and said, in a feeble voice, "No, John; no, my dear John, you no get him yet, you no get him yet; I bees not dead!"

ANOTHER: While the General was commanding at Decatur, Alabama, last May, he had very strong works constructed round the town. One pleasant morning, as I was walking about, "a mere looker-on in Vienna," I happened to meet the General near where the men were at work, and said to him, "General, you will soon have your fort completed."

"Yes," said he; "and as strong as pepper, as strong as pepper, Sir!"

A NEW ORLEANS correspondent writes:

I know that the Drawer is not the place for notices of new books, but perhaps it may admit a reference to a late English novel, for the sake of what is certainly one of the "curiosities of literature," and a very funny one.

I have lately happened upon and read a novel announced to be "by Lady Jane Scott, a daughter-in-law of Sir Walter Scott." (Is the public expected to believe that the Lady Jane has inherited the genius of her father-in-law?) A passably good story, with some rather clever analysis of society in England, and two or three well-drawn characters, but with the absurdest incongruity in the dénouement. The first husband of the heroine, whom it is thought best to remove from this sublunary sphere, has a fall on a wharf, and breaks his arm badly. Mortification ensues, and the arm is amputated above the elbow. Quite an original incident for a novel, certainly, and one which the author, at least, might be expected to remember for a few pages. But amputation was of no avail, was performed too late, and the poor fellow dies about ten pages after the operation. Just before he dies he calls his young and lovely wife and his friend, who is to be her second husband, to his bedside, and "takes the hand of his wife in one of his, and with the other seizes that of his friend."

THE following I vouch for as fact, as well as the preceding:

In the Academy located in — Village, at one time, some years ago, albums became very popular among the fair ones. Among the gentlemen was a good-natured, careless, heedless fellow, by name Jim F——, who, whatever other qualifications he might have lacked, had a large share of self-esteem. Miss Lucy had one of the nicest albums in school, which was sent to Jim, "with Miss Lucy's compliments, hoping he would favor her with something from his pen." Any thing original was, of course, beyond expectation; so he sat down to search the fields of poesy for something appropriate. At last he found it, as the following lines, copied from the good old "English Reader," attest:

"How loved, how valued once, avails thee not
To whom related, or by whom begot;
A heap of dust alone remains of thee,
'Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be."

It is needless to add that Jim's contributions were at a discount thereafter.

OLD Venango is one of the counties of Western Pennsylvania, and its county seat, sometimes called "the nursery of great men," has had more characters in its history than most towns of the same population. Among these was one known familiarly as "Van," the proprietor of a restaurant, well stocked with the popular drinks of the day. Although in the liquor business, Van's friends claimed that he was doing more for the temperance cause than any man in town, on the principle that he diluted his liquors so thoroughly with water as to render them harmless.

We have another character known as "the Major," famous for his politeness and harmlessness, but liable at times to become very thirsty. The Major one summer afternoon repaired to Van's grocery to indulge in a quiet bender. Seating himself in the back-room he commenced imbibing, all alone in his glory. After drinking all afternoon most persistently, and yet without the desired effect, he called Van, and with an exclamation better omitted in the recital, he declared his liquor was "the meanest he ever saw in his life, as the more he drank the more sober he grew!" The Major then returned home musing on the uncertainty of this world's pleasures.

On another occasion the Major called at the office of a young sprig of the law, Tom N——, who has since disappeared in the mazes of Secessiondom. A difficulty soon arose between them, resulting in Tom preemptorily ordering the Major out of his office. The latter not exhibiting a disposition to leave, Tom, who was more famous for strength of lungs than of muscle, assured him of his legal right to eject him forcibly, and taking a law-book from the shelf proceeded to read his authority for the use of just as much force as should be necessary for such ejection.

"Very good," says the Major, with imperturbable gravity, and still occupying his seat; "but where is the force? I have been waiting for that for some time!"

ANY one who has sojourned in Chicago, the "Garden City," for a fortnight can bear testimony to the abominable character of the aqueous fluid, as sometimes dispensed to the city by the Water Commissioners, and can perhaps appreciate the following table-talk:

MR. SMITH (holding up a glass of water). "I guess, Margaret, you forgot to filter this water."

MARGARET. "Indade, Sir, I filtered it as well as I could, Sir."

MRS. SMITH. "How did you filter it, Margaret?"

MARGARET. "Through flannel, ma'am."

MRS. SMITH. "Through flannel? Why, where did you get flannel to make a filter?"

MARGARET. "Oh! I jist took one of your husband's undershirts, ma'am."

MRS. SMITH. "Why, Margaret, I'm surprised at your doing such a thing."

MARGARET. "Oh, ma'am, I didn't take one of the clean ones; I jist took one out of the clothes-basket, ma'am."

A CORRESPONDENT in San Francisco writes to the Drawer:

The following, which is positively true, occurred in one of the so-called cow counties in this State, in the summer of 1859:

A lady who was authorized to act as agent for the Mount Vernon Association called upon a wealthy neighbor, one of the District School Directors, and presented the subscription list to his lady, with the request that she should aid in the patriotic object. Aunt Polly, as she was familiarly called, said that her old man usually 'tended to the money, and that when he came in from work he 'mout give su'hin' to'rd it." Soon the old man presented himself, and, upon being requested to subscribe, said that "he wa'n't acquainted much about sich affairs, and didn't know but thar mout be some humbug 'bout it." He wanted to know how the money was to be used, and disclaimed all knowledge of General Washington and Mount Vernon. He wanted to know how much the "old farm" was "a-going" to cost; and upon being told $250,000, he burst out with "Humph! I know it's a humbug now. Why, I've seen as fine farms as ever lay out door sell in old Kanetuck for five thousand. No, they can't catch me with any sich humbug as that. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars! Humph!" and the poor fellow went out to his work, probably counting on his fingers how many five-thousand-dollar farms that would buy.

A few days after this transpired I was relating the circumstance to a neighbor friend, a young man some twenty-five years of age, a good talker, and a heavy electioneerer at local elections. He listened with marked attention until I had got through, when, somewhat to my astonishment, he came out with, "Well, I've often hern tell of Washington, but don't know where he lives." I explained to him that he was the father of our country, and but for him and his co-operators we should not now be enjoying the liberties of a free people. He thanked me for the information, and promised that if our country called for aid that he should be "thar." He has kept his promise. The last I heard of him he was with Carlton's command in New Mexico, proving that the name of Washington is the watch-word of at least one brave man.

A CONTRIBUTOR sends the following:

Ben Barse, one of the settlers in Jackson Township, Potter County, Pennsylvania, kept a "house of entertainment" on Pine Creek, for stray travelers through that thickly wooded, sparsely settled country. His nearest neighbor was a man named Post, who lived three quarters of a mile distant, up "the other fork." Post was a small, sore-eyed man, with a large family, and eked out rather a scanty livelihood by cultivating about four acres of "clearing" and by fiddling at all the dances in the neighborhood.

Nine years ago a friend of mine was traveling through that lonely country, and stopped at Barse's for the night. After supper my friend, who sat upon the stoop smoking a cigar, was startled by a terrific yell or howl from an object coming in full career down the road toward the house.—Supposing it to be some creature of the surrounding forest, my friend advanced cautiously to reconnoitre, for it was now nearly dark, and discovered the "creature" to be an overgrown boy, barefooted and bareheaded, who succeeded, between sobs and howls, to explain that he was Post's oldest boy, and that his mother, who had been sick for some time, had just died. Of course a messenger was dispatched from Barse's to the other neighbors, and all was done that could be to comfort the bereaved and to perform such kindly offices as the occasion required. The next morning Post came down to Barse's, and requested Barse and my friend to go with him and pick out a suitable spot as a last resting-place for his deceased wife, there being no burying-ground in the neighborhood. They went back with him to his clearing, and after looking over the ground, they indicated as their choice a retired spot at some distance from the house. The bereaved husband was evidently disappointed, and said:

"Friends, suppose you go down into the woods and pick out a spot to bury her. For my part I don't see any use in taking up cleared land with her!"

ONE of our soldier boys, whose time had expired a few months since, met some of his comrades at home on furlough, who insisted that he should take a drink with them. Now Alf is not a drinking man, but they urged so hard that finally he compromised, and agreed to take some ale. To drink with one, and not with all, would never answer, and he continued until there was a good-sized "bee in his bonnet." While carefully steering his way home he came face to face with the minister and one of the deacons of the church to which he belonged. They commenced a serious conversation with him, which was respectfully listened to, until they wound up by saying "that they did not know how such conduct could be overlooked, and were afraid that he must be expelled." Here Alf found words, and answered, "No, no, gentlemen, I don't want to be expelled, but I'll tell you what I will do—I'll resign!" His experience with army officers suggested this expedient.

WE have a little "five-year-old" in this new country (California), who never heard the word "tailor." One day an older brother placed on him a dress-coat, and taking the shears he transformed it into a jacket. A neighbor coming to the house, the following conversation took place:

"Good-morning, Albert! you have a new coat, I see."

"Yes, Sir; a new one."

"Who made it for you?"

"Brother Lellie made it."

"Your brother Lellie must be a good tailor."

"Yes, he is first-rate tailor; he cut the tail right square off!"

A YOUNG lawyer, just "establishing" out West, writes:

"I am getting into practice. The voice of forensic eloquence—in logical argument, pathetic appeal, or fiery invective—is heard in the courts of justice [that's mine]! The innocent and oppressed seek the protection and defense of the strong arm of the law [them's my clients]! There are, however, unworthy members of the profession who look upon the noble science of jurisprudence as a system of sophistry and chicanery; who use the laws, intended as a shield for the innocent and a staff for the weak, to uphold injustice and protect the guilty [that's opposite counsel]! But not always, even in this world, does crime go unwhipped of justice; not always do the wicked [that's his clients] escape the fruit of their iniquity [that's judgment, with costs and damages]; nor the virtuous [that's me again] fail to receive their just reward [and that's FEES]!!!"

FROM Petrolia comes the following:

A few evenings since, while in your city, in company with Mr. John S—, of Warren, and Mr. C—, of Titusville, in this State (both successful "oil-men"), I attended the performance of Coriolanus at Niblo's. For the benefit of your non-oleaginous readers let me premise the story by stating that the original mode of procuring petroleum among us was by granting the land to parties willing to operate, reserving a royalty in kind, in lieu of rent, the interest granted being called "the working interest." In the last scene of the tragedy, where the artist had given a view of the Volscian camp, with the city of Rome in the distance, he had painted a signal-station having every appearance of a derrick over an oil-well. Observing it, I turned to S—, and remarked, "Why, S—, they have been boring for oil in the Volscian camp there; do you see the derrick?"

"Yes," he answered; "so they have. I wonder if they found any?"

"Oh yes," chimed in C—; "they struck oil there. Seneca had the working interest in that well, and to this day they call petroleum Seneca oil!"

A MICHIGANDER sends a good one:

An old sea-captain, who was in the habit of spending his time while in port among a set of hard-drinking fellows, returned to his hotel in Fulton Street, Brooklyn, one evening, in a partially-intoxicated condition. In going up to his room he walked out of one of the windows in the second story, and landed upon the pavement. Fortunately he was not hurt by his descent, and upon going back into the house met the landlord. "Look here, Mr. —," says he, "if you don't shorten the steps in your stairs I won't stop with you any more!"

A TOUR THROUGH ARIZONA.

[Sixth Paper.]

HACIENDA OF THE SANTA RITA MINING COMPANY.

AS five or six days would elapse before the return of our wagon from Tucson, a small party, consisting of Mr. Poston, Lieutenant Arnold, and myself, accompanied by ten men belonging to the escort, took advantage of the opportunity to visit the mines of the Santa Rita district. For this expedition we provided ourselves with a pack-mule for our provisions and carried our own blankets on horseback. Crossing the Santa Cruz at the foot of the milpas, opposite the town of Tubac, we followed an arroya for about four miles, when we ascended the right bank and entered a dry elevated plain, called in this country a mesa, or table, stretching almost as far as we could see north and south, and bounded on the east by the mountains of Santa Rita, and on the west by the Santa Cruz Valley and the mountains of Atacosa. It was a matter of surprise to most of us how luxuriant the grass was on this mesa, and what an inexhaustible support it affords for innumerable herds of cattle. No water, however, is to be found nearer than the Santa Cruz River and the cañons of the Santa Rita Mountains. The Pecacho on the left forms a bold and striking feature in the scene, rising like a massive fortress directly on the edge of the plain, and backed by the rugged ribs of the Santa Ritas, the two main peaks of which, called "the teats," form a prominent land-mark to travelers for a circuit of over two hundred miles. Our trail over the mesa, otherwise monotonous, was pleasantly diversified by groves of palo-verde and bunches of cactus; but apart from the peculiarity of the vegetation, it was a luxury to breathe the air. Nothing more pure or invigorating could exist upon earth. The unclouded sky and glowing tints of the mountains; the unbounded opulence of sunshine, which seemed to sparkle in atmospheric scintillations, inspired us with a perfect overflow of health and spirits; and it was no wonder we built many castles in the air, and reveled in dreamy regions of enchantment in which the glittering silver mines of Arizona played a prominent part.

At the first break of the mesa we struck an arroya, or rather rocky ravine, in which I noticed some very remarkable geological formations. A large area of the earth was covered by immense columns of sandstone, standing like the ruined colonnade of some grand old castle, many of them capped by prodigious boulders of rock, which no human power could have elevated to their present resting-places. How they came there, or how long they have thus stood battling with the elements, was beyond our ability to decide. Lieutenant Ives, in his admirable report on the Colorado, refers to similar geological phenomena in the region of the Great Cañon. I believe the theory of geologists is, that the earth has been washed away from these columns, leaving them standing in the open air as they stood in their natural strata underground.

Not far beyond the mesa we entered upon a rugged region, abounding in breaks and arroyas very rocky and difficult for our horses. In one of these desolate places we visited the spot where Mr. H. C. Grosvener, the last manager of the Santa Rita mines, and the last of three managers whose fate was similar, was killed by the Apaches about two years ago. It appears that a wagon containing supplies had been sent out from Tubac and was on its way to the hacienda, when the men who accompanied it were attacked and killed. Mr. Grosvener and Mr. Pompelly had passed the wagon and teamsters a few minutes before and proceeded to the hacienda. As the freight-party did not arrive within a reasonable time, Grosvener walked out alone to see what was the cause of the delay. The Apaches had meantime made their murderous attack on the teamsters and plundered the wagon; and were moving up the cañon, when they saw Grosvener coming, and immediately formed an ambush behind the rocks and shot him dead as he approached. His grave lies a few hundred yards from the head-quarters of the hacienda. A marble head-stone, upon which his name is inscribed, with the additional words not uncommon in Arizona: "Killed by the Apaches," marks the spot. By the side of this grave is another headstone, bearing the name of Mr. Slack, his predecessor, who lost his life by the same ruthless tribe of Indians. Another of the managers, also killed by the Apaches, lies buried at Tubac.

Early in the afternoon we reached the beautiful hacienda of the Santa Rita Company, now solitary and desolate. The houses have gone to ruin, and only a few adobe walls, furnaces, and the frame-work of the mill remain to mark the spot formerly so full of life and enterprise. It was sad to stand among these ruins and think how hard a fate had been the reward of nearly all the enterprising men who had built up this little community. A few years ago these houses, now empty and crumbling down in dusty fragments, were replete with busy life; the reduction works were in full blast, and every heart throbbed with the brightest anticipations of the future.

Mr. Poston, who had done more perhaps than any other man to develop the resources of this vast mineral region, had some depressing reflections as he gazed upon this scene of ruin. He had suffered too much, however, in Arizona, and seen too many reverses of fortune to waste much time in retrospection. The future was still bright and promising. It would not be long before these tenements would be again inhabited, and the sounds of life and industry again enliven the place. With the necessary protection now promised the Company is prepared to re-establish the works; an experienced manager, Mr.

Wrighton, who has had long experience in this region, is now on the way out, and probably not more than a few months will elapse before the mines and hacienda will be occupied by a large working force.

At the distance of a few hundred yards from the hacienda is a silver lead, situated strangely enough in the valley, close by the bed of the creek, upon which some explorations have been made. An assay of the ore, made in 1861, yielded $400 to the ton. Water is furnished by the mine itself, which is not considered a disadvantage in this country, where that element is the great desideratum.

A mile beyond we reached the foot of the Salero Mountain, near which, in a pleasant little valley, stand the ruins of the peon houses, once occupied by the operatives on the Salero Mine. The surrounding hills are clothed with a rich growth of grass, and there is an abundance of oak timber scattered over these hills and the adjacent mountains to supply the requisite fuel for the reduction works for many years. Water is found in an adjacent cañon a few hundred yards from the quarters, but not in sufficient quantities for stock. There would be no difficulty, however, in increasing the quantity by digging.

The Salero, which is the principal mine in this region, is situated in the side of a conical mountain of the same name, rising immediately from this little valley, and presenting some very striking mineral phenomena. The shaft is seen about a third of the way up its face, and is approached by a wagon road, which cuts and leaves exposed a number of veins running into the mountain in nearly the same direction, and all bearing more or less indications of silver.

This mine has long been known to the Mexicans, and was worked more than a century ago under the direction of the Jesuits at Tumacacori. A legend is told of the derivation of the name, SALERO or Salt-cellar, which may be worthy of record. On the occasion of a visit from the Bishop of Sonora to Tumacacori, the good father in charge of that establishment furnished, as in duty bound, the best entertainment for his superior that his limited resources would allow. The Bishop was delighted with the sumptuous feast laid before him; the chickens, the fruits, the wines were all excellent; there was only one thing lacking to complete his temporal happiness—a salt-cellar! The poor Padre was deeply mortified; he had forgotten all about the salt-cellar; in fact, had long since forgotten the use of such luxuries. Salt-cellars were as scarce in Arizona then as they are now. “Never mind!” said he, as a happy thought struck him, “your Excellency shall have a salt-cellar to-morrow.” A few trusty men were dispatched to the Santa Rita mountains, with orders to dig and smelt some silver ore and make a salt-cellar, and sure enough, by dinner-time the next day a massive salt-cellar was presented to the Bishop, and from that day forth the mine out of which the ore was dug was called the Salero. History does not record, but there can be little doubt that the worthy Bishop of Sonora enjoyed his dinner at Tumacacori.

During the afternoon, and on the following day, we visited at least fifteen or twenty distinct mines, all partially opened and well tested, forming what might be termed a perfect net-work of silver-bearing ledges. Among these were the Salero, Bustillo, Crystal, Encarnation, Cazador, and Fuller, each one of which has yielded, under a very imperfect system of working, at the rate of four to fourteen hundred dollars to the ton. This of course was from selected ores. The average would probably not fall short of two hundred dollars, though sufficient work has not yet been done upon which to base a reliable calculation. The assays and experiments of such men as Küstel, Pompey, Booth, Garnett, Mainzer, Blake, Dr. Jackson of Boston, and others, demonstrate at least that there is a great abundance of rich ores in the Santa Rita district.

As a grazing country for cattle and sheep the valleys and foot-hills of the Santa Rita can not be surpassed. Grass of every variety known in Arizona covers the ground all the year, and there is practically no winter for live-stock. The climate is so mild, even in the months of January and February, that it is a positive luxury to sleep in the open air. Wood can be obtained in limited quantities in the neighborhood, and when that is exhausted the valley of the Santa Cruz, only twelve miles distant, furnishes an inexhaustible supply. The mines abound in ores easy of reduction by smelting, and they are so situated that access to all of them by good roads can be had at a small expense. The transit to Tucson and Guyamas is over the best natural roads in the world, but will require military protection for some time to come.

Within the distance of eight miles lies the beautiful Valley of the Sonoita, which is watered by the river of the same name, and abounds in very promising gold and silver ledges. Some of the finest farming lands in the Territory lie along the borders of this stream. When Fort Buchanan was occupied, several families from Texas and the borders of Missouri lived in this valley; and I have been told the wheat and corn crops raised by them were absolutely wonderful. There can be no doubt that, with the protection afforded by the mines when in operation, the Sonoita Valley will be settled once more, and the soil again cultivated.

We took a ride over the intervening hills to see a gold ledge, called the “Tenaja,” or “Tank,” of which I made a sketch. The croppings are very fine; but I could not see any gold in them by the naked eye.

Late in the afternoon of the second day, having completed our tour among the mountains of the Santa Rita, we returned to Tubac, greatly pleased with our ramble, though somewhat tired and hungry. A bath in the Santa Cruz River refreshed us after our rough experience of the past few days; and it was not unpleasant to be once more within hail of a public highway, even though it brought us no news either from above or below. We were all anxious to hear from home. Nothing had reached us from “the States” for over two months. It might be that the war had come to an end, so little did we know or hear of the turmoil of strife or the excitement of speculation. Isolated as we were in a country fraught with dangers, it seemed strange how calm and peaceful the solitude around us looked. Not a stir, not a sound beyond the limits of our own encampment disturbed the intense quietude that reigned over the slumbering earth. Yet every thicket and ravine had its story of bloodshed and death, and around us lay the graves of murdered men!

No tidings of our wagon, which we had dispatched to Tucson for provisions and forage, having been received, up to the morning of the sixth day, we resolved to leave Tubac and proceed on our journey toward Sopori and the mines of the Cerro Colorado. It was our intention to camp at the Revanton Ranch, eight miles below Tubac, where we hoped to meet the wagon on its way up; nor were we disappointed, for some four or five Papago Indians, of whom the chief was our friend, Captain José, came dashing up with the pleasing intelligence that the wagon and detachment were close behind. These doughty warriors were all armed, some with old muskets and others with bows and arrows, and presented something of a stylish appearance in their mixed costume of military coats, serapas, loose pantaloons, rawhide sandals, and straw sombreros. One of them, a very important old gentleman in his own estimation, was peculiarly distinguished for the brilliancy of his uniform. He wore a blue cloth coat with two rows of buttons down in front and the same number on the back; so that, with a tremendous shock of hair, which fell loosely over his face and neck, it was difficult to tell, at a short distance, whether he was riding with his face or his back to the horse's head. Nor was the illusion quite dissipated by the appearance of his legs, which were quite bare, and fortunately so colored by nature that they corresponded exactly with the skin of his horse. We suspected that this doughty old warrior had so fashioned and equipped himself as a decoy for the enemy, whom he doubtless intended to deceive with the appearance of a retreat, when in reality he was making an advance.

Captain José, although of higher rank, was less ostentatiously accoutred, having only a plain blue coat with brass buttons in front, white cotton pantaloons, buckskin leggings, and moccasins of the same, all a little the worse for the wear and tear of travel. The rest of the party were stout young fellows of the tribe, who had probably distinguished themselves in some of the late forays against the Apaches. Mr. Poston had written down to San Xavier, to the Padre Mesa, to send up these chiefs and warriors, in order that they might accompany us on our proposed tour through the region of the Papago villages lying west of the Baboquivori. We found their services very useful as scouts, guides, and interpreters. Captain José speaks good Spanish, and is a man of excellent character, remarkable for his sobriety and good sense. Of all the Papagoes he is perhaps the most reliable and intelligent.

We soon had the pleasure of meeting the wagon and escort, by which we anxiously expected food both for body and mind. Only those who have been, as we were, nearly two months without a word of news from home, can appreciate the eagerness with which we crowded around the Sergeant and asked for the letters and newspapers; and only such can appreciate our disappointment, when we found that we had neither news nor newspapers of a later date than that of our departure from Tucson. Private letters there were for some of our party, but nothing that threw the least light upon the progress of the war. For all the information we had, we might as well have been in Timbuctoo or China. I could not but marvel that there existed within the limits of the United States a spot so completely isolated from the civilized world. Military expresses are all that now serve the purposes of communication in Arizona. So far as they go they are a great convenience; but it is hard for private citizens engaged in business to be dependent upon such precarious means of intercourse with the outside world. At this moment Arizona is, practically, more distant from San Francisco and New York than either of those cities is from China or Norway. I made the trip from Germany to Iceland and back much more easily, and with much less expense and loss of time, than from San Francisco to Sonora and back. Now that the Governor and his staff have located the capital, and put the wheels of the Territorial Government in operation, it is to be hoped that this great desideratum will attract the attention of Congress. Without mails and newspapers Arizona will never be a thriving country. At the time of our visit there was not a printing-press in the Territory. Mr. Secretary M'Cormick has since established the Arizona Miner, a very excellent little paper, edited with spirit and ability. It is the pioneer of a new and more enlightened era, and well deserves the patronage of the public. Newspapers and mails will of course follow the settlement of the country in natural order; but since the Territory of Arizona, with all its vast mineral resources, is subject to much greater difficulties of position and settlement than any other within our limits, and has received as yet but little consideration or aid from Government, it seems peculiarly deserving of encouragement from our Federal authorities. So far as I have seen, the people generally are loyal to the Union; the recent election, showing a large Union majority, has sufficiently determined that. Some discontent has heretofore prevailed against the military department for alleged neglect of protection; but measures have been taken to remedy the evils complained of. The recent vigorous and liberal measures taken by the departments in Washington to develop the resources of the Territory will undoubtedly result in a large increase of emigration.

It was our intention to camp at Revanton; but upon our arrival there we found it entirely destitute of water. There was not so much as a pool left in the Santa Cruz River from which we could satisfy our own thirst, much less water our animals. Thus it is that the rivers of Arizona disappear at the most unexpected points. The oldest Mexicans and Indians of our party had never before known the Santa Cruz to be dry at Revanton. From other causes this fine ranch has been deserted for several years. It was at one time claimed and occupied by Elias Brevoort, who built upon it a fine adobe house, with a large corral and garden, at the crossing of the river, where the road takes off to Sopori and the Cerro Colorado. This palatial edifice occupies a square of several hundred varas, and is perhaps the largest and most imposing private residence in Arizona. Sixteen thousand dollars were expended in the building of the house and improvement of the premises. Mr. Brevoort, as I was informed, had some connection with the Quarter-master's Department of the Army, and was sent down into Chihuahua to recover some absconding wagons and teams belonging to the United States Government. The wagons and teams remained there, and so did Brevoort. Subsequently "old Jimmy Caruthers," a frontiersman, squatted upon the ranch, and cultivated it to some extent, raising a good crop of corn and wheat; but the Apaches stole his cattle and broke him up. The first and last time I saw this eccentric character was on the rise of the mesa near Oatman's Flat, as mentioned in the second number of these papers.

The Revanton is now a ruin; the house is deserted—a death-like silence reigns over the premises. The grass is crisped, the trees are withered, the bed of the river is dry, the sap of life seems to have deserted the place with its inhabitants, and left nothing but ruin and decay to mark the spot. Yet a more beautiful region of country than that occupied by this ranch it would be hard to find any where. It is naturally rich in vegetation; the climate is unsurpassed, and during the season of rain, when the earth is clothed in verdure, it must be one of the loveliest spots in the world. But without water, of what avail are all the advantages of soil and climate?

The road by which we traveled on leaving the Revanton had not been much used of late, and was difficult to trace amidst the sandy arroyos and patches of mesquit and cactus. Our Mexican vaqueros, however, were never long at fault; their instinct on the subject of roads and trails is equal to that of a dog.

A delightful ride of five or six miles through a broad, rich valley of grass, pleasantly diversified with groves of mesquit and palo-verde, brought us to a narrow pass, on the right elevation of which stand all that remains of the buildings and store-houses of the Sopori Land and Mining Company. Little is now left save ruined adobe walls and tumbled-in roofs. As usual, not a living thing was to be seen. Silence and desolation reigned supreme.

At the time Colonel James W. Douglass lived here the Sopori was one of the most flourishing ranches in the country. He had herds of fat cattle ranging over the pastures; fields of grain and vegetables in the rich bottom that lies just in front of the dwelling-house; domestic animals and fowls of various kinds; and could always afford the traveler a generous reception. In fact the hospitality of "old Jimmy Douglass" was noted even in this country, where hospitality has long been considered one of the necessary virtues of existence. Prior to 1861, in the palmy days of Phil Herbert, Ned McGowan, and their confrères, all men who had acquired, by their industry or otherwise, houses and homes, and who had food to eat and blankets to lend, were expected, as a matter of course—indeed, compelled, from the necessity of the case—to lodge and feed (and often to clothe and lend money to) all other men who chose to go drifting about the country without means, and without the desire to procure any by honest labor.

This is the case to some extent in all new countries; but it was especially the case at Tubac, where the private quarters of the chief manager of the "Sonora Exploring and Mining Company" were invaded without ceremony, and their occupant never permitted to enjoy an hour's solitude, except when away from his own house. To feed the hungry and clothe the naked was his legitimate business, since he was one of the few men in the country who had enterprise enough to possess food and raiment; but when, after the exercise of many Christian virtues, in addition to those of patience and hospitality, it became pretty generally understood that "Poston's Hotel" got up about the best dinners and beds in the country, Tubac became a favorite place of resort for the various adjacent communities. Neither board nor lodging cost any thing at this agreeable place, which was a matter of some moment, considering the high price of provisions and the general scarcity of funds. Poston's was famous as the best "hotel" of the kind in Arizona, and being on the public highway to and from Sonora, had by far the largest number of "boarders." It was not a profitable institution in a pecuniary point of view. To be boarded out of one's house is a common calamity, but a few more such boarders as Poston had would have boarded him out of his boots.

The Sopori Ranch, although at present uninhabited, possesses advantages as a mining and grazing region which have long since given it a reputation in Sonora. Embracing over twenty square leagues of mountain and valley, it comprises within its boundaries some of the best silver and copper lodes and cattle-ranges in the country. During the greater part of the year it is well watered, but there are times when the water is scarce, except in the vicinity of the head-quarters, where the supply is never-failing. By means of acequias a considerable extent of bottom land of a very productive quality has already been cultivated. The usual cereal crops thrive well here, and esculents are especially fine. Wood of many valuable varieties—such as oak, ash, walnut, cotton-wood, willow, and mesquit—grows in the ravines and along the margin of the creek. Lying twelve miles south of Tubac, bordering on the Mission lands of San Xavier del Bac to the north, and distant but forty-five miles from Tucson, on the highway to the Cerro Colorado, Arivaca, and Sonora,

I spent the afternoon rambling over the hills, making sketches of the scenery, which at this season of the year is Italian in its atmospheric coloring. Indeed that land which possesses the "fatal gift of beauty" is fairly outrivaled by the Sopori.

The principal mine, which I also visited, is about two miles from the head-quarters. As yet the lode has been but little explored. A shaft has been sunk, from which some very rich ore has been taken, portions of it in small particles of pure silver.

I do not believe, however, from my own casual observation, that the mother vein has yet been struck. The average of ores taken out, and upon which experiments have been made, demonstrates a yield of $150 to the ton, and this by the rudest process of smelting. Selected specimens have yielded $700 to the ton. Still the vein does not appear to me sufficiently defined, at the point now reached, to warrant the belief that large results can be expected without further exploration. Mr. Bartlett, I believe, has taken a great interest in the development of this region, and has organized a company at Providence, Rhode Island, for the working of the mines on an extensive scale.

The whole country bears strong indications of rich mineral deposits. The Mexicans for many years past have worked some gold placers in the ravines of the neighboring mountains; and we saw the remains of arastras, where they had formerly ground and smelted silver ores. All this district of country needs development. With capital, energy, and patience it must eventually become one of the most valuable mining districts in the Territory.

It was late when we returned to our pleasant camping place under the wide-spreading "nogales," or walnut-trees, by the margin of the creek. The grass was luxuriant, and our animals enjoyed it with amazing zest. A fat deer, which we had killed on the way, enabled us to recompense ourselves for the fatigues of our tramp over the hills. When we turned-in upon our soft, grassy beds, and looked up at the clear star-spangled sky above us, there were some among us, I have no doubt, who thought that a home in such a charming wilderness would not be unpleasant, if one could be assured of such peace among men as reigned over the quiet earth. But peace like that is not for the races that inhabit this world. I lay for hours thinking over the unhappy condition of our country, and a profound sadness oppressed me as vision after vision of bloodshed and suffering and death passed like some funeral cortège through the silent watches of the night. Far away friends were falling in sanguinary strife; every where God's beautiful earth was desecrated by the wickedness of man; even here, in this remote wilderness, we were not exempt from the atrocities of a savage foe. We had seen the recent tracks of an Apache band on the road; and the cautious manner in which our animals were picketed and the guard stationed sufficiently manifested the insecurity of life and property in this region.

An early start enabled us to reach by noon the Heintzelman Mine—or, as it is more commonly called, the "Cerro Colorado." This celebrated mine belongs to a company of New York capitalists known as the "Arizona Mining Company." The distance by the road from Tubac is as follows: To Revanton, 8 miles; Sopori, 5; Cerro Colorado, 11; total, 24 miles. A much shorter road could be made across the foot-hills of the Atacosa range of mountains, but the work would be attended by considerable expense. From Sopori, the road now used is the public highway to Altar, Saric, and other points in Sonora, and will probably form a branch of the projected route to Port Libertad, on the Gulf of California. It runs through a broad open valley abounding in groves of walnut, oak, ash, and mesquit, fringing the bed of a creek which is usually dry at this season. Numerous arroyas extending down from the gulches of the neighboring mountains, in which the sands are drifted by the floods of former years, show that the country is not always so destitute of water as it is at present. The valley extends nearly all the way up from the Sopori to the foot-hills of the Cerro Colorado. It is covered with a luxuriant growth of grass, and is one of the finest grazing regions for cattle and sheep I have seen in the Territory. Sufficient water for stock can be had any where along the bed of the creek by digging a few feet. On the north side there is a rise of several hundred feet to the level of a mesa, which extends as far as the eye can reach, toward San Xavier del Bac. This plateau is dry and rocky, but produces fine grama grass, and furnishes an inexhaustible range for sheep. To the southward lie the rolling hills that join the Atacosa mountains. These are also covered with grass, and dotted with palo-verde, mesquit, and cactus. Deer are abundant in this region, having been but little disturbed during the past few years. We killed two as we traveled along the road, and saw many more. Wild turkeys, rabbits, quails, and other game also abound in great numbers, so that we had no difficulty in keeping our camp well supplied.

A prominent landmark for several miles before reaching the head-quarters of the Arizona Mining Company is the conical hill of reddish-colored rock called by the Mexicans the "Cerro Colorado," from which the district derives its name. Standing on a rise of rolling land, isolated from the neighboring mountains, it presents in its conformation and coloring a singularly picturesque feature in the scene. Back of this curious peak to the north lies a rugged range of mountains, upthrown, as it were, out of the earth by some tremendous volcanic convulsion. In this the strangest confusion of outlines and colors prevails; it is literally a chaotic wilderness of rocks, boulders, porphyritic pillars, masses of lava and scoria; weird and terrible, yet magnificent in the immensity of its desolation. Well has it been named by the old Spaniards the Mal Pais; yet no part of God's creation is utterly valueless to man. By that system of compensation which every where prevails, and of which Arizona furnishes some of the most remarkable examples, this desolate range of mountains abounds in veins of gold and silver, some of which have been profitably worked by the Mexicans. As yet, however, it has been but little explored by the Americans; and it would be difficult to estimate what may be the value of these deposits of precious minerals. Future exploration will doubtless develop them.

I was surprised on our arrival at the mine to see the amount of work which had been done at this place. The head-quarters lie on a rise of ground, about a mile distant from the foot of the Cerro Colorado, and present at the first view the appearance of a Mexican village built around the nucleus of a fort.

Scarcely three years ago the hacienda of the Cerro Colorado presented probably the most striking scene of life and energy in the Territory. About a hundred and twenty peons were in the employ of the Company; the works were in active operation; vast piles of ore were cast up daily from the bowels of the earth; wagons were receiving and discharging freights; the puff and whistle of the steam-engine resounded over the hills; herds of cattle, horses, mules, and other stock ranged over the valleys. At the time of our visit it was silent and desolate—a picture of utter abandonment. The adobe houses were fast falling into ruin; the engines were no longer at work; the rich piles of ore lying in front of the shafts had been sacked and robbed by marauding Mexicans; nothing was to be seen but wreck and ruin, and the few solitary graves on a neighboring hill, which tell the story of violence and sacrifice by which the pathway to civilization has been marked in Arizona.

We took up our quarters within the walled fortifications which mark the entrance to the mine. The works are well protected by a tower in one corner of the square, commanding the plaza and various buildings and store-houses, as also the shafts of the mine which open along the ledge for a distance of several hundred yards. We found the steam-engine still standing within the inclosure, but rusty and partially imbedded in the ground. Remains of arastras and "whims," with various massive beams scattered about, showed to some extent the large amount of labor expended upon these works.

The entrance to the mine is close by the tower. The shaft has been sunk to a depth of a hundred and forty feet, and has been for some time partially filled with water. Poston and myself descended by the ladders as far as we could. About sixty feet of water stopped us from going any farther. I was surprised at the completeness and durability of the work—the more so knowing with what difficulty every part of it had been accomplished.

Of the quality of the ores in this mine I am not prepared to express any opinion of my own. The best practical evidence I saw of their value was that the Mexicans had been plundering the different shafts which were accessible, just prior to our arrival; and judging from their rude system of reduction I scarcely think they would waste time in stealing ore of little value, and transporting it across the border line through an Apache country. It is well known that the town of Saric, in Sonora, has been built upon the proceeds of ore stolen from the Heintzelman mine. I saw scattered about the premises piles of ore, which had just been broken up ready for packing away; and the fresh tracks of mule-trains and wagon-wheels, on the well-beaten road to Saric, showed how profitable this sort of enterprise must be to the Sonorians.

Mr. S. F. Butterworth, who visited the Cerro Colorado eight days prior to our arrival, caught a party of them emerging from the mine. I may here mention that he was accompanied by Mr. Küstel, Mr. Higgins, and Mr. Janin—all gentlemen of learning and experience in mining matters—who assisted him in making a thorough examination of this mine and its resources. In the opinion of Mr. Butterworth and these gentlemen, the lode is one of the richest in Arizona, and will, under a judicious system of working, amply repay the capital invested in its development.

The average product of the Real del Monte mines in Mexico is $52 to the ton. That of the Gould and Curry, prior to the recent depression of mining interests in Nevada, was about $65. Assays of selected ores form no reliable criterion of the value of a mine. Some of the best ores have been taken from some of the poorest mines. It is the quantity of good average ore, and the facilities for working, that form the true criterion of value in this precarious business. Nothing is more unreliable, therefore, than estimates based upon exceptional tests. What the average of the Heintzelman mine is, has never, I believe, been determined by any systematic calculation, the operations having been of a transitory and progressive character. An assay of selected ore made by Dr. Garnett of San Francisco, in 1857, yielded $8624 of silver to the ton, and $111 20 of copper. The average of eight assays on different ores from the same mine, made by Professors Booth, Torry, Lock, Kinsey, and others, yielded $1424 45 to the ton. Recent assays made by Professor Jackson, of Boston, show 13 to 16 per cent. of silver, and 37 per cent. of copper to the ton. From the best information I can get, the average of ore worked at the Cerro Colorado hacienda, and at the hacienda of Arivaca, where a considerable portion of it was reduced, did not fall short of $250 to the ton; so that there can be no reasonable doubt as to the richness of the vein. It is clearly defined on the surface of the ground for a distance of two miles, and so far as subterranean explorations have gone, increases in width and quality as it descends.

The rich mineral district of the Cerro Colorado was first brought to the notice of Eastern capitalists by Mr. Poston, my friend and traveling companion, who explored it in March, 1856. To his indomitable energy is due the succession of discoveries since made in this and the neighboring districts of Santa Rita, Sopori, and Arivaca. During the summer of 1861, when the Federal troops were withdrawn, the Apaches renewed their depredations, and the barbarous races of Sonora turned loose to complete the work of destruction. Murder after murder followed in rapid succession. Mr. Poston's brother, who was in charge of the Heintzelman mine, was assassinated by the native employés. Within a few weeks every mine in the country, except that of Mr. Mowry, was deserted. After a series of hardships and difficulties almost incredible Poston and a single friend (Mr. Pompelly) made their escape to California. Those who have read the exquisite productions of Margaret and Lucretia Davidson—and few there are who have not—will feel interested in a brief notice of the only surviving member of that gifted family, Mr. M. O. Davidson, recently appointed Superintendent of the Heintzelman mine. This gentleman, whom I had the pleasure of meeting at San Xavier del Bac on our return from the Papagoria, arrived by the way of Guyamas with a party of thirty men, comprising some of the best practical miners, engineers, and artisans to be had in the Atlantic States. Mr. Davidson has had many years' experience of mining and engineering operations, as Superintendent of the Cumberland Coal Works and Chief Manager of the Havana Railroad in Cuba, and comes well prepared in other respects to develop the great mineral resources of Arizona. Already his men are at work, the engine is in operation, the main shaft will soon be sunk to a depth of several hundred feet, the buildings and reduction works will be refitted for occupation, new machinery erected, and contracts made for additional labor and supplies. Mr. Davidson will have many difficulties to contend with in this new field of enterprise; but with the protection of a Territorial Government it is to be hoped he will be exempt from those disheartening casualties which have so often fallen upon his predecessors. His views of the future destiny of Arizona are liberal and enlarged. He believes it to be a Territory destined to attract great attention within a few years. With a railway to Libertad and a free port on the Gulf, for which the people must look to the aid of Government, he is of opinion the prosperity of Arizona will be assured beyond question.

Seven miles from the Cerro Colorado we reached the Arivaca Ranch, long celebrated for its rich mines and fine pastures. This ranch, called by the Mexicans La Aribac, comprises within its boundaries 17,000 acres of agricultural land, 25 silver mines formerly worked by the Mexicans, and numerous gold, copper, and lead mines, as yet undeveloped. It contains a large amount of rich meadow-land, bordering on a never-failing stream; is well wooded with oak, walnut, ash, cotton-wood, and mesquit, and is capable of sustaining a population of five or six thousand souls. The range for cattle and sheep is almost without limit, extending over a belt of grazing country as far south as the Ari-zuma Mountains; west to the great peak of the Baboquivori, and north and east into the heart of the neighboring mountains. This goes far beyond the boundaries of the ranch; but in Arizona, as in California, the possession of water is tantamount to the possession of the whole surrounding country. The title is held by the Arizona Mining Company, and is derived from Thomas and Ignatio Orteiz, who perfected it as early as 1802. It was surveyed by Lieutenant A. B. Gray, of the Boundary Commission, in 1859. Up to the abandonment of the Territory in 1861 it was in a progressive state of improvement under the auspices of the Company's agent. The reduction works of the Heintzelman mine were situated on this ranch for the convenience of wood, water, and pasturage, and were projected on a costly and extensive scale. Little now remains of them save the ruins of the mill and furnaces, the adobe store-houses and offices, and a dilapidated corral.

We camped in the old mill, and spent a couple of days very pleasantly in visiting the mines and exploring the gulches of the neighboring mountains. Game was abundant. Some of our escort, who were good shots, brought in several fat deer, and we lived in sumptuous style during our stay.

A couple of miles below the head-quarters is situated another mining establishment belonging to the same Company, and designed for the use of certain mines in the same vicinity—one of which we visited and found to present very favorable indications of lead and silver ore. Several buildings in a fair state of preservation comprise what is left of the hacienda; also a double corral for horses and cattle.

To this corral hangs a tale. When Arivaca was occupied great precautions were taken to prevent the loss of stock by theft. The work animals were driven into the corral every evening before dark. A small adobe house, in which the vaqueros slept, stands opposite the entrance, with the door fronting the gate, so that it was supposed nothing could go in or out without attracting the attention of the guard. Watch-dogs were kept in order that the guard might be aroused in case he should happen to fall asleep during his watch, and the vaqueros were obliged to keep their door open. The bars of the gate were fastened with a heavy chain lashed around them, so that the least movement would be likely to make a noise. Besides there were white men in several of the quarters, well armed and always on the qui vive.

With all these precautions a band of four or five Apaches came one night and attempted to cut through the wall by sawing a gap in it with their hair riatas; but finding the material too hard they chose the alternative of making an attempt on the gate. To get the bars down without making a noise, they carefully unfastened the chain, and taking it link by link in their serapes as they moved it, actually succeeded in effecting an opening without even arousing the dogs. The Mexicans in charge were barely aroused in time to see thirty-nine valuable mules and several fine horses in full flight for the mountains. A party of five men was immediately dispatched in pursuit. The main body of the Apaches lay in ambush on the trail, and as soon as the pursuing party approached within a few paces, fired upon them, killing one, wounding another, and compelling the rest to fly for their lives. This was the last of the mules then belonging to the "Sonora Exploring and Mining Company;" which respectable body of capitalists will probably have to explore the mountains of Arizona a long time before they recover their property.

A still more adroit case of horse-stealing occurred in Sonora some years ago. A wealthy ranchero built a stone corral ten feet high, determined that the Apaches should never get possession of his stock. The gate was massive and iron-bound, and locked with a strong iron lock. One night a small band of these dextrous thieves climbed over the wall and lay down quietly under its shadow. At the usual time in the morning the vaqueros, unsuspecting of danger, unlocked the gate, swung it back to let the animals out as usual, and were profoundly astonished to see them dash forth in a stampede, five or six of them ridden by yelling devils of Apaches. Before they could fully realize the state of affairs there was not an Indian or an animal in sight; nor did the horses ever come in sight again. This is a well-authenticated incident, and has long been a favorite camp-story in Arizona.

From Arivaca we traveled through a broad open grazing country, over the proposed route to Libertad, on the Gulf of California. The first part of our journey, after passing the boundaries of the Arivaca ranch, some five or six miles below the haciendas, lay along a series of foothills to the left, with a fine pasture range to the right, extending to the Baboquivori Mountains. No water is found in this tract of country, but it is well wooded with mesquit, and the grass is excellent. The road continues through this valley till it strikes the rise of an extensive mesa to the right, over which it continues for twelve miles. A vast plain covered with small stones and pebbles and a scanty growth of grass and cactus, bounded in the distance by rugged ranges of mountains, is all the traveler can depend upon for enjoyment during the greater part of this day's journey. It becomes oppressively monotonous after a few hours. Nothing possessed of animal life is to be seen, save at very remote intervals, and then perhaps only a lonely rabbit or a distant herd of antelope. Even the smallest shrubs afford relief in this dreary wilderness of magnificent distances. The road winds, mile after mile, over the undulations of the mesa, turning to the right or to the left, like a great snake, often without any apparent reason save to measure the distance. Experience, however, taught us never to leave the main highway in Arizona; for in doing so the traveler is sure, sooner or later, to encounter an impracticable arroya or some impassable ridge of rocks. Colonel Ferguson had passed over this route nearly a year before, and we had the advantage of his wagon track, which was still comparatively fresh. This is another peculiarity of the country—the extraordinary length of time which even the slightest indentation in the ground lasts where the climate is so dry and equable. We saw wagon and mule-tracks which had been made, to the knowledge of some of our party, more than three years before.

Descending from the mesa, as we approached the mountain-range on the right, we entered a beautiful little valley, in which the grass was wonderfully luxuriant; but as usual there was no sign of water. The country is well wooded in this vicinity, abounding in fine specimens of cumero, a tree resembling the hackberry, and occasionally groves of oak on the hill-sides. Five miles through the bed of the valley brought us to a sign-board on the road-side, upon which we found written in Spanish and English:

On referring to Colonel Ferguson's report, we ascertained that the water was to be found at certain seasons about a mile up a cañon to the right, the entrance of which was marked by a cumero-tree. This camp is known as Zazabe, and is distant twenty-four miles from Arizona.

In full view to the east, between the Altar and Magdalena roads, lies the group of mountains called the Arizuma, in which the richest discovery of native silver known in the history of mining was made more than a century ago by the Spaniards. We had passed within fifteen or twenty miles of this famous mine on our way down into Sonora, and were now camped on the western side within about the same distance. It was with extreme reluctance that we were compelled to abandon the idea of visiting this interesting place. Our animals were much reduced in flesh, and our supplies of forage and provisions would be exhausted before we could complete our projected tour through the Cahuabia and the Papagoria.

Poston and myself, being a few miles ahead of the escort, availed ourselves of the chance to go up the cañon alone in search of the water, thinking we might see a deer on the way. I saw two, and shot one of them; but it did not stop on that account. The trail was marked by Apache tracks, apparently only a few days old. It was possible they were even then looking out for us. We found the water, as stated on the sign-board, about a mile from the cumero-tree. I must confess I kept a pretty sharp eye on the brush thickets and rocky fortresses that lined the sides of the cañon. Poston seemed rather to enjoy the prospect of losing his life than otherwise. I think he was reckless on account of a remark I had inadvertently made in camp the night before, that there would never be peace in Arizona or any where else until the whole human race was exterminated; and it was questionable if there would be then, for the animals would keep on fighting and killing one another. This thing of being shot through the body with rifle-balls and arrows, impaled with lances, and hung by the heels to a tree with a slow fire under one's head may be all very well as an adventure, but I am willing to let other people enjoy all the reputation that may attach to it.

A day's travel in Arizona is generally determined by the watering-places. We usually managed to make from twenty to twenty-five miles, but in some places were compelled to make forty or fifty, watering at the last place and dry-camping for the night. Whenever it became necessary to make a long stretch we started in the afternoon, traveled till midnight, camped till daylight, and then made the rest of the journada by noon.

Poso-Verde, or Green Wells, was our next encampment after leaving Zazabe. We followed the route to Altar till it intersects the wagon-road from Saric to Fresnal, passing on the way a deserted Indian village and some curious basaltic formations. Twelve miles below the point of the Baboquivori range of mountains we struck the road to Fresnal, which carried us back almost in an acute angle. There was no reason that we could perceive why we should not cut across by the Tualote trail, except that we were not on a tour of discovery, and could not afford time to experiment in short cuts. Nothing worthy of note occurred during this day's journey. We arrived at the Poso-Verde about two P.M., and found it a good camping-place, rather scarce of wood, but pleasantly sheltered by the mountains. The Boundary Commission spent some weeks at this point recruiting their animals and making explorations in the vicinity. The water is contained in a sort of pit, or natural tank, and has rather a strong flavor of alkali, corn-manure, dead coyotes, Indian sign, and decayed vegetable matter. A few hundred yards from the well is an adobe fort built by the Papago Indians as a protection to their frontier village and grazing range. The remains of a few bacquas are all the evidences of habitation we saw at this point. In former years it was frequented a good deal by Apache bands, but the Papagoes generally came off victorious in the battles that ensued. At this time they rarely appear except in squads of three or four, who descend from the mountains at night and make sudden raids upon the Papago cattle. Captain José, our chief, evidently felt a good deal of pride in the prowess of his people, though I must do him the justice to say he was quite modest about it.

I took my rifle during the afternoon and rambled up the cañon in search of a deer. About two miles from the well there is a beautiful little valley encircled by rugged mountains. The oak groves which adorn the pastures have much the appearance of apple orchards in a civilized country. The valley abounds in game. In several places near the water-holes the deer tracks were so thick that they reminded me of a sheep corral. Strange to say I saw but one deer during my ramble, yet this is not an uncommon experience in Arizona. We all saw acres of deer tracks and turkey tracks during our journey; but few of us saw the deer or the turkeys that made them. Game is exceedingly wild, and difficult to kill when shot. The tenacity of animal life is extraordinary. Indians must be riddled with balls before they can be killed. I know of a deer that ran half a mile without his liver and lights. As for quail they require about four ounces of duck-shot, and then they won't die easy. Several that I killed myself afterward made their escape into the bushes—a fact that I boldly assert on the veracity of a hunter.

There was a Californian volunteer in our party, holding the position of high-private, who declared on his word and honor as a gentleman that he shot a large hare four times and carried away a leg every time, so that the body of the poor animal had nothing left on it but the ears and tail; yet with even such limited means of locomotion it actually escaped by whirling over on its ears and tail, though he ran after it as fast as he could. Another even more remarkable— But I decline further revelations on the subject; and for additional information concerning the natural wonders of Arizona respectfully refer the reader to Buckskin Alick, a resident of San Xavier del Bac.

Leaving our camp at the Poso-Verde, we entered upon the extensive region of country lying to the west of the Baboquivori, and stretching, with occasional interruptions of detached sierras, as far as the Gulf of California. This vast tract of territory is for the most part a gravelly desert, intersected at remote intervals with arroyas and patches of palo-verde, mesquit, suarero, petaya, oquitoia, and choya—the shrubs and cacti usually found in the desert regions of Arizona. Water exists only in the “tenagas,” or natural tanks, formed at remote intervals in hollow basins by the action of the sun and rain; yet so scanty is the supply that men and animals have often been known to perish in attempting to cross this inhospitable region during the dry season.

A day's journey through the portion of the Papagoria lying along the foot-hills of the Baboquivori brought us to the first of the inhabited rancherias, near which is the small Mexican town of Fresnal, a collection of adobe hovels built at this point within the past two years, on account of the convenience afforded by the Indian wells for the reduction of ores stolen from the Cahuabia mines. There are also some rich silver-bearing veins in the neighborhood, but they have not been developed to any considerable extent.

A curious feature in Arizona mining operations that frequently attracted my attention was here exemplified. The Cahuabia district is situated in a detached range of mountains, distant about twenty-five miles from Fresnal, and although a limited quantity of water exists there, which could be increased by a small amount of labor, the Mexicans steal the ore from abandoned or neglected mines, and pack it across the intervening desert sooner than go to the trouble of digging wells for themselves and reducing the silver on the spot. There is no advantage in the way of wood or other supplies at Fresnal which could not be had by a little trouble at the Cahuabia.

I asked the Padrone, whom we found at work driving a blind horse around one of his arastras, why he went to the trouble of making trips to the Cahuabia mines and packing the ore twenty-five miles to reduce it when he could do it as well on the spot. His reply was, “Quién sabe?” I suggested to him that, from all I heard, water was as plenty in the ground there as it was here, and wood still more so. To this he answered: “Si Señor—quién sabe—quisas si—quisas no—yo no sai.” I ventured to hint that if the owners of the ore chose to prevent him from stealing it they could do so as well at Fresnal as they could at Cahuabia. “Si Señor,” said the Padrone, “yo pienso co si—yo no sai—quisas si, quisas no—quién sabe. Yo son muy pauvera.” This was all I could get out of him, and was as satisfactory as any thing I had ever derived from a Mexican thief. I think he was slightly rattled by the formidable appearance of our escort. Doubtless he thought we had come to raze the town, or seize the old blind horse that was at work in the arastra.

Fresnal contains some ten or a dozen rude adobe hovels, roofed and partially walled with the favorite building material of the country, oquitoia—a kind of hard, thorny cactus which grows on the deserts. We found here about twenty vagabond Sonorians, who were engaged in grinding and smelting the ores which they had stolen from the Cahuabia mines. The yield, according to their own account, was about $300 to the ton. I made a sketch of the grand old peak of the Baboquivori from this point. This is one of the most remarkable landmarks in Arizona, and is seen at the distance of sixty or eighty miles from the surrounding deserts.

We crossed the desert of the Papagoria the next day, and made an exploration of the Cahuabia district. The principal mines in this district are owned by the Cahuabia Mining Company. From the report of Mr. Mainzer, a very able practical engineer, it would appear that the silver lodes are among the richest in Arizona; and I can readily believe this to be the case from my own observation. I have seen nothing in Washoe or elsewhere that presents more favorable indications. Mr. Jaeger, our Fort Yuma friend “Don Diego,” of whose history I gave a brief sketch in my first paper, owns the “Pecacho,” a very rich lead, upon which considerable work has been done. A few Mexicans were engaged in getting out the ores at the time of our arrival. This mine was leased to a Mexican during the past two years, who, by the rudest system of working, managed to get about forty thousand dollars out of it, over and above expenses. I apprehend Don Diego is furnishing more silver to his Mexican friends out of the Pecacho than he is to himself. In the hands of a company of capitalists who would properly work the mine, I believe it would be a very profitable investment; but Don Diego is one of those eccentric men who considers himself rich as long as he has a large amount of property. Whether it pays himself or others is nothing to the point. He reminds me of a celebrated gentleman who is ambitious to own fifty millions of acres on the Colorado Desert—it would be such a magnificent piece of property!

Wood and water are scarce in the Cahuabia district, but grazing for animals is good during the greater part of the year. There would be no difficulty in procuring abundance of water by means of artesian wells; which, after all, must eventually be the salvation of Arizona.

We visited the Bahia, a silver lode of extraordinary richness, belonging to the Cahuabia Mining Company. From some Mexicans who were helping themselves to the ore we learned that it yielded an average of $300 to $350 to the ton, and occasionally they struck it in nearly a pure state. There are also very fine copper mines in the vicinity. Mr. Hill d'Amit, who was a member of our party on the trip to Sonora, is largely interested in one of these; and considers it one of the best copper leads in the country—quite equal to the celebrated Maricopa lead on the Gila. Difficulty of transportation is the great drawback to copper-mining in this part of Arizona. I am satisfied, from my own observation and from the concurrent testimony of others, that the Cahuabia is a mineral region of more than ordinary richness. It abounds in almost all the precious metals; but is as yet scarcely known beyond Tucson. No finer field for exploration and enterprise exists south of the Gila.

Our sojourn was necessarily limited. Water was scarce, the grass nearly used up, and our forage entirely out. Provisions, too, were becoming scanty; and we had a long journey yet to make across the barren wastes of the Papagoria.

Leaving our camping-place at the old hacienda of the Cahuabia Mining Company, we struck across for the next watering-place on the route to San Xavier, called Coyote, where we overtook the escort and baggage-wagons, having sent them on to that point from Fresnal. This is a desolate little spot, under the shadow of the mountains, with a pool of dirty water, the only attraction of the place. We distributed some few trinkets among the poor Indians living in the vicinity, and were kindly furnished in return with three eggs—all their village afforded.

From the Coyote to San Xavier del Bac is a stretch of forty-five miles without water. By starting late in the afternoon, after our animals had fed and quenched their thirst, we were enabled to make a dry camp on the desert, some thirty miles distant, by twelve o'clock at night. Before reaching camp we met a party of three horsemen, one of whom proved to be our friend Hill d'Amit on the way from Tucson to the Cahuabia. They brought letters from home—the first I had received. Too impatient to wait for a fire I lingered behind the train and read my letters by moonlight, the only light then available. A curious place to receive and read letters from home—the desert of Papagoria!

On our arrival at San Xavier we called a gathering of the Papagoes from all the villages of the Papagoria, and had a grand time for the next two weeks, delivering to them the goods and agricultural implements purchased by the Government for their use. There was great rejoicing among the women over their fine calico dresses and fancy-colored beads, and the men seemed much pleased to receive their hoes, picks, and shovels. If the hymns of praise sung by these simple people for the health and happiness of Mr. Commissioner Dole do not favorably affect his standing in the next world, it will not be owing to the ingratitude of his red children, or to the lack of eloquent speeches made in his behalf by Poston and myself.

We lodged in the grand old Mission Church. The good Padre Messea greatly contributed to our comfort and happiness by his unceasing kindness; and we had no reason to regret the time we were obliged to spend at this interesting place.

Sundry complimentary visits from our military friends stationed at Tubac resulted in the withdrawal of our escort and the seizure of our mules. Left on foot, with but scanty means of subsistence, we were compelled to cast ourselves upon the generosity of Captain José, who got us some provisions, and agreed to escort us down to the Pimo villages. By various adroit negotiations Poston secured a couple of private mules and a burro. Mr. J. B. Allen, of Tucson, a most estimable gentleman, to whom we were indebted for the most generous attention on several occasions, furnished us with a team for our ambulance. Thus provided with all the necessities of life, with Captain José as our Chief and Buckskin Alick as our Adjutant, we made perhaps the grandest sortie out of Tucson ever witnessed in that famous city. In due time we reached the Pimo villages.

Here I was compelled reluctantly to part from my good friend Poston, whose intelligent conversation and unremitting kindness had cheered and encouraged me through the entire tour. He was bound for the North on a political campaign, and I for my cottage home in Oakland, where my presence was rendered necessary by illness in my family. Mr. Allen kindly gave me a seat in his buggy as far as Fort Yuma. There I met an old friend, Mr. Ames, Superintendent of the Military Express, who had just arrived from Camp Drum. In the most generous manner he started on the return trip several days before his customary time, in order to furnish me with the means of conveyance home. We crossed the Colorado Desert and reached Los Angeles without serious accident, and in a few days more I was safely landed in San Francisco.

My impressions of Arizona may be summed up in a few words. I believe it to be a Territory wonderfully rich in minerals, but subject to greater drawbacks than any of our territorial possessions. It will be many years before its mineral resources can be fully and fairly developed. Emigration must be encouraged by increased military protection; capital must be expended without the hope of immediate and extraordinary returns; civil law must be established on a firm basis, and facilities of communication fostered by legislation of Congress.

No country that I have yet visited presents so many striking anomalies as Arizona. With millions of acres of the finest arable lands, there was not at the time of our visit a single farm under cultivation in the Territory; with the richest gold and silver mines, paper-money is the common currency; with forts innumerable, there is scarcely any protection to life and property; with extensive pastures, there is little or no stock; with the finest natural roads, traveling is beset with difficulties; with rivers through every valley, a stranger may die of thirst. Hay is cut with a hoe, and wood with a spade or mattock. In January one enjoys the luxury of a bath as under a tropical sun, and sleeps under double blankets at night. There are towns without inhabitants, and deserts extensively populated; vegetation where there is no soil, and soil where there is no vegetation. Snow is seen where it is never seen to fall, and ice forms where it never snows. There are Indians the most docile in North America, yet travelers are murdered daily by Indians the most barbarous on earth. The Mexicans have driven the Papagoes from their southern homes, and now seek protection from the Apaches in the Papago villages. Fifteen hundred Apache warriors, the most cowardly of the Indian tribes in Arizona, beaten in every fight by the Pimos, Maricopas, and Papagoes, keep these and all other Indians closed up as in a corral; and the same Apaches have desolated a country inhabited by 120,000 Mexicans. Mines without miners and forts without soldiers are common. Politicians without policy, traders without trade, store-keepers without stores, teamsters without teams, and all without means, form the mass of the white population. But here let me end, for I find myself verging on the proverbs.

ARIZONIAN IN SIGHT OF HOME.

DRIVING HOME THE COWS.

OUT of the clover and blue-eyed grass
He turned them into the river-lane;
One after another he let them pass,
Then fastened the meadow bars again.

Under the willows, and over the hill,
He patiently followed their sober pace;
The merry whistle for once was still,
And something shadowed the sunny face.

Only a boy! and his father had said
He never could let his youngest go:
Two already were lying dead
Under the feet of the trampling foe.

But after the evening work was done,
And the frogs were loud in the meadow-swamp,
Over his shoulder he slung his gun
And stealthily followed the foot-path damp.

Across the clover, and through the wheat,
With resolute heart and purpose grim,
Though cold was the dew on his hurrying feet,
And the blind bat's flitting startled him.

Thrice since then had the lanes been white,
And the orchards sweet with apple-bloom;
And now, when the cows came back at night,
The feeble father drove them home.

For news had come to the lonely farm
That three were lying where two had lain;
And the old man's tremulous, palsied arm
Could never lean on a son's again.

The summer day grew cool and late.
He went for the cows when the work was done;
But down the lane, as he opened the gate,
He saw them coming one by one:

Brindle, Ebony, Speckle, and Bess,
Shaking their horns in the evening wind;
Cropping the butter-cups out of the grass—
But who was it following close behind?

Loosely swung in the idle air
The empty sleeve of army blue;
And worn and pale, from the crisping hair,
Looked out a face that the father knew.

For Southern prisons will sometimes yawn,
And yield their dead unto life again;
And the day that comes with a cloudy dawn
In golden glory at last may wane.

The great tears sprang to their meeting eyes;
For the heart must speak when the lips are dumb
And under the silent evening skies
Together they followed the cattle home.

HEROIC DEEDS OF HEROIC MEN.

Port Hudson.—Its Situation.—Admiral Farragut.—Preparing the Fleet.—Running the Batteries.—The Midnight Battle.—Failure and Success.—Death of Lieutenant Cummings.—Loss of the Mississippi.—Various Incidents.—Coolness of Captain Smith.—Investment of Port Hudson.—Sunday Assault.—Heroism of the Soldiers.—Failure.—Fall of Vicksburg.—Surrender of Port Hudson.—Interesting Scenes.

THE passage by the Union gun-boats of the tremendous batteries which the rebels had erected at Port Hudson, was one of the most heroic deeds of the war. Port Hudson, or Hickey's Landing, as it used to be called, is situated on a bend, on the eastern side of the Mississippi River, about twenty-two miles above Baton Rouge, and one hundred and forty-seven miles below Vicksburg. The bluff, rising forty feet above the level of the river, was covered with forts for a distance of nearly four miles, constructed upon the most scientific principles of modern military art, and armed with the most approved and heaviest ordnance, which England, seeking the ruin of our republic, could furnish the rebels. The river, just at the bend, suddenly narrows, and the current, striking upon the west bank, is thrown across, running with great velocity, and carrying the channel almost directly under the base of the precipitous cliffs. Any vessel attempting the passage would be compelled to run the gauntlet of a plunging fire from batteries which commanded the range for several miles above and below.

It was proposed, in order that our fleet might be able to co-operate with General Grant in the siege of Vicksburg, to attack Port Hudson, and, under the fire of the bombardment, to attempt to force a passage, by several of our gun-boats, up the river. Rear-Admiral Farragut, who was intrusted with this perilous adventure, was the man for the hour. He had already acquired world-wide renown in the capture of New Orleans, a feat for which no parallel can be found in the annals of naval warfare.

This distinguished officer was born in Tennessee in 1803. His father was an army officer, much esteemed by General Jackson. When but nine years of age the boy, David Glasgow Farragut, entered the navy as a midshipman under Commodore Porter. From earliest childhood he has developed alike grandeur and magnanimity of character. Nursed in the midst of hardships and perils, he has ever proved himself adequate to any emergence. A Southerner by birth he married a Southern lady, established his home in Norfolk, Virginia, and was mainly surrounded by those whose sympathies were with the rebellion. But nobly he proved true to his country and his flag. As the madness of secession seized upon the community, Admiral Farragut, in his own home at Norfolk, expressed, with a sailor's frankness, his decided opposition to the disloyal proceedings.

"You can not be permitted to remain here," said the traitors, "while you hold such sentiments."

"Very well," replied the Admiral, "I will then go where I can live with such sentiments."

He knew the temper of the rebels, and went home and informed his family that they must take their departure from Norfolk for New York in a few hours. He left the next morning, April 18, 1861. The next night the navy-yard was burned. When he arrived in Baltimore he found that the rebel mob had possession of the streets, having torn up the railroad track. With difficulty he secured a passage to the North in a canal-boat. Reaching New York he obtained a safe retreat for his family at Hastings, on the Hudson, and then went forth to battle for that banner beneath which he had proudly sailed for more than half a century. Had he remained in Norfolk one day longer he would have been imprisoned and perhaps hung for his loyalty.

Treason in the Cabinet had scattered all our ships, that there might be no naval force at hand to oppose the rebels. For several months Admiral Farragut had no command, simply because the Government had no vessel to give him.

At length when the naval expedition was fitted out against New Orleans, he was selected as the right man to lead it. With his entire fleet, in an engagement which impartial history has pronounced almost superhuman in its daring and its accomplishment, he ran the batteries, surmounted all the obstructions in the river, and crushed the gun-boats of the enemy—aided, heroically aided, by Commodore Porter with his mortar-boats. On the 25th of April, 1862, he anchored before the city which treason had seized. Under the menace of his guns he compelled every rebel flag to go down into the dust. For this achievement he was elevated to the rank of Rear-Admiral; and probably now, after his achievements at Port Hudson and Mobile, no one will dispute his title to be the foremost naval hero of the war. Such was the man who was intrusted with the command of the fleet which was destined to run the batteries of Port Hudson.

The following anecdote, illustrative of his character is worthy of record. The Admiral has always been, from boyhood, thoughtful, earnest, studious. While in foreign ports he was ever busy in acquiring the language of the people. He spoke Italian, Spanish, French, and Arabic with almost as much fluency as his own language. On one occasion, in approaching an island in the Mediterranean, the captain of the ship remarked that he did not know how he should communicate with the people, as he had no interpreter. Just then a boat came alongside filled with natives.

"Captain," said one of the officers, "we have an officer on board who seems to speak all languages. He is doubtless in league with the 'Old Boy.' Suppose you send for him."

Lieutenant Farragut was called for. He looked into the boat and saw an old Arab woman there, with whom he immediately entered into conversation, alike to the surprise and amusement of all.

Eight war vessels comprised the expedition to ascend the Mississippi from New Orleans. The splendid flag-ship Hartford led, a first-class steam sloop of war. Her armament consisted of twenty-six 8 and 9 inch Paixhan guns. Then came the Richmond, a ship of the same class, armed with twenty-six 8 and 9 inch Columbiads. The first-class steam sloop of war Mississippi followed with twenty-two guns of the same calibre. The Monongahela, a second-class steam sloop, carried sixteen heavy guns. The gun-boats Kineo, Albatross, Sachem, and Genesee followed, each carrying three Columbiads and two rifled 32-pounders. All these vessels were screw-propellers except the Mississippi, which was a side-wheel steamer.

This little fleet ascended the river from New Orleans, and passing the smouldering ruins of Baton Rouge, the capital of Louisiana, anchored, on the morning of the 14th of April, 1863, a few miles below the long series of rebel batteries at Port Hudson. In ascending the river the starboard sides alone of the ships would be exposed to the fire of the rebels, and the starboard guns alone could be called into action. Every precaution was adopted in preparation for the terrible ordeal. The bulwarks consisted of solid timber, fifteen inches in thickness, impervious to bullets, but offering but little resistance to solid shot or shells. One remarkable feature of the preparation is worthy of especial notice. The passage was to be attempted in the darkness of the night. It would not be safe to have any light upon the deck, as that would guide the fire of the foe. The simple yet ingenious measure was adopted of white-washing the deck, the gun-carriages, and nettings, so that the stands of grape and canister were as visible as a black hat would be upon drifted snow. The effect of this contrivance struck all with surprise.

Early in the morning the squadron reached Prophet's Island, from which place the frowning batteries of the rebels could be plainly seen. Six mortar-boats, prepared to take part in the bombardment, but not designed to run the batteries, were here moored along the shore. They threw ponderous missiles, more destructive than the mythological bolts of Jove. At half past one o'clock these mortars opened fire, at a signal-gun from the Hartford, to try their range. The shells rose majestically into the air, through a curve of between three and four miles, and exploded over the rebel guns, without apparently doing much harm. In the mean time a small land-force, which had been sent by back-country roads to distract the attention of the garrison at Port Hudson by an attack in the rear, signified their arrival at their designated position by opening fire.

At half past nine o'clock at night a red light from the flag-ship signaled the ships and gun-boats to weigh anchor. The Hartford led, towing the Albatross lashed on her starboard side. The Richmond, following, towed the Genesee. The Monongahela towed the Kineo. The Mississippi and the Sachem followed.

The mortar-boats were anchored just above Prophet's Island, under shelter of the eastern banks, but from which point they could easily pitch their shells into the works of the foe.

Signal-lights were flashing along the rebel batteries, showing that they were awake to the movements of the Union squadron. Soon the gleam of a fire kindled by the rebels was seen, which blazed higher and more brilliant till its flashes illumined the whole river opposite the batteries with the light of day. This immense bonfire was directly in front of the most formidable of the fortifications, and every vessel ascending the stream would be compelled to pass in the full blaze of its light, exposed to the concentrated fire of the heaviest ordnance. Still it was hoped, notwithstanding the desperate nature of the enterprise, that a few at least of the vessels of the squadron would be able to effect a passage.

Silently in the darkness the boats steamed along, until a rebel field-piece, buried in the foliage of the shore, opened fire upon the Hartford. The challenge thus given was promptly accepted, and a broadside volley was returned upon the unseen foe. The rebel batteries, protected by strong redoubts, extended, as we have mentioned, with small intervening spaces, a distance of nearly four miles, often rising in tier above tier on the ascending bluff. Battery after battery immediately opened its fire; the hill-sides seemed peopled with demons hurling their thunder-bolts, while the earth trembled beneath the incessant and terrific explosions. And now the mortar-boats uttered their awful roar, adding to the inconceivable sublimity of the scene. An eye-witness thus describes the appearance of the mammoth shells rising and descending in their majestic curve:

"Never shall I forget the sight that then met my astonished vision. Shooting upward, at an angle of forty-five degrees, with the rapidity of lightning, small globes of golden flame were seen sailing through the pure ether—not a steady, unfading flame, but coruscating like the fitful gleam of a fire-fly, now visible and anon invisible. Like a flying star of the sixth magnitude the terrible missile—a 13-inch shell—nears its zenith, up and still up, higher and higher. Its flight now becomes much slower, till, on reaching its utmost altitude, its centrifugal force becoming counteracted by the earth's attraction, it describes a parabolic curve, and down, down it comes, bursting, it may be, ere it reaches terra firma, but probably alighting in the rebel works ere it explodes, where it scatters death and destruction around."

The air was breathing gently from the east, and dense volumes of billowy smoke hung over the river, drifting slowly across in clouds which the eye could not penetrate, and adding greatly to the gloom and sublimity of the scene. It strains a ship too much to fire all the guns simultaneously. The broadsides were consequently generally discharged by commencing with the forward gun, and firing each one in its turn in the most rapid manner possible—as fast as the ticking of a clock. The effect of this bombardment, from ship and shore, as described by all who witnessed it, was grand and terrific in the extreme. From the innumerable batteries, very skillfully manned, shot and shell fell upon the ships like hail. Piercing the awful roar, which filled the air as with the voice of ten thousand thunders, was heard the demoniac shrieks of the shells, as if all the demons of the pit had broken loose, and were reveling in hideous rage through the darkness and the storm.

In the midst of this scene of terror, conflagration, and death, as the ships were struggling through the fire against the swift current of the Mississippi, there was heard from the deck of the Richmond, coming up from the dark rushing stream, the cry of a drowning man, “Help! oh, help!” The unhappy sufferer had evidently fallen from the Hartford, which was in advance. In such an hour there could not be even an attempt made to rescue him. Again and again the agonizing cry pierced the air, the voice growing fainter and fainter as the victim floated away in the distance, until he sank beneath the turbid waves.

The whole arena of action, on the land and on the water, was soon enveloped in a sulphurous canopy of smoke, pierced incessantly by the vivid flashes of the guns. The vessels could no longer discern each other or the hostile batteries on the shore. It became very difficult to know how to steer; and as in the impenetrable gloom the only object at which they could aim was the flash of the guns, the danger became imminent that they might fire into each other. This gave the rebels great advantage; for with their stationary guns trained upon the river, though they fired into dense darkness, they could hardly fire amiss. Occasionally a gust of wind would sweep away the smoke, slightly revealing the scene in the light of the great bonfire on the bluff. Again the black, stifling canopy would settle down, and all was Egyptian darkness.

At one time, just as the Richmond was prepared to pour a deadly fire into a supposed battery, whose flash the gunners had just perceived, Lieutenant Terry shouted out, “Hold on, you are firing into the Hartford!” Another quarter of a minute would have discharged a deadly broadside into the bosoms of our friends. Just then another flash of the Hartford's guns revealed the spars and rigging of the majestic ship just along-side of the Richmond. The demons of war were now flapping their wings on the blast, and death and misery held high carnival. The surgeons were busy in their humane yet awful tasks. The decks were becoming slippery with blood. The shrill cry of the wounded often pierced the thunder of the conflict. The gloom, the smoke, the suffocation, the deafening roar, the bewilderment of the ships struggling through the darkness, presented a scene which war's panorama has perhaps never before unrolled.

Still the ships kept up an incessant fire from their starboard guns, and from brass howitzers stationed in the tops, whenever the lifting of the smoke would give them any chance to strike the foe. The ships were now all engaged. Many of them were within sixty feet of the batteries. The Monongahela had two immense rifled Parrott guns, each of which threw shot weighing two hundred pounds. The thunder of these guns and of the mammoth mortars rose sublimely above the general roar of the cannonade. A shell from a rebel battery entered the forward starboard port of the Richmond, and burst with a terrific explosion directly under the gun. One fragment splintered the gun-carriage. Another made a deep indentation in the gun itself. Two other fragments struck the unfortunate boat-swain's mate, cutting off both legs at the knee and one arm at the elbow. He soon died, with his last breath saying, "Don't give up the ship, lads!" The whole ship reeled under the concussion as if tossed by an earthquake.

The river at Port Hudson, as we have mentioned, makes a majestic curve. Rebel cannon were planted along the concave brow of the crescent-shaped bluffs of the eastern shore, while beneath the bluff, near the water's edge, there was another series of what were called water-batteries lining the bank. As the ships entered this curve, following the channel which swept close to the eastern shore, they were, one after the other, exposed to the most terrible enfilading fire from all the batteries following the line of the curve. This was the most desperate point of the conflict; for here it was almost literally fighting muzzle to muzzle. The rebels discharged an incessant cross-fire of grape and canister, to which the heroic squadron replied with double-shotted guns. Never did ships pass a more fiery ordeal.

Lieutenant-Commander Cummings, the executive officer of the Richmond, was standing with his speaking-trumpet in his hand cheering the men, with Captain Alden by his side, when there was a simultaneous flash and roar, and a storm of shot came crashing through the bulwarks from a rebel battery, which they could almost touch with their ramrods. Both of the officers fell as if struck by lightning. The Captain was simply knocked down by the windage, and escaped unharmed. The speaking-trumpet in Commander Cummings's hand was battered flat, and his left leg was torn off just below the knee.

As he fell heavily upon the deck, in his gushing blood, he exclaimed:

"Put a tourniquet on my leg, boys. Send my letters to my wife. Tell her that I fell in doing my duty!"

As they took him below, and into the surgeon's room, already filled with the wounded, he looked around upon the unfortunate group, and said,

"If there are any here hurt worse than I am let them be attended to first."

His shattered limb was immediately amputated. Soon after, as he lay upon his couch, exhausted by the operation and faint from the loss of blood, he heard the noise of the escape of steam as a rebel shot penetrated the boiler. Inquiring the cause, and learning that the ship had become disabled, he exclaimed, with fervor,

"I would willingly give my other leg if we could but pass those batteries!"

A few days after this Christian hero died of his wound. He adds another to the honored list of those martyrs who have laid down their lives to rescue our beloved country from the most wicked rebellion which ever disgraced the history of this world. A reporter of one of the New York papers, describing the scene just before the battle, writes:

"In conversation with Mr. Cummings I asked him whose post in time of action was on the bridge—a narrow platform even with the tops of the rail across the ship from side to side—where the best view can be had of the whole ship fore and aft. With a quiet smile he only pointed to his own breast. You may well believe that I often recalled this with great interest. There never was a more enthusiastic, chivalrous, and high-minded corps of officers than those on board the Richmond. They had toned up the whole ship's crew to their own valor."

The chaplain, Rev. Dr. Bacon, of New Orleans, was aiding with the group around the gun when Lieutenant Cummings fell; but he escaped unharmed. Like most of our chaplains during the war he avoided none of the peril of battle. No officer on board was more heroic than he, in facing every danger, as he animated the men to duty. Just above the batteries were several rebel gun-boats. They did not venture into the melee, but anxiously watched the fight, until, apprehensive that some of our ships might pass, they put on all steam and ran up the river as fast as their web-feet could carry them. But now denser and blacker grew the dark billows of smoke. It seemed impossible, if the steamers moved, to avoid running into each other or upon the shore. An officer of each ship placed himself at the prow, striving to penetrate the gloom. A line of men passed from him to the stern, along whom, even through the thunders of the battle, directions could be transmitted to the helmsman. Should any of the ships touch the ground beneath the fire of such batteries their destruction would be almost sure.

It was a little after 11 o'clock at night when the first shot had been fired. For an hour and a half the unequal conflict had raged. The flagship Hartford and the Albatross succeeded in forcing their way above the batteries, and in thus gaining the all-important object of their enterprise. The Richmond, following, had just passed the principal batteries when a shot penetrated her steam-chest, so effectually disabling her for the hour that she dropped, almost helpless, down the stream. The Genesee, which was along-side, unable to stem the rapid current of the river, with the massive Richmond in tow, bore her back to Prophet's Island. Just as the Richmond turned a torpedo exploded under her stern, throwing up the water mast-head high, and causing the gallant ship to quiver in every timber.

The Monongahela and Kineo came next in line of battle. The commander of the Monongahela, Captain M'Kinstry, was struck down early in the conflict. The command then devolved on a gallant young officer, Lieutenant Thomas. He manfully endeavored through all the storm of battle to follow the flag-ship. But in the dense smoke the pilot lost the channel. The ship grounded directly under the fire of one of the principal rebel batteries. For twenty-five minutes she remained in this perilous position, swept by shot and shell. Finally, through the efforts of her consort, the Kineo, she was floated, and again heroically commenced steaming up the river. But her engineery soon became so disabled under the relentless fire, that the Monongahela was also compelled to drop down with the Kineo to the position of the mortar fleet. Her loss was six killed and twenty wounded.

In obedience to the order of Admiral Farragut, the magnificent ship Mississippi brought up the rear, with the gun-boat Sachem as her ally, bound to her larboard side. She had reached the point directly opposite the town, and her officers were congratulating themselves that they had surmounted the greatest dangers, and that they would soon be above the batteries, when the ship, which had just then been put under rapid headway, grounded on the west bank of the river. It was an awful moment; for the guns of countless batteries were immediately concentrated upon her. Captain Smith, while with his efficient engineer Rutherford he made the most strenuous exertions to get the ship afloat, ordered his gunners to keep up their fire with the utmost possible rapidity. In the short space of thirty-five minutes they fired two hundred and fifty shots. The principal battery of the foe was within five hundred yards of the crippled ship, and the majestic fabric was soon riddled through and through by the storm with which she was so pitilessly pelted. The dead and the wounded strewn the decks, and it was soon evident that the ship could not be saved.

Captain Smith prepared to destroy the ship, that it might not fall into the hands of the rebels, and to save the crew. Captain Caldwell, of the iron-clad Essex, hastened to his rescue. Under as murderous a fire as mortals were ever exposed to, the sick and wounded were conveyed on board the ram. Combustibles were placed in the fore and after part of the ship, to which the torch was to be applied so soon as the crew had all escaped to the western shore. By some misunderstanding she was fired forward before the order was given. This caused a panic, as there were but three small boats by which they could escape. Some plunged into the river and were drowned. It is related, in evidence of the coolness of Captain Smith, that in the midst of this awful scene, while lighting his cigar with steel and flint, he remarked to Lieutenant Dewy:

"It is not likely that we shall escape, and we must make every preparation to secure the destruction of the ship."

After spiking nearly every gun with his own hands, and seeing that the survivors of his crew were fairly clear of the wreck, Captain Smith, accompanied by Lieutenant Dewy, Ensign Backelder, and Engineer Tower, sadly took their leave, abandoning the proud fabric to the flames. Scarcely had they left, when two shells came crashing through the sides of the Mississippi, overturning, scattering, and enkindling into flame some casks of turpentine. The ship was almost instantly enveloped in billows of fire. A yell of exultation rose from the rebels as they beheld the bursting forth of the flames. The ship, lightened by the removal of three hundred men, and by the consuming power of the fire, floated from the sand-bar and commenced floating, bow on, down the river.

The scene presented was indeed magnificent. The whole fabric was enveloped in flame. Wreathing serpents of fire twined around the masts and ran up the shrouds. Drifting rapidly downward on the rapid current, the meteor, like a volcanic mountain in eruption, descended as regularly along the western banks of the stream as if steered by the most accomplished helmsman. As the ship turned round, in floating off, the guns of her port battery, which had not been discharged, faced the foe. As the fire reached them the noble frigate, with the stars and stripes still floating at her peak, opened a new bombardment of the rebel batteries. The shells began to explode, scattering through the air in all directions. The flaming vision arrested every eye, on the land and on the ships, until the floating mountain of fire drifted down and disappeared behind Prophet's Island. And now came the explosion of the magazine. There was a vivid flash, shooting upward to the sky in the form of an inverted cone. For a moment the whole horizon seemed ablaze with fiery missiles. Then came booming over the waves a peal of heaviest thunder. The very hills shook beneath the awful explosion. This was the dying cry of the Mississippi, as she sank to her burial beneath the waves of the river from which she received her name.

Captain Caldwell of the Essex who, as soon as he saw the Mississippi to be on fire, gallantly steamed to her aid, directly under the concentrated fire of the batteries, succeeded in picking up many who were struggling in the waves, and in rescuing others who had escaped to the shore. There were about three hundred men on board the Mississippi. Of these sixty-five officers and men were either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. Seventy who escaped to the shore, wandered, for many miles, down the western banks of the stream, in constant danger of being taken captive, wading the bayous, and encountering fearful hardships, until they finally reached the ships below. Two ships, the Hartford and the Albatross, succeeded in running the gauntlet. We have not space here to recount their subsequent exploits.

Two months now passed away, during which vigorous preparations were made in New Orleans to attack and capture Port Hudson, so that efficient aid might be contributed to General Grant, who was at that time besieging Vicksburg. In the mean time the rebels had been very busy, and the batteries at Port Hudson were surrounded, on the land side, by as powerful a series of ramparts and redoubts as modern science could construct. A large patriot fleet and army were assembled at Baton Rouge. The rebel works were soon invested. The lines of the Union army extended in a semicircle from Thompson's Bayou, five miles above Port Hudson, to Springfield's Landing, about the same distance below. While this movement of the land-forces was taking place the fleet was attracting the attention of the rebels by an incessant bombardment. The Hartford and Albatross, which had run the blockade, attacked the upper batteries; while the Richmond, Monongahela, Genesee, and Essex opened their hottest fire upon the batteries below.

General Banks was in command of the land-force. The extreme right was commanded by General Weitzel, the centre by Generals Emory and Grover, the left by General T. W. Sherman. The artillery brigade was under the command of General Arnold. On the morning of Wednesday, the 27th of May, 1863, the great battle began. Our troops were to march up with bare bosoms against one of the strongest positions in the world. An almost impenetrable abatis of felled trees covered the ground before them. Sharpshooters occupied every available point to pick off the officers. The ramparts bristled with artillery, double-shotted with grape and canister. Dense lines of rebels of desperate valor crouched behind the earth-works, with muskets loaded and capped, prepared, while almost safe from danger themselves, to hurtle such a storm of lead into the faces of the advancing patriots as mortal bravery has rarely encountered.

The patriots who were to face this fiery ordeal were men who detested war. With great reluctance they had but recently left their homes of peaceful industry. They loved their wives and their children, and scenes of destruction and carnage were abhorrent to all their feelings. But the free institutions, so priceless, which their fathers had bequeathed to them, were endangered, and for the integrity of their country they were nobly willing to lay down their lives.

The line of battle was formed at daybreak. Weitzel, Grover, Augur, Sherman—men already renowned in this great strife for popular rights—marshaled their enthusiastic men in the dim twilight for the day of blood. The signal for the onset was given, and the whole majestic line moved forward. At the same signal every gun in the fleet which could be brought to bear upon the foe opened its thunders. Every rebel battery and musket responded, and for a circuit of leagues the deafening roar of battle filled the air. Hour after hour there was no intermission. Both parties fought with the utmost possible determination. Through mutilation and death, and over every obstacle, the patriots pressed resolutely forward. The rebels contested every inch. Guns were clubbed. Bayonets crossed each other. Hand clenched hand and breast pressed breast in the deadly strife. The patriots drove the rebels from several portions of their works, seized their guns, and turned them upon the retiring foe. These young men, fresh from their homes and from all the ennobling pursuits of industry, moved steadily forward against and clambered over these bristling ramparts, under the most murderous fire of shot, shell, grape, canister, and musketry, with all the firmness of veterans.

The Second Regiment of Louisiana Native Guards, under Colonel Nelson, made one of the most heroic charges of the day. They went in nine hundred strong. When they came out but six hundred answered to the roll-call. They poured one charge of bullets in upon the foe, and then, through a concentric fire of musketry and batteries, rushed forward with fixed bayonets. The Sixth Michigan and the One Hundred and Twenty-eighth New York were in the same charge. General Sherman led in person, and was carried from the field severely wounded. General Neal Dow, of Maine, was also wounded. Each of these two regiments lost nearly one half of its effective men. The patriots, in this heroic attack upon the right, gained the ground they fought for. But they could not hold it, for it was commanded by other and more formidable batteries in their rear.

In the centre the onset by Augur and Grover was no less impetuous. The rebels were driven foot by foot from their rifle-pits and outer intrenchments into their main works, from which they never emerged again until they marched out prisoners of war. The rebels had placed every obstacle in the way of the Union advance which art could suggest, and all the most terrible engines of war exhausted their energies in the work of slaughter. And yet these young patriots, all inexperienced in war's horrible science, who had enlisted but for nine months, carried line after line of intrenchments, with precision of movement not surpassed by the veteran soldiers of Waterloo or Sevastopol.

Our loss amounted to about a thousand men in killed, wounded, and missing. But we gained very important advantages. Several guns were captured, the rebels were driven back, and positions of great military importance were secured for future operations. The efforts of the fleet were equally successful. The accuracy of the firing was very remarkable. Five of the heaviest guns of the rebels were dismounted.

The First Regiment of Louisiana engineers rendered efficient service in this action. It was composed exclusively of colored men. General Banks, speaking of them in his report, says:

"In many respects their conduct was heroic. No troops could be more determined or more daring. They made, during the day, three charges upon the batteries of the enemy, suffering very heavy losses, and holding their position at nightfall with the other troops on the right of our line. Whatever doubt may have existed heretofore as to the efficiency of organizations of this character, the history of this day proves conclusively to those who were in condition to observe the conduct of these regiments, that the Government will find in this class of troops effective supporters and defenders."

A fortnight now passed away of cannonading, of skirmishing, of incessant action of sharpshooters, of throwing up intrenchments, and digging parallels. On the 14th of June all things were ready for another grand assault. The point of attack now chosen was the extreme northeasterly corner of the rebel works. Weitzel and Kimball and Morgan and Paine and Grover had massed their forces here for another great struggle. For several days a heavy fire of artillery had been kept up at this point upon the hostile batteries, and several of their most important guns had been dismounted. We had been steadily drawing nearer to their works, picking off their gunners with our sharpshooters wherever we could get sight of a head or a hand, and now our batteries were in many places within three hundred yards of those of the foe.

At 10 o'clock at night of Saturday, June 13, General Augur, who had just returned from the head-quarters of General Banks, gave orders that all were to be in readiness for the grand assault at 3 o'clock the next morning, Sunday. Eager as all the soldiers were for the movement, and sanguine as they were of success, there probably was not a Christian man in the army who did not regret that the assault was to be made on the Sabbath day. Rarely during the war had a party making an offensive movement on Sunday been successful. The fact had attracted the attention even of the most thoughtless men.

The day had not dawned when the brigades were moving by routes which had been carefully marked out to them for the impetuous assault. During several previous days the engineers had been employed constructing a covered way through which the assaulting column could advance to within about three hundred yards of the enemy's position. Through this they marched in single file to the point where they spread out in line of battle. The advance was then over an old cotton-field. But the rebels had filled it with lines of ditches, which were covered and concealed by an abatis of fallen trees and vines. The rifle-pits of the foe commanded every inch. It was impossible for horses to move across this plain, and infantry could by no possibility keep in regular order of battle. The entire line of rebel works extended eight miles by land and three or four by water. Along this whole circuit the assault was to be made simultaneously by the army and navy, and with the utmost determination that there might be no concentration of rebel troops to repel the main assault, which was to be made upon the northeast angle of the rebel lines. Elsewhere the attack was merely to distract attention, and to keep the foe engaged.

Before the dawn the most terrific cannonading commenced along the whole line afloat and ashore. Every gun within the rebel intrenchments and from the patriot opposing batteries was fired with the utmost rapidity. Not a man on those grounds had ever before heard thunders of war so awful. The air was filled with shrieking, bursting shells. The hills shook beneath the tremendous explosions. Dense clouds of smoke, which hung heavily over the whole expanse, gave the place the appearance of a vast volcano in violent eruption.

The grand assaulting column was under the immediate command of General Paine. It was led by the Eighth New Hampshire and the Fourth Wisconsin regiments. Then came the Fourth Massachusetts and the One Hundred and Tenth New York. Then came the Third Brigade under Colonel Gooding, consisting of the Thirty-first, Thirty-eighth, and Fifty-third Massachusetts, and the One Hundred and Fifty-sixth and One Hundred and Seventy-fifth New York. The Second Brigade followed, under Colonel A. Fearing. Its serried ranks were composed of the One Hundred and Thirty-third and the One Hundred and Seventy-third New York. The remainder of this brigade were detailed as skirmishers. Then came the First Brigade under Colonel Ferris. It was composed of the Twenty-eighth Connecticut, the Fourth Massachusetts, and four companies of the One Hundred and Tenth New York. The necessary number of pioneers and Nims's Massachusetts Battery were added.

Such was the immense battering-ram which military science had devised and constructed to break through the rebel intrenchments. While the storm of war was beating with the utmost fierceness along a circuit twelve miles in extent, this ponderous force was to be hurled headlong, with all conceivable impetuosity, upon a single point. Success seemed certain. The battle can not be described. It was a delirious scene of terror, tumult, and blood. The following words from one who was a participant in the scene may give a faint idea of its horrors:

"The moment we turned into the road shot, shell, grape, and canister fell like hail around us. On we went. A little higher a new gun opened upon us. Still farther they had a cross-fire—oh, such a terrible one! But on we went bending, as, with sickening shrieks, the grape and canister swept over us. I had no thought, after a short prayer, but for my flag. The color-bearer fell, but the flag did not. Half the guard fell, but the flag was there. When about three hundred yards from the works I was struck. The pain was so intense that I could not go on. I turned to my second lieutenant, and said, 'Never mind me, Jack; for God's sake jump to the colors.' I don't recollect any thing more until I heard Colonel Benedict say, 'Up, men, and forward!' I looked, and saw the rear regiments lying flat to escape the fire, and Colonel Benedict standing there, the shot striking all about him, and he never flinching. It was grand to see.

"When I heard him speak I forgot all else, and running forward, did not stop till at the very front and near the colors again. There, as did all the rest, I lay down, and soon learned the trouble. Within two hundred yards of the works was a ravine parallel with them, completely impassable from the fallen timber in it. Of course we could not move on. To stand up was certain death. So was retreat. Naught was left but to lie down, with such scanty cover as we could get. We did lie down in that hot, scorching sun. I fortunately got behind two small logs, which protected me on two sides, and lay there, scarcely daring to turn, for four hours, till my brain reeked and surged, and I thought that I should go mad. Death would have been preferable to a continuance of such torture. Lots of poor fellows were shot as they were lying down; and to lie there and hear them groan and cry was awful. Just on the other side of the log lay the gallant Colonel Bryan with both legs broken by shot. He talked of home, but bore it like a patriot. Near him was one of my own brave boys with five balls in him. The Colonel got out of pain sooner than some, for he died after two hours of intense agony. Bullets just grazed me as they passed over. One entered the ground within an inch of my right eye. I have been in many battles, but I never saw, and never wish to see, such a fire as that poured on us on June 14. It was not merely terrible. It was HORRIBLE."

After eight hours of as desperate fighting as was ever witnessed on earth, our charging columns were repulsed with great slaughter. About 11 o'clock A.M. the fighting ceased. The ground in front of the rebel redoubts was covered with the patriot dead and wounded. But till night darkened the scene the rebels inhumanly fired upon the wounded writhing in their blood; and no one could carry to them a cup of cold water without being struck by the bullet of a sharpshooter. General Paine was severely wounded by a ball which broke both bones of his leg just below the knee. He could not be brought from the field until after dark. Before he was struck down he had got five regiments within four rods of the rebel works, and some of his skirmishers had actually clambered over the ramparts. Not being promptly supported, they were speedily cut down. As General Paine lay upon his back hour after hour in the blistering sun, slightly protected between two rows of the cotton-field, he dared not attempt to cover his face with his cap, for if the rebels saw the slightest movement a shower of balls was instantly poured upon him. Our whole loss during the day amounted to about seven hundred and fifty. It was a sad Sabbath day's work. We had lost much, and gained nothing. The next day, under a flag of truce, the dead and wounded were removed.

Port Hudson was in reality but an outpost of Vicksburg, where General Grant was day by day cutting off the resources of the rebels, capturing their outlying batteries, and driving them within narrower limits. The fall of either of these great fortresses rendered the other no longer tenable. On the 4th of July, 1863, the garrison at Vicksburg, more than thirty thousand strong, were compelled to an unconditional surrender to General Grant. The joyful tidings were speedily conveyed down the river to the patriot army surrounding Port Hudson. Salvos of artillery and shouts from thirty thousand patriot throats conveyed the news to the rebels within their strong intrenchments. General Banks was just preparing for another assault, when he received a communication from General Gardner, who was in command of the rebel works, offering to surrender. General Frank Gardner at Port Hudson and General Pemberton at Vicksburg were both Northern men. They had both gone from their free homes in the North to fight against that banner beneath whose folds they were born, and for the destruction of that Constitution to which our country was indebted for all its prosperity and power.

As we have mentioned, Port Hudson was three hundred miles below Vicksburg. It was not until the morning of the 7th that General Banks received the news of the surrender. General Gardner sent to him that afternoon a communication containing the following words:

"Having received information from your troops that Vicksburg has been surrendered, I make this communication, to ask you to give me the official assurance whether this is true or not; and if true, I ask for a cessation of hostilities with a view to the consideration of terms for surrendering this position."

In General Banks's brief response, dated July

RAISING THE STARS AND STRIPES.

8, he stated: "I have the honor to inform you that I received yesterday morning, July 7, at 45 minutes past 10 o'clock, by the gun-boat General Price, an official dispatch from Major-General Ulysses S. Grant, United States Army, whereof the following is a true extract:

"The garrison of Vicksburg surrendered this morning. The number of prisoners, as given by the officers, is twenty-seven thousand, field-artillery one hundred and twenty-eight pieces, and a large number of siege-guns, probably not less than eighty."

"I regret to say that under present circumstances I can not consistently with duty consent to a cessation of hostilities for the purpose you indicate."

Preparations had already been made for an immediate assault. Our troops were flushed with the joyful news which they had heard, and which rendered the downfall of Port Hudson certain. They were anxious to be led instantly against the foe, that they might storm and take his batteries before the fleet and the army should have time to descend from Vicksburg and deprive them of a portion of the honor. The rebels knew that their doom was sealed. They could not escape, and they could not resist the forces now to be arrayed against them. Nothing whatever could be gained by prolonging the contest. General Gardner accordingly sent back a reply couched in the following terms:

"Having defended this position as long as I deem my duty requires, I am willing to surrender to you, and will appoint a commission of three officers to meet a similar commission appointed by yourself at 9 o'clock this morning, for the purpose of agreeing upon and drawing up the terms of surrender, and for that purpose I ask for a cessation of hostilities."

The commissioners immediately met, and the articles of capitulation were signed, by which the fortress with all its garrison, its stores, and its armament, was surrendered to the National Government. At the earliest dawn of the next morning, Thursday, July 9, the whole patriot camp was alive with joyful animation to witness the glorious spectacle the day was to usher in. It was a splendid morning. The air was filled with the flutterings of the Star-spangled Banner, and from scores of martial bands our national airs were pealed forth over the water and the land.

General Andrews, chief of staff of General Banks, at 7 o'clock, with a strong column of the victors, made the grand entrance into the rebel fortifications. The rebel army were drawn up in an immense line upon the bluff, with their backs toward the river. Their officers, in great dejection, were grouped together on one side. The patriot army advanced with gleaming weapons, and were spread out in a double line in face of the conquered garrison. The patriot officers each took his position in front of his men. General Gardner then advanced toward General Andrews and offered him his sword. General Andrews declined receiving it, courteously saying,

"In appreciation of your bravery, however misdirected, you are at liberty to retain your sword."

General Gardner then said, "General, I will now formally surrender my command to you; and for that purpose will give the order to ground arms."

The order was given. Five thousand men bowed their heads, deposited their arms upon the ground, and rose prisoners of war. Armed guards were then placed over the captives, and the glorious old flag of the Union rose and floated forth like a meteor from the flag-staff. It was unfurled to the breeze from one of the highest bluffs by the men of the steamship Richmond. The flag was saluted by the thunders of a battery whose reverberations rolled majestically along the broad surface of the Mississippi. And thus this great national river, upon whose banks uncounted millions are yet to dwell, and which treason had insanely attempted to wrest from the nation, was restored to its rightful owners. Treason has done its utmost to rob the nation of the Mississippi, and has failed. The banner of rebellion will never again go up upon those shores. The Stars and Stripes will never again go down.

As the immediate fruit of this capture there fell into our hands 5500 prisoners, 20 pieces of heavy artillery, 5 complete batteries numbering 31 pieces of field artillery, a large supply of balls and shells, 44,800 pounds of cannon powder, 5000 stand of arms, 150,000 rounds of ammunition, 2 steamers, and a considerable amount of commissary stores.

The rebel General Gardner admitted that even if Vicksburg had not fallen he could not have held out three days longer. He had made up his mind that he could not repel another assault. He was therefore anxiously watching every movement, intending that so soon as there should be decisive indications of an assault that he would surrender. The capture of Port Hudson consequently redounds to the glory of the heroic army which surrounded it. It was the result of the Herculean exertions and the military ability of the fleet and the army under Commodore Farragut and General Banks. To them belong the undivided honor.

MY STAR.

I LOOKED upon the starry heavens one night
Long years ago, when I was but a boy;
Then Life seemed brimming over with delight—
Filled was the cup with sweetest draughts of joy.

Among the glittering host which gemmed the skies
I chose one star, and said, "It shall be mine;"
And often in the night my boyish eyes
Turned to that star to watch it gleam and shine.

And oft in childish thought I wondered then
If those bright spheres were teaming worlds like ours,
If cities shone thereon, and crowds of men
Swarmed the long streets, or toiled through weary hours.

The years slid by—the boy to manhood grew;
No longer only roses strewed Life's ways,
Her paths were rugged, and the strong winds blew
Harsher and rougher than in other days.

And like a breeze which over gardens blows,
Laden with faint perfumes of many flowers;
Or as the sun, long hidden, when he glows
Through cloud and mist which veiled his face for hours,

Came the forgotten fancy back again
Through Memory's crystal gates, which stood ajar,
And the Man, looking on the jeweled plain,
Searched the broad heavens in vain for that one star.

Had it gone wandering through the realms of space
Like a lost Pleiad, or had his dull eyes
Forgotten, in the growth of years, its place
Amid the glittering splendor of the skies?

One time he stood with her his heart held dear,
With her he deemed the fairest of the fair;
And words of love had blessed her willing ear,
Falling like gentlest dew upon the air.

That night she pointed to a brilliant star,
And called it hers, with all its myriad rays;
And lo! within the shining heavens afar
He saw the lost star of his boyhood's days.

Since then, somehow, the skies have sunnier grown,
And goldener seem the fleeting, honeyed hours,
And all along Life's rugged paths have blown
Sweet-scented buds, and fragrant, lovely flowers.

SUGAR-MAKING IN CUBA.

YNGENIO EL FLOR DE CUBA.

ALMOST twelve years ago (November, 1853) this Magazine described the processes of making sugar then in use in Louisiana. The processes then employed in Cuba were essentially the same. Since that time great improvements have been introduced into Cuba. It is proposed in the present paper to describe the processes now employed upon the larger "Yngenios" or sugar estates.

Since the difficulties attending the slave-trade became serious, and the cost of African slaves has been consequently increased, the Cuban planters have carefully scrutinized every improvement likely to reduce the cost of labor, and have generally abandoned the cultivation by the hoe, so that the quality of clayed sugar produced by good machinery and scientific process now surpasses that of any other country in the world. There is no want now of enterprise among the leading sugar-planters, and they are not deterred by the cost of any machinery which will, in their judgment, save money. On the contrary, they are more apt to err by extravagant outlay on projects yet untried; and more than one fine estate has passed through the hands of liquidators on account of its ruinous cost.

The old wasteful process of boiling in open trains is abandoned on the largest estates; and where it is yet practiced, it is generally in connection with some improved process of filtering, or at least of drying the molasses sugar or "muscovado." It must not be understood that the expensive process of boiling in vacuum-pans is universal. There are still many small mills whose owners can not afford these costly machines, and there are over four hundred driven by oxen. These, however, are insignificant in their capacity of production when compared with the large estates using the best machinery known to sugar-makers.

SUGAR COOLERS—EL TREN COMUN.

A few words will serve to describe the old system, which can be seen in full operation in any of the large sugar districts, under the name of El Tren comun or Tren de Jamaica, from the class of kettles used. The cane on being passed through the rollers of the grinding-mill is deprived of its juice, and the fibre, or "trash," is carried on by an endless band to fall into a cart below, from which it is spread out in the fields to dry, and in due time finds its way back to the furnaces. Meanwhile the juice runs through strainers, and is lifted by a force-pump to oblong troughs which stand near the chimneys of the furnace. In these it is allowed to settle, and the scum rises in a few minutes to the surface, a gentle heat being applied meanwhile. The sirup is then drawn off into a train of copper kettles below to be converted into sugar. In the first of these kettles it is treated to a little milk of lime, which causes the scum to rise to the surface in a dense body, when it is removed by the negroes with a common strainer or skimmer. From this pan it is passed to others, according to its advance toward crystallization, nearer and nearer to the mouth of the furnace, boiling furiously meanwhile until it reaches at last, after a passage of several hours, the pan called the teache-pan, or strike-pan, over the very mouth of the furnace. As the entire contents of one pan is discharged into the next at the same time that a fresh supply of juice is introduced from those behind it, all are kept full, and the scene is very lively when the fires are good and the sirup boils briskly. A negro guards each pan, or more frequently has two under his care, and is actively at work tossing the sirup into the air when the bubbles become too large and run over into the next pan, thus showing that there is danger of burning the sugar. At other times the negroes are busy skimming off, with a light hand, any feculencies which may arise.

The most delicate process in this rather rude manufacture is the test of the sugar, when it reaches the last pan and becomes thick. In the last few minutes, before it is fit to be removed from the fire, the crystals form with great rapidity, and the sugar-master is constantly trying the sirup with his finger and thumb, the teache or "touch" test, which gives the name to this pan. Baumé's Saccharometer is also used, but, not generally, the proof by the eye being simpler and better. When the sugar reaches this state there is much danger of burning; and upon the skill of the sugar-master, in making the strike at the right moment, will depend the quality of the sugar. From the strike-pan the sugar is run into shallow coolers, where it remains for about twenty-four hours, and is then transferred to cones, such as are used in sugar-refineries, to drain off the molasses. In some places, however, it is customary to pass the strike into a long, narrow box, with fenders six feet high on two of its sides. Two negroes, taking their position, one at either end, toss the sirup into the air with copper ladles working on pivots until it is so exposed to the air as to be frothy, and crusts the sides of the box like the spongy lava around the crater of a volcano. It is then passed directly into the cones and crystallizes in a few hours.

BOILING-HOUSE—EL TREN COMUN.

The object of crystallizing in shallow pans is that the crystals, floating loosely in a greater space, may form freely and of a large grain. Those who crystallize in cones say that the same object is obtained by gently stirring the cooling sirup once or twice on the first day. On the second day the cone is moved into the purging-house, and is not touched again for three weeks, except once to remove the plug at the bottom of the cone that the molasses may drain off into proper receptacles, to be boiled again and dried as muscovado sugar. A cloth is laid over the top of the cone while the molasses is draining off, and soft mud or clay spread upon it. This, draining through the sugar, drives the molasses before it to the apex of the cone; and after twenty days the loaf of sugar in the cone is found to be hard, white at the base, whity-brown in the middle, and yellow with molasses at the apex. These divisions being separated and dried are known as the Blanco, Quebrado, and Cucurucho or Cugucho, commonly quoted in the Havana market. The first of these would be called by our housewives "coffee-sugar;" the meaning of the second is "Leavings;" and of the third "Cornucopia;"—the points of the cones.

In all these processes, as practiced in the old-fashioned mills, a very serious loss occurs. They rarely express more than half the sugar from the cane which analysis has proved to exist there, and in all the different manipulations it would seem as if the object was to waste, and not to save sugar. The boiling-house is filled with the vapors rising from the kettles, and in the tossing undergone by the sirup much sugar is evaporated. The consequence is much molasses and little sugar; and it is to obviate these losses that costly machinery has been invented.

Boiling in vacuo, which is the great principle of improved sugar-making, is nothing new. It has long been in use in Cuba and Jamaica, and is the principal means used by the great sugarrefiners of England and the United States. But though long used, it has worked its way among the sugar plantations very slowly, and few of the great mills of Cuba date back further than twelve or fourteen years. The machinery for such undertakings is so costly, that it was only when the great Dons found that slaves were hard to get, and they themselves were growing so rich that they hardly knew how to invest their money to advantage, that they seriously set to work to build mills capable of grinding the product of 2000 acres of cane-land, and at the same time reducing the number of negroes necessary on an estate by more than one-third. Success only stimulated them to build larger mills and import finer machinery, until now the sugar-mills of Cuba are not unworthy to be named with the cotton-mills of England.

A large sugar estate like the San Martin, the Alava, El Flor de Cuba, Ponina, San Rafael, España, Habana, and others which we might name, is a small village in itself. Let us take for description the San Martin, in the jurisdiction of Cardenas, bordering on that of Colon, and about forty-five miles by railroad from the city of Cardenas; since it is the largest Yngenio in Cuba, and possesses the most costly machinery probably of any on the island. It lies in the midst of cane-fields, stretching as far as the eye can reach, and from the casa de purga can be seen the chimneys of five or six of the finest estates of Cuba. The jurisdictions of Cardenas and Colon produce nearly half of the sugar exported from the island, and the village of Banagüises, within three miles of the San Martin, is the centre of this rich sugar country.

IN THE BARRACON.

Approaching the estate of San Martin from the railroad, the size and height of the chimney attract immediate attention, it being 23 feet in diameter at the base, and rising to the height of 180 feet. In the houses which cluster around this great chimney one recognizes the Spanish model of a village—a grand square, or plaza, and streets running off at right angles from every side. The Mill and Curing House are, of course, the most prominent objects in this great square. They form its northern boundary for 800 feet. To the right of the mill is the “barracoon,” or building for the slaves, of whom there are some 900. It occupies the entire side of the square, and is itself a hollow square, with long sheds, substantially built of brick, running around it; the doors opening into the inner court, in the style common to Spanish and South American cities. Each one of the doors has a small hole, about six inches square, cut near the floor, to promote ventilation; and as there is a barred window high up in every room, on the opposite side from the door, good ventilation is secured. In the centre of the court is a large building, with a steam-engine for pumping water and a furnace, in which the food for nearly a thousand souls is cooked in common. Corn-meal and bananas are the staples. In crop time, however, there is a good deal of private catering going on, with the aid of sirup and molasses.

The barracoons of the San Martin cover about four acres of land, and being well painted and kept in good order, have a pleasing appearance. The same style of architecture for barracoons—a single-storied shed, forming a hollow square, with its cook-house in the centre—prevails on most of the large plantations, for security as well as convenience; some of them having high walls, and all access or egress being strictly guarded. On others, however, the negroes live in wooden or thatch hovels, in such proximity to the sugar-house as may be convenient.

The Chinese have quarters by themselves, and on more than one estate have been permitted to put up huts for themselves, in which may be recognized the peculiar architecture of a Chinese city, if bamboo and bits of matting are accessible. The interiors of the Chinese huts are cleanly, but behind them—or rather, between them, for they are laid out in streets—are the usual collections of garbage which, as much as any other cause, make the Asiatic cholera so fearful in the cities of the East.

The southern side of the square of the San Martin is occupied by the houses of the administrador of the estate, the engineers, and sugar-master—the hospital and fine gardens stretching for several hundred feet to their rear. To the east are the saw-mill, tool-shops, and other buildings. The Hospital is said to be the finest on the island, and certainly surpasses any which it has been our privilege to examine in a lengthened tour of Cuba. It covers about an acre of ground, the open court in the centre being partly paved and partly covered with flowers. In the middle of this court is a fountain, and an aviary containing doves and quails, the whole presenting a pleasing effect to the eye. Over the doorway is an inscription in Spanish, to the effect that it is “consecrated to suffering humanity.” To the right on entering is the Botica y Drogueria, full of medicines, and arranged with all the neatness and possessing all the medicines of a good pharmacy. To the left is the Salon de Practicante, where new cases are examined and trivial ones prescribed for. The doors of the various halls which open on the corridors have appropriate inscriptions for males, females, and Chinese—each being dedicated to some saint. There is also a mortuary-house (Capilla y Deposito), with skull and cross-bones over the doorway, and warehouses for drugs, dispensary, etc. Entering one of the halls we find it full of beds, with the head-board to the wall, at equal distances apart, each neatly numbered. Each man’s basin hangs at the head of his cot, and each one is supplied with a blanket. The beds are made by stretching a bullock’s hide on a solid frame, the most suitable bedding in a hot climate; but some of the beds are merely boards laid lengthwise, insuring coolness and cleanliness. It is evident that every care is paid to the condition of the sick; and we may cite as a proof of the superior management of this estate, as well as the wisdom of humane treatment, that out of 900 negroes and 170 Chinese only 14 were in the hospital, and of them about two-thirds were able to sit up. Most of them were confined by accidents, such as happen daily in the cane-fields with people so careless. In one of the wards was a woman suckling her child, dressed in the style of negro infants—a bit of string around the wrist. These proofs of humanity and care for the slaves and Chinese apprentices were the more pleasing from the fact of their being undoubtedly compelled to labor very severely. They lead at the best a hard life, far worse on most of the Cuban estates than on the Southern plantations of our own country. As was rudely observed by one of the many American mechanics in Cuba, "They treat a nigger like a gentleman in Alabama to what they do here." A large number of those found in Cuba are native Africans, rude, savage, and ready to commit any atrocity. Nothing but the whip can keep such men in subjection and compel their labor. With every opportunity they skulk away to the cane-fields, where they often lie hid for many weeks. Some are in shackles half their lives, for when the chains are off away they go like wild beasts.

As for any attempt to civilize these rude creatures further than whipping them when they will not work, a man must look far and carefully to see it in Cuba. It is true that the priests in the cities gather them into the churches, where, on grand occasions, they distribute among them catechisms and cigars, and make it a point to baptize every negro baby; but it is little that the slaves learn of the Christian religion, and they will sooner kneel to their masters than to God. Indeed one can not but think that their master is a greater and more powerful being in their eyes than the Almighty. On the sugar estates in the country they rarely see a priest; churches are unknown except in the cities and towns; Sabbaths are passed without notice; and from birth to death the native African and his children live as much like the beasts as if in Africa itself, the only real difference being that in Africa they are wild beasts, in Cuba they are beasts of burden.

It needs but to see a negro funeral on a large estate to realize the bitter mockery of that philanthropy, which claims that the slave is most charitably ransomed from death in his own country to be civilized and Christianized; and for these priceless boons he is made "an organized laborer." We saw one once on the Alava estate, one of the largest in Cuba. We have seen men buried on the field of battle, have seen many a pauper funeral, have heard the burial-service mumbled at sea by an infidel captain over the remains of a godless wretch, but we never saw any burial more wretched than that of a miserable slave. It was a rainy afternoon—and a rainy afternoon in the tropics means a fierce thunder-storm—when one of the Spanish overseers remarked that "there was another dead," and pointed out a procession of three negroes, two of them bearing the body with a piece of bagging thrown over it, and the third following with a spade in his hands. The bearers were old men who could be spared for the duty, and walked very slowly, which seemed to suit the gravedigger well, for he had irons on both legs, and though a lusty fellow, could not go much faster than his elders. The group had not enough clothing between them for one man. The old men had breeches of an unknown mud color, and their bent backs were bare; the follower was minus the breeches, but he had obtained a long coffee or sugar sack, had cut a hole in the bottom for his neck and two at the sides for his arms. They passed behind the mill, but no one looked up, through a crowd of women and girls who were raking up the cane-trash, and down to the edge of the cane-field. No notice whatever was taken of them, while the stout fellow in chains dug a shallow trench, in which they left their burden. The whole job, for ceremony there was none, took about half an hour. Just as the rain ceased they hobbled back to their ordinary tasks, well soaked but indifferent.

These things have little effect on the negro; but it is very different with the Chinese; and for the treatment of Chinamen in this matter the Spaniards and Cubans have undoubtedly earned the hatred of many individuals who would otherwise be content. When we recollect that at home the Chinaman actually worships his dead ancestors; that he procures his own coffin in his lifetime, often spending $1000 upon it; that China is justly described as a vast burial-ground; and that wherever Chinese are colonized they send their dead to their own country, if they can afford it—the greatness of the outrage in the eyes of a Chinaman, of this burial like a dog, will at once be perceived. He has superstitions which oblige him to burn paper figures of clothes, money, etc., for the use of his departed friends in the other world. All these superstitions exist still, but can not be carried out in Cuba, and he knows that at his own death no friend can perform the rites for him. We will venture to say, from actual statements of Chinese themselves, that this is, in their own opinion, the greatest grievance of their lot as laborers in Cuba. They are, however, a casuistic race, and comfort themselves with the belief that immediately after death their souls return to the Flowery Empire, and hover around the altars of their ancestors, where the relatives whom they left perform the necessary rites, in the benefits of which they participate.

Possibly this belief in the immediate passage of the soul to their native country will explain the alarming prevalence of suicide among the Asiatics when they first discover how severe their lot is, or when they become homesick. Suicide is more or less common among the newly-arrived, and breaks out suddenly like an epidemic, without any change of labor or treatment, which would seem a reasonable provocation to self-destruction.

Some of the best of machinery is to be seen on the Yngenio San Martin; and we will endeavor to describe the process of sugar-making, as practiced on that estate, remarking that it is similar, with a few slight alterations, on all plantations using the fine system of Derosne.

In this system the boiling of the sirup is conducted entirely by steam. The cane is first crushed in a powerful mill, made at Paris, by J. F. Cail and Co., in 1853, which has been in operation ever since with only the most trifling repairs, and is now in as fine condition as when it was put up. The engine is of 60 horse-power, turning three powerful rollers for crushing, eight feet in length and three feet in diameter. The cane is supplied by an endless chain, with slabs as in a tread-mill, moving in a channel-way of the same width as the rollers, and running almost level with the ground for 50 or 60 feet. Some thirty or forty women are constantly employed in supplying this feeder with cane-stalks, which are smoothed by others. The stalks pass unceasingly between the rollers, the crushed cane falling upon another channel-way, like the feeder, which carries it out of the mill, and to such a height that the refuse drops into carts standing ready to carry it to the fields to be spread out to dry. Some idea of the volume of cane passing through the mill may be obtained from the fact that seven light carts, each holding as much as would fill a New York omnibus, are kept at work, receiving and distributing the "trash" as it falls from the mill. A still better idea of the immense bulk of cane crushed in a day is gained by watching the trains of cars running on a tram-way from the cane-fields to the mill, and discharging their contents, and then to find at night, that, although the train of seven or eight cars has been running incessantly, a space of at least fifty feet square, where the cane in the morning was piled up twenty feet high, is quite bare by sundown. Indeed it is necessary to stop the mill every few days for want of cane, and to turn all hands into the cane-field.

The juice runs out from below the rollers in a stream as thick as a man's leg; and passing through copper strainers, the holes of which are as large as an English six-pence, it leaves behind a portion of the dirt and bits of cane which fall with it from the rollers. It is then forced up to cisterns in the boiling-house, from which it is to be discharged into copper clarifying kettles, called defecadores. These are made with an iron jacket in which steam can be admitted. In the Yngenio San Martin there are sixteen of these. When ready for use they shine so that you can see your face in them. The coolie turns a great stop-cock and a stream of tawny liquor rushes as from a hydrant, and in three or four minutes fills the kettle up to a certain mark, about 10 inches from the top, when the stop-cock is closed in that kettle and one opened in the next.

We will wait and see what is done to the juice in the first defecator, while one after another of the train is receiving its supply. It will detain us only a few minutes. After starting the next kettle the workman returns and gives a few turns to a little wheel by which steam is admitted below the defecators. A grand commotion follows that shakes the light flooring on which we are standing, and for about five minutes there is a mysterious boiling going on in the depths of the great pot, which shows itself by a frothy scum rising to the surface. A little lime has been slaked in a bucket and poured into the mess. As to the quantity the sugar-master has a word to say about that, and generally sees to its being all right before it goes in, the proportion varying according to the quality of the cane. As soon as the kettle is fairly boiling steam is shut off and the contents are left quietly simmering for ten or fifteen minutes. Meanwhile the bubbles have gone down, but a very muddy scum—the cachazza—is forming on the surface, growing blacker and thicker with every minute. You can draw lines through it with your stick, as though writing in the sand by the sea-shore. When this scum begins to crack it is time to draw it off through the meshes of a sieve, and if you go below the defecator you will find a stream of hot juice, looking like turpentine, running into a trough. The scum settles in the bottom of the defecator, and as soon as the liquor begins to run very dirty the pipe is turned by the coolie below to discharge over another trough which carries it into a receptacle where it is purified again. The light scum is drawn off also, and a jet of cold water is started in the defecator, while the workman carefully cleanses it to be ready in its turn for another charge of juice. It is necessary to have a train of kettles sufficient to keep the stream of guarapo from the grinding-mill always running. In the San Martin the circuit is completed in about an hour.

Meanwhile the hot stream of defecated juice is pouring into a small charcoal filter about ten feet high, twenty-three of which stand in a grim row, dividing the defecators from the bulk of the machinery, and behind them is another rank of tall fellows, twenty in number, and as many feet in height, in which the juice is finally purified after making the circuit of the boiling-house once or twice more.

The black vats full of animal carbon—in common English, “bone charcoal”—perform an important duty in the sugar-house, and cost a great deal of money. The charcoal can be bought in Havana for about $3 per 100 pounds, and each one of these great filters holds 1800 pounds, which can only be used for seven or eight days, so that the value of the charcoal used in the train during that time is nearly $2000. The cost is reduced on the large estates by burning the bones and by washing the charcoal each time it is taken from the filters. To do all this a large house with furnaces, many retorts, and a considerable force of slaves are required. Unburned bones are brought from South America and other parts of the world, and cost in Havana about $1 per 100 pounds. They require four days’ burning in the furnaces to make charcoal, and much care and attention during the process. After being used the coal is returned to the charcoal-house, sticky with molasses and quite lustreless. It is then passed through a revolving washing-machine, and afterward finds its way to the furnaces. This process being repeated until the coal is too fine for use, the loss for each week in the filter is not much more than ten per cent. Great efforts have been made to economize charcoal and fuel (coal), as these two materials are the most expensive in the sugar-house. Numerous experiments have been made in retorts and furnaces, every improvement in this department effecting a considerable saving; but after all experiments, animal carbon remains the best refining material known, and the use of a certain quantity appears indispensable to produce white sugar. The higher the filters the better the product of the Yngenio. Sulphurous gas has been employed with a certain degree of success, but it has scarcely found its way into the Cuban Yngenio, whatever use may be made of it by the sugar-refiners of England and the United States. There are other means of clarifying the "guarapo" and of discharging the molasses from the sugar, which should only be used by men well acquainted with chemistry, as they require the employment of poisonous acids. These, therefore, do not concern the sugar-planter or manufacturer of clayed sugars, but belong properly to the more scientific refiner.

After passing through the smaller of the two kinds of carbon-filters in the San Martin, the juice—el guarapo—passes over a series of pipes called condensadores, which perform the double function of condensing the steam rising in the vacuum-pans and of evaporating the juice. Theoretically this machine is an exceedingly ingenious adjustment, and constitutes the distinguishing feature of the Derosne train; but practically it has many objections. It is formed of horizontal pipes about six inches in diameter, arranged in a tall rack, and turning so sharply that they are parallel, one above the other, at a distance of not more than three inches apart. From twenty to twenty-three of these turns occur in each machine, so that at a distance it looks like a rack of parallel bars arranged horizontally. The juice is carried to the top of the frame, and falls through fine holes, which discharge a drop at a time. Falling upon the hot pipes it condenses the steam within, and loses some of its own liquid, which rises in a dense vapor. It does not remain long enough on each pipe to become burned, and in the fraction of a second occupied in its passage from one pipe to another it loses heat to the atmosphere. Near the bottom there is more risk of burning the sirup; but here again the steam in the pipe has lost much of its heat, and as the liquor becomes hotter the pipe is cooler, a nice equilibrium being maintained by the relative action of the two. Now this is all very well as long as the pipes are kept clean and the liquor runs over them in an unbroken shower of small drops as regular as the teeth of a comb; but, unfortunately, as soon as the mill is stopped the copper pipe is covered with a rusty coat, and looks more like sand-paper than a tube of polished copper. It is then necessary to clean it carefully by dropping water over it for some time before and after using it; and even with the greatest care it will be noticed that in many places three or four drops will run together, and the action become irregular. When once the sirup has formed little channel-ways for itself in this manner it is exceedingly difficult to obtain good action, and the sirup is injured. It will be readily seen, too, that the constant action of minute drops of sirup or water must very soon wear out the copper.

Besides these defects, there is grave objection to the constant clouds of steam which it throws off, filling the boiling-house with moisture, and interfering with the crystallizing of the sugar at a later stage. In the Yngenios using Derosne's condensadores it is observed that they obtain the best sugar when they take the greatest pains to keep the machinery scrupulously clean, and any carelessness in this respect, especially if it occurs at this stage, is sure to injure the quality. In this matter the San Martin is a model establishment. After long trial some sugar-masters have ceased dropping sirup over the condensadores; but by dropping water instead they still use them as condensers for the waste steam from the vacuum-pans. On the whole, a steam injection column (which is also attached to Derosne's machinery) would seem to answer the purpose better, taking less room, and doing away with the objectionable vapor. Another very serious objection to Derosne's condensadores is their liability to cracking when much worn. Fine holes as small as the head of a pin and little cracks in the joints are not easily found in a machine enveloped in clouds of steam, and little leaks like these very much interfere with the vacuum in the pans.

After passing over the condensadores—or, directly from the first filters where condensadores are not in use—the sirup passes into the first vacuum-pans.

The principle of the vacuum-pan is well understood. In them the same processes of boiling and evaporation are performed which we have already described in the open or Jamaica train, but at a much lower temperature, and without risk of burning the sugar. The loss by evaporation in the open train is also avoided. This loss is considerable, owing to the violent tossing it undergoes in the open air. In the first vacuum-pans the boiling is slow, and sugar is not formed in them, the object being to increase the density of the sirup by evaporating a part of the water composing it, after which it has to undergo further clarifying before it is boiled down into sugar. The usual form of Derosne's vacuum train is what is called double-effect; that is, two pans stand side by side, one of which is boiled by the steam rising from the sirup in the other, the sirup also being drawn, at intervals, from the first to the second. In the San Martin they possess two trains of three pans each, the middle pan being slightly the largest, and discharging its steam into both the others. In some places a treble-effect has been tried, the first pan boiling the second, and the steam from that second pan boiling the third; but it is found that too much heat is lost by this plan. The art of boiling sugar in a vacuum-pan requires quite as much skill and experience as in the open train, the proof by teache—or touch—being the same in both instances. The sirup to be tried is drawn by a simple and ingenious proof-stick from the very centre of the pan, and is tested either by teache or by Baumé's saccharometer. This is a tube of mercury or fine shot in a bulb like a thermometer, but, unlike the thermometer, containing atmospheric air. In water it sinks, but in sirup it rises in proportion to the density of the sirup. A degree on the scale marks 0.019 parts of sugar in the sirup. Thus if the saccharometer, floating in sirup, marks  $10^{\circ}$  B. we have  $.019 \times 10 = .19$ , and know that there is nineteen per cent. of sugar in that sirup. If the sirup is boiling, however, it is denser than when cold by about three degrees; but thin juice is of the same density, hot or cold. Although these distinctions are not often known to the solemn-faced Asiatics or darkeys who use this beautiful little instrument, they are able to get as much practical good from it as the sugar-master himself, the latter having made a mark upon it for their guidance. The skill lies in admitting thin juice, or guarapo, from the reservoir, or from the other pans when the sirup becomes too thick; and when the panful is properly "cooked," or brought to a density ranging from  $26^{\circ}$  to  $28^{\circ}$  B., where it is about half sugar, to discharge it promptly into the caldrons for further defecation. The same heat to which the sirup had been subjected in the vacuum-pans is kept up in these by means of a steam-coil at the bottom, into which the operator admits steam at will. Just enough steam is admitted to bring the liquor to a froth; very little vapor arises from the caldron, and the instant it does the steam is turned off. Each time that it is brought to the boiling-point it throws up with the froth some of the impurities which none of the former processes had removed, and these are lightly skimmed off as they arise.

The process is repeated again and again, and the sirup is not only purified but concentrated. It is now turned off into the high filters, where the last process of clarifying is performed. From these it runs out a clear bright liquor, as pleasant to the eye as fine old sherry. This pure liquor, which has been round and round the boiling-house so many times, now finds its way into the great vacuum-pan, called the strike-pan, where at last it will become sugar. Here it is boiled at the temperature of  $180^{\circ}$  F.; but gradually as the sirup becomes thicker the temperature is lowered until, when the crystals have begun to form, the heat is not greater than  $160^{\circ}$  F. The reduction still goes on until, finally, when the sirup is ready for "striking," the temperature is the lowest at which proof-sugar will boil at three inches below a perfect vacuum, say  $145^{\circ}$  F. It is now thick with crystals of sugar floating in molasses, and the trial by teache is repeated momentarily. The engineer peers anxiously through the glass-windows at the boiling sirup, and finally makes preparations to discharge his pan into the "heaters" below. The sirup falls from the bottom of the strike-pan of a rich auburn color, and often the crystals can be seen as it flows. The strike-pan, or great vacuum-pan of the Yngenio San Martin, is a magnificent piece of workmanship, costing \$70,000, and capable of boiling from 1100 to 1500 panes or cones of sugar, containing 100 pounds each of green sugar, in a day.

In the heaters below the strike-pan steam is applied by means of a cast-iron jacket, such as we saw around the defecadores where the juice was first heated; the thick molasses is stirred freely, and speedily carried from thence to the ordinary sugar-cones, or panes, where it stands for a day in the high temperature of the boiling-house until the crystals acquire some solidity. The panes are then removed to the casa de purga, where they undergo the claying process, and are purged of their molasses. This process is the same on estates using the Jamaica train, and needs no further notice. The casa de purga is generally the largest house on the estate. That of the San Martin is 400 feet long and 150 feet broad, and contains room for 22,220 panes. The general plan of the casa de purga is the same on all the estates, there being one floor pierced for the cones, and a packing and drying room below. In the lower room are double rows of cars, one above the other, placed on tram-ways, and so arranged that they may be run out into the sunshine with their loads of moist sugar to dry. This plan of building is simple and effective, and could not be improved. The white sugar, or blanco, when dried in the sun is ready for market. The quebrado requires a little more time, and is spread over an oven; but the cuchuchos, or points of the cones, are brought back to the boiling-house, ground up thoroughly, moistened with water, and passed through the centrifugal machines to free them from molasses. The sugar is now of the grade of quebrado; or being further moistened with water, and placed in panes it may be brought again to the purging-house and regularly clayed, making good white sugar, although not of as good quality as first sugar. The smaller quantity obtained will not generally pay for the extra labor.

The molasses that drips from the panes in the casa de purga is collected in tanks and returned to the boiling-house, when it is taken up by the vacuum-pan and boiled again, making very good sugar; but this time, instead of being placed in panes to make clayed sugar, it is run into shallow iron tanks, about ten by four feet, in which the crystallization proceeds more slowly than in the former. When the sugar in these has hardened it is cut out by coolies with spades, worked until it is a thick paste of sugar and molasses, and poured into the centrifugal drying-machines, with which all large Yngenios are furnished. These are of various patterns, prominent among them being those of J. F. Cail and Co. of Paris, Aspinwall and Woollys of the United States, and Fawcett, Preston, and Co. of Liverpool. The Yngenio San Martin has fifteen of the first-named manufacture. Cail's centrifugal, although very good, is not so easily managed as the others, especially the machine made by Fawcett, Preston, and Co. The power is communicated from above by common shafting in the French machine, and from below in the American; otherwise the two are very similar. The American method leaves the top of the centrifugal unencumbered by machinery, and facilitates the operation of supplying it with molasses. It also gives the laborer more room when scooping tirely, except in principle, from both the others named. Instead of being set with vertical shafting, as those are, it is hung like a coach-wheel, on horizontal shafting, two machines being generally hung on one shaft, but each being thrown out of gear at pleasure, independently of the other. Instead of being two feet in diameter, it measures four; and instead of being charged while at rest, the molasses is run into it by a trough while in rapid motion. Being of larger size, and requiring no increase of power to turn it, its makers claim that it is more economical, out the sugar than in the French arrangement. These are the only distinctions between the French and American systems. In both the machines are charged before they are set in motion. Revolving with great rapidity, the molasses is speedily thrown by centrifugal force to the sides, which are made of wire netting, corrugated for greater strength. The molasses flies off through the meshes of this netting, leaving, in six or eight minutes, a fine, dry sugar, called miel de purga—the common brown sugar of the grocers. The grain is finer than that of the sugar made from the first boiling of the sirup; and this quality of sugar can be afforded at a low price. The color is regulated according to desire by running the centrifugal machine for a longer or shorter period with each charge of molasses; and when a whitish sugar is wanted, it is obtained by turning a jet of steam upon the revolving mass. The bleaching effect of steam is well known. The use of steam, however, causes it to part with so much of the molasses that it loses weight, and the higher price of the whiter sugar rarely compensates the planter for the loss. It is therefore customary to turn on the steam for only a minute or two before stopping the machine, causing a crust of white sugar about a quarter of an inch thick to form on the two or three inches of miel de purga which clings to the sides of the machine. As each machine can be thrown out of gear without interfering with the others all stages of drying can be observed at once. The molasses from this second purging is boiled and passed again through the centrifugal machines, so that the common "third" molasses of commerce contains little crystallizable sugar.

The English centrifugal machine differs en-and justly so in our opinion. With six-horse power it can clean 400 pounds of sugar in an hour. It is supplied with a small steam-pipe, to be used in bleaching if desired. The brakes used in these three machines all differ slightly; but this is of no importance, as all are excellent. Probably there is less friction with the English brake, owing to the peculiar hanging of the machinery.

On many of the sugar estates, when the owners can not afford the costly copper vacuum-pans and the amount of machinery and charcoal filters which accompany them, it is not unusual to find the old Jamaica train used with a Wetzel pan, or that invented by M. Bour, to concentrate the molasses. Sometimes a small vacuum-pan of the Rillieux patent is used for this purpose, and the molasses purged, finally, in a few centrifugal machines connected with it.

The Wetzel pan is heated by steam. It is a long tank, the bottom being rounded to form the half of a circle. In this tank, which is filled with molasses, revolves a hollow wheel, through which steam passes freely. The hollow drums of this wheel are also full of steam, and placed at either end of the tank, revolving in the molasses. Through their centres passes a large pipe, also steam-filled; and the circumference of these two drums are connected by pipes, about an inch and a half in diameter and two inches apart. Revolving slowly, a considerable heating surface is thus presented to the molasses; and each of the smaller pipes, as it rises from the liquid, carries a considerable quantity with it, which is dripping throughout its semi-revolution, until it plunges again into the molasses. The whole mass of molasses in the tank is gently agitated by the constant revolution of the machine, and is concentrated rapidly, much more so than over an open fire, but without risk of burning.

The Bour pan is similar in principle to the Wetzel, the only difference being that the liquid is distributed equally over a number of drums similar to those at the ends of the Wetzel tank.

The Rillieux vacuum-pan is of cast-iron, and differs in shape from the copper pans of other makers, the pipes being set horizontally instead of vertically, as in the dome-shaped vacuum-pan. The lower half of the Rillieux pan is filled with pipes an inch and a half in diameter, laid lengthwise, as in the boiler of a locomotive; the upper half is filled with sirup and the steam arising from it. The use of iron instead of copper very much reduces the cost, and makes the pan popular for boiling miel de purga in small mills, the same steam-engine giving power to the centrifugals. The only drawback to the use of this economical system is the difficulty of cleaning iron pipes and preventing corrosion.

There are in Cuba, as well as in Louisiana, estates of from fifteen hundred to two thousand acres of cane which use Rillieux's train, greatly to their satisfaction. It is simpler and less costly than that of Derosne, or any other on the same general system as Derosne's, dispensing with the condensadores, which are of questionable advantage in that system, and substituting a steam injection-column. For a complete train under the system of Rillieux three pans are required; but, as they stand side by side, and as their shape allows great compactness with large heating surface, they require fewer boilers than the same number of pans under other circumstances.

In the first pan the guarapo, after coming from the smaller filters, receives its first boiling, the pipes being heated for the purpose with the exhaust steam of the engine which works the grinding-mill. A dense steam arises, which passes into the heating-pipes in the next pan, and gives heat to concentrate the sirup to 28° Baumé. The sirup then passes into caldrons furnished with the steam coil for further defecation, and thence into the large filters, passing from them into the strike-pan, as in the Derosne apparatus. The strike-pan, or third pan, is supplied with fresh steam from the boilers. The condensation of the waste steam, both for the purpose of maintaining the vacuum and for keeping a constant current of fresh steam in the heating apparatus, is maintained by a small vacuum-engine, a steam injection-column, and a fan for cooling the condensed water. Water being very scarce in many places, it is necessary that the same supply should be used over and over again, and the devices for economizing water are very ingenious. One of the finest mills in Cuba using the Rillieux train is that of Don Diago at Perico, called the Yngenio Tinguaro. It has a train made by Merrick and Sons, of Philadelphia, from which a "strike" of 260 panes, or about 2500 pounds of green sugar, can be made at once, and the three vacuum-pans, each eleven feet long, have respectively 240, 354, and 260 pipes of 1½ inch diameter. The sugar made by this estate is excellent. That of the adjacent plantation, Santa Elena, with similar machinery, is also of superior quality. A new mill at Bolondron, called the San Rafael, has been recently fitted with the Rillieux machinery, and here the system may be studied with the greatest advantage. The sugar of this mill is of very good quality.

It does not always follow, however, that the Yngenio possessing the finest machinery makes the best sugar. This is notably illustrated in the neighborhood of Banaguises, where the adjacent estates of "Habana" and "Alava" differ greatly in the quality of their refined sugar. The "Habana" has the reputation of making the best in Cuba; and as the two estates are the property of the same gentleman, Señor Zulueta, one of the richest sugar-planters on the island, and master of we know not how many Yngenios and cabellarias of land, it might be expected that any talent possessed in the one Yngenio would be exerted to improve the other, or that if there was any decided advantage in machinery enjoyed by the one it would be introduced into the other. It is certainly not for want of fine machinery that the sugar of the "Alava" is not the best; for the machinery of the "Alava" is the newest and best of the two, and the estate has in its time turned out a crop of 21,000 boxes. The machinery of the "Habana," on the contrary, is rather indifferent, and not to be compared with that of the "San Martin" or "El Flor de Cuba," in the same neighborhood; and yet all agree that no sugar-planter of that country has surpassed "La Habana." Their loaves are of snowy whiteness, and bear favorable comparison with those of the refiner. The superiority is generally ascribed to better land and better cane; but it is very singular that the adjacent estates, possessing soil of the same character and the same kind of cane—la caña blanca, commonly known as the Tahiti cane—do not produce equally fine sugar.

While capital has been lavished on costly machinery, and vast improvements have been made in the manufacture of sugar, the general principles of defecating with lime, filtering with bone charcoal, and concentrating under a vacuum have remained unchanged, although it has long been felt that some chemical substitutes for the present expensive process would be very desirable, and some of the best chemists of Cuba and the United States have long studied this problem.

Any process which would do away with the use of animal carbon and prevent the formation of molasses in boiling would work a great revolution, and Señor Alvaro Reynoso, of Havana, announces that he has discovered such a process. It as yet remains a secret, and but for the high reputation and chemical experience of the gentleman claiming to have made the discovery its announcement would be received with incredulity. Señor Reynoso, however, is the director of the Institute for Experimental Chemistry in

Havana, Doctor of the Faculty of Science in Paris, Honorary Member of the Imperial Institute of France (Academy of Sciences), besides possessing other honorary titles, and has given much time and attention to the culture of the sugar-cane, having published several able essays on the subject. A man of his character would not be likely to hazard his reputation on a visionary scheme, and Señor Reynoso has claimed that he can produce excellent sugar at one boiling by chemical treatment of the guarapo while cold. He claims that no molasses is formed, but after drawing off the impurities of the cane-juice a pure crystallized sugar remains. He asks a large sum of money for his secret, and professes himself ready to disclose it as soon as this is guaranteed. The matter has excited much interest in Havana, and will probably be thoroughly investigated. If it is practicable, and good sugar can really be made without the machinery and capital at present required, its manufacture will be enormously extended.

READY FOR MARKET.

MR. RASPTON'S RESURRECTION.

I.

MR. RASPTON held to the belief that a man should be master in his own house. Some of his sex have consented to a divided sway in life, it being admitted that they reign supreme over their own department, while the domestic world is ordered by their better half. Other more timid spirits have entirely given up the reins of government, and are content to go whithersoever the leading genius drives. For such Mr. Raspton entertained a contempt far transcending that he bestowed upon the meanest member of the brute creation. His was a mind that, like Napoleon's—if it were Napoleon—included the minutest details as well as the grand scope of affairs. No cook could lay aside a surreptitious ounce of sugar, no washer-woman pocket the remnant of a bar of soap without being brought to book. Nor did this penny wisdom tend in the least to that proud foolishness which the proverb satirically intimates. It never interfered in any way with the conduct of an extensive business, or hindered for a moment the golden flow of profits.

If there had ever been a time when these traits were unfelt or unacknowledged by his fellow-men, it was far back in the forgotten Past. The clerks in Mr. Raspton's store never read the newspaper or sat by the stove, chairs a-tilt, in the intervals of business. For all spare moments they found useful work; or, did rare leisure offer, stood erect behind their counters waiting, alert, the advent of fresh custom. The "hands" in his factory were all assembled long ere the bell had given its final clang. The maid in the kitchen, like her mistress in the parlor, ever felt an eye upon her watching all her movements. And Maria Jane, the oldest daughter, would no more have dared to call her practicing done at fifty-nine minutes past nine instead of plump ten o'clock, than she would have ventured any other insane or impossible achievement. She would have known that her father in that high perch away "down street" which he called his office, would instinctively become aware of the deficit, and punish it accordingly. There had been a period in Mrs. Raspton's history when she had offered some faint opposition to the autocratic sway—a period to which she now recurred with feelings such as those with which Mr. Van Amburgh might be supposed to contemplate his former sojourn in the lion's mouth. For, strange as it now seemed to all who looked upon him, Mr. Raspton had once been young and, after his fashion, in love. He had gone through a form of courtship, rigid and mechanical, it is true; he had had a honeymoon, a pale, cold article, but intended to do duty for the real thing. These were the only shams of which he had to accuse himself in a life of stern devotion to practical and actual facts. It was at this time that Mrs. Raspton had shown trifling symptoms of a will of her own—symptoms at once repressed and stifled by the guiding hand. She was now perfect in her routine. So much money was dealt out to her per week, and from that, she knew, just so much household comfort must be provided, not one pennyworth lacking. A settled sum was allowed for the family dress, and their appearance must do credit to it. Twice a quarter the children were examined to see if the requisite amount of knowledge had instilled itself into their brains, and woe to student and teacher if either were derelict. Oft, with all his rigidity, Mr. Raspton could not fairly be called penurious. His table was well spread; his expenditure in all ways respectable, though not liberal; he had his charities even regulated, like every thing else, with mathematical exactness; was punctual in attendance at church and prayer-meeting; and looked forward without apprehension to the final settlement of accounts, assured that there would be a balance in his favor.

But his family never rested from an oppressive sense of responsibility. Maria Jane and the boys envied in childhood the freedom of every ragged little imp that made dirt-pies or played in the gutter, and as they grew older the feeling varied in object but not in quality. Then, too, both they and Mrs. Raspton were aware that they lived far, far within their income, and each had their little longings and ambitions. Thought was free, at any rate, and speech as well, provided it came not to the ear of the ruling powers.

"What a sweet place the Brinleys have!" remarked Mrs. Raspton, pensively, as she and Maria Jane sat at their work one afternoon. "So complete all through! If there is any thing I do dote upon it is a pretty house and grounds."

"And there is no reason why we shouldn't have them, I am sure, if father only thought so," responded the daughter. "But I suppose we shall stay here as long as the timbers will hold up the roof. No hope of any change for us."

"I'm afraid not. Father would think it awfully extravagant to build."

"I wouldn't ask for that," said Maria Jane, with generous concession, "if he would only fix up this place a little. Put on a wing with two parlors and bedrooms above, and furnish them all up in modern style, and cut these windows down to the floor, and have a veranda across the front, and new carpets and sofas and pictures, and, oh! a thousand things that we haven't and never shall have as long as we live."

"No," agreed the mother. "But it would be very pretty. I always did like a piazza. It's so pleasant to take your chair out and sit there when the sun is off; and we could have vines climbing up to make it shady, you know."

"And hanging-baskets," said Maria Jane. "I saw the most lovely trailing plants at Huger's yesterday."

"And it would be such a nice place for the flower-pots; my geraniums and the oleanders are quite wasted as it is."

"And we do so need new parlors and a spare bedroom," continued Maria Jane. "This is a perfect thoroughfare, and every thing in it so shabby and old-fashioned. A wing with rooms above would just give us what we want."

"Yes," said the mother; "and parlors opening into each other are always so pleasant. I like to look through folding-doors into the next room; it gives you such an idea of space, somehow."

"That's partly due to the tall mirrors," explained Maria Jane; "they almost double the size of an apartment."

"But they're terribly expensive, aren't they?" asked the mother, anxiously.

"We can't help that—every body has them," said Maria Jane, with decision.

"Well—do you like these little figures they have in Brussels now?"

"Oh, mamma, I think they're lovely! A green carpet—hot grass-green, nor blue-green, but just the right shade, and then a small, bright pattern—oh!" and she clasped her hands in mute ecstasy, unable to express the rest.

"You would want green chairs then, wouldn't you?"

"Yes, and curtains, and picture-cords."

"Wouldn't there be too much of it?"

"No, I think not—we should have buff walls, you know. Buff and green are such a pretty contrast."

"So they are, dear. And the bedrooms—should they be green too?"

"Oh no!—don't let us have every thing alike. What should you say, mamma?"

"My fancy would be maroon. Yes, the front-room, which would be the largest, in maroon; and the furniture rich and heavy to correspond. The back-room simpler—say blue-and-white."

"How sweet! And what sort of furniture?"

"I like carved rose-wood," said Mrs. Raspton, who, once launched in her expenditure, gave her imagination full sweep. Maria Jane was for a moment stunned, as it were, by the thought of such magnificence, but soon recovered.

"How splendid!" she said, with high appreciation of her mother's taste. "And in the back-room we would have enameled; it's simple, but very pretty."

"Yes, and that should be yours, my dear. You keep your things so neatly that you deserve a nice room."

"Thank you, mamma! And we would get wash-stand and toilet china all to match."

"And bed-linen and blankets the very best quality," said Mrs. Raspton, with housewifely care.

"There would be nothing in the other part of the house to correspond with it, though," said Maria Jane; and as her eye fell on the brass-nailed sofa and the great octagonal figures of the carpet, the vision faded, and she came painfully back to the realities of things.

"Where's the use of talking, mamma?" she said, bitterly. "It can never come to any thing, and we know it."

"I suppose not," said Mrs. Raspton; "still it's pleasant once in a while. When you were lying in your cradle I used to sit and fancy how nice it would be to have a grown-up daughter by-and-by. Time has brought that true, and perhaps it will do the same with these other fancies." So saying, she turned the conversation adroitly into other channels, and Maria Jane's overclouded brow grew clear again.

The boys meanwhile had grievances of other character. "How I hate a sight like that!" said James to his brother Arthur, as they walked along the street together. "A carriage all polish and silk and silver-plate, drawn by a couple of old crows! I wonder if the man thinks we can't count their ribs through those fine showy nets!"

"Well," said Arthur, as the equipage moved on, "if you like to see things in keeping you've only to look at our own establishment; there are no such contrasts there. I declare I wonder my mother and Maria Jane are willing to ride in the old shell. A pretty figure we make, driving up to the church-steps, among all the handsome turn-outs! I always expect to have my face peppered with mud, down there between the wheels!"

"And all the new carriages are hung so high!" continued James, with bitterness. "It looks as if it had come over in the Mayflower. And as for our horses they haven't even a net to hide their bones."

"And Jo Bright has such a splendid bay team that he'd sell any day at a good offer. I should think father would jump at the chance; but no—he'll go on driving old Spavin and Wind-gall to the end of the chapter!"

"I tell you, Arty, we boys ought to have a horse apiece, and Maria Jane a pony. She's growing up a splendid figure of a girl, and she'd ride like Di Vernon—she's lots of pluck. But she'll never have a chance, nor we either, while the Governor's term of office lasts."

"You may bet your head on that," was the classic response—and the academy gate shut off the colloquy.

As time went on it brought new trials to the young spirits. Maria Jane grew prettier with each succeeding day, and Mrs. Raspton felt that she might be made "an ornament to any circle." She sounded the praise of boarding-schools in Mr. Raspton's ears, and was met by the assertion that no money of his would be wasted on such follies; if Maria Jane couldn't learn enough at the academy she must remain in ignorance. Vainly, too, did she suggest a term or so with the maître de danse, who expounded to the village youth the mysteries of waltz and German; Mr. Raspton at once defined his position—and Maria Jane's performances on the light fantastic toe had to be guided by her own taste and observation. And by-and-by arose another source of trouble. The girl's pretty, round face and hazel eyes made conquest of Ned Brinley, the most admired of all the rustic beaux. Her set envied her, and wondered at her good fortune; but Mr. Raspton saw the matter in another light. Ned had never settled down very steadily at business, and no idle fop, the autocrat declared, should have the spending of his money. The lover was forbidden the house, and Maria Jane cried herself sick without in the least softening her father's iron heart. The boys, too, had fresh troubles. Arthur, who was bent on college, was ordered to renounce that fancy and go into the store—a mandate which he perforce obeyed, but with continued and open discontent. James had taken to business kindly, and Mr. Raspton had great hopes of him; but he, like the rest, seemed destined to cross his father's will, and be crossed in turn. He had fallen seriously in love with Nelly Ray, the child of one of Mr. Raspton's poorest tenants—a sweet, sensible girl, but without beauty or any other outward charm to account in the eyes of the angry parent for his son's infatuation. This affair, too, he at once nipped in the bud, enforcing a seeming obedience, though James declared his intention of taking his own way as soon as he became his own master. Having thus vindicated authority Mr. Raspton calmly pursued his own course quite unmindful of the hot, young rebellion around him. The poor mother meanwhile had no such peace. Into her sympathizing bosom Maria Jane poured all her tears; to her the boys uttered their indignant protests. Among the three the kind woman was nearly distracted.

Things were in this position when Mr. Raspton was suddenly called abroad; some great purchase of iron demanded his personal supervision. No especial grief was felt or feigned by the family. The wife bestirred herself to get his shirts and socks in order, and Maria Jane hemmed half a dozen new handkerchiefs. Twenty-four hours from the announcement of his proposed departure he was on his way, and a day or two after Mrs. Raspton read his name among the list of passengers by the Liverpool steamer. Nothing more could be heard from him for some time, of course, and all resigned themselves without difficulty to their ignorance. For the first time in their lives the children drew free breaths. It was magnificent autumn weather, the woods aflame with gorgeous colors, the sky piled with rich clouds, the air sweeter than Eden. Maria Jane felt almost happy spite of her separation from her lover; she could think of him unrestrainedly at any rate, which she hardly dared do with her father's cold eye upon her. The boys lingered a little at meals, loitered a trifle down the street, or stopped to chat with an acquaintance. Mrs. Raspton's kind face lost its anxious look, and altogether the absence of the stern head was pleasantly felt through all the house. The change in outward act was slight, however, for he would soon return, and the habit of obedience too was powerful.

Twenty days passed by—three weeks—and some surprise was felt that no word reached them of his safe arrival. Nobody was prepared, though, for what came—a letter from the captain of the steamer, stating that on such a night, it being dark and stormy, Mr. Raspton had fallen overboard, and spite of every exertion it had been found impossible to save him. The circle stared wildly at each other. Could this be true? Father gone! All that strong will, that pervading influence, utterly withdrawn, and that so quietly! Were they never to hear any more than this? No; he had perished alone in the darkness with the wild sea, and out of its depths his voice would never rise again.

II.

"I don't know what to think about it," said Mrs. Raspton. "My own feelings were always in favor of mourning, but your poor father disapproved of it; he said it did no good to any one, and was a large bill of expense."

"We need not mind the expense, mother," said James, gravely. He had taken the direction of matters since the news had come. "It is a question of respect to father's memory, and I think it should be paid."

"I'm very glad you feel that way, my son," said Mrs. Raspton, wiping her eyes. "He meant well, James," she added, deprecatingly. "Father seemed a little harsh sometimes, but it was all intended for your good."

"Yes, mother, I suppose so," he replied, looking back with a sensation of awe to things which a few weeks since had roused such strong resentment. How strange it seemed to be free from that stern control, to be accountable only to himself for what he chose to do! Did he grieve; did any of them? It was not possible to feel the sorrow which the loss of a more tender parent would have caused; but they experienced a great shock, they felt that an event most solemn and painful had occurred. Uneasily conscious of the lack, without admitting it to themselves, they strove to make it up in outward observance and respect. Their mourning was the deepest, their veils the longest that could be procured; funeral services were held in the largest church of the village, and to it the relatives were summoned from far and near. A tall monument of the most expensive marble towered above the plainer tombstones of the cemetery, bearing the record of his virtues and his fate. Many a time during these arrangements did his wife start at their extravagance and dread Mr. Raspton's displeasure; then, as suddenly remembering all, put her handkerchief to her eyes. Her tears did not flow in a hot rush of passionate grief; they welled up gently from a prevailing sadness. And by-and-by she ceased to think of him as Mr. Raspton; he was "Severus" again, as he had been in their young days. She was by nature a little sentimental, but the tendency had long been stifled in her daily conflict with the hard facts of life. Now it renewed itself. She mused with not unpleasing melancholy on the events of their early life and courtship; looked often at the little pin set with his hair and that of her first baby, whom she lost, and related to Maria Jane various amiable incidents which showed her father in quite a new light. "It's only natural that I should feel it most," she would say; "you and the others are young; you'll have new ties and new interests; but nothing can ever make up the loss to me." Meanwhile the neighbors had very different views. A good-looking woman, still rather young, and with plenty of means, she was sure to marry again after a decent interval, and three or four eligible matches were selected for her in a month's time.

The winter went by quietly; James looked into the affairs, and found them largely more prosperous than any one had supposed. Spring came, and workmen were busy about the mansion. The coveted veranda ran across the front, French windows opening upon it, and vines newly set out gave promise of luxuriance and shade in time. By fall the proposed wing was completed, and Maria Jane and her mother went to New York with carte-blanche for furniture. A few weeks rendered all complete. The early dreams were adhered to in most items; there were the green carpets and buff paper-hangings, the carved rose-wood and maroon. Maria Jane had the promised back-room where she set her feet on violets and snow, or looked up at walls where azure bells swung gracefully from slender vines. Cord reflets of marble, rich hues of Bohemian glass, clear depths of mirror were not wanting. And many a costly trifle had been added; a picture here, an engraving there, rich volumes for the table, or elegant articles of decoration. Maria Jane surveyed the effect with delight unbounded, her mother with a kind of mournful pleasure. "I only wish poor Severus could have seen it!" she remarked, with a sigh. The daughter was silent. She greatly doubted if "poor Severus" would have enjoyed the sight.

Other changes not less important had been wrought. James promoted the father of his beloved to a better place and higher wages, and removed the family to a neat cottage of his own. Many an evening he and Nelly spent together, many a drive they took behind the fine "bay team" for which the boys had longed. Ned Brinley's sentence of exile was annulled, and he was received as Maria Jane's affianced; only it had been stipulated, for her sake and his own, that the marriage should not take place till he were established in practice. Meanwhile he came and went at will, worshiped by his betrothed and by her mother scarcely less. Arthur was in college and doing nobly.

Such was the state of things one late October afternoon, when a gentleman left the train at Bromley station, and, looking about for a conveyance, presently descried one that met his wants.

"Can you take me up to Mr. Raspton's?" he inquired.

"Mr. Raspton's?" said the man, hesitatingly.

"Yes—Severus Raspton's. You must surely know the place."

"Oh, the widder's, you mean." Why did the gentleman start at that word? "Old Raspton's dead, you know," he explained; "lost at sea a year ago or thereabouts."

"I know. I forgot for the moment. Drive fast."

"I'll have you there in fifteen minutes. That your baggage, Sir? It's a good two mile, but I'll land you at the door before you know it."

"Very well," said the stranger, quietly.

"Why does he seem so wrapped up in himself like?" thought Jo Bright. "What's that cap drawn over his eyes for, as if he was just ready to be swung off, and the cloak round his chin? And why can't he look a feller in the face? Fine day, Sir," he added, aloud.

"Very," responded the laconic stranger.

Three minutes passed in silence. As they turned a corner a pretty sight revealed itself; a gentleman and lady were riding toward them. He tall and stately on his fine black horse, she graceful, erect, her face all bloom and radiance. As the pair flashed by the stranger turned eagerly to gaze.

"There's Maria Jane this minute," said Jo Bright. "Ain't she a good one to look at, though? And the young feller with her is Ned Brinley, that she's agoin' to marry; ain't half nor a quarter good enough for her. I'm of the old chap's mind about that."

"Ah!" said the stranger, with a semblance of interest.

They reached the cemetery, its carefully-kept turf still verdant, its quiet precincts solemn with evergreen and the white dazzle of marble.

"See that tall stun up there?" asked Jo, pointing to a lofty shaft that rose, snow-pure, against the dark back-ground of cedars. "That's his monnyment. They put it up this spring as soon as ever the frost was out of the ground; frost heaves a tombstun dreadful, you know.

Wouldn't he have groaned at the expense! It cost an awful sight. But they had their own head about it, to be sure. 'When the cat's away the mice 'll play;' and this time the cat was away for good and all."

"Stop here," said the stranger, suddenly. "I should like to see the stone."

"Oh, certingly," said Joe, getting down and opening the gate.

"Stay with your horses, if you please," said the gentleman, decidedly, as Joe prepared to accompany him.

The stranger proceeded up the walk, the dry leaves rustling at his tread. Dead leaves, dead hopes, dead ambitions; how well they met together in this place, he thought. He reached the monument. The burial-plot was fenced by iron chains; there was one little grave, the first baby's, with its tiny head-stone. Glossy-leaved myrtle overran the spot, dark pansies lent their purple glow, a mournful willow drooped its long boughs near; all showed loving thought and tendance. He knelt and kissed the little mound, then leaned his forehead on the chilling marble. What solemn thoughts went through his mind of what might have been, what almost was! what contritions for the past and hopes for the future!

"Friend o' his'n?" said Jo, bursting with curiosity, as the stranger resumed his seat. But he received no answer.

They went across the stream by the foundry, the factory, and the store. The gentleman looked up at the signs on each.

"They've left the old name," he said.

"Yes," replied Jo. "It was a good name in business. Great on that, the old man was."

They drove on till the house was reached—the house with its new wing and veranda, shining with fresh paint, its door-yard glowing with verbena and geranium blossoms.

"Why, what's this? It can't be the place!" exclaimed the stranger.

"All right—here you are, Sir," said Jo, driving rapidly up the graveled sweep which had replaced the cart-worn lane.

Mrs. Raspton was sitting comfortably at her sewing in the amended parlor; through the long windows she could see the hanging-baskets she delighted in, and the gay glint of fall-flowers in the beds beyond. The afternoon was cool, and a bright fire burned in the grate. The crimson curtains, the dark, rich carpet, all wore a look of cheer and comfort; nor was Mrs. Raspton's figure, despite its widow's weeds, at variance with the general effect. Comely and peaceful she pursued her work, snipping off a thread now and then, or glancing out.

"I wish Maria Jane would come," she thought. "She and Ned ride too long. What's that? Jo Bright. He's brought up a gentleman from the station. Who can it be, I wonder?"

A minute more, and some one came into the hall—the parlor door opened—she gave a shriek and swooned away.

Maria Jane and Ned arrived as James came up from business. The lovers bade good-by at the door with an appointment for the evening, and brother and sister went in together. The lamp was lighted on the parlor-table, and by their mother on the sofa sat a gentleman who had his arm around her. For one moment the young people stood confounded; the next all was a wild whirl of feeling. "Father! father!" they cried—and had no words to express their agitation, their amazement. And their delight? I don't know. They were glad to welcome him back to cheerful day again, to dissociate him from ideas of gloom, to find him once more a part of the active, breathing world. But Maria Jane thought, with fearful misgiving, of the altered house, the costly furniture, and, most of all, Ned. Would her father ever allow her to keep him? While James's swift fears ranged to Nelly and the bays, and a thousand other topics. Mrs. Raspton had no such drawbacks. She sat holding her husband's hand in hers, and feeling as if the Severus of her youth had come back to her. Happily the neighbors' prophecies had been unfulfilled, and there was no new image to interfere. She listened to the tale of his danger, his suffering as he clung to the plank which the ship had flung him, his fear, his despair, his last thoughts of home, his final rescue. How those who saved his life had robbed him of all else; how he had been left penniless in a far, foreign land to work his way back as best he might; how he had written letters which, he now learned, had never come to hand; how he had dreaded death or disaster to them in his absence; how he had toiled and grieved; how he was here at last—at home, safe, with an unbroken circle. The wife cried and laughed together, while the children's eyes were wet, and the harsh lines of the father's face grew soft.

"Here, Maria Jane," said Mrs. Raspton, pulling off her widow's cap, "get me a bit of red ribbon or flowers, or something to put in this border; and take off that black dress, and put on your blue silk that you had just before father went away. It's no time to be wearing mourning now."

"Never mind!" said Mr. Raspton, kindly. "I can't spare her long enough for that." And the girl remained, looking at her father with more filial feelings than she had ever known, yet wondering, with a constant undercurrent of dread, what he would say when he knew all. What should she do, what could she do, if Ned were again banished?

In the midst of these agitations tea appeared, and the wondering domestic had to hear the news, and retire to spread it rapidly from house to house. It reached Ned Brinley among the rest, producing in that young gentleman's mind considerably more than the average excitement.

"What shall I do?" he asked himself. "Go up at once? That's the most open way, the most manly. But then he might consider it intrusive, and it would work against us. Yet I can't leave Maria Jane to face his displeasure unsupported. They won't tell him the first night," he at last decided; "and early to-morrow I'll have it out. If he keeps his old mind concerning me I must just take the dear girl off at once—if she'll come; and I think she will! I wish he would turn me out-of-doors! but no, that would be bad for her. I can't wish any thing that would give her pain, the sweetest, dearest—" But he can pursue these musings just as well alone.

Tea over, Mr. Raspton began to look about as if noting the changes in the room. Maria Jane trembled as she watched him, but no decrease of graciousness was visible.

"You have made some alterations I observed as we drove up," he presently remarked. "Suppose we go about and see what they are."

"Now is the time!" thought the poor girl, nervously; but there was no use in trying to evade the crisis. Light in hand she led the way, and they all went over the new building so handsome, and, alas! so costly. She saw with alarm a deep seriousness overspread her father's countenance—an alarm that would have deepened had she read his mind. "What!" he inwardly exclaimed. "Had they no limits to their folly! I could have borne much and borne it patiently, but this passes all! Such extravagance! such reckless, willful extravagance! They thought I was gone"—with bitterness—"and never could come back to interfere. Perhaps they would have liked if I never had."

But his eye fell on his wife's happy, agitated face, on Maria Jane with her pretty, pleading looks. There was a struggle, sharp but short; his brow cleared, and he went serenely through the remainder of the exhibition.

The struggle was renewed in the still hours of night when good Mrs. Raspton slept peacefully at his side, and the children in rooms above woke every hour or so from uneasy slumber to wonder what the morrow would bring forth. Strong, stern displeasure would arise whenever he thought of that extravagance, so contrary to every known wish of his; whenever he remembered the changed lives and plans of those who had hitherto been utterly subject to his will. What hindered him from taking affairs into his own hands again? The house was altered, to be sure; he could not conjure it and its plenshing back to their original state and the money they had cost into his coffers; but nothing else was irrevocably fixed. Arthur might be recalled from college, Maria Jane's engagement broken off, James made to give up that girl without a penny. Or, at any rate, his will could be declared; and if they ran counter to it he could banish them from his house and deprive them of his property. And strongly tempted was he, as he lay there, to resolve it.

But a vision came over him of that dark night a year ago. Of the black waters, cold as death; the agony, the remorse, the despair. In warm contrast rose the bright room of that evening, the glad, tearful faces, the bliss of home regained. Should he cloud it all, bring sullen bitterness instead, make them wish that the sea had indeed never given up its victim. It was a hard conflict and a long.

How it ended we may best judge by looking in upon a Christmas gathering two years later. Arthur, who graduated the past summer with distinction, is an honored guest; so are Mr. and Mrs. Brinley, a young pair in the full pride of health and beauty. Mr. Raspton begins to wear a benevolent-old-gentleman aspect, and his wife is the picture of comely matronage.

"Why are Nelly and James so late?" she asks, going to the window, and looking out with some anxiety. "Oh here they are—baby and all!"

A rush is made for the door, and baby is seized upon and unmuffled; there are kisses and handshakes and all manner of happy Christmas greetings. And when dinner is over, and all are comfortably seated around the fire, grandpa takes the young wonder on his knee and meekly submits his forefinger to the mercies of those two sharp teeth that are beginning to peep through the pink gums.

So let the curtain fall.

POOR ISABEL.

THE gate at the foot of Mrs. Deshaughne's garden slowly swung open, and was closed by a timid hand again, and then a hesitating step went up the crackling gravel. It was the step of a young woman, wavering and uncertain in approach, and pausing every moment or two while its owner ran her eye over the windows that glared at her from behind a lofty screen of blossoming white lilacs which shook their dripping plumes in the gay sunshine and scattered their powerful perfume abroad through the hemisphere of fresh morning air.

The young woman, decently but poorly clothed in black, was something almost at variance with the gladness and sparkle of that finest hour of June; the budding briars, the opening honeysuckles, the twittering birds, all seemed to belong to a different world from that in which she had lived. And so indeed they did; for, in the first place, they were the arabesques, the gay border and marginery of health and wealth and possible joy, and she was born of illness and poverty and pain; and, in the second place, they sung and bloomed and were fragrant in the clear dazzle of American air, and she had never drawn till now other than the humid ocean-breath of English shores.

This young person was rather above the customary height of women, but thin and worn in figure, stooping and narrow, and of a somewhat awkward and angular gait. She had none of the curving contours of her countrywomen, nor any of those peach and rosy tints that so illuminate the massive mould of material beauty. Nevertheless, to an attentive glance, the pale face withdrawn among its shadows, abounded in a peculiar loveliness of its own, though that glance searched twice to find it. The delicate features were as clearly cut as though, instead of being modeled in perishable clay, they belonged to some antique marble; the heavy lids and a slight droop of the mouth gave them a pensive cast, and the eyes were large and dark and mournful, though seldom raised: had the fine-edged lips been of deeper dye, had any flush of pink stained the white cheek or ear, had any radiance blessed the tear-acquainted eye, the face would have been a miracle to look at. As it was, the dark hair waved a little about her temples, thought better of it, and retreated into its shielding cap, and to a casual or inferior eye she presented only a strange appearance, as of something unique for a maid-servant, but scarcely to be coupled with any idea of delight. An artist, a poet, or even a man of culture, might have reveled in the daily vision of those perfect outlines; the clod whom she would probably wed, if indeed she ever married at all, would doubtless think her ugly; the mistress whom she should serve would certainly never look again at that pallid countenance, the wrinkle of suffering dividing its forehead, the dark circles around its eyes, nor give it a second thought in all her idle wanderings of fancy.

The young woman drew near the door at last, and hesitated; it was the grand entrance, pillared and porched; with her old-country ideas it would never do to knock there; she quietly stepped back and found a side-door, and asking for the lady of the house was shown into Mrs. Deshaughne's presence.

Mrs. Deshaughne sat in her summer parlor, opening on the velvety lawn, where the webs of woven dew yet glittered. She fancied she was very busy while she copied out recipes for a cookery-book-according-to-chemistry, whose publication she meditated; for one of her crotchets was that she was a famous housewife. This was the right side of the pattern. If she could have seen the wrong side, perhaps she might have learned that she was an infamous task-mistress.

As the new-comer stood in the door before her she commandingly nodded her in, and then surveyed her leisurely from head to foot, skewering her, so to say, on the gaze. If she secured her services it was unlikely that she would ever fairly look at her again; thus it was well to make the inspection complete at present, but it required to effect it some peculiar qualities that are scarcely looked for in a young and handsome woman.

"So you wish to obtain the situation in my nursery?" she asked, having frightened the girl with her gaze entirely out of what courage she began with.

"If you please, ma'am."

"Are you equal to it?"

"Oh, I hope so, ma'am."

"It is not a question of your hopes but of your ability," said the lofty lady. "Are you strong, are you healthy?"

"I am quite healthy," said the applicant, hesitating over her reply. "I have never had a downright illness, that is."

"Ah, indeed!"

"Perhaps I am not so strong just at the present," she added, fearing lest she had misled her questioner, "being but lately off the sea."

"From where?"

"Out of London, ma'am."

"English, then." The tone said that was good, for Mrs. Deshaughne had begun life by forbidding the daughters of Erin her kitchen.

"You are accustomed to children?"

"Very well accustomed."

"You have had whole charge of any?"

"I had the care of my young brothers and sisters for a year and more, while my mother was away to her work."

"Brothers and sisters! I dare say. That is a very different affair. What was your condition in England?"

"We were farmers, ma'am, till my father was misfortunate, and lost his land. And then—he was laid up, and mother she worked."

"Why was it that you did not go out yourself instead?"

"My hands were full at home, ma'am, with father and the children; and mother did nursing."

"Not very capable then," was the audible commentary upon the full hands.

The girl colored, and looked at the lady of the house a moment, as if she questioned her right to that title, then sighed, and dropped her eyes.

"How happened you to come to America?" continued Mrs. Deshaughne.

"The children died—"

"Died? How? Through any carelessness? Oh, really!" was begun in an alarm of curiosity.

"Oh no, indeed—no, indeed, ma'am! They took the fever; and mother couldn't abear it when they were gone, and we just emigrated," the lifted eyes growing shining and dewy while she spoke.

"Dear me! Well. Yes. And where are they now—your father and mother?"

"They are dead, too, ma'am." And the dew in her eyes became tears that ran down her quiet face like rain.

"Oh dear! That is sad. And then you are quite alone?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"No followers?"

"None, ma'am."

"And you wish to be a nursery-maid?"

"If you please, ma'am."

"Have you any character?" continued the catechism.

"Oh! I trust there's no one has a word against me."

"Pshaw! Any written character?"

"I'm begging your pardon, ma'am. The surgeon of the ship gave me a writing, ma'am."

"The surgeon of the ship! Now this is too much. He had probably seen you at odd times during two months."

"He was a gentleman from our place, ma'am. He was knowing to our bad luck, and had seen me often in our better days."

"Better days!" said Mrs. Deshaughne to a lady who sat, with a book, in the embrasure of the window beside her, and who had fidgeted a good deal during the dialogue; "I must say it is very disagreeable to order about people who have seen better days. Every body has invariably. For my part, these are the best I have ever known or ever hope to know. If I decide to engage you," proceeded she, in much the same tone, to the young woman, "I wish to hear nothing at all of better days. Let me see your recommendation."

The girl approached the awful judgment-seat and tendered it. It proved to be something more satisfactory than anticipated.

"Hm," said Mrs. Deshaughne, running the jeweled head of her gold pen over her lips.

"Hm. Very well. You are twenty-seven years old then?"

"Last May, ma'am."

"Never mind the month. What wages do you expect?"

"Whatever may be the custom I was wishing."

"Yes; of course. But as a beginner, untried, ignorant, I should not think of paying you the same as an experienced nurse. I shall say nine shillings. To be doubled after the first year has expired. Will that satisfy you?"

The girl hesitated a moment. "Indeed, ma'am, I hardly know," she said. "I was—that is—I entered into an obligation to pay the debt of my mother's burial. I am afraid that would not let me do it in the time, and have any thing over."

"Oh, I have nothing to do with that. That is all I shall be willing to allow under the circumstances. As for dress, though, I dare say you could get along with cast-off things such as would fall to you from my sister and myself or Madame Deshaughne."

"That might make a difference, ma'am," said the girl, coloring again, hating to go further, and fearing to find worse, if worse could be.

"Will you engage me, ma'am, at that rate?"

"I must think about it.—Can you cook any? Arrow-root, for instance, barley-water, caudle? Let me hear how you make a wine-panada," said the cunning amateur, in hopes of a new prescription from across the seas.

"Indeed I shouldn't be giving it to children at all," was the astute reply.

"Very true. But bread every one should be equal to. Not that you would be called upon to make it, but if you were, how should you raise it, with yeast or with muriatic acid?"

"With what, ma'am!" exclaimed her terrified listener.

The dietetic reformer shrugged her shoulders. "How far prejudice and ignorance can go!" murmured she, to her companion. "Half poisoned already at the sound. We use the acid here," continued she, aloud and maliciously.

"I should think the bread would be sour, ma'am!" was the innocent reply.

"Oh no. Let me see," resumed Mrs. Deshaughne, referring to her tablets; "you say you are good-natured?"

"No, ma'am. I didn't say so. I'm of a quick temper."

"Ah, that would never do."

"Perhaps, ma'am, you'd not discover it but for my telling. I could say that I am patient with children, on the whole."

"That is very bad, very bad. I can't have that example set for Agatha; and as for Arnold, he is a high-spirited child, and I can't have him thwarted."

"Certainly, ma'am," meekly answered the prospective termagant.

"Very bad. I don't know. Are you a good seamstress?" asked Mrs. Deshaughne, as if an affirmative would remove her doubts in relation to the quick temper, and would moreover cover a multitude of sins.

"I've done a deal of fine sewing, ma'am. Lace-work and embroidery. And I earned ten pound flossing flannels one year."

"Is that so?" said the astonished hearer. "Have you any specimens?"

The girl drew a wonderful bit of needle-work from her reticule, and handed it to the lady. Mrs. Deshaughne checked the exclamations that rose to her companion's lips; it would never do to let the creature know how valuable she was. Her eyes devoured it; then she tossed it aside as a trifle; for though she was preparing a great future warfare against dress, embroideries were still her wedge of Achan. "Well," said she, "what did you say our name was?"

"Isabel Throckmorton."

Isabel Throckmorton! Mrs. Deshaughne had something like literary proclivities. It ran through her mind that the wife of Sir Walter Raleigh was none other than Elizabeth of that name—and what was Isabel but Spanish for beautiful Elizabeth?—the absurd coincidence answered for potent argument, settling the vexed point in her mind; and, under the patronage of the noble lady dead this three hundred years, Isabel Throckmorton was dismissed the presence, a nursery-maid of the mighty Mrs. Deshaughne, and Mrs. Deshaughne continued to copy out directions for concocting Flummery and Floating Island, Trifle and Topsy Squire.

It was not by any means a sinecure that Isabel found in her place. The slave of two spoiled children—subject to every one of their caprices, bathing them, dressing them, walking with them, amusing them all the day long, and by night, so soon as they were asleep, stitching on the endless embroideries with which her mistress kept her supplied, till her back ached and her soft eyes grew bloodshot and bleared—she could count her nine shillings at the close of the week with satisfaction as honestly earned. Of a nervous temperament, interiorly quick and passionate, she was forced, as was right, to keep herself persistently curbed, lest Miss Agatha should follow a bad example, or Master Arnold, who must not be thwarted, should by any accident have his spirit broken; and she became in process of time gently and sadly yielding enough to satisfy Mrs. Deshaughne herself. But every gain has its drawbacks; for no sooner had the servants below stairs descried the hesitating self-surrender and timidity of this sensitive and inwardly fiery creature, than, not to be above the littlenesses of human nature, they took advantage of it in every possible way; so that between high and low the poor, dispirited girl was fairly pushed to the wall, and grew every day more touchingly submissive to Fate—if the great engine can be supposed to impinge upon so small affairs as hers. For encounter with a fresh torrent of such cruel questioning as that she had experienced upon entering this place was something she felt herself, as Mrs. Deshaughne would have phrased it, unequal to, and once established therein nothing would induce her to leave it till the debt of her mother's burial were paid, at least; service would always be service, she felt, to her, be it where it would, and stairs were as hard to climb in one house as another, always provided it were not her own.

One other thing made Isabel's bondage endurable; this poor nursery-maid had formed an attachment, and that not to one of her equals, but to the best blue blood of the house. There were two Mrs. Deshaughnes, one regnant, to be sure, the other, as a wicked son had christened her in satire of his brother's marriage, Dowager; but once in a while the Dowager raised her idle sceptre from the side of the arm-chair out of which all day she never stirred unless lifted, and, when the wand fell, the atmosphere of the house had experienced a purification. Her daughter-in-law held the placid moon-faced silver-haired old lady in wholesome awe, and therefore did her bidding, but never said much about it. It was to the Dowager that Isabel had attached herself; she must have something to love, and until usage should have made them dear, even as we hug our sorrows, Miss Agatha and Master Arnold were out of the question. The Dowager lady's apartment, by day, opened with folding-doors into the nursery, and these were usually slid apart only for morning-prayers, but, after she had acquired an idea of the state of things, they were made to remain apart—the two rooms were thrown into one, and the tolerable-and-not-to-be-endured little Deshaughnes were under surveillance, so that only a limited portion of Isabel's arm was subject to their thumbs and forefingers, and Master Arnold's boots were entirely frustrated, if Miss Agatha's pins were not. To this kind but eccentric old lady, for in that dwelling kindness was eccentricity, Isabel owed whatever breathing-space she found; for when it was evident that all the odd jobs which no one else desired to do, but which by somebody must be done, were tacitly imposed upon the nursery-maid, the Dowager, bit by bit, instituted a new order of things, and without exactly becoming a religieuse had Isabel sit and read godly books to her by the half hour, pages that refreshed her when she noted what she was reading, and that slipped off like oil when her mind preferred to wander upon other themes. And when she found Isabel capable of understanding these things, she forgot the distance between their stations, talked to her of the past, since there was no one else to listen and she loved to speak, and first moaned and then jested over her scapegrace son in India, the wild Harry, whom she seemed to love, with the natural inconsistency of womankind, far more than her perfectly well-regulated son George, of the present household; and she would have Isabel ferret out his letters from all manner of inconceivable hiding-places, and would take her great glass and follow along the lines, and read out to her the blackest passages of all the absurd boy's confessions with unfeigned enjoyment, always finishing by the kind of absolution which perusal of a chapter of Holy Living and Dying might give her and him together. And though the Dowager was every whit as imperious as Miss Agatha, Isabel wore her rue with a difference. The old lady at the same time innocently appeared to take fresh interest in her grandchildren, which Mrs. Deshaughne regarded as a sign of the breaking up of her constitution, since usually she had forbidden them her presence, having designated them as a couple of cubs. But when she had thrown their cages together, as she said, she decided to do the work thoroughly, and so every day took one of them out with her on her little drive; and of course the nurse must go too, as otherwise she would be in fear of her life, she declared—a very unnecessary fear, as their mother and Talleyrand might have thought it. This pleasuring, however, did not last long, for the cold weather came and the asthmatic Dowager could no longer breathe the outer air. She ordained then a summer indoors; the neglected conservatory was rehabilitated, filled with the richest exotics and healthiest vines, and a skillful gardener was secured, who was expected to make the product of the vines pay for the beauty of the blossoms. Here, of course, she could not go herself, unless specially borne, and accordingly Isabel did her behests there morning and night, gathering the baskets of flowers, advising, seeing, reporting, ordering. And if Isabel lingered in such a pleasant place, between the tiers of splendid plants, all odorous and hung with bloom, the kind Dowager had no reprimand for her. And when once that lady herself, having been carried down, had sat for an hour in person in the tepid and half-enchanted atmosphere, and had held conversation with the young gardener there, it would have been noticeable, if there had been any one to notice it, that immediately thereafter Isabel was deputed extraordinary envoy half a dozen times a day with queries and instructions and commendations in the matter of this last hobby of the Dowager's till any body's patience but her own would have been exhausted. Singularly enough, it seemed that Isabel found a pleasure in it.

One day—it was a dull, rainy day in the January thaw when all the world beyond the pane looked dismal—the Dowager, resolved to have even more floral cheer than customary about her, determined, as she said with her bit of irreverence, to get the upper hand of Nature herself—a thing which every one believed the Dowager to have done years ago, as otherwise she must have been long beneath the sod. Accordingly Isabel was dispatched to the conservatory, not only for the usual flowers and ivies, but to see if the marvelous South American plant had yet parted its sheath, and to bring any new-blossomed wonders bodily away to blow a while under her eyes, cheating the weather into believing itself fair, after which the Dowager would have had June in January's teeth.

"What is there new to-day, Mr. Dunyan?" asked Isabel, opening the little glass door and stepping down before the handsome fellow, one of whose glances always made her blush.

"Well, Miss, there's the roses," said the young gardener, merrily; "there's the red ones, I've never seen finer;" but as Isabel did not take his mischief he went on in another vein. "And there's the double yellow roses—it's like those Chinamen to have their roses yellow, is it not now? You'll not be having white ones—there's snow enough out of doors."

"And to spare, it seems," answered Isabel, timidly.

"Then there's some lilies, a white Japan; and a chap just blown from the Cape of Good Hope—wherever that may be. Well now, he's worth seeing; cast an eye at his color; 'as a villainous look, 'asn't he? Like a snake ready to spring, if snakes 'ad such colors."

"I've read of their like to the old lady," said Isabel.

"Have you now?" answered the gardener, admiringly. "I'm not much of a reader myself. Perhaps you'd tell me about it some time."

"Oh yes, indeed."

"That would be kind of you. I read the book the old lady—Madame Deshaughne I would say—sent me, and I'd beg you to return it with my respectful thanks. I found it—well—when your gentlemen undertake it they talk above the profession, and there's little to be learned from them. It's practice tells, Miss Isabel."

"Ah yes," answered Isabel, not daring to lift her eyes in his face. "Has the Dove blown yet, may I ask, Mr. Dunyan?"

"The South American plant, do you mean? The Flower of the Holy Spirit. Yes, Miss, step this way, there it is." And the young man took off his hat as if in homage before the magnificent orchid, over whose scarlet bosom a tiny white dove seemed poising and fluttering, but in reality merely to run his hand through the thick brown curls that shadowed his winning face. "That," said he, "is what I call fine. There's no green-house this side of East River has its mate."

Isabel stood breathless before the beautiful thing that almost seemed to stir and palpitate with life, while the gardener ran volubly on in his nimble praises. Then at last she picked up the basket of cut flowers and slung it over her arm, and Mr. Dunyan lifted the pot in which the Flower of the Holy Spirit bloomed, and placed it in her hands to be carried up for the Dowager's delectation. As he did so his hands touched hers, his face was near hers; something, Isabel was innocent of any knowledge concerning it, made her suddenly tremble, her fingers did not at once clasp over what it had been supposed they would, the pot slid through, dashed on the bricks in halves, the flower dragged its sheer petals in the dust, and with the confusion of escape from such a possibility Mr. Dunyan set his heel upon the stem, and dove and blossom, white and red, were crushed and blended in one ruin. Isabel was faint with horror. As for Mr. Dunyan, he did not love his flowers to the point of tears.

"Gather up the fragments and let nothing be lost," said he, coolly; and in a few moments no vestige of the wreck remained in the pathway, but all had been tossed into a corner and hidden under an inverted basket.

"Oh, oh, Mr. Dunyan! What can I do?"

What can I do? I am ruined—I have ruined you!" cried Isabel, in an agony. "She will turn us off!"

"Then somebody else must turn us on," said Mr. Dunyan, quite enjoying himself.

"And she'll be so disappointed. Oh, she counted upon it."

"Never mind, never mind, Miss. I've the mate to it coming forward. 'Twill be out in a week or so. I'll send her word that this one is delayed—that's all."

"I'd not have you be telling an untruth in my behalf!"

"It's the Queen's own truth, no less. And as for that I'd tell twenty for you, Miss Isabel," said the gallant gardener, not meaning a syllable he said.

The color flew so over Isabel's face that for a moment, as it subsided, the gardener surprised himself wondering if she were not pretty. Then she stood pale, and faded, and weary-looking again, her eyes a little swollen and heavy, and he laughed at his fancy. It was only a moment's fancy though at best, for before it ended Isabel grew fairly livid with fear, and, turning, Mr. Dunyan saw the reigning Mrs. Deshaughne at the door, with Miss Agatha swinging by one hand from her gown, and peering at the two out of a pair of satisfied malicious eyes. Without doubt, as his quick intelligence instantly taught him, the little imp had followed Isabel down, and had spied out the evil deed and reported it to her mother. That good lady had risen straightway from the composition, on paper, of a Gooseberry Fool, and hastened to the scene of action, for she prided herself on being one of those careful housewives whose servants always pay for the broken crockery. Mr. Dunyan, then, seeing the cloud on the mistress's face, chivalrously resolved to play the part of conductor to its lightning himself, and immediately putting his best foot forward made his salute.

"I was just telling of a misfortune I have met with, ma'am," said he. "A beautiful plant that I had purchased myself as a present for Miss Agatha, when it flowered, fell from my 'ands a moment since and was ruined."

"Oh, is that all?" answered Mrs. Deshaughne. "I understood that Isabel had broken the new South American plant."

"Not at hall, ma'am, not at hall. The Spirito Santo has not yet come forward; I have it behind there in a warmer spot. Probably it will not fully flower this fortnight. Could you look at it, ma'am?" And the slippery-tongued gallant led the way down the little alley, while Isabel stared in amaze.

Mrs. Deshaughne looked condescendingly at the plant in question, then cast her eyes around, and—woe worth the while—they alighted on the refraction that a broken corner-pane made with a ray of sunshine, and then followed the betrayer down to the little heap just thrown there temporarily and partly covered with the basket; they were hawk's-eyes, perhaps to match the hawk's-nose between them. She moved forward, displaced the basket, and raised the broken stem and torn, trampled blossom. She held it a moment suspended over her hand, turned and looked at the white, guilty Isabel, flashed her eyes over the dumb-stricken gardener, and uttered their sentence.

"You have told me a falsehood, Mr. Dunyan," said the lady. "You are dismissed from my service."

Isabel turned, warmed into courage. "Oh, ma'am, if you please," she cried, "it was my fault, all my fault! It was I myself that did it. He only meant to be generous, ma'am. He was hiding my blame. Oh, Mrs. Deshaughne, if you would be so kind—if you would reconsider, ma'am—"

"I shall not dismiss you, Isabel, though you have committed a grave fault," interrupted her majesty. "Do not be concerned. Mr. Dunyan will find his wages in the hall." And the morning's work was done.

The lady swept away, followed by the pleased Agatha, and left the two as she found them. Isabel remained silent through terror at the consequences of her carelessness. When at last she dared to raise her eyes Mr. Dunyan was surveying her and laughing. He immediately stepped forward and sent the reserved plant which he had shown the lady spinning through the air.

"She'll not have that neither," said he; and his eye gave a mischievous glance at the trembling girl as his foot gave the wicked toss.

"Oh, Mr. Dunyan, don't do so, please!" exclaimed Isabel, with clasped hands. "I am going directly to beg the old lady's good word. Oh! perhaps she will take you back."

"Be hanged if I'll be taken, Miss," said he. "I've had a plenty of it."

"You can't mean that," stammered Isabel, her heart quaking afresh in spite of herself.

"I mean that I'd sooner go to Coventry than heat any more of that woman's salt," replied he, with a will. "Why, she hasn't a bone to throw to a dog."

"But what can you do? Oh, I have ruined, I have ruined you!"

"Nonsense. What can I do? Why, I can get lodged at Dame Halsey's down at the foot of the road, and do the gardening for 'alf a dozen gentlemen's places at once. I only came here till I could look about me."

"Dame Halsey's! Are you English, then, Mr. Dunyan? I always thought your voice sounded like home."

The young man colored and frowned a moment, then laughed a laugh that showed all his white teeth and lighted up his face like sunshine.

"English!" said he. "What could 'ave put that into your 'ead? I had an English nurse, to be sure."

"Oh!" said the subdued Isabel. "I was in hopes you were my countryman."

"Sorry to disappoint you, Miss," he answered, drawing near and still slightly smiling as his black eyes sparkled on her from under their dark brows, and the lashes thick and long as any girl's—"sorry to disappoint you. But I was born in Trevence."

And as Isabel knew no more of Trevence than she did of the Ultima Thule she remained both disappointed and convinced. There was something she wanted to say, but she had no words to say it, and the idea that she could ever be of use to this strong and proud young man seemed to her preposterous.

"If I could ever hope to make it up to you," she murmured; "if I could ever serve you—"

Mr. Dunyan proceeded to gather up such tools as belonged to himself while she spoke.

"Now, my dear," he remarked, "you've said enough. Let by-gones be by-gones." Then he took his basket, hung his blue jacket across his shoulder, and stood towering a moment beside her. "Well," said he, "I'm off, Miss Isabel. Now and then I shall drop in upon you of an evening. I'm going to get my wages at present, and I'll have the last ha'penny, depend on't. Don't you fret now." And the audacious fellow suddenly bent and left the mark of his lips on the white cheek that grew instantly crimson beneath their touch, while its startled owner felt thoroughly suffused with some new, pleasant, unfamiliar warmth, and it seemed to her that a very rose of joy had suddenly bloomed in her heart, and was scattering perfume and color throughout her whole being. It was the first kiss Isabel had ever received from any but her mother; it was strange as delicious. When its second of time was over she looked up and found herself alone, but with the saucy, smiling, bending face of Dunyan fixed indelibly, as it seemed, before her eyes. It never crossed the unconscious girl's mind that all this meant any thing beyond the moment, or had the remotest relation to that first scene of the great drama of life, some part in which, tragedy, or comedy, or chorus, every one is called upon to play. She was sure it was very impertinent in Mr. Dunyan to have stooped and kissed her so daringly, very foolish and perhaps wrong in her not to have resisted him; but then how sweet it was! Poor Isabel!

Blushing and tingling now, she gathered up her burdens and sought the Dowager's room, finding the nursery still vacant, for Miss Agatha was enjoying the fruits of her labors, and had dragged Master Arnold down into the hall to see Mr. Dunyan dismissed with his wages. Isabel at once rehearsed the morning's misfortunes, and the old lady, when she had finished laughing at them, began to pity them. She was a sprightly soul, this Dowager, after the fashion of a past generation that filiped at its sorrows, and she contrived to extract some cheer even from the hard cushions of her arm-chair. When this nursery-maid, to whom she had taken one of the violent fancies that age sometimes takes to youth, was about her, or when her son visited her, she was gay and garrulous as a magpie.

On the occasions when her sceptre was effecting any of its irresistible revolutions in the household she sat upright and calm, and was the moon-faced, placid, silver-haired old lady again, whom you would have deemed a happy angel of peace and submission. It was not, moreover, because she lacked attention from others that she demanded so much from Isabel; for did not Mrs. Deshaughne every morning, in the performance of her filial-in-law duty, read to her the last written page of the Complete Housekeeper's Guide to a Healthy Table? And perhaps the amusement which the old lady derived from the entertainment did something toward helping the insubordination on its account below stairs.

"So Mr. Dunyan has gone," said she. "Very inconsiderate of Martha. Mrs. Deshaughne ought to have known that the first thing the man would do would be to finish the other one. Then, I suppose her temper was soured, making a fool of herself and the gooseberries too. Now we shall have no Spirito Santo at all. You're the only one of us all that has seen it, Isabel, lucky girl! So he went. Did he bid you good-by?"

"Oh yes, ma'am."

"How, may I ask?"

"Oh, he said he would drop in of an evening now and then."

"That's all? You bring him up to me when he does. I'll have him over the coals for you. What is that red spot on your cheek—Miss Agatha's griffes?"

"It's—it's where—he kissed me there," said Isabel, desperately, first putting up her hand, and then covering the red spot in a universal mantle of the tint.

"Ah, ah, ah, how naughty!" And then the Dowager grew serious. "No more of that, Isabel, my good girl. Keep your cheeks for their owner."

"Who is that, ma'am?" was asked in a slight perplexity.

"You'll know him by his sign-manual on your left hand. Your husband, girl!"

"Oh!" was the comprehensive and shame-faced reply.

"Yes, yes, give the lads their distance. 'Idle dallying never came to naught,' says the proverb, which, you know, is 'one man's wit but many men's wisdom.'" And then, despite her caution, the venerable lady was softly sighing under her breath, "Alas for the good old days when we were young!"

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said Isabel, not catching the words.

"Never mind about it," was the response. "'Twould do you no good. There! Now we'll spend a profitable half hour to hide our folly. Here's a sermon upon the rainbow like unto an emerald. Let us discover how much the man has seen of it. Read now."

Isabel missed Mr. Dunyan as the days went on after this, she had grown to be so accustomed to his impertinent politenesses. The new gardener was a gruff old Dutchman who spoke scarcely two intelligible syllables, and whose stupidity was a thorn in the flesh whenever she undertook to execute the Dowager's orders. Mrs. Deshaughne also began to enter remonstrances concerning the amount of the nursery-maid's time appropriated by others, and proposed that the elder lady should procure an attendant of her own.

"Very well, then," declared the Dowager. "I'll take Isabel, she suits me. You may get another nursery-maid."

But Mrs. Deshaughne had no mind to relinquish the skillful fingers that furnished her with the best of foreign embroidery for nothing at all, and angrily withdrew her forces from the field.

"She has reached the tart in her list," said the Dowager, as the authoress retired. "As for me, I have only come as far as spice, but that does for snaps!"

It was only a week or two after this that Mrs. Deshaughne was rewarded for her forbearance, when Isabel awoke one night startled from sleep by a bell striking at her ear. It was the Dowager's ring, and she hastened to answer it.

"Light the lamp, Isabel," gasped the old lady. "I am going—to die—I believe. But I should really—like to see how to do it. No matches? Ah! Martha might long ago—have had gas brought in. But there—what odds is it to me when—I am going out!" And her laugh came near suffocating her.

"Don't be frightened, my good Isabel," resumed she, as the girl trembled to look at her. "I dare say it is hard to be alone with—almost a ghost. But then—I never hurt you, living—why should I, dying?—Death—is only a condition. I have been ill. I convalesce. Tomorrow—I shall be well."

"Oh, ma'am, let me just call the master!" cried Isabel, alarmed at the labored breathing, and fancying the old lady's mind wandered.

"No, no—his grief—he'd be sorry—not so sorry as my poor Harry though. George's grief would—disturb me. How could I die in peace?"

"But Mrs. Deshaughne, then?"

"Tush!" cried the dying woman, with her inextinguishable spirit. "No, no, I say, child. Death terrifies her. He is going to swallow her some day. He is her bugaboo. The great giant—that shall crack her bones. Not the great angel that shall lift her on his wings. I dislike being—abhorrent to her—when I can not—retort. Stay here. You are not like a—servant, Isabel. You are—my friend. I hope I—have done you no harm."

"Oh, ma'am! oh, ma'am! Never!"

"Good. There are worse things—than dying, Isabel. If my poor Harry were only here! Ah, my boy, my boy! Put the pillows behind me. Wipe my forehead, be so kind. Pretty soon—I shall have nobody. Think of that, child. Oh, what freedom! Rest and rest. Now—read the prayers for the dying." And when Isabel finished reading the Amen gurgled in the Dowager's throat, and she was gone.

Isabel prepared her old friend for the grave herself that night; a deed over which Mrs. Deshaughne fairly melted into thanks in the morning, and the glow of gratitude at being relieved from death-bed attendance was still so genuine in the vacuum that would be popularly termed her heart, that when the Dowager's will was read and it was discovered that she had left to her faithful Isabel Throckmorton the sum of one thousand dollars, Mrs. Deshaughne did not utter a syllable of contravention, but, satisfied with her own share, had her husband attend to Isabel's before any other of the legacies. That done, Agatha might pinch and prick, and Arnold tread and thrust with impunity—Mrs. Deshaughne felt that her duty had been nobly done, and there were the subjects of wafers and waffles, and wheys and whips, yet awaiting her attention.

The possessor of such an inheritance, Isabel could readily have become a personage now among the servants had she once dreamed of it. But having paid her poor little debt, and put the balance at interest with Mr. Deshaughne, she never thought of assuming her proper dignity; and, with the natural inertia of a timid mind, remained where she was, supposing every other place would be equally as bad, and forgetting about her fortune. The consequence therefore was, that in a little while her companions forgot about it too, and she was pushed as closely to the wall as ever. So Isabel walked with the children, and ran errands, and did the work of others, uncomplainingly and all day long as before, and stitched lace-work, wheel-work, long-stitch, and satin-stitch, half the night. And now and then, as he had promised, and only now and then, Mr. Dunyan dropped in at the lower door, and cut Isabel to the heart by flirting with every other girl in the house beside herself; but with her, somehow, a diffidence had lately possessed him, and what all the rest expected as matters of course he dared not offer Isabel. But how was she to know that?

At about this time Mrs. Deshaughne finished the labors of her pen, and proceeded to put her theories into practice. That book was never to go out upon the world until its recipes, each and every, had been tested in her own kitchen and tasted on her own table. That people should exist and perform the routine of heavy tasks on such diet proved, of course, impossible; and then the concoctions were not to their mind. Yet so rich material must not be wasted—where was Isabel? The viands were sent up to the nursery and not expected to come down again. And, growing every day more cadaverous, Isabel was slowly eating her way through the book in miseries of indigestion and panics of sudden death, and not in the least hoping to be alive at the word Finis.

Thin and pale and destitute of strength upon this book-worm provender, Isabel was one afternoon, on the edge of twilight, returning through the lane on a commission of Mrs. Deshaughne's, when she heard a trampling and lowing close behind her, mingled with the crying of drivers and cracking of whips, and found herself at the front of a herd of cattle whose tossing heads and horns loomed through the gray air like the phantasmagoria of a nightmare. Once this would not have alarmed her, now a flock of demons would have been preferable companions in the narrow place. Flight was out of the question; they were swifter than she, and full of their wickedness; yet without flight she would be trodden under foot. There was nothing to do; so after her first scream she pressed close against the fence and shut her eyes. As she stood there, while the bellowing troop drew near, suddenly a voice sounded in her ear:

"Look alive, Miss Isabel, and lend an 'and!" and opening her terrified eyes she saw a shadow like Mr. Dunyan on the other side of the hedge, his two arms extended to grasp her waist, and after a moment's doubtful poise in air she also was safe on the other side, and Mr. Dunyan had set his foot in the hole of a decayed post, had fallen, and lay with a broken limb. When the cause of this disaster had passed, and Isabel had seen the last of the tasseled tails whisk in the twilight air, she began to wonder that Mr. Dunyan yet remained on the ground, and speaking to him and receiving no answer, stooped and found him insensible.

Here was an occasion for whatever fibre Isabel had, no wailing nor wringing of hands; she remembered the brook in the field, ran to it and brought water in his cap to revive the injured man, dragged him away a little, with exertion of all her force, that she might straighten the limb whose condition she at once discerned. Then when he had awakened with a groan, she ran to alarm some neighbors, to extemporize a stretcher, and shortly had him at home, and a physician summoned, and had privately fee'd Dame Halsey with a fabulous sum to attend to every want of the patient. After which she went home half broken-hearted, and wondering if she were born to be this man's doom and destruction.

The next day, when it was time for Isabel to walk with the children, she took the tangible translation of one of Mrs. Deshaughne's recipes, sent up at her dinner—for it would have been strange indeed if, proceeding as far in the list as the jellies, not one of the whole number of compounds had been gustable—and staid a moment at Dame Halsey's door to deliver it; for probably even that, she thought, would be an improvement upon the Dame's diet-drinks. And on the following evening, having bribed the housemaid to sit in the nursery till her return, she ran down with a handkerchief over her head just to inquire how Mr. Dunyan might find himself. Mr. Dunyan's own voice cried out in response, "Come in here, Isabel; come in here!"

Isabel hesitated, but Dame Halsey gave her a friendly shove through the door, and she stood beside him and straightway burst into tears.

"Oh, Mr. Dunyan, I shall be the death of you yet!" she cried, as she saw his flushed face and pained features.

"I dare say you will!" he answered, with a grimace. "But not just this time, unless I die of a broken ankle; which I won't!"

"You'll never forgive me," sobbed Isabel. "I've lost you a place first, and now perhaps I've lost you a limb!"

"Come, I wouldn't be borrowing trouble, you have to pay such bitter usury, I've 'eard. I'll be about in a couple of months, the Doctor says, good as new; in fact, better'n ever, for I'd worn that bone some thirty years, now it's warranted sound for sixty more to come. You call in now and then, bring me your goodies, as you did yesterday, and we'll call it square. I say, was that some of the High and Mighty's cookery? 'Twasn't so bad now. Didn't know she was up to any thing but slops. If she feeds her people on that they fare better than when I was there. Eh, Isabel?"

"They won't eat it," said Isabel, laughing through her tears. "And so I have to. And you can have it all, only you'd die."

"That's a good girl. Give us the dimple again. I declare, Isabel, you're fairly pretty when you laugh."

"Then I'm a fright the most of my time," she answered, still laughing, but with half the mind to cry.

"You've made me feel better already. If my 'ead didn't hache so cursedly I'd shoulder a crutch and see you home."

"Your head? Then you must have fever. Did the doctor leave you any drops?"

"Yes. There they are. It's about time for them now. Perhaps you'd give them to me, Isabel?"

Of course, then, she came again the next evening; for Lucy, the new housemaid, shamed into generosity by Isabel's distress and munificence, offered to sit again an hour with the sleeping children. On her way the cook beckoned her into the pantry and put something into her hands. "There," said she, "you just take that to Mr. Dunyan with my respects. It's some of her draff, to be sure, but then sick folk likes it, and the house must be rid of it. Laws a me! I hopes my nex' missis won't run mad a elevating the digesters. As for this one, she ain't half baked herself, no more'n that dish in the story was—when the pie was opened the birds began to sing—and as for the most of her mixin's they're just about as sensible as that one—pocketful of rye, and four-and-twenty black-birds baked into a pie! Covering my range all day with her meddlin' messes! What's that? For me? Is that another? A fresh fuddle? I'd drop a pinch into 'em that would make her wish her cake was dough, that I would! if 'twarn't that you have to make 'way with the most of 'em, Isabel, and you're a good patient soul that lets folks put upon you!" And the cook retreated in dudgeon over the remembrance of her wrongs, spelling out as she went the directions for walnut-sauce that the other had just brought down to her. "Catsup indeed!" muttered she, between her teeth. "Catlap would be more to the pint! Well, I've give warning!" And, not caring to hear more, Isabel sped down the field to her destination.

And so for a week or more, constant to the moment, every evening Isabel made a little call on the invalid, never forgetting to provide herself with some welcome dainty, a jelly, or a cream, or a bunch of grapes begged from the gruff old gardener, till at last Mr. Dunyan looked for her coming with eager interest, and experienced actual disappointment if the door-latch lifted after dark and it were not she.

So Isabel came and went, brought cheer and left it, made him more comfortable in her short hour than Dame Halsey did in the whole twenty-four; told the news, lent the papers, brought the flowers in which the young gardener really had an interest; listened to his schemes for the future, and became with all her care and attention no longer the pale, silent, tear-sodden maid-servant in his eyes, but a rosy, smiling person of importance.

One noon when he had been able for some time to move about, though he had had it kept a careful secret from Isabel, as Mr. Dunyan sat in his chair in the sun, he looked up at Dame Halsey stirring round in her household affairs, and said, "Seeing you a counting your eggs, puts me in mind to say that I've nothing beforehand in the world, Dame, not a farthing—a shiftless wretch. You'll have to wait for my debt to you till I get quite about again."

"That's all settled!" answered the Dame, with a fling of her duster over the basket of eggs.

"Settled? How?" he said, turning on her with surprise.

"Isabel," said the sententious body.

"Isabel? What has she to do with that?"

"She paid me beforehand; that's all. The night she brought you home. She broke you, and she must mend you, I suppose."

The young man made no more reply, but pondered silently for hours with a brow growing constantly more vexed and more perplexed, and walked and stood and sat alternately, doing neither three consecutive moments, wearing a flushed and paling face and bitten lip, till at last night and Isabel came.

Isabel wore a little red hood over her dark hair from which she had long since stripped the prim cap, for the weather belonged to one of those chilly days that sometimes surprise the ardent August himself, and whether it were that, or the run in the cool air, that gave her cheek its color, who could say? At any rate, as she approached, the glowing sky behind her, and the evening-star hanging just over her head, she seemed so happy and lovely a woman, so different from the dreary dismal girl of yore, that Dunyan felt his heart give a throb as he rose on his cane and went to meet her. He paused half-way. "Now," said he to himself, "be a man, and let her alone, she's none of yours." And then his eyes rested on her. "How pretty she is!" he added in his thoughts. "I didn't know I cared about her. Why can't I leave her now, she's good as gold? She's got gold, too. She likes me, that she does. What's that other one to me? what right has the hag! Little Isabel. Ah you red cheek. No, I can't, I can't. By God, I won't!" And when Isabel reached him he stamped his well foot upon the ground, as if to set a seal thereby on some determination.

"I am nearly well you see, Isabel," said he, aloud.

"Ah yes, you can walk," answered Isabel, pulling off her hood, "I am so glad!"

"Are you then? I can't say the same. You'll not be running down of an evening much longer."

Isabel's face crimsoned.

"You think, perhaps," continued Dunyan, then, "that I'll be running up? You think wrong," he said. "Not a step of it."

"You'll forget all about us then?" answered Isabel, with a great cadence of disappointment in her voice. "You'll not be dropping in now and then any more?"

"No."

Isabel shivered as she stood at the thought of it.

"Put on your hood, girlie," said he. "You're catching cold; I saw you. No, I'll not go up to the house; what should I go there for? There'll be no soul I care to see!"

He paused, but Isabel was speechless; if she had spoken perhaps her voice would have been a cry.

"No," continued he, unabashed. "There isn't a soul in that house at present that I ever care to see again. And to tell you the truth, Isabel, I'm thinking of being married."

Isabel said nothing still lest she should shriek; she could keep calm if she could keep quiet; she only gazed at him with great, amazed, despairing eyes, and there was silence.

"Isabel," said Mr. Dunyan, suddenly, "what did you go and pay Dame Halsey for? Heh?"

But he received no answer.

"And what have you been bringing me jellies and sauces and relishes for, and making me comfortable all this time?"

Still Isabel could not have replied. She never had any spirit.

"You got me this cane," said he. "Do you think I can get along with only one cane? I want another. I want one just as high as your shoulder. I want it all the time." He placed his hand on her shoulder as he spoke, and walked, leaning a trifle of his weight upon it. "Why don't you answer me then?" said he. "Why don't you say I can have it?" And he bent to look in her face, and, doing so, saw her lip quiver. "Tears?" said he. "Because I'm not going up to Squire Deshaughne's any more? Who do you suppose I'd care to see there when you're gone? Would I suffer you to go back and stay there? Who do you suppose it is I am going to marry, Isabel?" And all at once, as the shower gushed from her eyes and her heart, he had caught her in his two arms and was folding her close to his strong breast, and saying over and over again in her ears, "No one but you, no one but you, my dear, my love, my little Isabel!"

On her return that night, having left Mr. Dunyan, who had limped home with her, in the kitchen, the nursery-maid sought her mistress, and announced her intention of leaving. Mrs. Deshaughne looked up in consternation. "Going?" she said. "And only one breadth embroidered of the dress Miss Agatha is to wear at her Aunt Maria's wedding?"

"I can work on it just as well after I'm married, ma'am," said Isabel, blushing.

"Married! You are in earnest? What a foolish girl! What under the sun are you going to be married for? I never can conceive why people in your situation in life marry at all."

"Why does Miss Maria marry?" asked Isabel, already emboldened.

"That is quite another thing. If you are going to take me up in that way, Isabel, I shall not regret losing you. But here you are, comfortable, surrounded by plenty; and there you will be poor, struggling, hard-working, and instead of one mouth very likely a dozen."

"You can do for your own, ma'am, and love lightens the way."

"Well. You will do as you please, I suppose; people always do. I have performed my duty in warning you, Isabel; for you have been a good girl, taking your inexperience into consideration, and I could wish better things for you. Foolish, foolish! However."

Following these encouraging remarks, there was a little jeering among the envious maids in the kitchen.

"Ah, she's taken bad," said Lucy.

"Awful spasms," answered the cook. "It's an epemetic always going round."

"Yes," said the waiting Dunyan, "it needed both my arms to hold her."

"Is she often took that way?" asked Lucy.

"Tell me, girlie," whispered Dunyan, "is it hard to take?"

But the next day it was all amply compensated by Mr. Deshaughne's ringing for her, and after assuring her that he should never forget her kindness to his mother, and bidding her call upon him if she needed help in the future, paying over her legacy, and making up the balance of all she had drawn, so that it lay, as before, a round check for a thousand dollars.

One fine September morning, a month from that day, Mrs. Isabel Dunyan had indorsed her maiden name on the back of the slip of paper, and Mr. Robert Dunyan had folded its proceeds neatly into his pocket-book in the bank as if he had been in the habit of cashing drafts every day of his life, and coming away, had paid it all over for the little house and garden at the head of the lane; and with a wedding present of the Complete Housekeeper's Guide to a Healthy Table from Mrs. Deshaughne, the two were established in life together.

If Isabel all the days of her life had known only trouble and grief, now in her thirtieth year she began to experience the blessedness of being. They were different skies under which she breathed from the cloudy heaven of her youth; it was a different soil upon which she trod from her previous path among graves. She remembered that it was said there shall be new heavens and a new earth; and when her husband, happy as herself, sometimes paused in the midst of his happiness to forbode, she would repeat it to him, and assure him that if this were not already the millennium, still their delight was so simple and so innocent that it must certainly be eternal. If Robert kept the garden and vines and paling perfect in order and neatness out of doors, Isabel kept the floors and furniture as exquisitely within; it was outside a little nook of bowery beauty, and internally a nest of spotless precision. When the gay-tinted autumn had vanished, and white winter lay on the land, Isabel's well-swept hearth and polished irons reflected the ruddy fire in a thousand dancing lights to greet the husband returning at dark; and her snowy table glittered in the glow as gayly as if its plated ware had been the silver of Potosi, spread, as it was, with none of Mrs. Deshaughne's olla podridas, but with pure and healthy dishes, as pleasant to the palate as to the eye. Often in the long evenings she read to him while he practiced his mechanical skill upon some trifle; or at other times she sewed with a swift needle, and listened to the gossip of his day's duties; or, later, while he sat on a low seat before the falling fire, she came and placed herself on the mat at his feet, resting her head upon his knee, and he told her little incidents of his youth, and hearkened in return to her mournful tale, and promised anew, with tears in his eyes, to make all that sorrow up to her now in joy; and if there were any thing concealed in his recital of by-gone days beneath imaginary sketch and detail Isabel never suspected it.

By-and-by spring came up the round side of the earth, and the pretty white cottage was odorous in the atmosphere of its broad plats and beds of violets, double and deepest blue, from which Robert gathered much income; and Isabel laid their pressed sweetness away in a drawer where she had hidden her latest possessions; for now she no longer sewed on the well-paid embroidery, but garnished little linens and cambrics of her own, with all the art of her needle running riot in snow-flakes and vines and frost-work of fern-like tracery. It seemed to Isabel that never before had there blossomed such a spring—a spring of such gentle and balmy winds, such perfumed air, such shining skies; she almost feared that never would there come another. All the time she followed her husband with adoring eyes; she found him so strong, so kind, so gay, he anticipated her wishes, prevented her whims, was as devoted to her as the sunbeam is to the earth; every day, beneath that caressing warmth, her heart opened and expanded.

June came, with all its roses, went, and left them lingering yet behind; and when the last of them hung fully blown upon its bending stem, and shedding its fragrant petals slowly down, Isabel lay burdened with unspoken satisfaction and a dearer little rose nestled on the pillow beside her.

It was touching to see the mother then in all those succeeding months. She was like some one who found it impossible to believe in her good luck; and she regarded her baby as if it were a cherub that, for some divine reason, had taken mortal shape a while, but which must eventually escape from her unworthy retention. Nor was the father far behind. He saw a miracle lying across Isabel's lap; he recognized the beauty of God's laws that had created so lovely a thing in his image; and each time that he looked from the dark eyes of the pale little child into Isabel's face his heart filled with a yearning tenderness over her and the gift she had given him. Every day made him a nobler and a better man, it seemed; there was not a moment when he would have hesitated to lay down his life for the sure welfare of the two treasures of his hearth. But in the midst of all his joy a haunting horror beset him: and after any moment of peculiar pleasure, the autumn day when at the close of many weary months Isabel first set her foot outdoors; the afternoon when, returning home, the baby first doubtfully faltered the name he was to wear for her through life; after any such incident he seized his hat and rushed away with desperation, as if it were not possible to breathe freely again till he had walked off some weight, be it of terror, or of remorse, or any agony of apprehension. Then he would return to find the child asleep, and fear that it were dead perhaps, and call for Isabel to make the dark eyes open; or he would find her sitting before the fire with it lulled upon her knee, holding up the tiny pink foot to the blaze till he kissed its five dimples, and laid his wife's cool hand upon his burning cheek and wet it with his tears. If all this meant any thing but excess of gladness Isabel had no dimmest glimpse of the truth behind. She was so content and blest that she forgot all the possibilities of the sinful, sorrowful world. Ah, what a happy, happy twelvemonth flew by! Two years it made, of quiet and pride and delight, so swift that at the close they seemed but to have breathed two breaths.

It was more than Dunyan deserved. And so it became high time for fate to put out a strong hand and crush such a hollow satisfaction.

One morning, an hour before noon, the dinner simmered over the fire, Isabel sat at her quilling-irons, and the baby stood by a chair just within the door of the other room. It had been an ailing child, and had but lately stood at all, now she could make her way round by clinging to various objects, but had never yet toddled off alone. The sunshine fell brightly in at the opposite window, and gilded the yellow locks of the little girl till her head seemed fairly covered with a glory, and every thing in either room was light and bright and cheery.

Suddenly the outer door of the room where Isabel was burst open and Dunyan entered—entered precipitately, bent and almost falling in, like one staggering. His hat dropped upon the floor, he was pale as death, and his hair lay all wet upon his forehead.

"Isabel, darling," said he, hurriedly, in a strange, thick voice, "can you pack up in an hour?"

"Can I? Why of course I can. But in an hour? What for?"

"Never mind what for. All your things, and hers, and mine?"

"Why, why, where are we going, Robert?"

"To Philadelphia first. Then further."

"Philadelphia!" she uttered, in astonishment. "To live?"

"To live somewhere, away from 'ere. I can't breathe here another day, Isabel. Oh, I am choked, I am choked!" he cried, tearing at his throat.

His voice, his way, made a fearful feeling come over her that perhaps he had been drinking. Yet Dunyan never drank. No, it was no other intoxication than that of intense excitement.

"Robert!" she exclaimed, alarmed, "what can you mean?"

"Come, come, dear! spring to it. There's only an hour," he said.

"But, Robert, your work! And then my embroidery—I was making enough by it to have kept us, nearly."

"You can make by it as well there."

"And all my customers!"

"I'll promise you new ones."

"But—"

"There's no time for words, Isabel."

"Oh, don't look so!" she exclaimed, at his fixed and desperate face. "Surely I'd follow you to the world's end. Don't speak to me so! There, there, never mind it, I'll run up and get your things off first. But what's to do with the furnishing?"

"I've sold the house, Isabel, and all that's in it as it stands."

Often after a blow the first remark is trivial enough to laugh at.

"And the dinner in the pot!" said Isabel.

Dunyan scarcely heard her; he was laying down some bills on the table. "Not quite so much as it cost us, dear," said he. "Only nine hundred; but it will start us fresh. And then we've 'ad two years' wear out of it. Two years' wear! Two years' wear!"

"Oh, when we were so happy!" said Isabel, gathering up her quilling lest any moisture should fall upon it.

All this time the baby, dancing on heel and toe, holding by one hand to the chair, its little curls flashing in the light, had been crying unnoticed, "Papa! papa!" and ringing melodious changes on the sound.

"Ah, my God! look at her!" cried Dunyan; and the child, leaving her support, set one foot before another, at first suspiciously, then firmly, followed it up, and walked waveringly, with extended balancing arms, laughing face, and shining hair, along the sunbeam to her father. He snatched her to his heart. "You are mine! you are mine!" he cried, so fiercely that the frightened child put up a trembling lip. "No one shall tear me away. I will not forsake you! Oh, my darling! my darling! my little child, my only one! life of my life!" and he bowed over her till the tiny hands she pushed against his face were wet with his great passionate scalding tears. In some perplexity Isabel took the child from him and stood her upon the floor. He bent then and kissed her own mouth. "God bless you, my dear wife, my true wife! My true wife before God!" said he; and she laid her head for a moment against his shoulder. As they remained so, Isabel felt the baby pulling stoutly at her skirts; she raised her head and turned. A shadow fell upon the floor. Dunyan had left the door ajar; now it was open; and a woman stood upon the threshold.

A woman, tall, and large, and fair, her cheeks dyed with a deep rose of anger, her luxuriant blonde hair falling in large, short ringlets about her white throat, her blue eyes burning and sparkling over the two—the fury that possessed her consuming the marks of a grosser demon. Once beautiful, now nothing but the incarnation of a vixen and a shrew, the weight of the moment gave, perhaps, to her full-curved and massive figure some of the majesty of a Nemesis.

"Very pretty of you, Mr. Everard, I do declare!" said the Nemesis.

"Who is this?" asked Isabel, indignantly stepping forward.

"I might hask the same," replied the other, holding the door open with the handle of her parasol. "But instead of that I'll tell you. I am that man's wife."

Isabel laughed in the midst of her trouble.

"Just hear her, Robert," said she. "She's crazy, I suppose, poor thing!" she added, in an undertone.

"No more than you be," said the woman, catching the sound. "I've come all the way over seas after my legal 'usband. What if the bans warn't cried for us? The priest bound us; and there's 'is ring hon my 'and."

A flash of terror and anguish smote Isabel. Why didn't Dunyan laugh with her? Could this be what ailed him? Then she hid her fear in an impregnable disbelief.

"There! that's enough," said she, shortly.

"As it ought to be," replied the other. "I've tracked 'im 'ere, hand a hawful time I've 'ad of it! And if there's a Lord in heaven, and if there ain't, I'm that man's wife!"

"Oh, you wicked woman! you false, false woman!" cried Isabel, aflame. "You are telling an untruth. I am his wife!"

"More's the pity, then—for here are two of us. Yes. Don't you put hon your virtuous hairs; there's time enough for that. I was Robert Everard's wife a dozen years ago; hand as for you—but I'll call you no names." And Mrs. Everard magnanimously folded her arms under her shawl and nodded with complacency.

"Everard? Oh, you are mistaken!" said Isabel then, with her crazed brain clinging, like a drowning man's hand, to a straw, "there is no one of the name of Everard here."

"Oh! ain't there? Yes there is; yes there is!" triumphantly cried the other. "Everard's his name at 'ome, whatever Dunyan may be 'ere; and Margaret Heverard's my name. That man," said she, slowly drawing out her arm and pointing the finger at him, "ran away from me five years ago. I've raised 'eaven and hearth to find him. The law's on my side. And now I've got him, and now I mean to keep him!"

"Oh, it's not true, it's not true!" cried Isabel. "Robert, Robert, why don't you speak?"

"And here's my certificate, if that'll do you any good," said the woman.

Isabel seized and tore it into twenty fragments.

"Hoity toity, my mistress! That's your game, is it?" And in reward Mrs. Margaret dealt Isabel's hands a blow with her parasol that scored them. At the sound Mr. Dunyan turned, seized the parasol, and flung it far beyond the gate, took the stout shoulder in his grip, and would have sent its owner after it but for Isabel's voice:

"Wait a moment, Robert. That woman is lying to me, is she not?" And her eyes besought him.

"Why don't you speak, Everard?" said the woman, quietly, feeling the game was safe.

Dunyan's hand fell from her shoulder. He looked from one to the other, from one to the other. Then his eyes seemed to grow to Isabel's, and to her the silence was terrible.

"No, Isabel," he murmured at last, in husky whispers; "she is telling the devil's own truth."

Isabel caught up her child. An instinct taught her to hold it as her shield against the world.

"I am his lawful wedded wife," asserted the conquering intruder.

"And what am I?" cried Isabel.

"What are you?" answered Margaret. "Look in the glass yonder and see. What are you indeed? Look at your stooping, one-sided, lank, lean picture, and think to keep my man away from me!" And she drew herself up like a queen. "A hussy to boot. And that's what you are. For a viper!"

Mr. Dunyan put his hand back on the woman's shoulder, thrust her through the door, and shut and bolted it. And crying out, "I never came all the way from home to give the thing up now. You'll come with me!" she regained possession of her parasol, calmly took her seat on the door-stone, and awaited the results of her conjugal faithfulness.

For a few moments after the door was closed Dunyan stood there, not daring to look up.

"You can not forgive me, Isabel?" said he, finally.

"It was my fault," she answered. "I should never have put myself in your way. I ought to have seen that you were a married man."

How quiet she was! Not a tear, a groan, an exclamation. He half expected her old vehemence and her blind, helpless appeals; that she would be frantic with grief; that he could soothe her, promise her, console her. Then he saw that he should have known Isabel better. How far she had gone from him already! A fresh wave of agony swept over Dunyan, his frame shook with a great tearless sob.

"Oh, Isabel!" he said; "you will not forgive me."

"I do, I do—if there is any thing to forgive." She turned away quickly, but soon resuming, said: "We will not speak so of it. We must see what can be done."

"Yes, Isabel, what can be done. I will go away a while—out West, where such things are easy. I will 'ave my divorce. It will be but a month or two. Then I will come back to you, my darling, my own girl!"

Isabel hesitated. Home again, joy again, a happy, honest woman once more of unsullied name, his love, his care, his dear, dear presence! And then certain holy words seemed to illuminate themselves in letters of light before her eyes, and far, far off she heard a voice, like a tolling bell, saying, "Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery."

"Has she done you any wrong, Robert?" asked Isabel.

"She! She does me wrong by drawing breath to-day!"

"Oh, Robert, there it is! You must go with her—your wife."

"My wife!" He ground his teeth at the word, and wrung his great, hard hands. "Yes," said he, "my wife. But let me tell you how. A boy of twenty, caught by a woman of thirty—caught as the prey by the fowler. Handsome then, handsome as the devil, she was; and why she fancied me he only knows. But she did—God! she did. Married in a frolic, and trapped and secured—nothing loth then either, not loth till too late. Jealous if I spoke to a jill on the way; after me if I sat an hour at the show; crying out at me with her loud voice the length of the street; taking to the drink; keeping my 'ouse unclean, my food uncooked, my clothes unwashed, unmended, with her pot companions beside her. Ah! ah! she led me seven years of hell, and then I ran away. But every Michaelmas since I've sent her a matter of twenty pound, enough to keep her in any honest way, though it pinched me. And though I sent it to London, it's by that she tracked me. Ah, Heaven! hunted like a hare!"

"Poor boy! poor boy!" sighed Isabel.

"Ah, my girl, I thought you would say so. I thought you would never send me away from you. From you and her, my little pretty one." He picked up his hat as he spoke, and stood fingering the brim like a culprit awaiting sentence. "Isabel," said he then more boldly, looking up and drawing a freer breath, "I'll be rid of this woman, and it shall all go as before between us! you and me? We'll spend the balance of our days together yet."

"Ah, Robert, can you think so poorly of me as that?" she sadly answered. "You and I must part to-day."

"Don't say that," urged he. "Don't say that! You are going to break my heart!"

"No, no, Robert; you have done wrong—"

"I know it. Wrong, most grievous wrong to you, my dear. But I was never meaning you should know—"

"I was not thinking it. No wrong to me. You have blessed me instead. You have given me two happy years I never looked for; all their memories; and—you have given me her to be my delight all the days of my life. You'll not be taking her from me, Robert?" and she looked up at him with wistful eyes.

"How can I lose her? How can I lose her?" he answered, sitting down and burying his face in his hands.

There was a pause—full of noble bitterness. It was broken at last by Isabel.

"You shall have her if you will. Oh, if you will! But 'twill be hard for me to miss you both and to be all forlorn. And yet, poor man—and yet, poor man," she faltered, swallowing great gulps of trouble. "It's worse for you who can't have your sorrow out alone, who won't be by yourself. Oh, good-by, my little lass! There, Robert, take her, take her!"

"To be under that jade's thumb. Oh no. She's safe with you. She's yours." He looked at the child, crowing and capering in Isabel's arms, and in reward she was still a moment and turned—her eyes, large and dark as purplest hearts—ease all gilded in sunlight, shining up at him.

"Oh, I can't go, I can't go!" he cried.

"There's no other way, Robert. You can't stay. It's your duty and your atonement," said the sad-voiced Isabel. "You've done wrong, as I was saying. Oh, I forgive you, but what will God do? Perhaps you'll wipe it out by doing right. 'Twon't be for long—folk are cruel—and in the next world there'll be God to judge betwixt us—she and me!"

She went up to him with the child in her arms; he rose, and would have covered both in one embrace; but Isabel left the baby there and retreated, herself, like a feather blown by a breath.

"Oh already, Isabel?" he said, bitterly, setting down the child. "You're going to forget me? You've begun so soon?"

"It is my duty to."

"Well, then, I'll bid you all good-by together, you and her and the sun. I'll not see to-morrow's rise I'm thinking."

But as he turned to go, his fingers so tightly locked that they were bloodless, the quick foot-fall reversed him, the hands were on his shoulders, the face raised to his. "Oh, put your dear arms about me!" cried Isabel. "Oh, for the last time, the last, last time! Be strong, be strong, Robert, as I shall. This life's not all. Oh, God help us! bear it bravely for my sake!"

"There, there, I'll try," he murmured. "God bless you, girl, and forgive me!"

And Isabel and happiness were for this world divorced.

When Robert, half a dozen hours later, sat by Margaret's side, jolting southward in the cars, he waked from a sort of stupor of abstraction, and took off his hat to wipe the forehead on which a cruel moisture started with reviving memory. As he did so his eye was caught by something tucked within the lining of the hat. It was the parcel of bills, the nine hundred dollars received for the house, that he had laid upon the table, and that Isabel must have hidden there while he sat with his face in his hands. He returned them to their place, with a look in his eye that told Margaret what would become of them at the next station. But there were many miles before them ere that could be reached; they were rushing through a darkening landscape, the air in the car was hot and oppressive, he had just passed a period of strange excitement, he was weighed down by a heavy consciousness that wherever he fled from this woman she yet would find him out, and that her clemency alone kept him from the bigamist's cell. Jolting monotonously onward, before that station was reached and left behind Robert was asleep, Margaret had obtained possession of the parcel; and applying to it some generosity, though a curious logic, had sent three hundred to Isabel, and had kept the balance herself—reasoning that, as there were three of them, six hundred was not any more than the share of two.

So Isabel began life again. All that night she kept her baby, a little unconscious cuddling dreamer, close to her cold stone of a heart for comfort; but she refused to think—she was only stolidly miserable, far better that than the acute agony of comprehension. The next day she gathered their clothes together, left the little cottage without once looking behind her, persuaded Dame Halsey to take the child to board, and went to secure for herself a situation as seamstress with Mrs. Deshaughne again—a thing which Mrs. Deshaughne all the more willingly accorded to her because she found a grim pleasure in the fulfillment of her prediction.

If Isabel had been a fine lady now, if she had "Fed upon roses and lain in the lilies of life," perhaps she would have died. But no one under Mrs. Deshaughne's roof was an idler; the Complete Housekeeper being off her hands and the cook's, she had turned her attention toward thrift of apparel and the invention of a Universal Costume. And, lest that were insufficient, if any of her fine friends were at a loss for the marking of their republican crests and plebeian initials, the transfer of their old embroideries, or the decoration of new ones, Mrs. Deshaughne knew of a poor woman who would be glad to do it all for a less sum than that usually given—the work was put into Isabel's hands and the money into Mrs. Deshaughne's; and the conscience of the latter lady was elastic enough to tell her that, as she had a perfect right to employ her seamstress as she pleased, farm her out, or otherwise, she had also a perfect right to employ the aforesaid money in the purchase of sunshades for the little brown girls of the Zahara. Work, therefore, there was, and plenty of it; and in it Isabel buried herself, while her needle flew faster than her pulses. Not to think was all her desire—to become a breathing automaton her aim. She succeeded at the cost of half her nervous strength. When she knelt down in the morning she repeated her false husband's name, to be sure, but only mechanically; at midnight, well worn, unstrung, and tired to the last point of endurance, all that sheathing of fortitude melted; and, though she half believed it wrong even to think of the man, his mention came involuntarily, and her petitions were full of fervor and tears, wrestling for him in prayer to the pitch of madness. But even then she would lie down at last in bed, feeling that she was but turning over from a happy dream; that she had really only retaken her old life; that she had more than cause for gratitude enough on account of that delicious season to remember. It was only when she saw her little girl that the floods fairly came over Isabel; that the passion mounted and surged over hope and faith and memory; that she felt in agony the difference between herself and the Isabel of two years ago; that recollection gave a keener pang to pain; and then, with it all, wild apprehensions for Dunyan, wild sympathy with his sorrow tore her bleeding heart. But after one of these occasions Isabel worked with such a will, stitched and tamboured with such electric speed, that her mistress recalling it, was perfectly ready to spare her another hour with her child on the next time she asked for it.

Mrs. Deshaughne's will was good; but in spite of it, at last, those fingers had to rest, and then the reaction of all this strain followed fast upon poor Isabel in illness; but even in the delirium at dead of night she hid her face in the pillow, half aware that she was weeping and wailing about a forbidden name. When fever, that great remedy of abused Nature, had finally left Isabel, she would have found it easy to sink away into the reposeful hollows of death had not the child which they brought to her bedside goaded her back to labor and patience, and once more she pricked out the pattern of her life with her needle.

That Isabel had not been turned adrift upon the summons of the physician, when it was part of Mrs. Deshaughne's principles that a servant sick was no longer a servant, and the poor-house and not hers was the place for paupers, was certainly a wonderful thing; but, in the first place, the head of the house, who now and then made people aware of his existence, would not listen to it; and, in the next place, Mrs. Deshaughne was a woman, and sight of Isabel's little girl, whom Miss Agatha brought up to the house and found great pleasure in dressing and undressing like a doll, melted her principles into compassion; and, once allowing her to remain there, of course the rest was done thoroughly, and she was nursed as carefully as if she had been the first lady of the land.

Naturally enough then, when once more reinstated in her little straw chair, with her sewing-bird beside her, Isabel desired to make her mistress some thank-offering. But what had she in the world to give except her labor, and that already belonged to Mrs. Deshaughne. Isabel looked at her tambour-frame, and felt that it was capable of far more than she had ever demanded of it; but where was she to obtain the material for any splendid design? Buy it she could not, nor would it be befitting if she could. Were there only something of Mrs. Deshaughne's very own that she could ornament lavishly as some sacerdotal stole, her needle would be blest. Casting about in her mind, Isabel bethought herself of a great trunk in the attic, containing old East Indian things, and once belonging to the Dowager, that long ago Mrs. Deshaughne had bidden her empty among the servants, but which she had neglected to do, supposing perhaps that it contained merely a raff of soiled and unsuitable finery, and fearing their sneers, till it was forgotten. Now she determined to overhaul it. It required some courage on Isabel's part to brush away the tribes of spiders who had fastened their tent-ropes to its big brass nails; but then, that done, the lid lifted, and article after article displaced, it proved to be quite as she suspected—a medley of jams and jumbles equal to Mrs. Deshaughne's book, as the Dowager herself would have said—old satin gowns worn to the thread, napless velvets and faded muslins; here a parcel of yellow gloves, there odd pairs of the Dowager's countless slippers; for her tiny feet and hands had preserved their shape to the last, and she had been as particular about their covering as Cinderella's godmother herself could have been; then an untouched piece of damask, a web of sheer lawn, a bundle of letters, with the string broken, a conjuror's handkerchief with the ace of hearts in the corner, a child's doll, a receipt-book, maliciously tucked out of her junior's way, and, at the very last, something pinned up with rusty pins in linen. Perhaps this would be what she wanted, said presentiment; she unfastened a corner, then tore the rest back, ran down to her own room, and spread the thing out on her bed.

It was an India silk, one of those coarse-fibred fabrics without lustre which can be wrung out of a rain-storm uninjured, probably sent to the Dowager by her scape-grace of a son, valued by her too much to be given away, but thrown aside on account of its inappropriate color, which was the last shade and suspicion of sea-green just before melting into perfect white. Isabel smoothed it out over the foot-board, and watched how unbrokenly it took and blended all the various ripples of light; and as she knew it would meet with no manner of approbation from Mrs. Deshaughne as it was, she hurriedly cut off the breadths by a gown she had just finished for that lady, and locked the rest away in a drawer. Then she obtained permission to walk into town, where she selected her device and her flossy silks of most fine and exquisite hues, and, returning, fastened the first length of the material into her tambour-frame. Rising then every day a couple of hours before her usual time, she gave the earliest sunbeams to her task; and whenever she went to see her child the tambour-frame went too, till at last, surprised to see what pleasure she had found in it, breadth after breadth and the long bodice-piece beside, she ripped from the frame, free and finished.

As Isabel entered Mrs. Deshaughne's sitting-room with the work spread upon her arm, that personage forgot her usual caution, all her recent principles of retrenchment and the livery of the race as well, which had been taking shape in her head, and burst into exclamations of rapture and then of questioning surprise over it. Isabel proceeded to explain; and fearing lest his wife should feel her dignity assailed by a servant's expression of gratitude, intending soon, moreover, to tread the Universal Costume under foot, and glad of so dazzling an ally, Mr. Deshaughne, who happened to be present, hastened to acknowledge the gift in the warmest words warrantable.

Isabel held it out to the light with some admiring pleasure herself. Up more than half of every length, and on all the prominent points of the long bodice-piece, wandered a wild convolvulus-vine, the leaves laid in softest shades of thick rich green, dark under the shelter of the open blossom, the delicate pink of whose cup seemed just wrought to hold the rosy light of morning, and brightly caught beyond upon the shining beards of silver spikes of wheat. "I must have been here when Harry sent it," said Mrs. Deshaughne to her husband, "but I remember nothing of it—do you?"

"I'll bring the balance, ma'am," said Isabel, and went lightly up to her drawer.

Taking the yet faded remnant from its place, and shaking it carefully out, several open letters fell from between the long-laid plaits, probably put there once, after the Dowager's odd ways, to hold them stiff. Isabel stooped to pick the letters up, and glancing at them, saw that they were in the script of the wild Harry. As she did so the name of Robert Everard caught her eye. Robert Everard? Robert Dunyan? What could Harry Deshaughne have to say of him so long ago? Or was it another? Were there possibly two such? Would it be wrong in her to see when his mother had read her so many others? All this must have sped like lightning through Isabel's thoughts, with its pros and cons, for she had instantaneously perused the page.

At first the letter seemed to be nothing but one of wild Harry's customary recitals to this confidante whom he had chosen in his mother. But after a few lines the interest deepened, and Isabel read breathlessly. Harry was making his correspondent acquainted with his sundry cronies, and having already delineated several, was sharpening his pen upon another—one who, having been disappointed in some love affair at home, had entered the British army, and was just arrived in the southern hemisphere.

"As if all India were powerless to make a man believe in metempsychosis," wrote Harry, "out comes Kingsbury, grave as a Hindoo, steady as a clock. But consider, he's just wound up. I'll answer for him by-and-by, toward the small hours, and on tick too. Meanwhile, patience, and shuffle the cards; and when Kingsbury turns up it will be with the knave and the deuce, and taking all the tricks in his suit. Abandon the case of a scamp whose pranks you can recite by the hour? A specimen? You shall have it. But take the first that comes to hand, my wicked little mother with her ears pricked for worse. I staid at their place, you know, when I was in England, on my way over. Crossing the fields one night, Kingsbury and I, we came on a parcel of work-people from the town, who had been frolicking all their holiday. They had drunk their beer and the foam had not fallen, and they were a jovial company. Wearing his severest airs, if you saw him now you would think it was we who were the peasants. Kingsbury advanced to them, reprimanded them, exhorted them; and so well did he play the priestly part that before he left he had united two of them in marriage, a boy called Everard and a buxom blonde-haired beauty who answered to the name of Margaret something, I furnishing the ring for the occasion and giving the bride away. And to set a seal on the solemnity, after the ceremony he presented them with a certificate that in the morning they might see the evening had been no dream, and I don't doubt that to this day young Robert Everard and his wife Margaret are living together, blaming or blessing their frolic and their holiday, as the case may be. Ah no, dear Dowager, Kingsbury is worth yet a dozen of those graves qui font trembler l'Olympe au mouvement de leur sourcil."

Isabel fairly flew down the stairs, and entering the sitting-room, with the silk in one hand, held up the letter in the other, her white face and blazing eyes like the moon breaking through clouds.

"That rag!" cried Mrs. Deshaugne. "Is it possible you have brought to pass this marvel from that dab of a thing?"

"O Sir! O Ma'am!" cried Isabel, "will you just read this?"

And while she clenched both hands on her furious heart, Mr. Deshaugne, a little wondering, calmly read it aloud to his wife.

"I congratulate you, Isabel," said he, then, looking up; "this letter will perhaps be the means of reinstating you in all you have lost."

"Not me, Sir—oh, not me!" said she, with her melancholy voice. "I can never be a whole woman again. But it sets her right—my little lass!"

"Yet for all that," remarked Mrs. Deshaugne, blandly, "I hope you see that it would all have been much better for you if you had followed my advice."

And that night, having assembled the domestics, Mrs. Deshaugne, taking a magisterial pleasure in the act, read to them the unadulterated passage as wild Harry wrote it, and announced that inasmuch as his previous marriage must be invalid Isabel was undoubtedly the true and legal wife of Robert Everard.

It was perhaps as well for Isabel in the estimation of her companions that the announcement was made so early—for it was only the next day that Mr. Deshaugne, in turn, brought to her another letter, the only one she had ever received, although Fate had ordained that a half dozen years ago the reckless Harry should write that page to no one in reality but his sister-in-law's waiting-maid. By the following night Isabel had reached Philadelphia, and was mounting the narrow stair of a lodging in the suburbs, to which she had been directed.

Isabel paused a moment at the landing, her hand upon the lock of the door, and, finding that her heart beat only more turbulently the longer she delayed, opened it and entered. There was the flicker of a street-lamp cast up the ceiling, filling the place with a gusty twilight; there was a bed upon the floor, a woman crouching in the corner, a dead man on the straw.

Too late for her to tell him what she knew, to hear the reassuring word from him, to kiss his lips to peace, to shut his aching eyes with her tender hand. She had not once hoped in her journey to bring him back to health and life again, had scarcely dared desire it; but she had trusted to sit yet beside him for an hour, to tell him all the little things about their child, to feel his warm arms fold round her once again as her forehead lay upon his heart, to hush him perhaps away from pain to death as she sang a verse he had liked to hear when long ago she idly sang it to her baby nor dreamed of its meaning—

Close, close thine eyes, the night is long,
But day is breaking—
Fall, fall asleep beneath my song
To Heaven's awaking.

In the wildest fear of all her hurrying travel she had only fancied that perhaps the lip would shake, the mouth would fall; but first he would have gazed on her and said, "I loved you then, my wife, I love you now." Alas, that when Isabel knelt there and leaned her head upon his shoulder in the old fond way, it could be he that neither turned nor stirred. For Robert, long-worn and weary, had gone to his rest.

But there was no rest for Isabel; neither was there time for tears. The world crowded on her too fast even to let her suffer her desolation by herself. When she had made the common earth dearer by giving to it what she loved yearningly and tenderly best, there was Margaret yet to win—and how could she win the woman unless she loved her first herself? And so Isabel tore for a little the black veil off her heart that she might take Margaret in. But once lifted that black shadow seldom falls again. Sore task it was and sad, but Isabel mastered it at last, and while she grieved one night over the stubborn spirit all at once the woman fell upon her neck and wept.

So Isabel returned to the place that these few years had bound to her with such strong ties that it seemed the one central spot of the earth; and with her came a strange and decent body, clad in weeds, whom no one knew and no one was to know—a haggard, faded woman, exhausted of life, if one had but discerned it, by intemperance and want, the color on her cheek no longer rose or carnation but the dull smoulder of disease. Once more the little cottage at the head of the lane was rented, the child was taken home, the violet beds made ready for the spring, and Isabel's needle—now far more famous than Mrs. Deshaughne's cookery-book—earned the three a generous livelihood. And many an autumn afternoon, when the pale sunshine fell through the golden canopy of the great elm that crowned the house, one could see the strange woman, sealed as one not long for this life, sitting in the door and playing with the little child that darkly looked at her out of Robert Everard's eyes. And Isabel would come and stand beside her till Margaret, turning, smiled up trustingly in her quiet face; and then, taking the child between them, the three would go in and be housed from the evening shades together.

OUR LESSONS IN STATESMANSHIP.

I CONFESS to having brought home a new sensation, and perhaps a new idea—or one new to me, at least—from the ballot-box at the late Presidential election. There was something in the look and manner of the crowd there gathered that was peculiar and most impressive. Nothing, or next to nothing, was said, but the great thing was taken for granted. I found that just after sunrise, when I expected to find the coast clear, so that I could drop my votes into the boxes without delay, a long line, not likely to pass away under an hour, was in advance. The prospect of waiting so long without breakfast compelled a retreat. Two hours later—when it was said that the crowd would probably be the least—I went again, and joined the end of this queue of freemen, and in about an hour and a half I reached the ballot-box, somewhat naughtily taking comfort in seeing the rear-rank as full as when I came, and therefore requiring of new-comers the same delay.

What memorable demeanor in that whole company! Every man seemed at once to affirm his own duty and his neighbor's equal right. There was no crowding, no bad temper, no dispute, no profanity, not even any show of partisanship, except in the mottoes quietly presented upon the placards on the two little stands of the rival vote-distributors. The person directly in front of me was a handsomely-dressed young man, apparently a merchant, who barely indicated his political preferences by modestly saying what candidate, in his opinion, would win the day and the White House—a prediction which, as I supposed, proved to be wrong, yet was not in the least offensive. Behind me stood a man in a plain and well-worn dress, with the look of a working-man, quite intelligent and kindly, but with something in his face and bearing that said that life was not wholly sunshine with him. He said nothing as to the candidates, yet I felt quite at one with him on the subject, and was quite drawn to him, when the rain began to fall and he held over my improvident head the umbrella which he had wisely brought. The only noticeable change in our ranks was made by the approach of an easy, smart-looking gentleman, who stepped up before my front neighbor, and took the place next above, which was vacated for him by the occupant, a plainly-dressed man, who fell back to the extreme rear. Nobody complained of this arrangement, by which a leading German merchant thus secured an early vote by sending his coachman to keep a place for him till he came, for the coachman too was a voter, and could have held the place for himself, and nobody was defrauded. On we passed in tranquil order, and all the proof I had of the presence of the mighty arm of the law was a bland request from one of the policemen near the ballot-box to tell him how long it took for each person to vote on the average. In reply to my remark that the time varied, according to the voter's quickness and the number of questions put to him, from twenty seconds to about a minute, he said that, according to his calculation, ten men voted on an average in seven minutes, which would amount to about eighty-five an hour—an allowance sufficient to accommodate all the voters in the district between sunrise and sunset.

This simple story of facts is given merely to serve as text for the thoughts that are to be presented. The question comes, What does this mean—what idea, what motive, what destiny are before the thousands and tens of thousands of people who meet thus quietly, in this great and sometimes tumultuous city, in unison with the millions of freemen who, at the same time, from the Atlantic to the Pacific shore, are casting their suffrages that are to decide who shall rule the nation with a royal authority, though without royal name, for four years during this fearful civil war and all its attendant burdens and anxieties? It may be said that the more than Sunday quiet of the city was owing to the military force at hand to quell riot. But not a soldier was to be seen, and no well-informed man can for a moment suppose that the voters at large needed any such restraint, however much it might be called for to keep down a certain ruffian class of inhabitants, or look after rebel intruders. I called at noon on the commander-in-chief of the National troops, and chatted half an hour with him as pleasantly as on any New England Sunday, and was well assured that he had no fears of what was coming, confident as he was that the people at large meant no ill, and that the malcontents and traitors dared do no ill. I confess to being greatly comforted by the visit, quite confirmed in the faith that the nation is sound and strong, and that the sword is in the hands of men who know and love the law, and will not see it trodden under foot.

The explanation of the marvel of this great election lies in the simple fact that our people, as never before, went to the ballot-box as a nation deeply conscious of the solemnity of the issue before them, and transformed from partisans into patriots, and rising above the shifts of politicians into the calm attitude of statesmen. We are impressed as never before with the truth that our people are learning statesmanship, and giving noble fruits of their training. It may be, and doubtless is, true that their conduct was deeper than their theory, and their act was wiser than they knew. This is the case with all earnest action, and there is much in our great impulses that passes our understanding. Yet our people can not be accused of acting blindly, and never has the discussion of great principles entered more largely into public debate than of late. Nor would we exclude either of the great parties from our commendation, for both professed fidelity to the same essential laws, and both held themselves bound by the issue of the ballot. Nothing better expresses our sense of the spirit of the people than an illustration from the great motive powers of nature. The atoms and globes are held and moved by certain elementary forces, and each particle of the crystal, each pebble of the globe, each globe of the system reveals, if we will rightly interpret it, the dominant powers that keep the universe in due rest and motion. Pick up a pebble from the shore, and we can deduce from its history and phenomena all the great laws of the heavens. So take a voter, and analyze the mind that moves him—and the history, idea, and destiny of the nation speak out from him at once. Consider somewhat carefully the National Idea and its practical development in our Manifest Destiny, in the light of the late movement of the people.

What do those millions of men all over the country—from New York to San Francisco, from Chicago to New Orleans—take for granted but the characteristic idea of the nation, of the Many in One, and the One in Many. Every man feels that he is rightly among the many, under a government that claims the many diversities of places, persons, and parties, under the unity of its jurisdiction? He has been educated to understand very well the organic relation between himself and the nation. In fact, every school-boy knows the simple facts that seem to puzzle most of the political wiseacres of Europe, and can read in every national election the steps of the process by which the individual is related to the town, the town to the county, the county to the State, and the State to the Nation. Our bright boys and girls too are learning that this complex relation has been evolving itself, under God's providence, for more than two centuries, or from the very beginning of the American colonies, instead of being the result of a specific compact. In its present form, indeed, the written Constitution shaped our National Union, but by no means created it. The Constitution expressed and embodied the previous dispositions and life of the people, whom God had been forming into a nation, and its authority rests more upon the habits and institutions which it completes than upon the specific compact which it enacts. We accept the compact, but not as a mere bargain between the States, that may be set aside at the pleasure of the parties. Our people do not believe that any paper of itself creates obligation, but honor the paper because of the inherent worth of the obligation which it recognizes. They believe that national life grows; that it had been growing for centuries, under colonial neighborhood, French and Indian wars, Revolutionary struggles, Confederate articles, Constitutional law; nor did the growth then end, for nothing stops growing until it begins to die. The nation has been growing these seventy-five years since the Constitution was formed—growing not only in extent but in intent, or in spirit and idea, and can not deny this fact without abjuring its own life or laying hands upon its own being. Our people are feeling as well as thinking this great truth, and it is idle to try to make them believe that their life as a nation rests upon an arbitrary compact or optional partnership, not upon a providential evolution and a solemn covenant. They believe that nations, like families, are under Divine rule, and that civil ties have as much sanctity as household ties between those whom God joins and man is not to put asunder. It is evident to us that this faith entered largely into the recent contest, and more and more do our people insist upon the first article of true American statesmanship, that we are a nation, under God—and such, under Him, do we mean to continue.

This conviction expresses itself in the calm assurance with which the millions go to the ballot-box without the least misgiving, as the nation's right and duty to be and to prosper. Distance of place serves but to confirm the conviction; and our hearts beat warmly, but not strangely, as we note how closely the remotest regions answer to our own pulses, and East and West annihilate space and faction at one blow, as loyal word flashes from ocean to ocean that the nation is up and doing, and liberty and law walk hand in hand together. So far as space is concerned, the national domain is practically less in danger of separation than when the Constitution was adopted; and San Francisco is nearer New York in thought, and will soon be nearer in exchange of goods, than Boston was in 1789. Chicago is nearer New Orleans than the Ohio was to the great Lakes at that date; and the whole country now is one as never before, in the growing sense of the unity of its geographical lines and the true fellowship of its commodities. The people are feeling that in territory we are a nation, and rising above sectional narrowness to statesmanlike enlargement.

The diversity of persons, as decided by locality, education, or race, offers a harder problem to the statesman, and Europe gives us over to destruction as being bound to go to pieces through so many distracting and heterogeneous elements. Our people do not seem to have any such fear, but have solved practically the problem of national oneness with such personal varieties. We have taken in foreigners enough perhaps to make two nations as large as our whole population at the Declaration of Independence; and while we can not say that the foreign element has been all that could be wished, it surely has not been our foremost danger; and the two leading emigrant races, the Irish and the German, have done us much good by their agricultural and mechanical labor, while they have marvelously counterbalanced each other by the reaction of Irish clan-nishness and ecclesiasticism against individualism and free companionship. A portion of the Irish, indeed, have seemed to have a mortal and dangerous antipathy to the negro; but this trouble has come to a head and been settled by the riots of 1863 and their summary end. The negro is not to be hunted down and murdered in our streets. Of this our soldiers are quite sure, and we believe that the class that furnished the rioters are also sure. Our people are firm in the faith that mobs are to be put down, and that bayonets and grape-shot are shorter and more merciful medicine than soft speeches or Quaker guns.

The hostility between North and South is the greatest of our dangers of a personal nature, because so many circumstances of climate, trade, and history combine with personal dispositions to set the two at variance. But our people have never believed in any inevitable, irrepressible antagonism between Northerners and Southerners. In old times the two sections mingled freely together, and the great men of both sections had a peculiar liking for each other, as the nature of things prepares us to believe. Since affinities thrive in the midst of contrasts, the reserved, laborious Northerner took comfort in the genial, indolent Southerner, in the ancient days of national loyalty. The one has always, perhaps, tended more to pride and the love of power, the other more to culture and prosperity; but the two got on very well together so long as their interests led the same way, and the plant-er's power was helped forward by the manufacturer's enterprise and thrift. The same congeniality will return when the cause of discord is removed. Already one obstacle is out of the way, and that is the mutual contempt that had begun to exist on account of the supposed shiftlessness of the South and the supposed cowardice of the North. The two parties have learned a certain respect for each other in the stern ordeal of war, and both have been too effective and too brave to foster any more contempt upon that score. Our soldiers bring back no fierce hatred for their antagonists, in spite of their too frequent cruelties; and our officers have apparently little fear of the rise of amicable fellowship as soon as the Secession leaders are out of the way, and the people return to their elective affinities.

But the negro—what shall we do with him, and how can the nation be one again, with such a barrier as those millions of blacks between the two sections, with the apparent antagonism of emancipation on one side and perpetual slavery on the other? Precisely what is to be done with the negro we do not profess to say, clear as the principle is that he is a human creature, and ought at once to have the rights of person, property, and family that civilization, even in despotic countries, secures to the humblest peasantry. Emancipation is the inevitable issue of the causes now at work in both sections. Jefferson Davis himself has affirmed the negro's manhood and his love of freedom; and the rebel President, by his assault on Sumter and by his last proclamation, is practically the prince of abolitionists, and has struck a blow at the Southern institution that Abraham Lincoln could never strike. Our people have always believed that emancipation would come at last, but they never looked for it or wished it in this way. The enemy hath done this, and compelled the nation thus to free the negro to save the white man. So let it be, and let slavery fall under the stroke of its own friends. Its fall, whether immediate or gradual, must bring North and South together by mutual need; for the millions of blacks must be the curse of the whole people unless they are made the blessing of the whole.

Our people have already settled the statesmanship of emancipation, and are as free from negromania as from negrophobia. They are understanding the negro's defects and excellences very well, and seeing his fitness for the careful training that he needs and accepts. They are seeing that the way to get rid of him is to accustom him to help himself. Our people have never had that disease of negro on the brain that has so afflicted the slavery propaganda and their Northern allies, for they have been disposed to let him alone, and have not been eager either to tread him down or to glorify him. The war has given him new consequence, by showing—what our fathers well knew—that he can be a good patriot and a good soldier. Our people are for giving him a fair chance to find his own level. We are in no danger of having him on the brain so long as we give him fair play; and injustice is always sure to haunt its authors with the ghost of its victims. Do a man wrong, pick his pocket, fire his house, forge his name, or poison his coffee, or even cherish any grudge against him, and we are quite sure to have him on our brain day and night. The only sure way to lay the ghost is to cease the wrong and set it right.

There are undoubtedly immense difficulties in the way of successful emancipation, but they are greatly lessened by recent experiences. It is clear that the negro is more docile than was anticipated, far less fierce and dangerous; and if less proud and intellectual than the average white man, much more mild, amiable, and reverential. It is clear, too, that the Southern horror of destroying the white man's social position by putting the negro on the same level of civil right is wholly idle. Liberty gives every class its proper level; and whatever the negro is or can be, he will be when emancipated. He will be himself, and not the white man. The war is setting this matter right, and no observing man can suppose for a moment that freedom destroys all elective affinities, and confounds all minds and tastes in one indiscriminate mass. In our army, where all are under the same flag, our men keep their social affinities; and character and culture, whether in officer or private, are sure to tell. Our negro soldiers have a character and worth of their own; but they are themselves, and not white men, and they are content to be themselves, with their own associations and aptitudes. It is so here at home, where labor follows its own law, and party passions are silent. No man thinks his social position injured by the fact that our laws protect our colored people as well as himself. Nor do our colored servants claim undue rank because of their freedom. In the country black and white laborers freely meet together under the proprietor's eye, and no white man thinks himself at all in danger of degradation by the company. A few weeks ago, after finishing a rustic tower upon a high rock, to serve as a kind of Temple of Loyalty, that should lift up the banner and cross aloft in honor, I had need of a team of oxen to drag great stones to complete a rough wall along the base of the structure, and no team could be procured but one belonging to a colored man, a small farmer in the neighborhood. He came with his two oxen, and worked all day with our own excellent man-of-all-work, an excellent specimen of Erin, as trusty as capable. The work was admirably done. The oxen were driven skillfully and gently, the rocks were adroitly handled, the chat between the two men was playful and friendly; and when, at the close of the day, the dark man came cheerfully and resolutely along with a huge block of white quartz upon his dray, and deposited it snugly in its place, near the foot of our Union tower, it seemed to me that there might be an omen in the event, and that, under God's providence, it might be the mission of the dark race to finish the temple of our American Liberty and Union by removing the old stigma on our shield, and bringing North and South into new and lasting fellowship. Our people are willing to believe in some such issue, and the robust, healthy instinct of the nation has never been afraid that freedom could destroy any inherent faculty or taste, or set any race above or below its natural and proper level.

The gravest danger to our national life threatens us from the quarter of party-spirit. Parties, more than differences of places or persons, have been and are our sorest evil; yet, in some respects, the evil has been less than was feared. Socialism has not troubled us, as was predicted; and it is marvelous that there is so little antagonism between rich and poor in our current politics; and the inanities of Communism have no hold of our people. The chief cause, probably, of the quiet feeling between the rich and poor is the fact that there are no fixed classes of rich and poor, but there is such free passage from one to the other, that he who makes war on either class may be fighting against his own children, and even against his own future condition. It is a striking fact, moreover, of our social condition, that the very order of persons who have been thought, from their lineage and condition, most dangerous to our civil order, are very fast becoming land-owners, and showing something of the conservatism that goes with property. As far as our observation goes, it appears clear that our laboring class in the country are bent on owning land; and within a few years we have seen many an acre of ground, with cottages, barn, pig, and cow, purchased by men who, in the old country, would never have aspired beyond a piece of hired land and a miserable shanty. No socialistic terrorism threatens us yet, nor has religious rancor risen to such proportions as to endanger our liberties. Our people have an instinctive sense that religious as well as civil liberty is safe, and the moment they see any disposition to interfere with it they will let the intruders know that freedom has weapons of its own, and knows how to strike as well as how to let alone.

Political parties have come near destroying us; and the present rebellion is the work of a political faction that has for thirty years been preparing for its accursed work. Yet no fair-minded, philosophical man will accuse either of the great historical parties of the country of originating secession. Andrew Jackson was as good a Union man as Henry Clay, and General M'Clellan affirmed the nation's right to defend its unity as emphatically as Abraham Lincoln. The two great historical parties have started from different poles of the same nationality—the first affirming the one organism, and the second affirming the many members in our national being, yet neither of them of necessity bound to deny the other's position; for if we believe that there are many in one, we must believe that there is one in many. Secession sprung indeed from one branch of the party of the many; but it is not a legitimate growth of that party, for it repudiates an essential of the Democratic idea, and insults and degrades the many States and people by assailing the unity that gives to the many liberty, dignity, and peace. Our people have seen from the beginning that secession is national suicide, and must be put down. Hence the persistency of the war spirit for four years, and the marvelous indorsement of that spirit at the late election. Neither party at the polls avowed secession, nor intended to favor it; but the political tricksters who drew up one of the platforms basely shrank from declaring openly the power of the nation to defend its life by arms, and foully insulted our slain and wounded heroes by declaring their sacrifice a failure and a folly. Our people would not stand such disloyalty and nonsense. They smelt the rat with their nostrils before they had time to speculate deeply upon the philosophy of the offense, and they would have nothing to do with any candidates who were mixed up with its abettors. Our people re-elected our President for many reasons indeed, but mainly from the best of all reasons, because they believed that he represented the vital, historical, Providential life of the nation; and that, with all his defects, he is a sound, old-fashioned American, and means to live, and have us all live, under the old flag in spite of all rebeldom, even with England and France as its backers. The people are right, we believe; and it was the best statesmanship to re-elect Abraham Lincoln.

He takes his honors modestly enough, and probably understands his position, and what is expected of him. He intends to prove that his Unionism means not the ruin but the salvation of the States, and will ere long show that in the Union, not out of it, even the now rebel States will find a prosperity, peace, and security that they could never win by being torn away from their historical and normal relation. He has proved that the many were meant to be one, and will prove that the one will protect and encourage the many, so as to secure to our great future a variety in unity such as we have never before known in the palmiest days of the republic. Our true policy will bring out all positive elements of local character as well as wealth, and in due time it will appear that the very traits that have done us wrong and moved our indignation can do us good and win our admiration. When Southern valor again becomes loyal we too shall be proud of it, and the Stonewall Jacksons of the future shall rank as do the Andrew Jacksons of the past. Even Southern Rights may cease to be an offensive word, and may enlist our enthusiasm and strength, when sought for and enjoyed in the Union, against all oppression and all misrule.

So we believe that our people hold fast to our great National Idea of the Many in One in face of all the differences of places, persons, and parties that seem to threaten it. Their religious sentiment is evidently accepting and exalting this national principle as never before, and singing and praying and preaching patriotism as of the essence of true faith. Our reading of history, our trust in Providence, our discipline of labor and sorrow, our sense of our mission in God's kingdom—nay, even our study of the variety and unity of nature around us, the law of differentialism and integration, the plainest teachings of God's bounty to us, and through us to the world, all combine to lift loyal conviction into an inspiration, and to make us hear the eternal Word confirming our great habit and popular instinct of nationality, and assuring us that God hath made us, and not we ourselves, and we have no right to abdicate the dignity to which we are called.

Our manifest destiny is substantiating our national idea by exhibiting its practical development in the great spheres of industry, government, morality, and religion. We are not speaking now of any ambitious theories or adventurer's visions, but of the obvious drift of affairs, and of the dispositions and work of our people.

We are a working people, and never since time was has there been a nation in which so many persons have taken a direct interest in the welfare of the country, and identified its welfare with their own. We all believe in getting a fair living; and our industry and enterprise have told wonderfully not only upon our national prosperity but our national spirit. An idea is nothing or next to nothing without some corresponding spirit; and what Plato calls spirit, or the irascible quality, is a necessary trait of the rational man if he would be practical or do any thing in the world. Now surely our labor has been a great school of public spirit or of national will; and while we have been severally thinking of getting a living, and opening springs of industry to please ourselves, Providence, by its own prevailing laws, has been connecting these together, as it connects the rills of the mountains with the brooks of the meadow and the waters of the sea, until what seemed dribbling weakness and feeble loneliness swells into combined majesty, and the grandeur of the all flows out from the little offerings of each. How magnificent is the wealth of the country, and what patience and strength and persistency have entered into the spirit of the people under this long discipline of toil! Power, like substance, is not lost, but only transformed; and what a startling manifestation of national power has sprung from the rising of industrial energy into public spirit!

The wealth of the country feels the pulsation of its great heart, and a unity of life is seeking to assimilate its commodities together in a true economy and fellowship. What wonders from the mine, as iron, copper, lead, coal, silver, and gold, come up from the dark earth; and not demons of darkness, but spirits of light, they join hands in benign activity, and distance the legends of magicians by the miracles of their harmonized utilities. Our fields and orchards join them in their ministry, and enrich and unite the nation with their gifts. Our grain, wheat, corn, rye, are all loyal servitors, and bind us to the sugar and rice and cotton of the South by a thousand affinities. Our products make us one nation as well as our lakes and mountains and rivers and seas, and our political economy is an important part of our manifest destiny. Our people are seeing this; and not only do industrial statistics now enter into common education, but our mechanics' and farmers' fairs and festivals are teaching the magnificence of our resources and the Providential unity of our domain. Even the burden of taxation has pressed upon us the conviction of our national ability as well as need; and the purse is regarded as the loyal defender of the flag. Our laboring class are feeling a new sense of proprietorship in the soil and its products; and the mines of Pennsylvania and of the Pacific coast not only swell our statistics of revenue but animate the courage and loyalty of the people, as if each man had interest and honor in the affluence of all. So let it be, until we work out our destiny to the full, and He to whom the earth with its fullness belongs enables us to see that His will is done in our fullness, and prosperity is the handmaid of humanity and religion.

We take as cheerful a view of the development of our national idea in the sphere of government. We have been learning to govern and to be governed for more than two hundred years, and our native American people especially have the hereditary spirit that reconciles liberty with law, and so unites two master forces, obedience and authority, in our loyal temper. The spirit of good government was nurtured in the old colonial townships, and went up through successive steps to the chair of the state and the nation. Never, probably, in history has there been so much schooling in the function of government as here within a century, and a mighty habit of order has been formed that has taken possession even of the rude border regions, and won the wild passions of the rough populace to the restraints of law and the blessings of civilization. California, when cut off from the direct control of the national arm, became a law to herself; and her own people, not a mob but a Vigilance Committee, like Saul of Tarsus, were won by an inward manifestation of the rightful rule to true loyalty, and they carried to the sister States, as Paul carried to the Apostles' college, the commission of membership, which came not so much of flesh and blood as from above. Our national order has been a constant schooling of public spirit, and our statesmen have been the generals of our peace, as our generals have been the statesmen of our war.

Undoubtedly the chief source of our satisfaction in our strong men is in their power to bring out the purpose that we all cherish or do what we all wish to do. A great thinker or speaker charms us by bringing out our own latent thought, and the word comes home to us, we say, because it touches a chord all ready to be touched. So a hero, whether in the Senate or the field, comes home to us by bringing out our own latent will, and doing for us what we can not do of ourselves. Our leaders in peace and war lead our spirit as well as our idea, and while we are proud of them, we thank them most for their mastery of heroic force, their power to win us by their very command. So now we delight in our great generals, as they cheer, and strengthen, and integrate our own wavering spirits, and the national pluck is embodied and organized in their will. We are no more afraid of being trodden on by them than we are afraid of being oppressed by a great thinker; for the hero ceases to be himself the moment he ceases to be possessed by the public will, just as the thinker ceases to be himself, and loses his charm the moment he sacrifices truth to passion or policy, and private feeling displaces intellectual loyalty. We rejoice greatly, therefore, in our noble generals and their brave armies. They develop powers that are to live in the life of the nation; and our people feel the truth even better than they know how to express it, and believe that peace, when it comes, will find us braver, as well as more loyal than ever, from the permanence of the spirit of discipline that goes from the camp and field to the household and school and Senate. There are, of course, bad soldiers; and war of itself is a sad evil, yet its temper is not selfish, but social and patriotic; and they who fight bravely under the flag affirm the law of the land in every blow, and declare the first essential of peace by the sword. War is the necessary act of government when assailed, and is as justifiable in certain circumstances as the police of our cities, which defends our persons and property by making constant war upon crime. We accept the military discipline of the last four years as part of the manifest destiny of the Nation, and are convinced by it that we have a heroic will as well as a leading idea. We have been laughed at as a set of braggarts half drunk with reveling in the wealth of a land that came to us by chance. We shall be laughed at no longer after such valor by sea and land. We do not laugh at our antagonists, for they too are brave, and are our own countrymen, and are to be again under our flag. We had rather fight with them than against them, and again, as of old, count their blood as part and parcel of our own.

We have no time to treat of our national destiny in its highest sphere, the region of morals and religion; and we must be content with the merest glance. It is becoming every year more evident, that while with us Church and State have been, are likely to be, distinct in organization and function, they are to have great influence upon each other, and that religion is feeling as well as shaping the character of our people and institutions. Recent struggles have brought out the temper of our great churches, and done much to bring them together in a certain fellowship of thought and feeling, if not of name. Take, for example, the most widely contrasted branches—the branches of extreme centralization and extreme individualism—the Roman Catholic and the Puritan Independent, the former with its historical priesthood and polity, its national council and far-seeing conservatism and its fixed authority; the latter with its popular will, congregational freedom, subjective mind, and radical temper. How strongly the Puritan Independent has argued and worked and fought for the national life, and given largeness to his method by loyal fidelity. How much he has done to connect the stubborn individualism of which he has been the sturdy champion, with the national fellowship without which individualism runs mad with self-conceit and self-will. The Roman Catholic, with the other prelatical bodies, has helped us perhaps more than he has known by keeping in view the historic unity and progress of true civilization, and never consenting to surrender the integrity of his church organization to party passions or sectional strifes. The Roman Catholic Church, as is the case with all prelacy, has been too timid in some respects, and not all of her prelates have, like Purcell and Timon, spoken out fully the word of humanity and patriotism that the nation craves, and Christendom should give now as of old. Yet Catholicism has done us good by keeping open great lines of fellowship between the belligerents as well as presenting us with noble specimens of generalship. She will do us more good when we, as a nation, study better the secret of her organic power, and master the arts of administration which her leaders have so well understood not always in the interests of liberty and progress. Between the two, the Independent and the Catholic, dwell a great company of thoughtful and well-balanced Christians, who can help the nation vastly in the present need by uniting depth of personal conviction with breadth of vision and force of will, in such a way as to bring out the resources of American character and fulfill our destiny in the kingdom of God on earth. Not in form, but in fact, the American Church is uniting the radical idea of the many with the conservative idea of the one.

We are near some crisis that is to call out the higher principles and powers of our people as never before. We are at war with States who speak our language, profess our religion, and share our history and laws with us. We must subdue their rebellion and reclaim them to loyalty. It is vain to hope to do this, either part of it, by arms alone, essential as it is to wield arms, and not for a moment yield to the sentimentalism that prolongs war by imbecile peace. The religion of the country must affirm the sanctity of the national idea, and exalt the public will by homage to the Supreme will, so as to make even the enemy respect the motive, and discriminate between brute force or sectional pride, and civic virtue or moral heroism. The religion of the country must help on the coming reconciliation by a spirit as gentle as it is brave, as merciful as it is just and true. A great work is to be done in this way, and it is too much to expect of our rulers to do the whole of it, or look even to Presidential Messages, or Cabinet Reports, to say all that the best heart and culture of the people craves. Precisely what is to be said or done by Christian influence we will not undertake to say; but sure we are that the time is near for a Christian mediation that must leave its mark upon the national life, and show that not only in the age of miracles did living waters flow from the flinty rock.

The American's character itself is to be invigorated, softened, and enlarged, and lifted up, by the discipline of war and pacification. He is to have a certain individualism, but not like the German, who hates organization; he is to hold fast to institutions, but not like the Englishman, who dreads progress; he is to love universal ideas, but not like the Frenchman, who makes ambitious abstractions bow the knee to imperial pride. Independent, steadfast, cosmopolitan, the American will keep the post to which Providence has called him, and his manifest destiny shall bring ruin upon no other race or nation, but serve the welfare of mankind and the glory of God.

Thus, near the 4th of March, 1865, we interpret the cheerful lessons in Statesmanship that are taught us by the 8th of November, 1864.

MAUD MOLYNEUX'S MUSIC-BOX.

I.

SAY what you will, there is something bewitching in the graceful runes of a music-box! One feels as though it were not a senseless machine, but an imprisoned spirit sighing forth its tender heart; piping dim remembrances of falling water, singing winds, green fields, soft skies, and smiling stars, forbidden by the limits of this Bastile it inhabits; one feels impelled to make a desperate assault thereupon, shiver it in atoms, and restore the lonesome little sprite to the delights of the sun and wandering airs. At least it seems strange enough that music—this remnant of Eden, higher than aspiration, deeper than thought, broad as love, the speech of the gods, and silence of stars—should make this bit of rose-wood a temple wherein to perform its mysteries and choral rites. Behold I take the key and let it loose, and straightway, like some pet bird, it returns to its prison, ready to sing yet again at my bidding!

Maud Molyneux's world was shut up in her music-box; on rising in the morning she wound it up and let it tinkle a cheerful accompaniment to her pretty toilet—pity we couldn't all wind the world up to please our whims!—if she "sewed or sang," its melody kept step with glistening needle or gliding verse; and at night the moon and stars looked into her little chamber, and seemed to listen, well pleased, to the sweet measures that lulled her into perfect dreams.

Maud was scarcely of the kind who go music-mad. I fancy music hardly vouchsafed her a sentiment before this box came to hand, though the new organ at church had discoursed psalm and fugue in her unawakened ear. Don Giovanni and all the operatic corps thundered their open-sesame at the gate of this sleeping palace.

What was it, then? What elfin gift, what wand of illusion ruled in this box, that it first should make to her the grand revelation of all grand possibilities in harmony? Let us conjecture! First, then, it was a present. And the donor? Young Eagleston—I have forgotten his Christian name. Ah! now we have the clew, perhaps! Suppose we follow it, and surprise mignonnette in "the round tower of her heart!"

Just before Eagleston went to India, and after having bidden Maud Molyneux a tender goodbye—which, after all, was a grain or two unsatisfactory, maybe—the express-man one twilight left at the door an unusual package, whose wrappings, various as a mummy's, disclosed a music-box, the polished surface reflecting like a mirror, while inlaid ebony and pearl arabesqued fantastically along its border. With this came a note beseeching her acceptance in pretty phrase, adding: "Do not forget me until this little instrument forgets its tunes; and when it makes life sweet with its blithe endeavor, believe I am with you in spirit, and that life to me is nowhere else so pleasant!"

During the three years that followed no other message passed between them; perhaps he thought "the least said the soonest mended." I am afraid the prescription didn't answer."

And so it happened that the music-box became the interpreter of her nature, the consoler of emotions, the enlivener of despondency, the Pegasus of imagination, the arrow of remembrance, the axis whereon her sphere of thought revolved, to which all other was but sun and moon lighting it on its infinite way.

Three years are a long time, if you only think of it. One grows gray in less, and weary of conjecture. This may stand as an apology for Maud Molyneux, if she needed one, while sitting in a tasteful sewing-room, opening through the windows upon blooming parterres, the music-box close at her elbow, but silent, a mass of muslin, like fleecy summer clouds, every where about, which the glad wind toys with. You think she is too busy over a new furbelow to care for the box to-day, do you? Last night it was wound as usual, got through one or two melodies with a something wavering measure, swung half-way into—

"The days when I went gipsying, and stopped. Three years, then, had done something for this music-box. Had they worn it out, or merely snapped some portion easily repaired? Perhaps it had simply lost equilibrium; for when the neighboring belfry tolling midnight awoke her the magical instrument, as if waiting for this dénouement, took up the tune where it had been left and deftly finished, then it went to sleep, and no winding or coaxing whatever could break the charm.
A long time ago!"—

While she sat with the afternoon sun at her feet, thinking of—who shall say what?—some firm step crossed the open sill behind, and a young man, maybe a thought bronzed, stood before her.

"Oh, Eagleston!" she cried, springing up, all the work flying to the four winds.

He took her hand and carried it to his lips.

"And you knew me?" curling his mustache.

"Oh, I should know you if you wore the guise of an angel, or came with the stealth of a burglar!"

"A doubtful compliment. Some have entertained angels unawares."

"Are angels abundant in India?" brushing something aside that he might find a seat, which, however, he did not take.

"Not at all; they are an imported luxury."

"Doesn't it seem very queer to be here? Aren't you homesick after living there so long?" in an odd kind of embarrassment.

"No, indeed; it would seem queer to be any where else at this moment. It is as if I had never left this."

"Is it?"

"Yes; when I last saw you you sat just there, your work strewn about as now—I have shrined you so in my thought. When tired and homesick I always found you here, in the cool of the falling day, busy with your shining fabrics. Have you never finished that piece of nonsense?"

Speaking, he stooped to gather up the scattered muslin, brought it to her, laid it in her arms, and looked in her eyes.

"This?—oh, this—is quite another affair"—shrinking—"no nonsense! Do you know I am making my wedding-dress!"

"That is just what I came to ask you to do."

She dropped her face in her hands, and for a breathing space was speechless, then:

"Next week I shall marry Mr. Ollendorff. The marriage contract is signed, the guests invited; see! this is his ring. You have come—"

"Too late! And yet you love me?"

There was no reply.

"Do you ever expect to care—for him?"

"I must try. He is kind, he loves me, and my mother adores him."

"And you?"

"And I?—I must not answer."

"And you?" with stern imperiousness.

"Half an hour since I should have thought it made no odds to me."

"You had then grown indifferent?"

"Or at least proud. Oh, why did you not speak before! how should I know? Surely it was right to smother the blaze when the guest delayed!"

He ground his teeth, taking a turn across the room. How young they were, reader!

"Yes, if you have absolutely resolved to make this sacrifice, for Heaven's sake perfect it! Oh, my love, you were sold under the hammer, and I was not here!"

A door swung open and Mrs. Molyneux appeared, a shimmer of lace across her arms.

"Maud, how deep— Oh! Eagleston; what a stranger! When did you arrive? I want to know, Maud, how deep you will have the hem of your veil? Perhaps you're not aware, Eagleston, that we are going to marry our little girl?"

"I have been informed."

Mrs. Molyneux, cold and sharp as a Damascus blade, and as penetrative, saw at a glance that a squall had but half blown over, and believed it the better part of valor to withdraw, lest it should expend its energy upon her devoted head.

This marriage madame had planned, manoeuvred for, raised heaven and earth to compass; its object was intelligent, handsome, and wealthy. Judge then if, at the very point of victory, she was not discomfited to find Blucher in the field? She had of old regarded Eagleston as a dangerous foe, and was heartily glad when he turned his face toward the rising sun. Years before, as they strolled through the garden arcades, or when young Eagleston brought his ponies for a canter, Mr. Molyneux would remark:

"A fine couple—nothing better!" To which his wife would answer:

"Don't be a fool, Molyneux! Maud is a beauty, and must make a match!"

"Matches are made in heaven." Than which Mr. Molyneux should have known better, since he was junior in a match-manufactory—where, perhaps, madame acted the senior, judging from her capacities in that branch. One thing is certain, Mr. Molyneux had found his match here below, and it had proved a Lucifer.

The anxious mother disappeared, and Eagleston returned to the charge.

"There is one chance left us—we can fly," he said; "two hours and twilight will abet us. You can walk to the garden-gate opening from the honey-suckle alley; and contracts, and auction-sales, and the whole diabolical crew, will count as nothing in our programme!"

"Eagleston! Eagleston!" she sobbed, "do not tempt me! I have pledged my word, my sacred honor;—and think of my poor disappointed mother! Do not conjure such bewildering visions, or I may forget what is right, I am so weak!"

"Then there is no reprieve. You are simply too weak to make a just decision. Oh love, forgive me! I do not mean to reproach you—that belongs to me! I am not master of my words. I will go!"

She stood up waveringly to bid adieu, both hands resting on the mute music-box, the wedding muslin across one arm.

"And will you not come to my wedding—and—eat my cake?"

"Certainly not; it would choke me!"

Her scalding tears fell upon the pretty polish of the music-box.

"Oh my darling box! tears will stain you!" she sighed, with a funny practicality in the midst of all. "I shall have nothing else to comfort me by-and-by!" And brushing them away with the bridal attire she drew Eagleston's attention.

"Ah! your music-box. Where are its songs?"

"It has been very sweet and patient. I have tried it long; but yesterday it broke, and will sing no more."

"A tell-tale box. You forget your lover, your own divine accord; and this little machine advertises the fact by forgetting too."

"Eagleston, you are cruel! Though I am almost the same as another's wife, I will confess that not for one moment have I forgotten you, and Heaven knows if I ever shall! Go. It is you must help me to what I most deplore!"

She gave him a hand to kiss, watched him pass through the garden, lost him behind the shrubbery and into the wide world.

II.

And so there was a wedding at Mr. Molyneux's. One wonders what sort of a knot is tied on these occasions. Certainly not the far-famed, indissoluble fantasy of song and story—the true-lover's knot? Then not the wonderful Gordian?—Stay! this must be the very thing, since our magistrates sunder it so easily with the Sword of Justice! Fie, Justice! do you lend your doughty weapon to such one-sided conflict?

I beg Mr. Ollendorff's pardon—peace to his ashes!—for these strictures upon what Mrs. Molyneux considered one of the sublimest matches of the century. You know there are some men who seem to squint at every subject, themselves included; and not being near-sighted, it distorts instead of clearing their vision. How should he know he was not the suitable parti for blooming youth, when hundreds of managing parents dinned into his unsuspecting ears his unsuspected excellences—his preserved youth, his resistless fascinations, his fabulous learning; so sugar-coated him with subtle flatteries and gilded with courteous blandishments, that he came to fancy himself fit to be prescribed as cure for the heart-disease of the prettiest girl in Christendom? 'Twasn't his fault, and I don't blame him for it. What I contend for is this—Where were the rosy dimples, the glinting eyes, the soft white hands of twenty-five years back? Where the pretty girls he danced and sang and coquetted with so long ago as that? For shame, at fifty to be celebrating your wedding-day, and not a silver one at that, Mrs. Molyneux to the contrary notwithstanding! I simply call you, Mr. Ollendorff, to account for the true and warm hearts slighted in auld lang syne; I don't mean to charge you with any particular breach of promise, but there have been twenty odd years in which you might have wooed, won, and worn, and have left Maud and Eagleston to follow your illustrious example, instead of coming in as marplot of their felicity! And therefore, with regret, I say, I believe to my heart that the eyes you should have brightened, the cheeks that should have blossomed at your coming, have faded and grown dim awaiting.

Very probably Mr. Ollendorff at twenty-five was quite a different specimen of man from that which his friends found him to be at fifty; gauche in manners, cadaverous in countenance, monosyllabic in conversation, distressingly industrious, continually out of pocket, and occasionally out at elbow; but the last twenty-five years had proved the wand of enchantment, divested him of rags and ravelings, and tricked him up in all the elegant elaborations of a wise and wealthy gentleman. Maybe he had been too deeply engrossed in dollars and cents to remember the possibility or feel the need of what most men seek first; now at fifty, with a fortune ready at hand, he suddenly found necessary some one to spend it; so he withdrew from business and set himself soberly to cultivating that rare exotic which the puzzle-book declares is to be found only in the dictionary. Happiness is a stubborn recluse; try to draw her out, and she is worse than a molar tooth. She will not be looked out of countenance, nor coaxed into quarters, nor surprised at her post, nor outflanked, nor taken by siege; but lay down your arms, make as though you can do without her favor, and in a trice she has enlisted under your banner and become your bosom friend! Never expect her or she will keep you waiting, and proffer the cold shoulder where you anticipate the festive feast.

Thus Mr. Ollendorff came to look upon the daughters of men and found that they were fair; and as the courtship was so ably conducted by Mrs. Molyneux, with slight skirmishes from his part on the outskirts of the subject, he slid comfortably and unsuspectingly from the gloomy solitude of a bachelor into the stately groove of marriage.

Maud Molyneux found in the morning paper a paragraph which matches that of her marriage directly above; it was a list of passengers in the steamer for India, and the first name was Eagleston!

"He will die in India," she thought, "and I shall die here presently; we shall never see each other again!"

Horridly improper! and I will agree with you. But one can't always command one's thoughts and make them skip along in pleasant places, with never a stupid stile or noisy beck to turn them aside!

The twisted cordon of "What will folks say?" fetters woman hand and foot; and though she be born tongue-tied too, all the lords of creation, with all their statutes and powers, can no more control her thoughts or bind them to one circumscribed sphere than a cobweb can hold together a crumbling building. However new and startling this tongue-tied theory may appear, you know all reform is subversive of worn-out creeds.

I do believe it was a sorry honey-moon, that of Mr. Ollendorff. What did it matter that he wore a brilliant on his sleeve, if it were only borrowed for the occasion? What that he carried Mrs. Ollendorff from mountain to beach, if no latitude could thaw her? What that he burdened her with jewels and arrayed her as a princess, so long as his name hung upon her like the chain of a captive, and his love harassed her like an evil conscience?

She was colder than an iceberg, more pitiless than the inaccessible stars, and lived as though all delight in art or nature, all hope or fear or passion whatsoever, touched her no more than it touched a statue.

Only one day she aroused herself, dispatched the music-box to be repaired, and would have let it hum itself to death but for an after-thought.

"A pretty enough idol," said Mr. Ollendorff one day, after having listened to it. "Where did you get it, my dear?"

"From a friend," was the distant reply. Nevertheless, the question startled her. What was a friend? One who wished you to be the crowning flower of humanity, the acme of all virtues, doing your highest duty, standing morally on the mountain-peaks of life, even though the eternal snows encompassed and the icy solitudes perplexed you? Was she doing, after all, what would please Eagleston? or worse yet, was she doing rightly? She glanced stealthily at Mr. Ollendorff, absorbed in a newspaper with wrinkled brow. His eyes nailed upon the last debate in Congress, he was thinking of quite other things: wondering if all men's wives were as high and mighty; supposed they must be; he couldn't tell, he wasn't used to these things; and some dim foreboding crossed his mind that it would have been well if he had never dreamed of getting used to them.

Mrs. Ollendorff bethought herself if she could not love where it would have been peace to love, if she could not call back the affection that had flowed out like the tide of a great river and threatened to leave her soul barren and exposed to the accidents of time, she could yet gratefully receive the shower from heaven, the early and latter rains, and rejoice in their joy.

And so many saints and simpletons will cry out against Mrs. Ollendorff because she played a part. Let them remember that it was a good part, a moral part, a highly respectable part, nothing romantic and ridiculous, and that she did not overdo it; that her poverty and not her will consented, because she could hardly expect to recall her own, in order to present it intact to its legal heir.

Saul's daughter played a rôle to save her lord from ruin, why not Mrs. Ollendorff?

So it chanced that the climate of Ollendorff Place became temperate. There were no more solos on the music-box—it was locked up in a dusky closet; no more solitary evenings for the master; for its mistress had put on the purple, and reigned with splendid urbanity. She sang her old ballads in his drowsy ear, read to him the dry columns of the day, joined in his walks, entertained him with funny and fantastic humors; and where some women sparkle their morceaux of wit and wisdom on the beau monde, she kept hers for the fireside, made heaven of a stormy day, and strung each on such a firm leash of sweetness and felicity that he doubted if, at last, Paradise would seem strange.

Sometimes, to be sure, when the evening shadows fell, and there was a pause, during which Mr. Ollendorff lost himself in a doze, she would remember, with something like self-reproach, that this was the hour Eagleston and she used to spend in the garden, wandering through its dim aisles, where the night-dew drenched the roses and flung their fragrance abroad; where now and then a bird, over-anxious, stirred and crooned in its sheltered nest, and the fire-flies flickered like distant beacon-lights; and with such remembrance came a bitter flood of regret lest she were untrue to him, and the consciousness that to be untrue were less sinful. Then she pictured him in her mind alone and uncared for in a foreign land; perhaps sick and suffering for her love; perhaps weary, and no home-sunshine to refresh him. Then sometimes, self-tortured to the depths of despair, she would suddenly find herself transported hence to the pinnacle of pride, spurred by another image that presented itself uninvited, an image wherein Eagleston performed the part to some haughty beauty which he had rehearsed to her one summer afternoon! But always she returned with a sad remorse to Eagleston's forlornness and her own inconstancy, perhaps forgetting that the overflow of affection, like that of the Nile, enriches waste places without exhausting the source.

And when, finally, death touched Mr. Ollendorff gently, lowered him tenderly into the grave, fond hands they were that administered to him; and sinking into eternity, the vista of the forsaken world vaguely shadowed forth to him a fair and tearful face, and he went his way believing Maud the most devoted of wives. And the world adopted his creed.

III.

It needed six years to bring this to pass. Two years later, and Eagleston stepped upon the quay and into a coffee-house to refresh himself before looking about him. Eight years beneath a tropic sun had not altered him so very much. To be sure, he had grown to resemble the natives somewhat, as all residents do, and bore a something grave aspect not familiar when last we saw him; but his eyes had the same old mischievous glitter beneath lashes black as night, and the white magic of his teeth flashed more brilliantly when they broke the dusky spell that climate had imposed.

It was the identical coffee-house at which he had taken his last gloomy meal before leaving home and hope and happiness behind; even some of the servants were the same, but they had forgotten him, and among the guests not one friendly face! He brooded over it with melancholy reflections upon the whirligig of time, sipping his claret indifferently, as if the claret, like the life of to-day, had lost flavor and fragrance in comparison with that of eight years gone.

He wondered, sitting there, if Maud were alive, and passing time gayly with her family about her, forgetful of youth and its passages, bound up in fashion and folly, a matronly woman of the world!

Then he fancied she must be dead, or some one would have told him about her before now—not remembering he had forbidden all mention of her name—and with a strange unfeelingness speculated upon the sensations such a fact would create within him if he should much care, or be less desolately unhappy!

Within speaking distance from him sat two gentlemen swallowing physical and mental viands at the same time, both bidding fair to be of an indigestible nature. They had pished and poohed over their newspapers, and execrated the wines for some time before Eagleston was brought out of himself to observe them by one rather loudly asking the other—

"Paul, did you see this ridiculous advertisement? Who was such a guy, pray?"

"What's it about? Making your fortune with a postage-stamp?"

"Nothing of the sort. Listen. 'Taken'—how delicately put!—'from Ollendorff Place within the last week a Music-box, of no great market value, but inestimable to the owner as a gift. Any person restoring it to said Place, or designating any other where it may be found, shall receive two hundred dollars upon the spot, and no questions asked. Otherwise means will be taken for the detection of the individual concerned therein.' There! isn't that sublimely simple and generous?"

"Not in the least. That's Mrs. Ollendorff's. She told me last night she had advertised. Ten to one but she'll recover it. The reward is a big bait; and then the thief is probably some one who knows the sort of woman he has to deal with—one who keeps her word, and has no cracks in it for the passage of deceit."

"Don't go to rhapsodizing, Paul. Of course, it's not ridiculous if it's Mrs. Ollendorff, the little widow. But what's the great row about its value? Did you present it?"

"Pshaw! Thereby hangs a tale: some lost sweet-heart or other trumpery."

"Poor lad! You never had a piece of bread particularly nice and wide, but that 'twas always sure to fall, and always on the buttered side, did you? Any clew to the thief?"

"The servants suspect an old umbrella-man, whom she took in one stormy day, raked the house for desirable umbrellas for him to mend, and dined him on the fat of the land, but when my gentleman had departed, there was no music-box to be found! After all, it was a rattle-brained affair; it had stopped the day before while I was there; just caroled 'The days when I went gipsying,' and there it shut up like a knife, as Reade would say. Tantalizing that it should stop short of the pretty refrain."

"Perhaps it was out of regard to your feelings, being aware that your acquaintance was a thing of yesterday and not of a 'long time ago!' And whom does Madame suspect?"

"Madame suspect! she is too much of a lady for that sort of thing. She declares it was simply some wandering minstrel, some troubador who had lost his instrument; but still she doesn't want to lose hers, you see, ah!"

"Then it wasn't a love-match with Mr. Ollendorff?"

"Folks say it was so like the very thing there was no detecting the difference; a capital counterfeit, I take it!"

"What, the woman with no cracks in her word? I always thought she had a wonderfully distracte air, as of something on her mind!"

"Excuse me, I can't allow you to air your wit at the expense of my friends," concluded the other in an undertone, as they left the place.

Here were volumes for Eagleston more thrilling than Sand's or Sue's, with the pathos of Dickens to him, the satire of Thackeray, the suggestiveness of Karr, and the facts of Boswell.

Maud was a widow, she still valued his gift, perhaps she had not forgotten him. She had lost the music-box; he must bring it back to her, and defeat if possible the manœuvres of this admirer, his foe and rival! That was the plot he made of it.

Thoreau inquires, "Could a grèater miracle take place than for us to look through each other's eyes for an instant?" Adding, "I know of no reading another's experience so startling and informing as this would be!" So if Monsieur Paul and his friend could have looked through the eyes of their sedate neighbor, have read his experience, I wot they would have known more and spoken less; but they went their ways, little dreaming of having brushed against the only person perhaps in all the world who could have read them Mrs. Ollendorff's riddle!

How many of us, without doubt, meet daily in our walks and amusements those who could tell us what we most desire to know, who sit at the same board with one we seek, whose commonplaces open the sequel to our romances, whose household words would solve our problems, and behold we pass them as heedlessly as the very mile-stones.

Eagleston engaged in his search much as the emissaries of the queen in the fairy-book did in order to discover the secret name of that rare scoundrel Rumpelstiltskin, who, otherwise, threatened to confiscate her young son in payment for the straw-spun gold with which she had deceived her royal spouse. He scoured the city and suburbs, dragged into light out of inconceivable cellars, improbable garrets, and unsuspected closets, that grotesque tribe, calling itself old umbrella-men, but most of whom appeared like gnomes dingy with the atmosphere of subterranean furnaces, with aspects as mysterious as though they were acquainted with all the processes of the alchemy of the earth by which it converts charcoal into diamond and solidifies sunshine in its veins; creatures speaking a gibberish unintelligible as themselves.

One thing was gained, he found golden opportunities for practical charity; it is an ill wind that blows no one any good, and perhaps, upon this principle, there is nobody who leaves this world but that some other body is glad to step into his shoes be they ever so slipshod.

Eagleston bought old umbrellas here in order to be armed with patronage there; but it all elucidated nothing. Though one had an old fiddle upon which he tortured "Hull's Victory" into a complete Defeat, and another a flageolet which had lost its breath, no whisper could he hear of a music-box; and, horrible to relate, when he made cautious inquiries about such an instrument, a hand-organ warranted to play "Shubert's Serenade" in forty seconds was offered for inspection!

Eagleston was waxing impatient, he was losing time, living without a glimpse of Maud, and what might not his rival compass in the mean while? And all for a music-box, which, should he find, what would it signify? A truce to such nonsense!

Walking gloomily to his café—for he lived a kind of gipsy life, taking his daily bread to-day in Dan, to-morrow in Beersheba; dining now in brilliant company and again in the crowded solitude of a restaurant—as he sauntered toward this last, he felt some one grasp his arm, and found himself locked in that of one of his Indian friends, who had returned at the same time with himself.

"Come, you dismal mope, you look as you were prowling round seeking whom you may devour!" said this parasite.

"Not quite exact, Bayard; what I may devour would be more to the purpose."

"Then go to the masquerade to-night with me, and devour beauty, and fashion, and eccentricity, and taste, with your hermosos ojos!"

"I don't feel like it; I'm not invited."

"Yes you are; I'm entreated to bring all the single gentlemen of my acquaintance, and you're expected to personate a rajah!"

"I hope you intend to provide the costume then; come and dine with me, and we'll see about it."

"With all my heart. I mean, with all my art of keeping bread from moulding; but I sup nectar and ambrosia at Ollendorff Place. Ah, you should know Mrs. Ollendorff, and you would never want to dine at a restaurant again, unless her mamma seasoned the soup!"

"Then there's a dragon guards the Hesperides? Will she favor the mask to-night?"

"The dragon? Heaven forbid! Not unless she plays duenna, foster-sister to dragon."

"I mean Mrs. Ollendorff."

"Oh, without doubt, she has just begun to frequent company; and this is at the house of an intimate—confoundedly too intimate to please the rest of us, if I must say it!"

"And where is that, pray? Is the rajah to go wandering about town in search of the maskers, and perhaps stumble upon the scene of revel at daybreak, when he should be disappearing with the ghosts and shadows and other hobgoblins?"

"Pshaw! didn't I tell you? At Paul Frederic's—'one of us'—nous autres—single wretches. Temple Avenue. I'll call for you."

"No, thank you; I'll go incog. See if you can penetrate me, and I'll do you as good a turn. Good-by, and seasoned soup if you will!"

IV.

The dancing-hall at Temple Avenue presented a gorgeous phantasmagoria to Eagleston, leaning in at the window in his black domino. It seemed like some wondrous exhalation evoked from chaos by the wand of a fanciful magician. For the first moment it was as if the flowers nodding in the conservatory, the strange birds asleep in the aviary, with all the imperial moths and gold-brown bees that haunt the one and the song that overflows from the other, had lent their grace, their fantasy, their color and dazzlement, their fragrance and spirit, their aerial lightsomeness, their very incarnate selves to the effect.

"Behold!" cried a sylph, in an over-robe of cobweb spangled with dew-drops, "there is a shadow black as Egypt looming in at the window!"

"Who fears shadows, Arachne?" returned her gallant; "I should be less pleased with Aurora just now; and true to the old adage, here she comes, swimming up the waltz in the embrace of Phœbus—I hope they're not published yet!"

"Ho! the shadows are lowering," quoth Wehrwolf to little Red Ridinghood. "Never fear, I'll come for you anon."

"Pull the bobbin and the latch will fly up," she replied.

"The shadows are beginning to look into the window!" sang a street-girl, laden with dainty wares. "The twilight's abroad and I may not stay. Sweetmeats! Who'll buy? Who'll buy?"

"We have our sweet-hearts, thank you!"

"The Queen of Hearts, she made some tarts, All on a summer's day," quoted Harlequin, helping himself from the wares. "Substance before shadow for me!"

"The Knave of Hearts, he stole those tarts, And hid them all away," concluded the likeness of a raven, snapping up the dainty.

"The gods sent me to you with a charm against yonder shadow," whispered Mercury, dropping down beside the Goddess of Liberty, the wings on his sandals glistening like jewels.

"And how goes the day on Olympus?"

"Every thing at sixes and sevens. Your furlough has expired down here."

"Shall I tell your fortune? Your shadow would devour millions such as this dour statue," said a querulous witch, pointing at Eagleston and shuffling the cards before Napoleon as he came by, cocked hat in hand.

"Thy wheel and thee are shadows,' and fortune favors the brave and the beautiful," he replied, bowing profoundly.

"Well said, after Waterloo and Elba and Josephine! But here comes good Queen Bess. She would like to hear a not about her pretty Essex?"

"Where, then, is my ring? Why does he not send it?"

"Some woman has it—not he."

"Begone, slanderer!" And turning to the black domino, "Shall I contend for a shadow?"

A gray-bearded priest, lost in his gilded breviary, stumbled on a Turk coiled upon his carpet and smoking a chibouque.

"Do you know whom you trample upon?"

"A brand from Bedlam without doubt," and jostling Eagleston with the return impetus, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!" he cried.

Undine, in a shimmer of Brussels lace, like a white spray of waterfall, kissed her necklace as though it were a rosary, and inquired every where for Bertha.

Eagleston lost not a moment, but glided in among the quaint gamblers. The necklace was a trinket as familiar as his own face. Undine had sunk upon an ottoman—not after the manner of the priest—and slid the necklace through her fingers.

"A pretty bauble," he said, crouching like her shadow at her feet. "Did the mermaids twine it, of 'turkis and agate and almondine?' And where is Hildebrand?"

"You ask too many questions at once," a trifle nervously, and staring at her interlocutor. "And what do you want with Hildebrand?"

"Only my own; besides, time is precious. How do I know but any moment you will vanish in a foam-wreath?"

"And then?"

"Then I shall lose you again."

"Have you been seeking me?"

"For æons; you, among other things."

"Complimentary. And what are they?"

"Things you seem to have lost: your heart, your memory, and your music-box. It seems that you are catechist in your turn."

"Enough, Paul," she muttered, half hesitatingly, half interrogatively, and rising to her feet, "Did you select your voice at the costumers? I understood you were to play the medieval knight."

Just then a dancer in that trim kissed his hand to her in passing.

"Ah!" glancing back at Eagleston scrutinizingly, "I must get to the air; I shall suffocate here!"

"I will conduct you with pleasure," he returned, offering his arm, while Arachne, spinning by as though for dear life, exclaimed,

"So that is Undine's shadow! But I fancied she had none."

Undine looked distrustfully at her companion.

"You're unfathomable, I believe," she said.

"I thought you were Mr. Frederic at first; but I must have been mistaken."

"Then why don't you beg my pardon?"

"I may be doing him an injustice."

"May I be so imprudent as to inquire what particular trait in my personality or behavior has the honor to resemble our host?"

"Certainly you may; but it doesn't follow that you shall be rewarded for your inquisitiveness. But pray, do you bring me word of my music-box?"

"And you do not inquire for the other missing articles—your memory and heart?"

"Because I know just where to lay my hand upon them."

"Lucky Undine!" stooping to pick up her necklace. "What dainty shells! each is a gem in itself, and each once held one atom of life, that great 'open secret.' Where did you say you got it?"

"I didn't say, Monsieur L'Ombre."

"Is it a game at Ombre?" broke in the mediaeval knight, advancing. "I shall have pleasure in appropriating you for the quadrille forming."

And bowing to Eagleston he would have led her away, but that she lingered to say:

"You remind me of some one."

"Yes, of Monsieur Paul Frederic," trembling in his shoes.

"No!" peremptorily. "And you will not tell me about my music-box?"

The knight's eyes shifted uneasily from one to the other, and he took an impatient step forward.

"You have a music-box, then?" said the shadow.

"I—"

"Madame," interrupted the knight, "we shall lose the quadrille as well as the music-box, and that is my affair, is it not?" a little tenderly.

He had made it so most decidedly, for the identical thing lay upon a tripod in that gentleman's private dressing-room, secure from feminine inspection; and there Eagleston found it half an hour afterward, when, retiring to arrange his mask and observe if any thing could have betrayed him, he, by mistake, took the wrong door. There it lay under his very eyes, the actual discoloring of Maud's tears on the polished lid, and her name inside in his own hand!

Monsieur Paul had probably reasoned thus: "Mrs. Ollendorff estimates absurdly this bauble; there must be more in it than appears. She clings to it; she must cling to me. Out of sight, out of mind. We will remove it till she belongs to me, when it can be easily discovered at a pawnbroker's."

So he had done it. Who the partner was he included in the "we" I do not know, unless it was the— But what am I saying?

Monsieur L'Ombre did not wait to break bread with this Pharisee, nor drop his mask at the feast, though Undine and others waited and wondered thereat; but he took the music-box beneath his ample domino and departed, with no one the wiser.

Some half dozen evenings after this the doorbell at Ollendorff Place was pulled lustily; a footman opened to a somewhat tall person wearing a long black cloak and broad sombrero, and carrying a bundle, who spoke with a foreign accent that I will not attempt to render.

"I must see Madame!"

"What is your errand? Madame, as you call her, is engaged!"

"My errand is with Madame, and I shall see her!"

"Your name then?"

"I will give it to Madame."

Madame, hearing the altercation, called,

"James, what is it?"

"Please, mum, it's a somebody to see you without ever sending his card!"

"Show him in directly, James!"

And he was ushered into a spacious drawing-room, dimly lighted, where he deposited the bundle upon a small teapoy farthest from the light.

"I have brought it," he said; "the music-box."

She made a rush toward it.

"Oh! oh! Mine? And where did you get it?"

Then recollecting herself into the stately courtesy of the lady; "and who are you, that I may thank you?"

"You said there should be no questions asked," he muttered.

"True!" retiring and trembling, "I will ask none. But are you sure it is the one? Let me examine."

She rang for a taper.

"You're not going to call the watch?"

"Certainly not; haven't I given you my word?"

"How do I know that you are to be trusted, that your word to-day is what it was yesterday?"

This was an odd position of affairs, she thought, but answered, smiling,

"I haven't changed; see, I do not arouse the domestics, except this maid—thank you, Bessy, that will do—nor arrest you, but simply dismiss you with this!" and she proffered a purse, between whose meshes the gold pieces smouldered as though they would burn their way through; he balanced it a moment on his finger and flung it upon the nearest table!

"What! Is it not enough?"

"Not enough!"

"But you have not counted it!"

She brought her taper to the teapoy, as if she would see what this audacious burglar most resembled. She spread the pieces upon the box and told them off. Suddenly he laid a detaining hand beside her own, on the polished wood, not brown with any craft, but white and smooth and shapely. And suddenly, as if responsive to the touch, a little gurgle of tune uprose, and where it had broken off its burden the music-box was taking it up again—

"A long time ago—a long time ago," and slowly, softly, lingeringly ringing out the melody. Then in a momentary kind of fearless forgetfulness she glanced up. A new and sweet revelation smote upon her with quick, convincing ray.

"Oh, Eagleston!" she cried, and— I think you and I had better leave the room.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SHADOW OF THE PAST.

ONE stepping back under the dark shelter of the bulwark, and one standing out boldly in the yellow light of the moon, the two friends turned face to face on the deck of the timber ship, and looked at each other in silence. The next moment Allan's inveterate recklessness seized on the grotesque side of the situation by main force. He seated himself astride on the bulwark, and burst out boisterously into his loudest and heartiest laugh.

"All my fault," he said; "but there's no help for it now. Here we are, hard and fast in a trap of our own setting—and there goes the last of the doctor's boat! Come out of the dark, Midwinter; I can't half see you there, and I want to know what's to be done next."

Midwinter neither answered nor moved. Allan left the bulwark, and, mounting the fore-castle, looked down attentively at the waters of the Sound.

"One thing is pretty certain," he said. "With the current on that side, and the sunken rocks on this, we can't find our way out of the scrape by swimming, at any rate. So much for the prospect at this end of the wreck. Let's try how things look at the other. Rouse up, mess-mate!" he called out, cheerfully, as he passed Midwinter. "Come and see what the old tub of a timber ship has got to show us astern." He sauntered on, with his hands in his pockets, humming the chorus of a comic song.

His voice had produced no apparent effect on his friend; but at the light touch of his hand, in passing, Midwinter started, and moved out slowly from the shadow of the bulwark. "Come along!" cried Allan, suspending his singing for a moment, and glancing back. Still, without a word of answer, the other followed. Thrice he stopped before he reached the stern end of the wreck: the first time, to throw aside his hat, and push back his hair from his forehead and temples; the second time, reeling giddily, to hold for a moment by a ring bolt close at hand; the last time (though Allan was plainly visible a few yards ahead) to look stealthily behind him, with the furtive scrutiny of a man who believes that other footsteps are following him in the dark. "Not yet!" he whispered to himself, with eyes that searched the empty air. "I shall see him astern, with his hand on the lock of the cabin door."

The stern end of the wreck was clear of the ship-breaker's lumber, accumulated in the other parts of the vessel. Here, the one object that rose visible on the smooth surface of the deck, was the low wooden structure which held the cabin door, and roofed in the cabin stairs. The wheel-house had been removed, the binnacle had been removed; but the cabin entrance, and all that belonged to it, had been left untouched. The scuttle was on, and the door was closed.

On gaining the after-part of the vessel, Allan walked straight to the stern and looked out to sea over the taffrail. No such thing as a boat was in view any where on the quiet moon-brightened waters. Knowing Midwinter's sight to be better than his own, he called out, "Come up here, and see if there's a fisherman within hail of us." Hearing no reply, he looked back. Midwinter had followed him as far as the cabin, and had stopped there. He called again, in a louder voice, and beckoned impatiently. Midwinter had heard the call, for he looked up—but still he never stirred from his place. There he stood, as if he had reached the utmost limits of the ship, and could go no further.

Allan went back and joined him. It was not easy to discover what he was looking at, for he kept his face turned away from the moonlight; but it seemed as if his eyes were fixed, with a strange expression of inquiry, on the cabin door. "What is there to look at there?" Allan asked. "Let's see if it's locked." As he took a step forward to open the door Midwinter's hand seized him suddenly by the coat-collar and forced him back. The moment after the hand relaxed, without losing its grasp, and trembled violently, like the hand of a man completely unnerved.

"Am I to consider myself in custody?" asked Allan, half astonished and half amused. "Why, in the name of wonder, do you keep staring at the cabin door? Any suspicious noises below? It's no use disturbing the rats—if that's what you mean—we haven't got a dog with us. Men? Living men they can't be; for they would have heard us and come on deck. Dead men? Quite impossible! No ship's crew could be drowned in a landlocked place like this, unless the vessel broke up under them—and here's the vessel as steady as a church to speak for herself. Man alive, how your hand trembles! What is there to scare you in that rotten old cabin? What are you shaking and shivering about? Any company of the supernatural sort on board? Mercy preserve us!—as the old women say—do you see a ghost?"

"I see two!" answered the other, driven headlong into speech and action by a maddening temptation to reveal the truth. "Two!" he repeated, his breath bursting from him in deep, heavy gasps, as he tried vainly to force back the horrible words. "The ghost of a man like you, drowning in the cabin! And the ghost of a man like me, turning the lock of the door on him!"

Once more young Armadale's hearty laughter rang out loud and long through the stillness of the night.

"Turning the lock of the door, is he?" said Allan, as soon as his merriment left him breath enough to speak. "That's a devilish unhand-some action, Master Midwinter, on the part of your ghost. The least I can do, after that, is to let mine out of the cabin, and give him the run of the ship."

With no more than a momentary exertion of his superior strength he freed himself easily from Midwinter's hold. "Below there!" he called out, gayly, as he laid his strong hand on the crazy lock and tore open the cabin door. "Ghost of Allan Armadale, come on deck!" In his terrible ignorance of the truth he put his head into the doorway, and looked down, laughing, at the place where his murdered father had died. "Pah!" he exclaimed, stepping back suddenly, with a shudder of disgust. "The air is foul already—and the cabin is full of water."

It was true. The sunken rocks on which the vessel lay wrecked had burst their way through her lower timbers astern, and the water had welled up through the rifted wood. Here, where the deed had been done, the fatal parallel between past and present was complete. What the cabin had been in the time of the fathers, that the cabin was now in the time of the sons.

Allan pushed the door to again with his foot, a little surprised at the sudden silence which appeared to have fallen on his friend, from the moment when he had laid his hand on the cabin lock. When he turned to look, the reason of the silence was instantly revealed. Midwinter had dropped on the deck. He lay senseless before the cabin door; his face turned up, white and still, to the moonlight, like the face of a dead man.

In a moment Allan was at his side. He looked uselessly round the lonely limits of the wreck, as he lifted Midwinter's head on his knee, for a chance of help, where all chance was ruthlessly cut off. "What am I to do?" he said to himself, in the first impulse of alarm. "Not a drop of water near but the foul water in the cabin." A sudden recollection crossed his memory; the florid color rushed back over his face; and he drew from his pocket a wicker-covered flask. "God bless the doctor for giving me this before we sailed!" he broke out fervently, as he poured down Midwinter's throat some drops of the raw whisky which the flask contained. The stimulant acted instantly on the sensitive system of the swooning man. He sighed faintly, and slowly opened his eyes. "Have I been dreaming?" he asked, looking up vacantly in Allan's face. His eyes wandered higher, and encountered the dismantled masts of the wreck rising weird and black against the night sky. He shuddered at the sight of them, and hid his face on Allan's knee. "No dream!" he murmured to himself, mournfully. "Oh me, no dream!"

"You have been over-tired all day," said Allan; "and this infernal adventure of ours has upset you. Take some more whisky—it's sure to do you good. Can you sit by yourself, if I put you against the bulwark, so?"

"Why by myself? Why do you leave me?" asked Midwinter.

Allan pointed to the mizzen shrouds of the wreck, which were still left standing. "You are not well enough to rough it here till the workmen come off in the morning," he said. "We must find our way on shore at once, if we can. I am going up to get a good view all round, and see if there's a house within hail of us."

Even in the moment that passed while those few words were spoken Midwinter's eyes wandered back distrustfully to the fatal cabin door. "Don't go near it!" he whispered. "Don't try to open it, for God's sake!"

"No, no," returned Allan, humoring him. "When I come down from the rigging I'll come back here." He said the words a little constrainedly; noticing, for the first time while he now spoke, an underlying distress in Mid-winter's face, which grieved and perplexed him. "You're not angry with me?" he said, in his simple, sweet-tempered way. "All this is my fault, I know—and I was a brute and a fool to laugh at you, when I ought to have seen you were ill. I am so sorry, Midwinter. Don't be angry with me!"

Midwinter slowly raised his head. His eyes rested with a mournful interest, long and tenderly on Allan's anxious face.

"Angry?" he repeated, in his lowest, gentlest tones. "Angry with you?—Oh, my poor boy, were you to blame for being kind to me when I was ill in the old west-country inn? And was I to blame for feeling your kindness thankfully? Was it our fault that we never doubted each other, and never knew that we were traveling together blindfold on the way that was to lead us here? The cruel time is coming, Allan, when we shall rue the day we ever met. Shake hands, brother, on the edge of the precipice—shake hands while we are brothers still?"

Allan turned away quickly, convinced that his mind had not yet recovered the shock of the fainting-fit. "Don't forget the whisky!" he said, cheerfully, as he sprang into the rigging, and mounted to the mizzen-top.

It was past two; the moon was waning; and the darkness that comes before dawn was beginning to gather round the wreck. Behind Allan, as he now stood looking out from the elevation of the mizzen-top, spread the broad and lonely sea. Before him, were the low, black, lurking rocks, and the broken waters of the channel, pouring white and angry into the vast calm of the westward ocean beyond. On the right hand, heaved back grandly from the waterside, were the rocks and precipices, with their little tablelands of grass between; the sloping downs, and upward-rolling heath solitudes of the Isle of Man. On the left hand, rose the craggy sides of the Islet of the Calf—here, rent wildly into deep black chasms; there, lying low under long sweeping acclivities of grass and heath. No sound rose, no light was visible, on either shore. The black lines of the topmost masts of the wreck looked shadowy and faint in the darkening mystery of the sky; the land-breeze had dropped; the small shoreward waves fell noiseless; far or near, no sound was audible but the cheerless bubbling of the broken water ahead, pouring through the awful hush of silence in which earth and ocean waited for the coming day.

Even Allan's careless nature felt the solemn influence of the time. The sound of his own voice startled him, when he looked down and hailed his friend on deck.

"I think I see one house," he said. "Here-away, on the main land to the right." He looked again, to make sure, at a dim little patch of white, with faint white lines behind it, nestling low in a grassy hollow, on the main island. "It looks like a stone-house and inclosure," he resumed. "I'll hail it, on the chance." He passed his arm round a rope to steady himself; made a speaking-trumpet of his hands—and suddenly dropped them again without uttering a sound. “It’s so awfully quiet,” he whispered to himself. “I’m half afraid to call out.” He looked down again on deck. “I sha’n’t startle you, Midwinter—shall I?” he said, with an uneasy laugh. He looked once more at the faint white object in the grassy hollow. “It won’t do to have come up here for nothing,” he thought—and made a speaking-trumpet of his hands again. This time he gave the hail with the whole power of his lungs. “On shore there!” he shouted, turning his face to the main island. “Ahoy-hoy-hoy!”

The last echoes of his voice died away and were lost. No sound answered him but the cheerless bubbling of the broken water ahead.

He looked down again at his friend, and saw the dark figure of Midwinter rise erect, and pace the deck backward and forward—never disappearing out of sight of the cabin when it retired toward the bows of the wreck; and never passing beyond the cabin when it returned toward the stern. “He is impatient to get away,” thought Allan; “I’ll try again.” He hailed the land once more; and, taught by previous experience, pitched his voice in its highest key.

This time another sound than the sound of the bubbling water answered him. The lowing of frightened cattle rose from the building in the grassy hollow, and traveled far and drearily through the stillness of the morning air. Allan waited and listened. If the building was a farm-house, the disturbance among the beasts would rouse the men. If it was only a cattle-stable, nothing more would happen. The lowing of the frightened brutes rose and fell drearily; the minutes passed—and nothing happened.

“Once more!” said Allan, looking down at the restless figure pacing beneath him. For the third time he hailed the land. For the third time he waited and listened.

In a pause of silence among the cattle he heard behind him, on the opposite shore of the channel—faint and far among the solitudes of the Islet of the Calf—a sharp, sudden sound, like the distant clash of a heavy door-bolt drawn back. Turning at once in the new direction, he strained his eyes to look for a house. The last faint rays of the waning moonlight trembled here and there on the higher rocks, and on the steeper pinnacles of ground—but great strips of darkness lay dense and black over all the land between; and in that darkness the house, if house there were, was lost to view.

“I have roused somebody at last,” Allan called out encouragingly to Midwinter, still walking to and fro on the deck, strangely indifferent to all that was passing above and beyond him. “Look out for the answering hail!” And with his face set toward the Islet, Allan shouted for help.

The shout was not answered, but mimicked with a shrill, shrieking derision—with wilder and wilder cries, rising out of the deep distant darkness, and mingling horribly the expression of a human voice with the sound of a brute’s. A sudden suspicion crossed Allan’s mind, which made his head swim and turned his hand cold as it held the rigging. In breathless silence he looked toward the quarter from which the first mimicry of his cry for help had come. After a moment’s pause the shrieks were renewed, and the sound of them came nearer. Suddenly a figure, which seemed the figure of a man, leapt up black on a pinnacle of rock, and capered and shrieked in the waning gleam of the moonlight. The screams of a terrified woman mingled with the cries of the capering creature on the rock. A red spark flashed out in the darkness from a light kindled in an invisible window. The hoarse shouting of a man’s voice in anger was heard through the noise. A second black figure leapt up on the rock, struggled with the first figure, and disappeared with it in the darkness. The cries grew fainter and fainter—the screams of the woman were stilled—the hoarse voice of the man was heard again for a moment, hailing the wreck in words made unintelligible by the distance, but in tones plainly expressive of rage and fear combined. Another moment and the clang of the door-bolt was heard again; the red spark of light was quenched in darkness; and all the islet lay quiet in the shadows once more. The lowing of the cattle on the main land ceased—rose again—stopped. Then, cold and cheerless as ever, the eternal bubbling of the broken water welled up through the great gap of silence—the one sound left, as the mysterious stillness of the hour fell like a mantle from the heavens, and closed over the wreck.

Allan descended from his place in the mizzen-top and joined his friend again on deck.

“We must wait till the ship-breakers come off to their work,” he said, meeting Midwinter half-way in the course of his restless walk. “After what has happened, I don’t mind confessing that I’ve had enough of hailing the land. Only think of there being a madman in that house ashore, and of my waking him! Horrible, wasn’t it?”

Midwinter stood still for a moment and looked at Allan with the perplexed air of a man who hears circumstances familiarly mentioned to which he is himself a total stranger. He appeared, if such a thing had been possible, to have passed over entirely without notice all that had just happened on the Islet of the Calf.

“Nothing is horrible out of this ship,” he said. “Every thing is horrible in it.”

Answering in those strange words he turned away again, and went on with his walk.

Allan picked up the flask of whisky lying on the deck near him, and revived his spirits with a dram. “Here’s one thing on board that isn’t horrible,” he retorted briskly, as he screwed on the stopper of the flask; “and here’s another,” he added, as he took a cigar from his case and lit it. “Three o’clock!” he went on, looking at his watch, and settling himself comfortably on deck with his back against the bulwark. “Daybreak isn’t far off—we shall have the pipings of the birds to cheer us up before long. I say, Midwinter, you seem to have quite got over that unlucky fainting-fit. How you do keep walking! Come here and have a cigar, and make yourself comfortable. What's the good of tramping backward and forward in that restless way?"

"I am waiting," said Midwinter.

"Waiting! What for?"

"With submission to your superior judgment, my dear fellow, I think quite enough has happened already. The adventure will do very well as it stands now; more of it is more than I want." He took another dram of whisky and rambled on, between the puffs of his cigar, in his usual easy way. "I've not got your fine imagination, old boy; and I hope the next thing that happens will be the appearance of the workmen's boat. I suspect that queer fancy of yours has been running away with you while you were down here all by yourself. Come now! what were you thinking of while I was up in the mizzen-top frightening the cows?"

Midwinter suddenly stopped. "Suppose I tell you?" he said.

"Suppose you do."

The torturing temptation to reveal the truth, roused once already by his companion's merciless gayety of spirit, possessed itself of Midwinter for the second time. He leaned back in the dark against the high side of the ship and looked down in silence at Allan's figure stretched comfortably on the deck. "Rouse him," the fiend whispered, subtly, "from that ignorant self-possession, and that pitiless repose. Show him the place where the deed was done; let him know it with your knowledge, and fear it with your dread. Tell him of the letter you burnt, and of the words no fire can destroy, which are living in your memory now. Let him see your mind as it was yesterday, when it roused your sinking faith in your own convictions, to look back on your life at sea, and to cherish the comforting remembrance that, in all your voyages, you had never fallen in with this ship. Let him see your mind as it is now, when the ship has got you at the turning-point of your new life, at the outset of your friendship with the one man of all men whom your father warned you to avoid. Think of those death-bed words, and whisper them in his ear, that he may think of them too. Hide yourself from him under an assumed name. Put the mountains and the seas between you; be ungrateful, be unforgiving; be all that is most repellent to your own gentler nature, rather than live under the same roof and breathe the same air with that man." So the tempter counseled. So, like a noisome exhalation from the father's grave, the father's influence rose and poisoned the mind of the son.

The sudden silence surprised Allan; he looked back drowsily over his shoulder. "Thinking again!" he exclaimed, with a weary yawn.

Midwinter stepped out from the shadow and came nearer to Allan than he had come yet. "Yes," he said, "thinking of the past and the future."

"The past and the future?" repeated Allan, shifting himself comfortably into a new position. "For my part I'm dumb about the past. It's a sore subject with me—the past means the loss of the doctor's boat. Let's talk about the future. Have you been taking a practical view? as dear old Brock calls it. Have you been considering the next serious question that concerns us both when we get back to the hotel—the question of breakfast?"

After an instant's hesitation Midwinter took a step nearer. "I have been thinking of your future and mine," he said; "I have been thinking of the time when your way in life, and my way in life, will be two ways instead of one."

"Here's the daybreak!" cried Allan. "Look up at the masts; they're beginning to get clear again already. I beg your pardon. What were you saying?"

Midwinter made no reply. The struggle between the hereditary superstition that was driving him on, and the unconquerable affection for Allan that was holding him back, suspended the next words on his lips. He turned aside his face in speechless suffering. "Oh, my father!" he thought, "better have killed me on that day when I lay on your bosom than have let me live for this!"

"What's that about the future?" persisted Allan. "I was looking for the daylight; I didn't hear."

Midwinter controlled himself, and answered. "You have treated me with your usual kindness," he said, "in planning to take me with you to Thorpe-Ambrose. I think, on reflection, I had better not intrude myself where I am not known and not expected. His voice faltered, and he stopped again. The more he shrank from it the clearer the picture of the happy life that he was resigning rose on his mind.

Allan's thoughts instantly reverted to the mystification about the new steward, which he had practiced on his friend when they were consulting together in the cabin of the yacht. "Has he been turning it over in his mind?" wondered Allan; "and is he beginning at last to suspect the truth? I'll try him. Talk as much nonsense, my dear fellow, as you like," he rejoined; "but don't forget that you are engaged to see me established at Thorpe-Ambrose, and to give me your opinion of the new steward."

Midwinter suddenly stepped forward again, close to Allan.

"I am not talking about your steward or your estate," he burst out, passionately; "I am talking about myself. Do you hear? Myself! I am not a fit companion for you. You don't know who I am." He drew back into the shadowy shelter of the bulwark as suddenly as he had come out from it. "O God! I can't tell him," he said to himself, in a whisper.

For a moment, and for a moment only, Allan was surprised. "Not know who you are?"

Even as he repeated the words his easy good-humor got the upper hand again. He took up the whisky-flask, and shook it significantly. "I say," he resumed, "how much of the doctor's medicine did you take while I was up in the mizzen-top?"

The light tone which he persisted in adopting stung Midwinter to the last pitch of exasperation. He came out again into the light, and stamped his foot angrily on the deck. "Listen to me!" he said. "You don't know half the low things I have done in my lifetime. I have been a tradesman's drudge; I have swept out the shop and put up the shutters; I have carried parcels through the street, and waited for my master's money at his customers' doors."

"I have never done any thing half as useful," returned Allan, composedly. "Dear old boy, what an industrious fellow you have been in your time!"

"I have been a vagabond and a blackguard in my time," returned the other, fiercely; "I've been a street-tumbler, a tramp, a gipsy's boy! I've sung for half-pence with dancing dogs on the high-road! I've worn a foot-boy's livery, and waited at table! I've been a common sailor's cook, and a starving fisherman's Jack of all trades! What has a gentleman in your position in common with a man in mine? Can you take me into the society at Thorpe-Ambrose? Why, my very name would be a reproach to you. Fancy the faces of your new neighbors when their footmen announce Ozias Midwinter and Allan Armadale in the same breath!" He burst into a harsh laugh, and repeated the two names again, with a scornful bitterness of emphasis which insisted pitilessly on the marked contrast between them.

Something in the sound of his laughter jarred painfully, even on Allan's easy nature. He raised himself on the deck, and spoke seriously for the first time. "A joke's a joke, Midwinter," he said, "as long as you don't carry it too far. I remember your saying something of the same sort to me once before, when I was nursing you in Somersetshire. You forced me to ask you if I deserved to be kept at arm's-length by you of all the people in the world. Don't force me to say so again. Make as much fun of me as you please, old fellow, in any other way. That way hurts me."

Simple as the words were, and simply as they had been spoken, they appeared to work an instant revolution in Midwinter's mind. His impressible nature recoiled as from some sudden shock. Without a word of reply he walked away by himself to the forward part of the ship. He sat down on some piled planks between the masts, and passed his hand over his head in a vacant, bewildered way. Though his father's belief in Fatality was his own belief once more—though there was no longer the shadow of a doubt in his mind that the woman whom Mr. Brock had met in Somersetshire and the woman who had tried to destroy herself in London were one and the same—though all the horror that mastered him when he first read the letter from Wildbad had now mastered him again, Allan's appeal to their past experience of each other had come home to his heart, with a force more irresistible than the force of his superstition itself. In the strength of that very superstition he now sought the pretext which might encourage him to sacrifice every less generous feeling to the one predominant dread of wounding the sympathies of his friend. "Why distress him?" he whispered to himself. "We are not at the end here—there is the Woman behind us in the dark. Why resist him when the mischief's done, and the caution comes too late? What is to be will be. What have I to do with the future? and what has he?"

He went back to Allan, sat down by his side, and took his hand. "Forgive me," he said, gently; "I have hurt you for the last time." Before it was possible to reply he snatched up the whisky-flask from the deck. "Come!" he exclaimed, with a sudden effort to match his friend's cheerfulness, "you have been trying the doctor's medicine, why shouldn't I?"

Allan was delighted. "This is something like a change for the better," he said; "Midwinter is himself again. Hark! there are the birds. Hail, smiling morn! smiling morn!" He sang the words of the glee in his old cheerful voice, and clapped Midwinter on the shoulder in his old hearty way. "How did you manage to clear your head of those confounded megrims? Do you know you were quite alarming about something happening to one or other of us before we were out of this ship?"

"Sheer nonsense!" returned Midwinter, contemptuously. "I don't think my head has ever been quite right since that fever; I've got a bee in my bonnet, as they say in the North. Let's talk of something else. About those people you have let the cottage to? I wonder whether the agent's account of Major Milroy's family is to be depended on? There might be another lady in the household besides his wife and his daughter."

"Oho!" cried Allan, "you're beginning to think of nymphs among the trees, and flirtations in the fruit-garden, are you? Another lady—eh? Suppose the major's family circle won't supply another? We shall have to spin that half-crown again, and toss up for which is to have the first chance with Miss Milroy."

For once Midwinter spoke as lightly and carelessly as Allan himself. "No, no," he said; "the major's landlord has the first claim to the notice of the major's daughter. I'll retire into the back-ground, and wait for the next lady who makes her appearance at Thorpe-Ambrose."

"Very good. I'll have an Address to the women of Norfolk posted in the park to that effect," said Allan. "Are you particular to a shade about size or complexion? What's your favorite age?"

Midwinter trifled with his own superstition as a man trifles with the loaded gun that may kill him, or with the savage animal that may maim him for life. He mentioned the age (as he had reckoned it himself) of the woman in the black gown and the red Paisley shawl.

"Five-and-thirty," he said.

As the words passed his lips his factitious spirits deserted him. He left his seat, impenetrably deaf to all Allan's efforts at rallying him on his extraordinary answer, and resumed his restless pacing of the deck in dead silence. Once more the haunting thought which had gone to and fro with him in the hour of darkness went to and fro with him now in the hour of daylight. Once more the conviction possessed itself of his mind that something was to happen to Allan or to himself before they left the wreck.

Minute by minute the light strengthened in the eastern sky, and the shadowy places on the deck of the timber ship revealed their barren emptiness under the eye of day. As the breeze rose again the sea began to murmur wakefully in the morning light. Even the cold bubbling of the broken water changed its cheerless note, and softened on the ear as the mellowing flood of daylight poured warm over it from the rising sun. Midwinter paused near the forward part of the ship, and recalled his wandering attention to the passing time. The cheering influences of the hour were round him look where he might. The happy morning smile of the summer sky, so brightly merciful to the old and weary earth, lavished its all-embracing beauty even on the wreck! The dew that lay glittering on the inland fields lay glittering on the deck, and the worn and rusted rigging was gemmed as brightly as the fresh green leaves on shore. Insensibly, as he looked round, Midwinter's thoughts reverted to the comrade who had shared with him the adventure of the night. He returned to the after-part of the ship, and spoke to Allan as he advanced. Receiving no answer, he approached the recumbent figure and looked closer at it. Left to his own resources, Allan had let the fatigues of the night take their own way with him. His head had sunk back; his hat had fallen off; he lay stretched at full length on the deck of the timber ship, deeply and peacefully asleep.

Midwinter resumed his walk; his mind lost in doubt, his own past thoughts seeming suddenly to have grown strange to him. How darkly his forebodings had distrusted the coming time—and how harmlessly that time had come! The sun was mounting in the heavens, the hour of release was drawing nearer and nearer; and of the two Armadales imprisoned in the fatal ship one was sleeping away the weary time, and the other was quietly watching the growth of the new day.

The sun climbed higher; the hour wore on. With the latent distrust of the wreck which still clung to him Midwinter looked inquiringly on either shore for signs of awakening human life. The land was still lonely. The smoke-wreaths that were soon to rise from cottage chimneys had not risen yet.

After a moment's thought he went back again to the after-part of the vessel, to see if there might be a fisherman's boat within hail astern of them. Absorbed for the moment by the new idea, he passed Allan hastily, after barely noticing that he still lay asleep. One step more would have brought him to the taffrail—when that step was suspended by a sound behind him, a sound like a faint groan. He turned, and looked at the sleeper on the deck. He knelt softly, and looked closer.

"It has come!" he whispered to himself. "Not to me—but to him."

It had come, in the bright freshness of the morning; it had come, in the mystery and terror of a Dream. The face which Midwinter had last seen in perfect repose was now the distorted face of a suffering man. The perspiration stood thick on Allan's forehead, and matted his curling hair. His partially-opened eyes showed nothing but the white of the eyeball gleaming blindly. His outstretched hands scratched and struggled on the deck. From moment to moment he moaned and muttered helplessly; but the words that escaped him were lost in the grinding and gnashing of his teeth. There he lay—so near in the body to the friend who bent over him; so far away in the spirit that the two might have been in different worlds—there he lay, with the morning sunshine on his face, in the torture of his dream.

One question, and one only, rose in the mind of the man who was looking at him. What had the Fatality which had imprisoned him in the Wreck decreed that he should see?

Had the treachery of Sleep opened the gates of the grave to that one of the two Armadales whom the other had kept in ignorance of the truth? Was the murder of the father revealing itself to the son—there, on the very spot where the crime had been committed—in the vision of a dream?

With that question overshadowing all else in his mind, the son of the homicide knelt on the deck, and looked on the son of the man whom his father's hand had slain.

The conflict between the sleeping body and the waking mind was strengthening every moment. The dreamer's helpless groaning for deliverance grew louder; his hands raised themselves and clutched at the empty air. Struggling with the all-mastering dread that still held him, Midwinter laid his hand gently on Allan's forehead. Light as the touch was, there were mysterious sympathies in the dreaming man that answered it. His groaning ceased, and his hands dropped slowly. There was an instant of suspense, and Midwinter looked closer. His breath just fluttered over the sleeper's face. Before the next breath had risen to his lips Allan suddenly sprang up on his knees—sprang up as if the call of a trumpet had rung on his ear, awake in an instant.

"You have been dreaming," said Midwinter, as the other looked at him wildly, in the first bewilderment of waking.

Allan's eyes began to wander about the wreck

—at first vacantly, then with a look of angry surprise. “Are we here still?” he said, as Midwinter helped him to his feet. “Whatever else I do on board this infernal ship,” he added, after a moment, “I won’t go to sleep again!”

As he said those words his friend’s eyes searched his face in silent inquiry. They took a turn together on the deck.

“Tell me your dream,” said Midwinter, with a strange tone of suspicion in his voice, and a strange appearance of abruptness in his manner.

“I can’t tell it yet,” returned Allan. “Wait a little till I’m my own man again.”

They took another turn on the deck. Midwinter stopped and spoke once more.

“Look at me for a moment, Allan,” he said.

There was something of the trouble left by the dream, and something of natural surprise at the strange request just addressed to him, in Allan’s face, as he turned it full on the speaker; but no shadow of ill-will, no lurking lines of distrust any where. Midwinter turned aside quickly, and hid, as he best might, an irrepressible outburst of relief.

“Do I look a little upset?” asked Allan, taking his arm and leading him on again. “Don’t make yourself nervous about me if I do. My head feels wild and giddy; but I shall soon get over it.”

For the next few minutes they walked backward and forward in silence—the one bent on dismissing the terror of the dream from his thoughts, the other bent on discovering what the terror of the dream might be. Relieved of the dread that had oppressed it, the superstitious nature of Midwinter had leaped to its next conclusion at a bound. What if the sleeper had been visited by another revelation than the revelation of the Past? What if the dream had opened those unturned pages in the book of the Future which told the story of his life to come? The bare doubt that it might be so strengthened tenfold Midwinter’s longing to penetrate the mystery which Allan’s silence still kept a secret from him.

“Is your head more composed?” he asked. “Can you tell me your dream now?”

While he put the question a last memorable moment in the Adventure of the Wreck was at hand.

They had reached the stern, and were just turning again when Midwinter spoke. As Allan opened his lips to answer he looked out mechanically to sea. Instead of replying he suddenly ran to the taffrail, and waved his hat over his head, with a shout of exultation.

Midwinter joined him, and saw a large six-oared boat pulling straight for the channel of the Sound. A figure, which they both thought they recognized, rose eagerly in the stern-sheets and returned the waving of Allan’s hat. The boat came nearer; the steersman called to them cheerfully; and they recognized the doctor’s voice.

“Thank God you’re both above water!” said Mr. Hawbury, as they met him on the deck of the timber ship. “Of all the winds of heaven which wind blew you here?”

He looked at Midwinter as he made the inquiry; but it was Allan who told him the story of the night, and Allan who asked the doctor for information in return. The one absorbing interest in Midwinter’s mind—the interest of penetrating the mystery of the dream—kept him silent throughout. Heedless of all that was said or done about him, he watched Allan, and followed Allan, like a dog, until the time came for getting down into the boat. Mr. Hawbury’s professional eye rested on him curiously, noting his varying color and the incessant restlessness of his hands. “I wouldn’t change nervous systems with that man for the largest fortune that could be offered me,” thought the doctor as he took the boat’s tiller, and gave the oarsmen their order to push off from the wreck.

Having reserved all explanations on his side until they were on their way back to Port St. Mary, Mr. Hawbury next addressed himself to the gratification of Allan’s curiosity. The circumstances which had brought him to the rescue of his two guests of the previous evening were simple enough. The lost boat had been met with at sea by some fishermen of Port Erin, on the western side of the island, who at once recognized it as the doctor’s property, and at once sent a messenger to make inquiry at the doctor’s house. The man’s statement of what had happened had naturally alarmed Mr. Hawbury for the safety of Allan and his friend. He had immediately secured assistance; and, guided by the boatmen’s advice, had made first for the most dangerous place on the coast—the only place, in that calm weather, in which an accident could have happened to a boat sailed by experienced men—the channel of the Sound. After thus accounting for his welcome appearance on the scene, the doctor hospitably insisted that his guests of the evening should be his guests of the morning as well. It would still be too early when they got back for the people at the hotel to receive them, and they would find bed and breakfast at Mr. Hawbury’s house.

At the first pause in the conversation between Allan and the doctor Midwinter—who had neither joined in the talk, nor listened to the talk—touched his friend on the arm. “Are you better?” he asked in a whisper. “Shall you soon be composed enough to tell me what I want to know?”

Allan’s eyebrows contracted impatiently; the subject of the dream, and Midwinter’s obstinacy in returning to it, seemed to be alike distasteful to him. He hardly answered with his usual good-humor. “I suppose I shall have no peace till I tell you,” he said, “so I may as well get it over at once.”

“No!” returned Midwinter, with a look at the doctor and his oarsmen. “Not where other people can hear it—not till you and I are alone.”

“If you wish to see the last, gentlemen, of your quarters for the night,” interposed the doctor, "now is your time! the coast will shut the vessel out in a minute more."

In silence on the one side and on the other, the two Armadales looked their last at the fatal ship. Lonely and lost they had found the Wreck in the mystery of the summer night. Lonely and lost they left the Wreck in the radiant beauty of the summer morning.

An hour later the doctor had seen his guests established in their bedrooms, and had left them to take their rest until the breakfast hour arrived.

Almost as soon as his back was turned the doors of both rooms opened softly, and Allan and Midwinter met in the passage.

"Can you sleep after what has happened?" asked Allan.

Midwinter shook his head. "You were coming to my room, were you not?" he said. "What for?"

"To ask you to keep my company. What were you coming to my room for?"

"To ask you to tell me your dream."

"Damn the dream! I want to forget all about it."

"And I want to know all about it."

Both paused; both refrained instinctively from saying more. For the first time since the beginning of their friendship they were on the verge of a disagreement—and that on the subject of the dream. Allan's good temper just stopped them on the brink.

"You are the most obstinate fellow alive," he said, "but if you will know all about it, you must know all about it, I suppose. Come into my room and I'll tell you."

He led the way, and Midwinter followed. The door closed, and shut them in together.

CHAPTER V.

THE SHADOW OF THE FUTURE.

WHEN Mr. Hawbury joined his guests in the breakfast-room the strange contrast of character between them which he had noticed already was impressed on his mind more strongly than ever. One of them sat at the well-spread table, hungry and happy; ranging from dish to dish, and declaring that he had never made such a breakfast in his life. The other sat apart at the window; his cup thanklessly deserted before it was empty, his meat left ungraciously half eaten on his plate. The doctor's morning greeting to the two, accurately expressed the differing impressions which they had produced on his mind. He clapped Allan on the shoulder, and saluted him with a joke. He bowed constrainedly to Midwinter, and said, "I am afraid you have not recovered the fatigues of the night."

"It's not the night, doctor, that has damped his spirits," said Allan. "It's something I have been telling him. It is not my fault, mind. If I had only known beforehand that he believed in dreams I wouldn't have opened my lips."

"Dreams?" repeated the doctor, looking at Midwinter directly, and addressing him under a mistaken impression of the meaning of Allan's words. "With your constitution, you ought to be well used to dreaming by this time."

"This way, doctor; you have taken the wrong turning!" cried Allan. "I'm the dreamer—not he. Don't look astonished; it wasn't in this comfortable house—it was on board that confounded timber ship. The fact is, I fell asleep just before you took us off the wreck; and it's not to be denied that I had a very ugly dream. Well, when we got back here—"

"Why do you trouble Mr. Hawbury about a matter that can not possibly interest him?" asked Midwinter, speaking for the first time, and speaking very impatiently.

"I beg your pardon," returned the doctor, rather sharply; "so far as I have heard the matter does interest me."

"That's right, doctor!" said Allan. "Be interested, I beg and pray; I want you to clear his head of the nonsense he has got in it now. What do you think?—he will have it that my dream is a warning to me to avoid certain people; and he actually persists in saying that one of those people is—himself! Did you ever hear the like of it? I took great pains; I explained the whole thing to him. I said, warning be hanged—it's all indigestion! You don't know what I ate and drank at the doctor's supper-table—I do. Do you think he would listen to me? Not he. You try him next; you're a professional man, and he must listen to you. Be a good fellow, doctor, and give me a certificate of indigestion; I'll show you my tongue with pleasure."

"The sight of your face is quite enough," said Mr. Hawbury. "I certify, on the spot, that you never had such a thing as an indigestion in your life. Let's hear about the dream, and see what we can make of it—if you have no objection, that is to say."

Allan pointed at Midwinter with his fork.

"Apply to my friend, there," he said; "he has got a much better account of it than I can give you. If you'll believe me, he took it all down in writing from my own lips; and he made me sign it at the end, as if it was my 'last dying speech and confession' before I went to the gallows. Out with it, old boy—I saw you put it in your pocket-book—out with it!"

"Are you really in earnest?" asked Midwinter, producing his pocket-book with a reluctance which was almost offensive under the circumstances, for it implied distrust of the doctor in the doctor's own house.

Mr. Hawbury's color rose. "Pray don't show it to me if you feel the least unwillingness," he said, with the elaborate politeness of an offended man.

"Stuff and nonsense!" cried Allan. "Throw it over here!"

Instead of complying with that characteristic request Midwinter took the paper from the pocket-book, and, leaving his place, approached Mr. Hawbury. "I beg your pardon," he said, as he offered the doctor the manuscript with his own hand. His eyes dropped to the ground, and his face darkened, while he made the apology. "A secret, sullen fellow," thought the doctor, thanking him with formal civility—"his friend is worth ten thousand of him." Midwinter went back to the window and sat down again in silence, with the old impenetrable resignation which had once puzzled Mr. Brock.

"Read that, doctor," said Allan, as Mr. Hawbury opened the written paper. "It's not told in my roundabout way; but there's nothing added to it, and nothing taken away. It's exactly what I dreamed, and exactly what I should have written myself, if I had thought the thing worth putting down on paper, and if I had had the knack of writing—which," concluded Allan, composedly stirring his coffee, "I haven't, except it's letters; and I rattle them off in no time."

Mr. Hawbury spread the manuscript before him on the breakfast-table and read these lines:

ALLAN ARMADALE'S DREAM.

"Early on the morning of June the first, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, I found myself (through circumstances which it is not important to mention in this place) left alone with a friend of mine—a young man about my own age—on board the French timber ship named La Grace de Dieu, which ship then lay wrecked in the channel of the Sound, between the main land of the Isle of Man and the islet called the Calf. Having not been in bed the previous night, and feeling overcome by fatigue, I fell asleep on the deck of the vessel. I was in my usual good health at the time, and the morning was far enough advanced for the sun to have risen. Under these circumstances, and at that period of the day, I passed from sleeping to dreaming. As clearly as I can recollect it, after the lapse of a few hours, this was the succession of events presented to me by the dream:

"1. The first event of which I was conscious was the appearance of my father. He took me silently by the hand; and we found ourselves in the cabin of a ship.

"2. Water rose slowly over us in the cabin; and I and my father sank through the water together.

"3. An interval of oblivion followed; and then the sense came to me of being left alone in the darkness.

"4. I waited.

"5. The darkness opened and showed me the vision—as in a picture—of a broad, lonely pool, surrounded by open ground. Above the farther margin of the pool I saw the cloudless western sky red with the light of sunset.

"6. On the near margin of the pool there stood the Shadow of a Woman.

"7. It was the shadow only. No indication was visible to me by which I could identify it, or compare it with any living creature. The long robe showed me that it was the shadow of a woman, and showed me nothing more.

"8. The darkness closed again—remained with me for an interval—and opened for the second time.

"9. I found myself in a room, standing before a long window. The only object of furniture or of ornament that I saw (or that I can now remember having seen) was a little statue placed near me. The statue was on my left hand, and the window was on my right. The window opened on a lawn and flower-garden; and the rain was pattering heavily against the glass.

"10. I was not alone in the room. Standing opposite to me at the window was the Shadow of a Man.

"11. I saw no more of it—I knew no more of it than I saw and knew of the shadow of the woman. But the shadow of the man moved. It stretched out its arm toward the statue; and the statue fell in fragments on the floor.

"12. With a confused sensation in me, which was partly anger and partly distress, I stooped to look at the fragments. When I rose again the Shadow had vanished, and I saw no more.

"13. The darkness opened for the third time and showed me the Shadow of the Woman and the Shadow of the Man together.

"14. No surrounding scene (or none that I can now call to mind) was visible to me.

"15. The Man-Shadow was the nearest; the Woman-Shadow stood back. From where she stood there came a sound as of the pouring of a liquid softly. I saw her touch the shadow of the man with one hand, and with the other give him a glass. He took the glass and gave it to me. In the moment when I put it to my lips a deadly faintness mastered me from head to foot. When I came to my senses again the Shadow had vanished, and the third vision was at an end.

"16. The darkness closed over me again; and the interval of oblivion followed.

"17. I was conscious of nothing more till I felt the morning sunshine on my face, and heard my friend tell me that I had awakened from a dream."

After reading the narrative attentively to the last line (under which appeared Allan's signature) the doctor looked across the breakfast-table at Midwinter, and tapped his fingers on the manuscript with a satirical smile.

"Many men, many opinions," he said. "I don't agree with either of you about this dream. Your theory," he added, looking at Allan, with a smile, "we have disposed of already: the supper that you can't digest is a supper which has yet to be discovered. My theory we will come to presently; your friend's theory claims attention first." He turned again to Midwinter, with his anticipated triumph over a man whom he disliked a little too plainly visible in his face and manner. "If I understand rightly," he went on, "you believe that this dream is a warning, supernaturally addressed to Mr. Armadale, of dangerous events that are threatening him, and of dangerous people connected with those events, whom he would do wisely to avoid. May I inquire whether you have arrived at this conclusion as an habitual believer in dreams? or, as having reasons of your own for attaching especial importance to this one dream in particular?"

"You have stated what my conviction is quite accurately," returned Midwinter, chafing under the doctor's looks and tones. "Excuse me if I ask you to be satisfied with that admission, and to let me keep my reasons to myself."

"That's exactly what he said to me," interposed Allan. "I don't believe he has got any reasons at all."

"Gently! gently!" said Mr. Hawbury. "We can discuss the subject without intruding ourselves into any body's secrets. Let us come to my own method of dealing with the dream next. Mr. Midwinter will probably not be surprised to hear that I look at this matter from an essentially practical point of view."

"I shall not be at all surprised," retorted Midwinter. "The view of a medical man, when he has a problem in humanity to solve, seldom ranges beyond the point of his dissecting-knife."

The doctor was a little nettled on his side. "Our limits are not quite so narrow as that," he said; "but I willingly grant you that there are some articles of your faith in which we doctors don't believe. For example, we don't believe that a reasonable man is justified in attaching a supernatural interpretation to any phenomenon which comes within the range of his senses, until he has certainly ascertained that there is no such thing as a natural explanation of it to be found in the first instance."

"Come! that's fair enough, I'm sure," exclaimed Allan. "He hit you hard with the 'dissecting-knife,' doctor; and now you have hit him back again with your 'natural explanation.' Let's have it."

"By all means," said Mr. Hawbury; "here it is. There is nothing at all extraordinary in my theory of dreams: it is the theory accepted by the great mass of my profession. A Dream is the reproduction, in the sleeping state of the brain, of images and impressions produced on it in the waking state; and this reproduction is more or less involved, imperfect, or contradictory, as the action of certain faculties in the dreamer is controlled more or less completely by the influence of sleep. Without inquiring farther into this latter part of the subject—a very curious and interesting part of it—let us take the theory, roughly and generally, as I have just stated it, and apply it at once to the dream now under consideration." He took up the written paper from the table, and dropped the formal tone (as of a lecturer addressing an audience) into which he had insensibly fallen. "I see one event already in this dream," he resumed, "which I know to be the reproduction of a waking impression produced on Mr. Armadale in my own presence. If he will only help me by exerting his memory, I don't despair of tracing back the whole succession of events set down here to something that he has said or thought, or seen or done, in the four-and-twenty hours, or less, which preceded his falling asleep on the deck of the timber ship."

"I'll exert my memory with the greatest pleasure," said Allan. "Where shall we start from?"

"Start by telling me what you did yesterday, before I met you and your friend on the road to this place," replied Mr. Hawbury. "We will say, you got up and had your breakfast. What next?"

"We took a carriage next," said Allan, "and drove from Castletown to Douglas to see my old friend, Mr. Brock, off by the steamer to Liverpool. We came back to Castletown, and separated at the hotel door. Midwinter went into the house, and I went on to my yacht in the harbor. By-the-by, doctor, remember you have promised to go cruising with us before we leave the Isle of Man."

"Many thanks—but suppose we keep to the matter in hand. What next?"

Allan hesitated. In both senses of the word his mind was at sea already.

"What did you do on board the yacht?"

"Oh, I know! I put the cabin to rights—thoroughly to rights. I give you my word of honor I turned every blessed thing topsy-turvy. And my friend there came off in a shore-boat and helped me. Talking of boats, I have never asked you yet whether your boat came to any harm last night. If there's any damage done I insist on being allowed to repair it."

The doctor abandoned all further attempts at the cultivation of Allan's memory in despair.

"I doubt if we shall be able to reach our object conveniently in this way," he said. "It will be better to take the events of the dream in their regular order, and to ask the questions that naturally suggest themselves as we go on. Here are the first two events to begin with. You dream that your father appears to you—that you and he find yourselves in the cabin of a ship—that the water rises over you, and that you sink in it together. Were you down in the cabin of the wreck, may I ask?"

"I couldn't be down there," replied Allan, "as the cabin was full of water. I looked in and saw it, and shut the door again."

"Very good," said Mr. Hawbury. "Here are the waking impressions clear enough, so far. You have had the cabin in your mind, and you have had the water in your mind; and the sound of the channel current (as I well know without asking) was the last sound in your ears when you went to sleep. The idea of drowning comes too naturally out of such impressions as these to need dwelling on. Is there any thing else before we go on? Yes; there is one more circumstance left to account for."

"The most important circumstance of all," remarked Midwinter, joining in the conversation without stirring from his place at the window.

"You mean the appearance of Mr. Armadale's father? I was just coming to that," answered Mr. Hawbury. "Is your father alive?" he added, addressing himself to Allan once more.

"My father died before I was born."

The doctor started. "This complicates it a little," he said. "How did you know that the figure appearing to you in the dream was the figure of your father?"

Allan hesitated again. Midwinter drew his chair a little away from the window, and looked at the doctor attentively for the first time.

"Was your father in your thoughts before you went to sleep?" pursued Mr. Hawbury. "Was there any description of him—any portrait of him at home—in your mind?"

"Of course there was!" cried Allan, suddenly seizing the lost recollection. "Midwinter! you remember the miniature you found on the floor of the cabin when we were putting the yacht to rights? You said I didn't seem to value it; and I told you I did, because it was a portrait of my father—"

"And was the face in the dream like the face in the miniature?" asked Mr. Hawbury.

"Exactly like! I say, doctor, this is beginning to get interesting!"

"What do you say now?" asked Mr. Hawbury, turning toward the window again.

Midwinter hurriedly left his chair, and placed himself at the table with Allan. Just as he had once already taken refuge from the tyranny of his own superstition in the comfortable common sense of Mr. Brock—so, with the same headlong eagerness, with the same straightforward sincerity of purpose, he now took refuge in the doctor's theory of dreams. "I say what my friend says," he answered, flushing with a sudden enthusiasm; "this is beginning to get interesting. Go on—pray go on."

The doctor looked at his strange guest more indulgently than he had looked yet. "You are the only mystic I have met with," he said, "who is willing to give fair evidence fair play. I don't despair of converting you before our inquiry comes to an end. Let us go on to the next set of events," he resumed, after referring for a moment to the manuscript. "The interval of oblivion which is described as succeeding the first of the appearances in the dream may be easily disposed of. It means, in plain English, the momentary cessation of the brain's intellectual action, while a deeper wave of sleep flows over it, just as the sense of being alone in the darkness, which follows, indicates the renewal of that action previous to the reproduction of another set of impressions. Let us see what they are. A lonely pool, surrounded by an open country; a sunset sky on the farther side of the pool; and the shadow of a woman on the near side. Very good; now for it, Mr. Armadale! How did that pool get into your head? The open country you saw on your way from Castletown to this place. But we have no pools or lakes hereabouts; and you can have seen none recently elsewhere, for you came here after a cruise at sea. Must we fall back on a picture, or a book, or a conversation with your friend?"

Allan looked at Midwinter. "I don't remember talking about pools or lakes," he said. "Do you?"

Instead of answering the question, Midwinter suddenly appealed to the doctor.

"Have you got the last number of the Manx newspaper?" he asked.

The doctor produced it from the side-board. Midwinter turned to the page containing those extracts from the recently published Travels in Australia, which had roused Allan's interest on the previous evening, and the reading of which had ended by sending his friend to sleep. There—in the passage describing the sufferings of the travelers from thirst, and the subsequent discovery which saved their lives—there, appearing at the climax of the narrative, was the broad pool of water which had figured in Allan's dream!

"Don't put away the paper," said the doctor, when Midwinter had shown it to him, with the necessary explanation. "Before we are at the end of the inquiry it is quite possible we may want that extract again. We have got at the pool. How about the sunset? Nothing of that sort is referred to in the newspaper extract. Search your memory again, Mr. Armadale; we want your waking impression of a sunset, if you please."

Once more, Allan was at a loss for an answer; and, once more, Midwinter's ready memory helped him through the difficulty.

"I think I can trace our way back to this impression, as I traced our way back to the other," he said, addressing the doctor. "After we got here yesterday afternoon my friend and I took a long walk over the hills—"

"That's it!" interposed Allan. "I remember. The sun was setting as we came back to the hotel for supper—and it was such a splendid red sky we both stopped to look at it. And then we talked about Mr. Brock, and wondered how far he had got on his journey home. My memory may be a slow one at starting, doctor; but when it's once set going, stop it if you can! I haven't half done yet."

"Wait one minute, in mercy to Mr. Midwinter's memory and mine," said the doctor. "We have traced back to your waking impressions the vision of the open country, the pool, and the sunset. But the Shadow of the Woman has not been accounted for yet. Can you find us the original of this mysterious figure in the dream-landscape?"

Allan relapsed into his former perplexity, and Midwinter waited for what was to come, with his eyes fixed in breathless interest on the doctor's face. For the first time there was unbroken silence in the room. Mr. Hawbury looked interrogatively from Allan to Allan's friend. Neither of them answered him. Between the shadow and the shadow's substance there was a great gulf of mystery, impenetrable alike to all three of them.

"Patience," said the doctor, composedly. "Let us leave the figure by the pool for the present, and try if we can't pick her up again as we go on. Allow me to observe, Mr. Midwinter, that it is not very easy to identify a shadow; but we won't despair. This impalpable lady of the lake may take some consistency when we next meet with her."

Midwinter made no reply. From that moment his interest in the inquiry began to flag.

"What is the next scene in the dream?" pursued Mr. Hawbury, referring to the manuscript. "Mr. Armadale finds himself in a room. He is standing before a long window opening on a lawn and flower-garden, and the rain is pattering against the glass. The only thing he sees in the room is a little statue; and the only company he has is the Shadow of a Man standing opposite to him. The Shadow stretches out its arm, and the statue falls in fragments on the floor; and the dreamer, in anger and distress at the catastrophe (observe, gentlemen, that here the sleeper's reasoning faculty wakes up a little, and the dream passes rationally, for a moment, from cause to effect), stoops to look at the broken pieces. When he looks up again the scene has vanished. That is to say, in the ebb and flow of sleep it is the turn of the flow now, and the brain rests a little. What's the matter, Mr. Armadale? Has that restive memory of yours run away with you again?"

"Yes," said Allan. "I'm off at full gallop. I've run the broken statue to earth; it's nothing more nor less than a china shepherdess I knocked off the mantle-piece in the hotel coffee-room when I rang the bell for supper last night. I say, how well we get on; don't we? It's like guessing a riddle. Now then, Midwinter! your turn next."

"No!" said the doctor. "My turn, if you please. I claim the long window, the garden, and the lawn as my property. You will find the long window, Mr. Armadale, in the next room. If you look out, you'll see the garden and lawn in front of it—and, if you'll exert that wonderful memory of yours, you will recollect that you were good enough to take special and complimentary notice of my smart French window and my neat garden when I drove you and your friend to Port St. Mary yesterday.

"Quite right," rejoined Allan, "so I did. But what about the rain that fell in the dream? I haven't seen a drop of rain for the last week."

Mr. Hawbury hesitated. The Manx newspaper which had been left on the table caught his eye. "If we can think of nothing else," he said, "let us try if we can't find the idea of the rain where we found the idea of the pool." He looked through the extract carefully. "I have got it!" he exclaimed. "Here is rain described as having fallen on these thirsty Australian travelers before they discovered the pool. Behold the shower, Mr. Armadale, which got into your mind when you read the extract to your friend last night! And behold the dream, Mr. Midwinter, mixing up separate waking impressions just as usual!"

"Can you find the waking impression which accounts for the human figure at the window?" asked Midwinter; "or, are we to pass over the Shadow of the Man as we have passed over the Shadow of the Woman already?"

He put the question with scrupulous courtesy of manner, but with a tone of sarcasm in his voice which caught the doctor's ear, and set up the doctor's controversial bristles on the instant.

"When you are picking up shells on the beach, Mr. Midwinter, you usually begin with the shells that lie nearest at hand," he rejoined. "We are picking up facts now; and those that are easiest to get at are the facts we will take first. Let the Shadow of the Man and the Shadow of the Woman pair off together for the present; we won't lose sight of them, I promise you. All in good time, my dear Sir; all in good time!"

He too was polite, and he too was sarcastic. The short truce between the opponents was at an end already. Midwinter returned significantly to his former place by the window. The doctor instantly turned his back on the window more significantly still. Allan, who never quarreled with any body's opinion, and never looked below the surface of any body's conduct, drummed cheerfully on the table with the handle of his knife. "Go on, doctor!" he called out; "my wonderful memory is as fresh as ever."

"Is it?" said Mr. Hawbury, referring again to the narrative of the dream. "Do you remember what happened when you and I were gossiping with the landlady at the bar of the hotel last night?"

"Of course I do! You were kind enough to hand me a glass of brandy-and-water, which the landlady had just mixed for your own drinking. And I was obliged to refuse it because, as I told you, the taste of brandy always turns me sick and faint, mix it how you please."

"Exactly so," returned the doctor. "And here is the incident reproduced in the dream. You see the man's shadow and the woman's shadow together this time. You hear the pouring out of liquid (brandy from the hotel bottle, and water from the hotel jug); the glass is handed by the woman-shadow (the landlady) to the man-shadow (myself); the man-shadow hands it to you (exactly what I did); and the faintness (which you had previously described to me) follows in due course. I am shocked to identify these mysterious Appearances, Mr. Midwinter, with such miserably unromantic originals as a woman who keeps a hotel and a man who physics a country district. But your friend himself will tell you that the glass of brandy-and-water was prepared by the landlady, and that it reached him by passing from her hand to mine. We have picked up the shadows, exactly as I anticipated; and we have only to account now—which may be done in two words—for the manner of their appearance in the dream. After having tried to introduce the waking impression of the doctor and the landlady separately, in connection with the wrong set of circumstances, the dreaming mind comes right at the third trial, and introduces the doctor and the landlady together, in connection with the right set of circumstances. There it is in a nut-shell! Permit me to hand you back the manuscript, with my best thanks for your very complete and striking confirmation of the rational theory of dreams." Saying those words, Mr. Hawbury returned the written paper to Midwinter, with the pitiless politeness of a conquering man.

"Wonderful! not a point missed any where from beginning to end! By Jupiter!" cried Allan, with the ready reverence of intense ignorance. "What a thing science is!"

"Not a point missed, as you say," remarked the doctor, complacently. "And yet I doubt if we have succeeded in convincing your friend."

"You have not convinced me," said Midwinter. "But I don't presume on that account to say that you are wrong."

He spoke quietly, almost sadly. The terrible conviction of the supernatural origin of the dream, from which he had tried to escape, had possessed itself of him again. All his interest in the argument was at an end; all his sensitiveness to its irritating influences was gone. In the case of any other man Mr. Hawbury would have been mollified by such a concession as his adversary had now made to him, but he disliked Midwinter too cordially to leave him in the peaceable enjoyment of an opinion of his own.

"Do you admit," asked the doctor, more pugnaciously than ever, "that I have traced back every event of the dream to a waking impression which preceded it in Mr. Armadale's mind?"

"I have no wish to deny that you have done so," said Midwinter, resignedly.

"Have I identified the Shadows with their living originals?"

"You have identified them to your own satisfaction, and to my friend's satisfaction. Not to mine."

"Not to yours? Can you identify them?"

"No. I can only wait till the living originals stand revealed in the future."

"Spoken like an oracle, Mr. Midwinter! Have you any idea at present of who those living originals may be?"

"I have. I believe that coming events will identify the Shadow of the Woman with a person whom my friend has not met with yet; and the Shadow of the Man with myself."

Allan attempted to speak. The doctor stopped him.

"Let us clearly understand this," he said to Midwinter. "Leaving your own case out of the question for the moment, may I ask how a shadow, which has no distinguishing mark about it, is to be identified with a living woman whom your friend doesn't know?"

Midwinter's color rose a little. He began to feel the lash of the doctor's logic.

"The landscape-picture of the dream has its distinguishing marks," he replied. "And in that landscape the living woman will appear when the living woman is first seen."

"The same thing will happen, I suppose," pursued the doctor, "with the man-shadow which you persist in identifying with yourself. You will be associated in the future with a statue broken in your friend's presence, with a long window looking out on a garden, and with a shower of rain pattering against the glass? Do you say that?"

"I say that."

"And so again, I presume, with the next vision? You and the mysterious woman will be brought together in some place now unknown, and will present to Mr. Armadale some liquid yet unnamed, which will turn him faint?—Do you seriously tell me you believe this?"

"I seriously tell you I believe it."

"And, according to your view, these fulfillments of the dream will mark the progress of certain coming events, in which Mr. Armadale's happiness or Mr. Armadale's safety will be dangerously involved?"

"That is my firm conviction."

The doctor rose—laid aside his moral dissecting-knife—considered for a moment—and took it up again.

"One last question," he said. "Have you any reason to give for going out of your way to adopt such a mystical view as this, when an unanswerably rational explanation of the dream lies straight before you?"

"No reason," replied Midwinter, "that I can give, either to you or to my friend."

The doctor looked at his watch with the air of a man who is suddenly reminded that he has been wasting his time.

"We have no common ground to start from," he said; "and if we talked till doomsday we should not agree. Excuse my leaving you rather abruptly. It is later than I thought, and my morning's batch of sick people are waiting for me in the surgery. I have convinced your mind, Mr. Armadale, at any rate; so the time we have given to this discussion has not been altogether lost. Pray stop here and smoke your cigar. I shall be at your service again in less than an hour." He nodded cordially to Allan, bowed formally to Midwinter, and quitted the room.

As soon as the doctor's back was turned Allan left his place at the table, and appealed to his friend with that irresistible heartiness of manner which had always found its way to Midwinter's sympathies from the first day when they met at the Somersetshire inn.

"Now the sparring-match between you and the doctor is over," said Allan, "I have got two words to say on my side. Will you do something for my sake which you won't do for your own?"

Midwinter's face brightened instantly. "I will do any thing you ask me," he said.

"Very well. Will you let the subject of the dream drop out of our talk altogether from this time forth?"

"Yes, if you wish it."

"Will you go a step further? Will you leave off thinking about the dream?"

"It's hard to leave off thinking about it, Allan. But I will try."

"That's a good fellow! Now give me that trumpery bit of paper, and let's tear it up, and have done with it."

He tried to snatch the manuscript out of his friend's hand; but Midwinter was too quick for him, and kept it beyond his reach.

"Come! come!" pleaded Allan. "I've set my heart on lighting my cigar with it."

Midwinter hesitated painfully. It was hard to resist Allan; but he did resist him. "I'll wait a little," he said, "before you light your cigar with it."

"How long? Till to-morrow?"

"Longer."

"Till we leave the Isle of Man?"

"Longer."

"Hang it—give me a plain answer to a plain question! How long will you wait?"

Midwinter carefully restored the paper to its place in his pocket-book.

"I'll wait," he said, "till we get to Thorpe-Ambrose."

THE END OF THE SECOND BOOK.

OLD LETTERS.

FAIR with the fairness of Dead Sea fruit;
True with the truth of a siren's smile;
Instinct with soul as an unplayed lute;
Expert of fraud as a serpent's wile—

If she to-morrow will wed for gold,
Flouting the rite with a perjured vow,
Shall not the new take the place of the old;
The sun of the then quit the ice of the now?

Ah! did he love her? He said so, in sooth;
And she made him say it in mazed surprise:
He swore to his honor to make it truth;
And his true heart clave to her heart of lies.

Was there no churl of her own degree,
No upstart churl with new acres broad,
To come at her call and her slave to be,
Till land married land in the fane of God?

Such were in plenty, for she had gold—
Such is the man she will wed to-morrow;
But she had a fancy that wealth untold,
That fathomless mine, a heart, to borrow.

To borrow, to borrow, but not to keep—
That were to hold it all too dear;
For practice, her hands its strings should sweep,
Her ears the full tones of its music hear.

Resolved, for a season she turned away
From senseless clowns with new acres broad;
Giving the poor and the proud his day,
Whose wealth was his brain and trust in God.

She made up her eyes to the depth of pools
Of love in the midst of her beauty's glare:
Fledged with new honors, flushed from the schools,
How should a young man know to beware?

Ah! did he love her? He said so, in sooth;
And she trapped him to say it in mazed surprise:
He said it, and swore to make it truth;
And his true heart clave to her heart of lies.

Will she break it now—the heart she trepanned?
May Heaven forefend! though a spell she throw Round it of ice, pray a magic hand
May touch it and bid its streams reflow!

If she to-morrow will wed for gold,
Flouting the rite with a perjured vow,
Should not the new take the place of the old?
Where are her thoughts and her fancies now?

Thrice hath the letter she holds been read—
Hath she been snared in her own device?
Why linger now o'er the hopes that are dead?
Let them be tombed with her artifice.

Ah! Memory whispers her hopes and fears,
Her anguish of doubt, till that letter came;
How the writer professed to her bliss and tears
She had lit once, forever, a vestal flame.

The spectacled Prudence, her mother, is kind!
Patient and kind to the griefs of youth;
She will wink at a heart-throb or pang till she's blind,
So her child be but true to her untruth!

Culled from the rubbish doomed to be burned,
Of scandal, of fashion, of fête and fair;
Alas! is his love, with his letters, returned,
Coiled round a lock of her worthless hair?

He recks not. Why should he? Both to the fire!
Of her future this prayer the grace shall be:
"God send my sons be not like their sire!
God send my daughters be not like me!"

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

IN FOUR BOOKS.—BOOK THE SECOND. BIRDS OF A FEATHER.

CHAPTER XIV.

STRONG OF PURPOSE.

THE sexton-task of piling earth above John Harmon all night long was not conducive to sound sleep; but Rokesmith had some broken morning rest, and rose strengthened in his purpose. It was all over now. No ghost should trouble Mr. and Mrs. Boffin's peace; invisible and voiceless, the ghost should look on for a little while longer at the state of existence out of which it had departed, and then should forever cease to haunt the scenes in which it had no place.

He went over it all again. He had lapsed into the condition in which he found himself, as many a man lapses into many a condition, without perceiving the accumulative power of its separate circumstances. When in the distrust engendered by his wretched childhood and the action for evil—never yet for good within his knowledge then—of his father and his father's wealth on all within their influence, he conceived the idea of his first deception, it was meant to be harmless, it was to last but a few hours or days, it was to involve in it only the girl so capriciously forced upon him, and upon whom he was so capriciously forced, and it was honestly meant well toward her. For if he had found her unhappy in the prospect of that marriage (through her heart inclining to another man or for any other cause), he would seriously have said: "This is another of the old perverted uses of the misery-making money. I will let it go to my and my sister's only protectors and friends." When the snare into which he fell so outstripped his first intention as that he found himself placarded by the police authorities upon the London walls for dead, he confusedly accepted the aid that fell upon him, without considering how firmly it must seem to fix the Boffins in their accession to the fortune. When he saw them, and knew them, and even from his vantageground of inspection could find no flaw in them, he asked himself, "And shall I come to life to dispossess such people as these?" There was no good to set against the putting of them to that hard proof. He had heard from Bella's own lips when he stood tapping at the door on that night of his taking the lodgings, that the marriage would have been on her part thoroughly mercenary. He had since tried her, in his own unknown person and supposed station, and she not only rejected his advances but resented them. Was it for him to have the shame of buying her, or the meanness of punishing her? Yet, by coming to life, and accepting the condition of the inheritance, he must do the former; and by coming to life and rejecting it, he must do the latter.

Another consequence that he had never foreshadowed, was the implication of an innocent man in his supposed murder. He would obtain complete retraction from the accuser, and set the wrong right; but clearly the wrong could never have been done if he had never planned a deception. Then, whatever inconvenience or distress of mind the deception cost him, it was manful repentantly to accept as among its consequences, and make no complaint.

Thus John Rokesmith in the morning, and it buried John Harmon still many fathoms deeper than he had been buried in the night.

Going out earlier than he was accustomed to do, he encountered the cherub at the door. The cherub's way was for a certain space his way, and they walked together.

It was impossible not to notice the change in the cherub's appearance. The cherub felt very conscious of it, and modestly remarked: "A present from my daughter Bella, Mr. Rokesmith."

The words gave the Secretary a stroke of pleasure, for he remembered the fifty pounds, and he still loved the girl. No doubt it was very weak—it always is very weak, some authorities hold—but he loved the girl.

"I don't know whether you happen to have read many books of African Travel, Mr. Rokesmith?" said R. W.

"I have read several."

"Well, you know, there's usually a King George, or a King Boy, or a King Sambo, or a King Bill, or Bull, or Rum, or Junk, or whatever name the sailors may have happened to give him."

"Where?" asked Rokesmith.

"Any where. Any where in Africa, I mean. Pretty well every where, I may say; for black kings are cheap—and I think"—said R. W., with an apologetic air, "nasty."

"I am much of your opinion, Mr. Wilfer. You were going to say—?"

"I was going to say, the king is generally dressed in a London hat only, or a Manchester pair of braces, or one epaulet, or a uniform coat with his legs in the sleeves, or something of that kind."

"Just so," said the Secretary.

"In confidence, I assure you, Mr. Rokesmith," observed the cheerful cherub, "that when more of my family were at home and to be provided for, I used to remind myself immensely of that king. You have no idea, as a single man, of the difficulty I have had in wearing more than one good article at a time."

"I can easily believe it, Mr. Wilfer."

"I only mention it," said R. W. in the warmth of his heart, "as a proof of the amiable, delicate, and considerate affection of my daughter Bella. If she had been a little spoiled, I couldn't have thought so very much of it, under the circumstances. But no, not a bit. And she is so very pretty! I hope you agree with me in finding her very pretty, Mr. Rokesmith?"

"Certainly I do. Every one must."

"I hope so," said the cherub. "Indeed, I have no doubt of it. This is a great advancement for her in life, Mr. Rokesmith. A great opening of her prospects."

"Miss Wilfer could have no better friends than Mr. and Mrs. Boffin."

"Impossible!" said the grateful cherub. "Really I begin to think things are very well as they are. If Mr. John Harmon had lived—"

"He is better dead," said the Secretary.

"No, I won't go so far as to say that," urged the cherub, a little remonstrant against the very decisive and un pitying tone; "but he mightn't have suited Bella, or Bella mightn't have suited him, or fifty things, whereas now I hope she can choose for herself."

"Has she—as you place the confidence in me of speaking on the subject, you will excuse my asking—has she—perhaps—chosen?" faltered the Secretary.

"Oh dear no!" returned R. W.

"Young ladies sometimes," Rokesmith hinted, "choose without mentioning their choice to their fathers."

"Not in this case, Mr. Rokesmith. Between my daughter Bella and me there is a regular league and covenant of confidence. It was ratified only the other day. The ratification dates from—these," said the cherub, giving a little pull at the lappels of his coat and the pockets of his trowsers. "Oh no, she has not chosen. To be sure, young George Sampson, in the days when Mr. John Harmon—"

"Who I wish had never been born!" said the Secretary, with a gloomy brow.

R. W. looked at him with surprise, as thinking he had contracted an unaccountable spite against the poor deceased, and continued: "In the days when Mr. John Harmon was being sought out, young George Sampson certainly was hovering about Bella, and Bella let him hover. But it never was seriously thought of, and it's still less than ever to be thought of now. For Bella is ambitious, Mr. Rokesmith, and I think I may predict will marry fortune. This time, you see, she will have the person and the property before her together, and will be able to make her choice with her eyes open. This is my road. I am very sorry to part company so soon. Good-morning, Sir!"

The Secretary pursued his way, not very much elevated in spirits by this conversation, and, arriving at the Boffin mansion, found Betty Higden waiting for him.

"I should thank you kindly, Sir," said Betty, "if I might make so bold as have a word or two wi' you."

She should have as many words as she liked, he told her; and took her into his room, and made her sit down.

"'Tis concerning Sloppy, Sir," said Betty. "And that's how I come here by myself. Not wishing him to know what I'm a-going to say to you, I got the start of him early and walked up."

"You have wonderful energy," returned Rokesmith. "You are as young as I am."

Betty Higden gravely shook her head. "I am strong for my time of life, Sir, but not young, thank the Lord!"

"Are you thankful for not being young?"

"Yes, Sir. If I was young, it would all have to be gone through again, and the end would be a weary way off, don't you see? But never mind me; 'tis concerning Sloppy."

"And what about him, Betty?"

"'Tis just this, Sir. It can't be reasoned out of his head by any powers of mine but what that he can do right by your kind lady and gentleman and do his work for me, both together. Now he can't. To give himself up to being put in the way of arning a good living and getting on, he must give me up. Well; he won't."

"I respect him for it," said Rokesmith.

"Do ye, Sir? I don't know but what I do myself. Still that don't make it right to let him have his way. So as he won't give me up, I'm a-going to give him up."

"How, Betty?"

"I'm a-going to run away from him."

With an astonished look at the indomitable old face and the bright eyes the Secretary repeated, "Run away from him?"

"Yes, Sir," said Betty, with one nod. And in the nod and in the firm set of her mouth there was a vigor of purpose not to be doubted.

"Come, come!" said the Secretary. "We must talk about this. Let us take our time over it, and try to get at the true sense of the case and the true course, by degrees."

"Now, lookee here, my dear," returned old Betty—"asking your excuse for being so familiar, but being of a time of life a'most to be your grandmother twice over. Now, lookee here. 'Tis a poor living and a hard as is to be got out of this work that I'm a doing now, and but for Sloppy I don't know as I should have held to it this long. But it did just keep us on, the two together. Now that I'm alone—with even Johnny gone—I'd far sooner be upon my feet and tiring of myself out, than a sitting folding and folding by the fire. And I'll tell you why. There's a deadness steals over me at times, that the kind of life favors and I don't like. Now, I seem to have Johnny in my arms—now, his mother—now, his mother's mother—now, I seem to be a child myself, a lying once again in the arms of my own mother—then I get numbed, thought and senses, till I start out of my seat, afeerd that I'm a growing like the poor old people that they brick up in the Unions, as you may sometimes see when they let 'em out of the four walls to have a warm in the sun, crawling quite scared about the streets. I was a nimble girl, and have always been a active body, as I told your lady, first time ever I see her good face. I can still walk twenty mile if I am put to it. I'd far better be a walking than a getting numbed and dreary. I'm a good fair knitter, and can make many little things to sell. The loan from your lady and gentleman of twenty shillings to fit out a basket with would be a fortune for me. Trudging round the country and tiring of myself out, I shall keep the deadness off, and get my own bread by my own labor. And what more can I want?"

"And this is your plan," said the Secretary, "for running away?"

"Show me a better! My deary, show me a better! Why, I know very well," said old Betty Higden, "and you know very well, that your lady and gentleman would set me up like a queen for the rest of my life, if so be that we could make it right among us to have it so. But we can't make it right among us to have it so. I've never took charity yet, nor yet has any one belonging to me. And it would be forsaking of myself indeed, and forsaking of my children dead and gone, and forsaking of their children dead and gone, to set up a contradiction now at last."

"It might come to be justifiable and unavoidable at last," the Secretary gently hinted, with a slight stress on the word.

"I hope it never will! It ain't that I mean to give offense by being anyways proud," said the old creature, simply, "but that I want to be of a piece like, and helpful of myself right through to my death."

"And to be sure," added the Secretary, as a comfort for her, "Sloppy will be eagerly looking forward to his opportunity of being to you what you have been to him."

"Trust him for that, Sir!" said Betty, cheerfully. "Though he had need to be something quick about it, for I'm a getting to be an old one. But I'm a strong one too, and travel and weather never hurt me yet! Now, be so kind as speak for me to your lady and gentleman, and tell 'em what I ask of their good friendliness to let me do, and why I ask it."

The Secretary felt that there was no gain-saying what was urged by this brave old heroine, and he presently repaired to Mrs. Boffin and recommended her to let Betty Higden have her way, at all events for the time. "It would be far more satisfactory to your kind heart, I know," he said, "to provide for her, but it may be a duty to respect this independent spirit." Mrs. Boffin was not proof against the consideration set before her. She and her husband had worked too, and had brought their simple faith and honor clean out of dust-heaps. If they owed a duty to Betty Higden, of a surety that duty must be done.

"But, Betty," said Mrs. Boffin, when she accompanied John Rokesmith back to his room, and shone upon her with the light of her radiant face, "granted all else, I think I wouldn't run away."

"'Twould come easier to Sloppy," said Mrs. Higden, shaking her head. "'Twould come easier to me too. But 'tis as you please."

"When would you go?"

"Now," was the bright and ready answer. "To-day, my deary, to-morrow. Bless ye, I am used to it. I know many parts of the country well. When nothing else was to be done I have worked in many a market-garden afore now, and in many a hop-garden too."

"If I give my consent to your going, Betty—which Mr. Rokesmith thinks I ought to do—"

Betty thanked him with a grateful courtesy.

"—We must not lose sight of you. We must not let you pass out of our knowledge. We must know all about you."

"Yes, my deary, but not through letter-writing, because letter-writing—indeed, writing of most sorts—hadn't much come up for such as me when I was young. But I shall be to and fro. No fear of my missing a chance of giving myself a sight of your reviving face. Besides," said Betty, with logical good faith, "I shall have a debt to pay off, by littles, and naturally that would bring me back if nothing else would."

"Must it be done?" asked Mrs. Boffin, still reluctant, of the Secretary.

"I think it must."

After more discussion it was agreed that it should be done, and Mrs. Boffin summoned Bella to note down the little purchases that were necessary to set Betty up in trade. "Don't ye be timorous for me, my dear," said the stanch old heart, observant of Bella's face: "when I take my seat with my work, clean and busy and fresh, in a country market-place, I shall turn a sixpence as sure as ever a farmer's wife there."

The Secretary took that opportunity of touching on the practical question of Mr. Sloppy's capabilities. He would have made a wonderful cabinet-maker, said Mrs. Higden, "if there had been the money to put him to it." She had seen him handle tools that he had borrowed to mend the mangle, or to knock a broken piece of furniture together, in a surprising manner. As to constructing toys for the Minders, out of nothing, he had done that daily. And once as many as a dozen people had got together in the lane to see the neatness with which he fitted the broken pieces of a foreign monkey's musical instrument. "That's well," said the Secretary. "It will not be hard to find a trade for him."

John Harmon being buried under mountains now, the Secretary that very same day set himself to finish his affairs and have done with him. He drew up an ample declaration, to be signed by Rogue Riderhood (knowing he could get his signature to it, by making him another and much shorter evening call), and then considered to whom should he give the document? To Hexam's son, or daughter? Resolved speedily, to the daughter. But it would be safer to avoid seeing the daughter, because the son had seen Julius Handford, and—he could not be too careful—there might possibly be some comparison of notes between the son and daughter, which would awaken slumbering suspicion and lead to consequences. "I might even," he reflected, "be apprehended as having been concerned in my own murder!" Therefore, best to send it to the daughter under cover by the post. Pleasant Riderhood had undertaken to find out where she lived, and it was not necessary that it should be attended by a single word of explanation. So far, straight.

But all that he knew of the daughter he derived from Mrs. Boffin's accounts of what she heard from Mr. Lightwood, who seemed to have a reputation for his manner of relating a story, and to have made this story quite his own. It interested him, and he would like to have the means of knowing more—as, for instance, that she received the exonerating paper, and that it satisfied her—by opening some channel altogether independent of Lightwood: who likewise had seen Julius Handford, who had publicly advertised for Julius Handford, and whom of all men he, the Secretary, most avoided. "But with whom the common course of things might bring me in a moment face to face any day in the week or any hour in the day."

Now, to cast about for some likely means of opening such a channel. The boy, Hexam, was training for and with a schoolmaster. The Secretary knew it, because his sister's share in that disposal of him seemed to be the best part of Lightwood's account of the family. This young fellow, Sloppy, stood in need of some instruction. If he, the Secretary, engaged that schoolmaster to impart it to him the channel might be opened. The next point was, did Mrs. Boffin know the schoolmaster's name? No, but she knew where the school was. Quite enough. Promptly the Secretary wrote to the master of that school, and that very evening Bradley Headstone answered in person.

The Secretary stated to the schoolmaster how the object was, to send to him for certain occasional evening instruction, a youth whom Mr. and Mrs. Boffin wished to help to an industrious and useful place in life. The schoolmaster was willing to undertake the charge of such a pupil. The Secretary inquired on what terms? The schoolmaster stated on what terms. Agreed and disposed of.

"May I ask, Sir," said Bradley Headstone, "to whose good opinion I owe a recommendation to you?"

"You should know that I am not the principal here. I am Mr. Boffin's Secretary. Mr. Boffin is a gentleman who inherited a property of which you may have heard some public mention: the Harmon property."

"Mr. Harmon," said Bradley: who would have been a great deal more at a loss than he was, if he had known to whom he spoke: "was murdered, and found in the river."

"Was murdered, and found in the river."

"It was not—"

"No," interposed the Secretary, smiling, "it was not he who recommended you. Mr. Boffin heard of you through a certain Mr. Lightwood. I think you know Mr. Lightwood, or know of him?"

"I know as much of him as I wish to know, Sir. I have no acquaintance with Mr. Lightwood, and I desire none. I have no objection to Mr. Lightwood, but I have a particular objection to some of Mr. Lightwood's friends—in short, to one of Mr. Lightwood's friends. His great friend."

He could hardly get the words out, even then and there, so fierce did he grow (though keeping himself down with infinite pains of repression), when the careless and contemptuous bearing of Eugene Wrayburn rose before his mind.

The Secretary saw there was a strong feeling here on some sore point, and he would have made a diversion from it, but for Bradley's holding to it in his cumbersome way.

"I have no objection to mention the friend by name," he said, doggedly. "The person I object to is Mr. Eugene Wrayburn."

The Secretary remembered him. In his disturbed recollection of that night when he was striving against the drugged drink, there was but a dim image of Eugene's person; but he remembered his name, and his manner of speaking, and how he had gone with them to view the body, and where he had stood, and what he had said.

"Pray, Mr. Headstone, what is the name," he asked, again trying to make a diversion, "of young Hexam's sister?"

"Her name is Lizzie," said the schoolmaster, with a strong contraction of his whole face.

"She is a young woman of a remarkable character; is she not?"

"She is sufficiently remarkable to be very superior to Mr. Eugene Wrayburn—though an ordinary person might be that," said the schoolmaster; "and I hope you will not think it impertinent in me, Sir, to ask why you put the two names together?"

"By mere accident," returned the Secretary. "Observing that Mr. Wrayburn was a disagreeable subject with you, I tried to get away from it: though not very successfully, it would appear."

"Do you know Mr. Wrayburn, Sir?"

"No."

"Then perhaps the names can not be put together on the authority of any representation of his?"

"Certainly not."

"I took the liberty to ask," said Bradley, after casting his eyes on the ground, "because he is capable of making any representation, in the swaggering levity of his insolence. I—I hope you will not misunderstand me, Sir. I—I am much interested in this brother and sister, and the subject awakens very strong feelings within me. Very, very strong feelings." With a shaking hand Bradley took out his handkerchief and wiped his brow.

The Secretary thought, as he glanced at the schoolmaster's face, that he had opened a channel here indeed, and that it was an unexpectedly dark and deep and stormy one, and difficult to sound. All at once, in the midst of his turbulent emotions, Bradley stopped and seemed to challenge his look. Much as though he suddenly asked him, "What do you see in me?"

"The brother, young Hexam, was your real recommendation here," said the Secretary, quietly going back to the point; "Mr. and Mrs. Boffin happening to know, through Mr. Lightwood, that he was your pupil. Any thing that I ask respecting the brother and sister, or either of them, I ask for myself, out of my own interest in the subject, and not in my official character, or on Mr. Boffin's behalf. How I come to be interested I need not explain. You know the father's connection with the discovery of Mr. Harmon's body."

"Sir," replied Bradley, very restlessly indeed, "I know all the circumstances of that case."

"Pray tell me, Mr. Headstone," said the Secretary. "Does the sister suffer under any stigma because of the impossible accusation—groundless would be a better word—that was made against the father, and substantially withdrawn?"

"No, Sir," returned Bradley, with a kind of anger.

"I am very glad to hear it."

"The sister," said Bradley, separating his words over-carefully, and speaking as if he were repeating them from a book, "suffers under no reproach that repels a man of unimpeachable character, who has made for himself every step of his way in life, from placing her in his own station. I will not say, raising her to his own station; I say, placing her in it. The sister labors under no reproach, unless she should unfortunately make it for herself. When such a man is not deterred from regarding her as his equal, and when he has convinced himself that there is no blemish on her, I think the fact must be taken to be pretty expressive."

"And there is such a man?" said the Secretary.

Bradley Headstone knotted his brows, and squared his large lower jaw, and fixed his eyes on the ground with an air of determination that seemed unnecessary to the occasion, as he replied: "And there is such a man."

The Secretary had no reason or excuse for prolonging the conversation, and it ended here. Within three hours the oakum-headed apparition once more dived into the Leaving Shop, and that night Rogue Riderhood's recantation lay in the post-office, addressed under cover to Lizzie Hexam at her right address.

All these proceedings occupied John Rokesmith so much that it was not until the following day that he saw Bella again. It seemed then to be tacitly understood between them that they were to be as distantly easy as they could, without attracting the attention of Mr. and Mrs. Boffin to any marked change in their manner. The fitting out of old Betty Higden was favorable to this, as keeping Bella engaged and interested, and as occupying the general attention.

"I think," said Rokesmith, when they all stood about her, while she packed her tidy basket—except Bella, who was busily helping on her knees at the chair on which it stood; "that at least you might keep a letter in your pocket, Mrs. Higden, which I would write for you and date from here, merely stating, in the names of Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, that they are your friends;—I won't say patrons, because they wouldn't like it."

"No, no, no," said Mr. Boffin; "no patronizing! Let's keep out of that, whatever we come to."

"There's more than enough of that about, without us; ain't there, Noddy?" said Mrs. Boffin.

"I believe you, old lady!" returned the Golden Dustman. "Overmuch indeed!"

"But people sometimes like to be patronized; don't they, Sir?" asked Bella, looking up.

"I don't. And if they do, my dear, they ought to learn better," said Mr. Boffin. "Patrons and Patronesses, and Vice-Patrons and Vice-Patronesses, and Deceased Patrons and Deceased Patronesses, and Ex-Vice-Patrons and Ex-Vice-Patronesses, what does it all mean in the books of the Charities that come pouring in on Roke-smith as he sits among 'em pretty well up to his neck! If Mr. Tom Noakes gives his five shillings ain't he a Patron, and if Mrs. Jack Styles gives her five shillings ain't she a Patroness? What the deuce is it all about? If it ain't stark staring impudence, what do you call it?"

"Don't be warm, Noddy," Mrs. Boffin urged.

"Warm!" cried Mr. Boffin. "It's enough to make a man smoking hot. I can't go any where without being Patronized. I don't want to be Patronized. If I buy a ticket for a Flower Show, or a Music Show, or any sort of Show, and pay pretty heavy for it, why am I to be Patroned and Patronessed as if the Patrons and Patronesses treated me? If there's a good thing to be done, can't it be done on its own merits? If there's a bad thing to be done, can it ever be Patroned and Patronessed right? Yet when a new Institution's going to be built, it seems to me that the bricks and mortar ain't made of half so much consequence as the Patrons and Patronesses; no, nor yet the objects. I wish somebody would tell me whether other countries get Patronized to any thing like the extent of this one! And as to the Patrons and Patronesses themselves, I wonder they're not ashamed of themselves. They ain't Pills, or Hair-Washes, or Invigorating Nervous Essences, to be puffed in that way!"

Having delivered himself of these remarks, Mr. Boffin took a trot, according to his usual custom, and trotted back to the spot from which he had started.

"As to the letter, Rokesmith," said Mr. Boffin, "you're as right as a trivet. Give her the letter, make her take the letter, put it in her pocket by violence. She might fall sick.—You know you might fall sick," said Mr. Boffin. "Don't deny it, Mrs. Higden, in your obstinacy; you know you might."

Old Betty laughed, and said that she would take the letter and be thankful.

"That's right!" said Mr. Boffin. "Come! That's sensible. And don't be thankful to us (for we never thought of it), but to Mr. Rokesmith."

The letter was written, and read to her, and given to her.

"Now, how do you feel?" said Mr. Boffin. "Do you like it?"

"The letter, Sir?" said Betty. "Ay, it's a beautiful letter!"

"No, no, no; not the letter," said Mr. Boffin; "the idea. Are you sure you're strong enough to carry out the idea?"

"I shall be stronger, and keep the deadness off better, this way, than any way left open to me, Sir."

"Don't say than any way left open, you know," urged Mr. Boffin; "because there are ways without end. A housekeeper would be acceptable over yonder at the Bower, for instance. Wouldn't you like to see the Bower, and know a retired literary man of the name of Wegg that lives there—with a wooden leg?"

Old Betty was proof even against this temptation, and fell to adjusting her black bonnet and shawl.

"I wouldn't let you go, now it comes to this, after all," said Mr. Boffin, "if I didn't hope that it may make a man and a workman of Sloppy, in as short a time as ever a man and a workman was made yet. Why, what have you got there, Betty? Not a doll?"

It was the man in the Guards who had been on duty over Johnny's bed. The solitary old woman showed what it was, and put it up quietly in her dress. Then she gratefully took leave of Mrs. Boffin, and of Mr. Boffin, and of Rokesmith, and then put her old withered arms round Bella's young and blooming neck, and said, repeating Johnny's words: "A kiss for the boofer lady."

The Secretary looked on from a doorway at the boofer lady thus encircled, and still looked on at the boofer lady standing alone there, when the determined old figure with its steady bright eyes was trudging through the streets, away from paralysis and pauperism.

CHAPTER XV.

THE WHOLE CASE SO FAR.

BRADLEY HEADSTONE held fast by that other interview he was to have with Lizzie Hexam. In stipulating for it he had been impelled by a feeling little short of desperation, and the feeling abided by him. It was very soon after his interview with the Secretary that he and Charley Hexam set out one leaden evening, not unnoticed by Miss Peecher, to have this desperate interview accomplished.

"That dolls' dress-maker," said Bradley, "is favorable neither to me nor to you, Hexam."

"A pert crooked little chit, Mr. Headstone! I knew she would put herself in the way, if she could, and would be sure to strike in with something impertinent. It was on that account that I proposed our going to the City to-night and meeting my sister."

"So I supposed," said Bradley, getting his gloves on his nervous hands as he walked. "So I supposed."

"Nobody but my sister," pursued Charley, "would have found out such an extraordinary companion. She has done it in a ridiculous fancy of giving herself up to another. She told me so that night when we went there."

"Why should she give herself up to the dress-maker?" asked Bradley.

"Oh!" said the boy, coloring. "One of her romantic ideas! I tried to convince her so, but I didn't succeed. However, what we have got to do, is, to succeed to-night, Mr. Headstone, and then all the rest follows."

"You are still sanguine, Hexam."

"Certainly I am, Sir. Why, we have every thing on our side."

"Except your sister, perhaps," thought Bradley. But he only gloomily thought it, and said nothing.

"Every thing on our side," repeated the boy with boyish confidence. "Respectability, an excellent connection for me, common sense, every thing!"

"To be sure, your sister has always shown herself a devoted sister," said Bradley, willing to sustain himself on even that low ground of hope.

"Naturally, Mr. Headstone, I have a good deal of influence with her. And now that you have honored me with your confidence and spoken to me first, I say again, we have every thing on our side."

And Bradley thought again, "Except your sister, perhaps."

A gray dusty withered evening in London city has not a hopeful aspect. The closed warehouses and offices have an air of death about them, and the national dread of color has an air of mourning. The towers and steeples of the many house-encompassed churches, dark and dingy as the sky that seems descending on them, are no relief to the general gloom; a sun-dial on a church-wall has the look, in its useless black shade, of having failed in its business enterprise and stopped payment forever: melancholy waifs and strays of housekeepers and porters sweep melancholy waifs and strays of papers and pins into the kennels, and other more melancholy waifs and strays explore them, searching and stooping and poking for any thing to sell. The set of humanity outward from the City is as a set of prisoners departing from jail, and dismal Newgate seems quite as fit a stronghold for the mighty Lord Mayor as his own state-dwelling.

On such an evening, when the city grit gets into the hair and eyes and skin, and when the fallen leaves of the few unhappy city trees grind down in corners under wheels of wind, the school-master and the pupil emerged upon the Leadenhall Street region, spying eastward for Lizzie. Being something too soon in their arrival they lurked at a corner, waiting for her to appear. The best-looking among us will not look very well lurking at a corner, and Bradley came out of that disadvantage very poorly indeed.

"Here she comes, Mr. Headstone! Let us go forward and meet her."

As they advanced she saw them coming, and seemed rather troubled. But she greeted her brother with the usual warmth, and touched the extended hand of Bradley.

"Why, where are you going, Charley, dear?" she asked him then.

"Nowhere. We came on purpose to meet you."

"To meet me, Charley?"

"Yes. We are going to walk with you. But don't let us take the great leading streets where every one walks, and we can't hear ourselves speak. Let us go by the quiet backways. Here's a large paved court by this church, and quiet, too. Let us go up here."

"But it's not in the way, Charley."

"Yes it is," said the boy, petulantly. "It's in my way, and my way is yours."

She had not released his hand, and, still holding it, looked at him with a kind of appeal. He avoided her eyes, under pretense of saying, "Come along, Mr. Headstone." Bradley walked at his side—not at hers—and the brother and sister walked hand-in-hand. The court brought them to a church-yard; a paved square court, with a raised bank of earth about breast high, in the middle, inclosed by iron rails. Here, conveniently and healthfully elevated above the level of the living, were the dead, and the tombstones; some of the latter droopingly inclined from the perpendicular, as if they were ashamed of the lies they told.

They paced the whole of this place once, in a constrained and uncomfortable manner, when the boy stopped and said:

"Lizzie, Mr. Headstone has something to say to you. I don't wish to be an interruption either to him or to you, and so I'll go and take a little stroll and come back. I know in a general way what Mr. Headstone intends to say, and I very highly approve of it, as I hope—and indeed I do not doubt—you will. I needn't tell you, Lizzie, that I am under great obligations to Mr. Headstone, and that I am very anxious for Mr. Headstone to succeed in all he undertakes. As I hope—and as, indeed, I don't doubt—you must be."

"Charley," returned his sister, detaining his hand as he withdrew it, "I think you had better stay. I think Mr. Headstone had better not say what he thinks of saying."

"Why, how do you know what it is?" returned the boy.

"Perhaps I don't, but—"

"Perhaps you don't? No, Liz, I should think not. If you knew what it was you would give me a very different answer. There; let go; be sensible. I wonder you don't remember that Mr. Headstone is looking on."

She allowed him to separate himself from her, and he, after saying, "Now, Liz, be a rational girl and a good sister," walked away. She remained standing alone with Bradley Headstone, and it was not until she raised her eyes that he spoke.

"I said," he began, "when I saw you last, that there was something unexplained, which might perhaps influence you. I have come this evening to explain it. I hope you will not judge of me by my hesitating manner when I speak to you. You see me at my greatest disadvantage. It is most unfortunate for me that I wish you to see me at my best, and that I know you see me at my worst."

She moved slowly on when he paused, and he moved slowly on beside her.

"It seems egotistical to begin by saying so much about myself," he resumed, "but whatever I say to you seems, even in my own ears, below what I want to say, and different from what I want to say. I can't help it. So it is. You are the ruin of me."

She started at the passionate sound of the last words, and at the passionate action of his hands, with which they were accompanied.

"Yes! you are the ruin—the ruin—the ruin—of me. I have no resources in myself, I have no confidence in myself, I have no government of myself when you are near me or in my thoughts. And you are always in my thoughts now. I have never been quit of you since I first saw you.

Oh, that was a wretched day for me! That was a wretched, miserable day!"

A touch of pity for him mingled with her dislike of him, and she said: "Mr. Headstone, I am grieved to have done you any harm, but I have never meant it."

"There!" he cried, despairingly. "Now I seem to have reproached you, instead of revealing to you the state of my own mind! Bear with me. I am always wrong when you are in question. It is my doom."

Struggling with himself, and by times looking up at the deserted windows of the houses as if there could be any thing written in their grimy panes that would help him, he paced the whole pavement at her side before he spoke again.

"I must try to give expression to what is in my mind; it shall and must be spoken. Though you see me so confounded—though you strike me so helpless—I ask you to believe that there are many people who think well of me; that there are some people who highly esteem me; that I have in my way won a station which is considered worth winning."

"Surely, Mr. Headstone, I do believe it. Surely I have always known it from Charley."

"I ask you to believe that if I were to offer my home such as it is, my station such as it is, my affections such as they are, to any one of the best considered, and best qualified, and most distinguished, among the young women engaged in my calling, they would probably be accepted. Even readily accepted."

"I do not doubt it," said Lizzie, with her eyes upon the ground.

"I have sometimes had it in my thoughts to make that offer and to settle down as many men of my class do: I on the one side of a school, my wife on the other, both of us interested in the same work."

"Why have you not done so?" asked Lizzie Hexam. "Why do you not do so?"

"Far better that I never did! The only one grain of comfort I have had these many weeks," he said, always speaking passionately, and, when most emphatic, repeating that former action of his hands, which was like flinging his heart's-blood down before her in drops upon the pavement stones; "the only one grain of comfort I have had these many weeks is, that I never did. For if I had, and if the same spell had come upon me for my ruin, I know I should have broken that tie asunder as if it had been thread."

She glanced at him with a glance of fear, and a shrinking gesture. He answered, as if she had spoken.

"No! It would not have been voluntary on my part, any more than it is voluntary in me to be here now. You draw me to you. If I were shut up in a strong prison you would draw me out. I should break through the wall to come to you. If I were lying on a sick bed you would draw me up—to stagger to your feet and fall there."

The wild energy of the man, now quite let loose, was absolutely terrible. He stopped and laid his hand upon a piece of the coping of the burial-ground inclosure, as if he would have dislodged the stone.

"No man knows till the time comes what depths are within him. To some men it never comes; let them rest and be thankful! To me, you brought it; on me, you forced it; and the bottom of this raging sea," striking himself upon the breast, "has been heaved up ever since."

"Mr. Headstone, I have heard enough. Let me stop you here. It will be better for you and better for me. Let us find my brother."

"Not yet. It shall and must be spoken. I have been in torments ever since I stopped short of it before. You are alarmed. It is another of my miseries that I can not speak to you or speak of you without stumbling at every syllable, unless I let the check go altogether and run mad. Here is a man lighting the lamps. He will be gone directly. I entreat of you let us walk round this place again. You have no reason to look alarmed; I can restrain myself, and I will."

She yielded to the entreaty—how could she do otherwise!—and they paced the stones in silence. One by one the lights leaped up, making the cold gray church-tower more remote, and they were alone again. He said no more until they had regained the spot where he had broken off: there, he again stood still, and again grasped the stone. In saying what he said then he never looked at her; but looked at it and wrenched at it.

"You know what I am going to say. I love you. What other men may mean when they use that expression I can not tell; what I mean is, that I am under the influence of some tremendous attraction which I have resisted in vain, and which overmasters me. You could draw me to fire, you could draw me to water, you could draw me to the gallows, you could draw me to any death, you could draw me to any thing I have most avoided, you could draw me to any exposure and disgrace. This and the confusion of my thoughts, so that I am fit for nothing, is what I mean by your being the ruin of me. But if you would return a favorable answer to my offer of myself in marriage, you could draw me to any good—every good—with equal force. My circumstances are quite easy, and you would want for nothing. My reputation stands quite high, and would be a shield for yours. If you saw me at my work, able to do it well and respected in it, you might even come to take a sort of pride in me;—I would try hard that you should. Whatever considerations I may have thought of against this offer I have conquered, and I make it with all my heart. Your brother favors me to the utmost, and it is likely that we might live and work together; any how, it is certain that he would have my best influence and support. I don't know that I could say more if I tried. I might only weaken what is ill enough said as it is. I only add that if it is any claim on you to be in earnest, I am in thorough earnest, dreadful earnest."

The powdered mortar from under the stone at which he wrenched rattled on the pavement to confirm his words.

"Mr. Headstone—"

"Stop! I implore you, before you answer me, to walk round this place once more. It will give you a minute's time to think, and me a minute's time to get some fortitude together."

Again she yielded to the entreaty, and again they came back to the same place, and again he worked at the stone.

"Is it," he said, with his attention apparently engrossed by it, "yes, or no?"

"Mr. Headstone, I thank you sincerely, I thank you gratefully, and hope you may find a worthy wife before long and be very happy. But it is no."

"Is no short time necessary for reflection; no weeks or days?" he asked, in the same half-suffocated way.

"None whatever."

"Are you quite decided, and is there no chance of any change in my favor?"

"I am quite decided, Mr. Headstone, and I am bound to answer I am certain there is none."

"Then," said he, suddenly changing his tone and turning to her, and bringing his clenched hand down upon the stone with a force that laid the knuckles raw and bleeding; "then I hope that I may never kill him!"

The dark look of hatred and revenge with which the words broke from his livid lips, and with which he stood holding out his smeared hand as if it held some weapon and had just struck a mortal blow, made her so afraid of him that she turned to run away. But he caught her by the arm.

"Mr. Headstone, let me go. Mr. Headstone, I must call for help!"

"It is I who should call for help," he said; "you don't know yet how much I need it."

The working of his face as she shrank from it, glancing round for her brother and uncertain what to do, might have extorted a cry from her in another instant; but all at once he sternly stopped it and fixed it, as if Death itself had done so.

"There! You see I have recovered myself. Hear me out."

With much of the dignity of courage, as she recalled her self-reliant life and her right to be free from accountability to this man, she released her arm from his grasp and stood looking full at him. She had never been so handsome, in his eyes. A shade came over them while he looked back at her, as if she drew the very light out of them to herself.

"This time, at least, I will leave nothing unsaid," he went on, folding his hands before him, clearly to prevent his being betrayed into any impetuous gesture; "this last time at least I will not be tortured with after-thoughts of a lost opportunity. Mr. Eugene Wrayburn."

"Was it of him you spoke in your ungovernable rage and violence?" Lizzie Hexam demanded with spirit.

He bit his lip, and looked at her, and said never a word.

"Was it Mr. Wrayburn that you threatened?"

He bit his lip again, and looked at her, and said never a word.

"You asked me to hear you out, and you will not speak. Let me find my brother."

"Stay! I threatened no one."

Her look dropped for an instant to his bleeding hand. He lifted it to his mouth, wiped it on his sleeve, and again folded it over the other.

"Mr. Eugene Wrayburn," he repeated.

"Why do you mention that name again and again, Mr. Headstone?"

"Because it is the text of the little I have left to say. Observe! There are no threats in it. If I utter a threat, stop me, and fasten it upon me. Mr. Eugene Wrayburn."

A worse threat than was conveyed in his manner of uttering the name could hardly have escaped him.

"He haunts you. You accept favors from him. You are willing enough to listen to him. I know it, as well as he does."

"Mr. Wrayburn has been considerate and good to me, Sir," said Lizzie, proudly, "in connection with the death and with the memory of my poor father."

"No doubt. He is of course a very considerate and a very good man, Mr. Eugene Wrayburn."

"He is nothing to you, I think," said Lizzie, with an indignation she could not repress.

"Oh yes, he is. There you mistake. He is much to me."

"What can he be to you?"

"He can be a rival to me among other things," said Bradley.

"Mr. Headstone," returned Lizzie, with a burning face, "it is cowardly in you to speak to me in this way. But it makes me able to tell you that I do not like you, and that I never have liked you from the first, and that no other living creature has any thing to do with the effect you have produced upon me for yourself."

His head bent for a moment, as if under a weight, and he then looked up again, moistening his lips. "I was going on with the little I had left to say. I knew all this about Mr. Eugene Wrayburn, all the while you were drawing me to you. I strove against the knowledge, but quite in vain. It made no difference in me. With Mr. Eugene Wrayburn in my mind, I went on. With Mr. Eugene Wrayburn in my mind, I spoke to you just now. With Mr. Eugene Wrayburn in my mind, I have been set aside and I have been cast out."

"If you give those names to my thanking you for your proposal and declining it, is it my fault, Mr. Headstone?" said Lizzie, compassionating the bitter struggle he could not conceal, almost as much as she was repelled and alarmed by it.

"I am not complaining," he returned, "I am only stating the case. I had to wrestle with my self-respect when I submitted to be drawn to you in spite of Mr. Wrayburn. You may imagine how low my self-respect lies now."

She was hurt and angry; but repressed herself in consideration of his suffering, and of his being her brother's friend.

"And it lies under his feet," said Bradley, unfolding his hands in spite of himself, and fiercely motioning with them both toward the stones of the pavement. "Remember that! It lies under that fellow's feet, and he treads upon it and exults above it."

"He does not!" said Lizzie.

"He does!" said Bradley. "I have stood before him face to face, and he crushed me down in the dirt of his contempt, and walked over me. Why? Because he knew with triumph what was in store for me to-night."

"Oh, Mr. Headstone, you talk quite wildly."

"Quite collectedly. I know what I say too well! Now I have said all. I have used no threat, remember; I have done no more than show you how the case stands;—how the case stands, so far."

At this moment her brother sauntered into view close by. She darted to him, and caught him by the hand. Bradley followed, and laid his heavy hand on the boy's opposite shoulder.

"Charley Hexam, I am going home. I must walk home by myself to-night, and get shut up in my room without being spoken to. Give me half an hour's start, and let me be, till you find me at my work in the morning. I shall be at my work in the morning just as usual."

Clasping his hands, he uttered a short unearthly broken cry, and went his way. The brother and sister were left looking at one another near a lamp in the solitary church-yard, and the boy's face clouded and darkened as he said, in a rough tone: "What is the meaning of this? What have you done to my best friend? Out with the truth!"

"Charley!" said his sister. "Speak a little more considerately!"

"I am not in the humor for consideration, or for nonsense of any sort," replied the boy. "What have you been doing? Why has Mr. Headstone gone from us in that way?"

"He asked me—you know he asked me—to be his wife, Charley."

"Well?" said the boy, impatiently.

"And I was obliged to tell him that I could not be his wife."

"You were obliged to tell him," repeated the boy angrily, between his teeth, and rudely pushing her away. "You were obliged to tell him! Do you know that he is worth fifty of you?"

"It may easily be so, Charley, but I can not marry him."

"You mean that you are conscious that you can't appreciate him, and don't deserve him, I suppose?"

"I mean that I do not like him, Charley, and that I will never marry him."

"Upon my soul," exclaimed the boy, "you are a nice picture of a sister! Upon my soul, you are a pretty piece of disinterestedness! And so all my endeavors to cancel the past and to raise myself in the world, and to raise you with me, are to be beaten down by your low whims; are they?"

"I will not reproach you, Charley."

"Hear her!" exclaimed the boy, looking round at the darkness. "She won't reproach me! She does her best to destroy my fortunes and her own, and she won't reproach me! Why, you'll tell me, next, that you won't reproach Mr. Headstone for coming out of the sphere to which he is an ornament, and putting himself at your feet, to be rejected by you!"

"No, Charley, I will only tell you, as I told himself, that I thank him for doing so, that I am sorry he did so, and that I hope he will do much better, and be happy."

Some touch of compunction smote the boy's hardening heart as he looked upon her, his patient little nurse in infancy, his patient friend, adviser, and reclamer in boyhood, the self-forgetting sister who had done every thing for him. His tone relented, and he drew her arm through his.

"Now, come, Liz; don't let us quarrel; let us be reasonable, and talk this over like brother and sister. Will you listen to me?"

"Oh, Charley!" she replied, through her starting tears; "do I not listen to you, and hear many hard things?"

"Then I'm sorry. There, Liz! I am unfeignedly sorry. Only you do put me out so. Now see. Mr. Headstone is perfectly devoted to you. He has told me in the strongest manner that he has never been his old self for one single minute since I first brought him to see you. Miss Peecher, our schoolmistress—pretty and young, and all that—is known to be very much attached to him, and he won't so much as look at her or hear of her. Now, his devotion to you must be a disinterested one; mustn't it? If he married Miss Peecher, he would be a great deal better off in all worldly respects than in marrying you. Well then; he has nothing to get by it, has he?"

"Very well then," said the boy; "that's something in his favor, and a great thing. Then I come in. Mr. Headstone has always got me on, and he has a good deal in his power, and of course if he was my brother-in-law he wouldn't get me on less, but would get me on more. Mr. Headstone comes and confides in me, in a very delicate way, and says, 'I hope my marrying your sister would be agreeable to you, Hexam, and useful to you?' I say, 'There's nothing in the world, Mr. Headstone, that I could be better pleased with.' Mr. Headstone says, 'Then I may rely upon your intimate knowledge of me for your good word with your sister, Hexam?" And I say, 'Certainly, Mr. Headstone, and naturally I have a good deal of influence with her.' So I have; haven't I, Liz?"

"Yes, Charley."

"Well said! Now, you see, we begin to get on, the moment we begin to be really talking it over, like brother and sister. Very well. Then you come in. As Mr. Headstone's wife you would be occupying a most respectable station, and you would be holding a far better place in society than you hold now, and you would at length get quit of the river-side and the old disagreeables belonging to it, and you would be rid for good of dolls' dress-makers and their drunken fathers, and the like of that. Not that I want to disparage Miss Jenny Wren: I dare say she is all very well in her way; but her way is not your way as Mr. Headstone's wife. Now, you see, Liz, on all three accounts—on Mr. Headstone's, on mine, on yours—nothing could be better or more desirable."

They were walking slowly as the boy spoke, and here he stood still to see what effect he had made. His sister's eyes were fixed upon him; but as they showed no yielding, and as she remained silent, he walked her on again. There was some discomfiture in his tone as he resumed, though he tried to conceal it.

"Having so much influence with you, Liz, as I have, perhaps I should have done better to have had a little chat with you in the first instance, before Mr. Headstone spoke for himself. But really all this in his favor seemed so plain and undeniable, and I knew you to have always been so reasonable and sensible, that I didn't consider it worth while. Very likely that was a mistake of mine. However, it's soon set right. All that need be done to set it right, is for you to tell me at once that I may go home and tell Mr. Headstone that what has taken place is not final, and that it will all come round by-and-by."

He stopped again. The pale face looked anxiously and lovingly at him, but she shook her head.

"Can't you speak?" said the boy, sharply.

"I am very unwilling to speak, Charley. If I must, I must. I can not authorize you to say any such thing to Mr. Headstone: I can not allow you to say any such thing to Mr. Headstone. Nothing remains to be said to him from me, after what I have said for good and all to-night."

"And this girl," cried the boy, contemptuously throwing her off again, "calls herself a sister!"

"Charley, dear, that is the second time that you have almost struck me. Don't be hurt by my words. I don't mean—Heaven forbid!—that you intended it; but you hardly know with what a sudden swing you removed yourself from me."

"However!" said the boy, taking no heed of the remonstrance, and pursuing his own mortified disappointment, "I know what this means, and you shall not disgrace me."

"It means what I have told you, Charley, and nothing more."

"That's not true," said the boy, in a violent tone, "and you know it's not. It means your precious Mr. Wrayburn; that's what it means."

"Charley! If you remember any old days of ours together, forbear!"

"But you shall not disgrace me," doggedly pursued the boy. "I am determined that after I have climbed up out of the mire you shall not pull me down. You can't disgrace me if I have nothing to do with you, and I will have nothing to do with you for the future."

"Charley! On many a night like this, and many a worse night, I have sat on the stones of the street, hushing you in my arms. Unsay those words without even saying you are sorry for them, and my arms are open to you still, and so is my heart."

"I'll not unsay them. I'll say them again. You are an inveterately bad girl, and a false sister, and I have done with you. Forever, I have done with you!"

He threw up his ungrateful and ungracious hand as if it set up a barrier between them, and flung himself upon his heel and left her. She remained impassive on the same spot, silent and motionless, until the striking of the church clock roused her, and she turned away. But then, with the breaking up of her immobility came the breaking up of the waters that the cold heart of the selfish boy had frozen. And "O that I were lying here with the dead!" and "O Charley, Charley, that this should be the end of our pictures in the fire!" were all the words she said, as she laid her face in her hands on the stone coping.

A figure passed by, and passed on, but stopped and looked round at her. It was the figure of an old man with a bowed head, wearing a large brimmed low-crowned hat, and a long-skirted coat. After hesitating a little the figure turned back, and, advancing with an air of gentleness and compassion, said:

"Pardon me, young woman, for speaking to you, but you are under some distress of mind. I can not pass upon my way and leave you weeping here alone, as if there was nothing in the place. Can I help you? Can I do any thing to give you comfort?"

She raised her head at the sound of these kind words, and answered gladly, "Oh, Mr. Riah, is it you?"

"My daughter," said the old man, "I stand amazed! I spoke as to a stranger. Take my arm, take my arm. What grieves you? Who has done this? Poor girl, poor girl!"

"My brother has quarreled with me," sobbed Lizzie, "and renounced me."

"He is a thankless dog," said the Jew, angrily. "Let him go. Shake the dust from thy feet and let him go. Come, daughter! Come home with me—it is but across the road—and take a little time to recover your peace and to make your eyes seemly, and then I will bear you company through the streets. For it is past your usual time, and will soon be late, and the way is long, and there is much company out of doors to-night."

She accepted the support he offered her, and they slowly passed out of the church-yard. They were in the act of emerging into the main thoroughfare, when another figure loitering discontentedly by, and looking up the street and down it, and all about, started and exclaimed, "Lizzie! why, where have you been? Why, what's the matter?"

As Eugene Wrayburn thus addressed her she drew closer to the Jew and bent her head. The Jew having taken in the whole of Eugene at one sharp glance, cast his eyes upon the ground, and stood mute.

"Lizzie, what is the matter?"

"Mr. Wrayburn, I can not tell you now. I can not tell you to-night, if I ever can tell you. Pray leave me."

"But, Lizzie, I came expressly to join you. I came to walk home with you, having dined at a coffee-house in this neighborhood and knowing your hour. And I have been lingering about," added Eugene, "like a bailiff; or," with a look at Riah, "an old clothesman."

The Jew lifted up his eyes, and took in Eugene more at another glance.

"Mr. Wrayburn, pray, pray leave me with this protector. And one thing more. Pray, pray be careful of yourself."

"Mysteries of Udolpho!" said Eugene, with a look of wonder. "May I be excused for asking, in the elderly gentleman's presence, who is this kind protector?"

"A trust-worthy friend," said Lizzie.

"I will relieve him of his trust," returned Eugene. "But you must tell me, Lizzie, what is the matter?"

"Her brother is the matter," said the old man, lifting up his eyes again.

"Our brother the matter?" returned Eugene, with airy contempt. "Our brother is not worth a thought, far less a tear. What has our brother done?"

The old man lifted up his eyes again, with one grave look at Wrayburn, and one grave glance at Lizzie, as she stood looking down. Both were so full of meaning that even Eugene was checked in his light career, and subsided into a thoughtful "Humph!"

With an air of perfect patience the old man, remaining mute and keeping his eyes cast down, stood, retaining Lizzie's arm, as though, in his habit of passive endurance, it would be all one to him if he had stood there motionless all night.

"If Mr. Aaron," said Eugene, who soon found this fatiguing, "will be good enough to relinquish his charge to me, he will be quite free for any engagement he may have at the Synagogue. Mr. Aaron, will you have the kindness?"

But the old man stood stock-still.

"Good-evening, Mr. Aaron," said Eugene, politely; "we need not detain you." Then turning to Lizzie, "Is our friend Mr. Aaron a little deaf?"

"My hearing is very good, Christian gentleman," replied the old man, calmly, "but I will hear only one voice to-night desiring me to leave this damsel before I have conveyed her to her home. If she requests it, I will do it. I will do it for no one else."

"May I ask why so, Mr. Aaron?" said Eugene, quite undisturbed in his ease.

"Excuse me. If she asks me, I will tell her," replied the old man. "I will tell no one else."

"I do not ask you," said Lizzie, "and I beg you to take me home. Mr. Wrayburn, I have had a bitter trial to-night, and I hope you will not think me ungrateful, or mysterious, or changeable. I am neither; I am wretched. Pray remember what I said to you. Pray, pray take care."

"My dear Lizzie," he returned, in a low voice, bending over her on the other side; "of what? Of whom?"

"Of any one you have lately seen and made angry."

He snapped his fingers and laughed. "Come," said he, "since no better may be, Mr. Aaron and I will divide this trust, and see you home together. Mr. Aaron on that side; I on this. If perfectly agreeable to Mr. Aaron, the escort will now proceed."

He knew his power over her. He knew that she would not insist upon his leaving her. He knew that, her fears for him being aroused, she would be uneasy if he were out of her sight. For all his seeming levity and carelessness he knew whatever he chose to know of the thoughts of her heart.

And going on at her side, so gayly, regardless of all that had been urged against him; so superior in his sallies and self-possession to the gloomy constraint of her suitor and the selfish petulance of her brother; so faithful to her, as it seemed, when her own stock was faithless; what an immense advantage, what an overpowering influence, were his that night! Add to the rest, poor girl, that she had heard him vilified for her sake, and that she had suffered for his, and where the wonder that his occasional tones of serious interest (setting off his carelessness, as if it were assumed to calm her), that his lightest touch, his lightest look, his very presence beside her in the dark common street, were like glimpses of an enchanted world, which it was natural for jealousy and malice and all meanness to be unable to bear the brightness of, and to gird at as bad spirits might.

Nothing more being said of repairing to Riah's, they went direct to Lizzie's lodging. A little short of the house-door she parted from them, and went in alone.

"Mr. Aaron," said Eugene, when they were left together in the street, "with many thanks for your company, it remains for me unwillingly to say Farewell."

"Sir," returned the other, "I give you good-night, and I wish that you were not so thoughtful."

"Mr. Aaron," returned Eugene, "I give you good-night, and I wish (for you are a little dull) that you were not so thoughtful."

But now, that his part was played out for the evening, and when in turning his back upon the Jew he came off the stage, he was thoughtful himself. "How did Lightwood's catechism run?" he murmured, as he stopped to light his cigar. "What is to come of it? What are you doing? Where are you going? We shall soon know now. Ah!" with a heavy sigh.

The heavy sigh was repeated as if by an echo, an hour afterward, when Riah, who had been sitting on some dark steps in a corner over against the house, arose and went his patient way; stealing through the streets in his ancient dress, like the ghost of a departed Time.

CHAPTER XVI.

AN ANNIVERSARY OCCASION.

THE estimable Twemlow, dressing himself in his lodgings over the stable-yard in Duke Street, Saint James's, and hearing the horses at their toilet below, finds himself on the whole in a disadvantageous position as compared with the noble animals at livery. For whereas, on the one hand, he has no attendant to slap him soundly and require him in gruff accents to come up and come over, still, on the other hand, he has no attendant at all; and the mild gentleman's finger-joints and other joints working rustily in the morning, he could deem it agreeable even to be tied up by the countenance at his chamber-door, so he were there skillfully rubbed down and slashed and sluiced and polished and clothed, while himself taking merely a passive part in these trying transactions.

How the fascinating Tippins gets on when arraying herself for the bewilderment of the senses of men, is known only to the Graces and her maid; but perhaps even that engaging creature, though not reduced to the self-dependence of Twemlow, could dispense with a good deal of the trouble attendant on the daily restoration of her charms, seeing that as to her face and neck this adorable divinity is, as it were, a diurnal species of lobster—throwing off a shell every forenoon, and needing to keep in a retired spot until the new crust hardens.

Howbeit, Twemlow doth at length invest himself with collar and cravat and wristbands to his knuckles, and goeth forth to breakfast. And to breakfast with whom but his near neighbors, the Lammles of Sackville Street, who have imparted to him that he will meet his distant kinsman, Mr. Fledgeby. The awful Snigsworth might taboo and prohibit Fledgeby, but the peaceable Twemlow reasons, "If he is my kinsman I didn't make him so, and to meet a man is not to know him."

It is the first anniversary of the happy marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Lammle, and the celebration is a breakfast, because a dinner on the desired scale of sumptuousness can not be achieved within less limits than those of the non-existent palatial residence of which so many people are madly envious. So Twemlow trips with not a little stiffness across Piccadilly, sensible of having once been more upright in figure and less in danger of being knocked down by swift vehicles. To be sure that was in the days when he hoped for leave from the dread Snigsworth to do something, or be something, in life, and before that magnificent Tartar issued the ukase, "As he will never distinguish himself, he must be a poor gentleman-pensioner of mine, and let him hereby consider himself pensioned."

Ah! my Twemlow! Say, little feeble gray personage, what thoughts are in thy breast to-day, of the Fancy—so still to call her who bruised thy heart when it was green and thy head brown—and whether it be better or worse, more painful or less, to believe in the Fancy to this hour, than to know her for a greedy armor-plated crocodile, with no more capacity of imagining the delicate and sensitive and tender spot behind thy waistcoat, than of going straight at it with a knitting-needle. Say likewise, my Twemlow, whether it be the happier lot to be a poor relation of the great, or to stand in the wintry slush giving the hack horses to drink out of the shallow tub at the coach-stand, into which thou hast so nearly set thy uncertain foot. Twemlow says nothing, and goes on.

As he approaches the Lammles' door, drives up a little one-horse carriage, containing Tippins the divine. Tippins, letting down the window, playfully extols the vigilance of her cavalier in being in waiting there to hand her out. Twemlow hands her out with as much polite gravity as if she were any thing real, and they proceed up stairs: Tippins all abroad about the legs, and seeking to express that those unsteady articles are only skipping in their native buoyancy.

And dear Mrs. Lammle and dear Mr. Lammle, how do you do, and when are you going down to what's-its-name place—Guy, Earl of Warwick, you know—what is it?—Dun Cow—to claim the flitch of bacon? And Mortimer, whose name is forever blotted out from my list of lovers, by reason first of fickleness and then of base desertion, how do you do, wretch? And Mr. Wrayburn, you here! What can you come for, because we are all very sure beforehand that you are not going to talk! And Veneering, M.P., how are things going on down at the House, and when will you turn out those terrible people for us? And Mrs. Veneering, my dear, can it positively be true that you go down to that stifling place night after night, to hear those men prose? Talking of which, Veneering, why don't you prose, for you haven't opened your lips there yet, and we are dying to hear what you have got to say to us! Miss Podsnap, charmed to see you. Pa, here? No! Ma, neither? Oh! Mr. Boots! Delighted. Mr. Brewer! This is a gathering of the clans. Thus Tippins, and surveys Fledgeby and outsiders through golden glass, murmuring as she turns about and about, in her innocent giddy way, Any body else I know? No, I think not. Nobody there. Nobody there. Nobody any where!

Mr. Lammle, all a-glitter, produces his friend Fledgeby, as dying for the honor of presentation to Lady Tippins. Fledgeby presented, has the air of going to say something, has the air of going to say nothing, has an air successively of meditation, of resignation, and of desolation, backs on Brewer, makes the tour of Boots, and fades into the extreme back-ground, feeling for his whisker, as if it might have turned up since he was there five minutes ago.

But Lammle has him out again before he has so much as completely ascertained the bareness of the land. He would seem to be in a bad way, Fledgeby; for Lammle represents him as dying again. He is dying now, of want of presentation to Twemlow.

Twemlow offers his hand. Glad to see him. "Your mother, Sir, was a connection of mine."

"I believe so," says Fledgeby, "but my mother and her family were two."

"Are you staying in town?" asks Twemlow.

"I always am," says Fledgeby.

"You like town," says Twemlow. But is felled flat by Fledgeby's taking it quite ill, and replying, No, he don't like town. Lammle tries to break the force of the fall by remarking that some people do not like town. Fledgeby retorting that he never heard of any such case but his own, Twemlow goes down again heavily.

"There is nothing new this morning, I suppose?" says Twemlow, returning to the mark with great spirit.

Fledgeby has not heard of any thing.

"No, there's not a word of news," says Lammle.

"Not a particle," adds Boots.

"Not an atom," chimes in Brewer.

Somehow the execution of this little concerted piece appears to raise the general spirits as with a sense of duty done, and sets the company agoing. Every body seems more equal than before to the calamity of being in the society of every body else. Even Eugene standing in a window, moodily swinging the tassel of a blind, gives it a smarter jerk now, as if he found himself in better case.

Breakfast announced. Every thing on table showy and gaudy, but with a self-assertingly temporary and nomadic air on the decorations, as boasting that they will be much more showy and gaudy in the palatial residence. Mr. Lammle's own particular servant behind his chair; the Analytical behind Veneering's chair; instances in point that such servants fall into two classes: one mistrusting the master's acquaintances, and the other mistrusting the master. Mr. Lammle's servant, of the second class. Appearing to be lost in wonder and low spirits because the police are so long in coming to take his master up on some charge of the first magnitude.

Veneering, M.P., on the right of Mrs. Lammle; Twemlow on her left; Mrs. Veneering, W.M.P. (wife of Member of Parliament), and Lady Tippins on Mr. Lammle's right and left. But be sure that well within the fascination of Mr. Lammle's eye and smile sits little Georgiana. And be sure that close to little Georgiana, also under inspection by the same gingerous gentleman, sits Fledgeby.

Often more than twice or thrice while breakfast is in progress Mr. Twemlow gives a little sudden turn toward Mrs. Lammle, and then says to her, "I beg your pardon!" This not being Twemlow's usual way, why is it his way to-day? Why, the truth is, Twemlow repeatedly labors under the impression that Mrs. Lammle is going to speak to him, and turning finds that it is not so, and mostly that she has her eyes upon Veneering. Strange that this impression so abides by Twemlow after being corrected, yet so it is.

Lady Tippins partaking plentifully of the fruits of the earth (including grape-juice in the category) becomes livelier, and applies herself to elicit sparks from Mortimer Lightwood. It is always understood among the initiated, that that faithless lover must be planted at table opposite to Lady Tippins, who will then strike conversational fire out of him. In a pause of mastication and deglutition, Lady Tippins, contemplating Mortimer, recalls that it was at our dear Veneerings, and in the presence of a party who are surely all here, that he told them his story of the man from somewhere, which afterward became so horribly interesting and vulgarly popular.

"Yes, Lady Tippins," assents Mortimer; "as they say on the stage, 'Even so!'"

"Then we expect you," retorts the charmer, "to sustain your reputation, and tell us something else."

"Lady Tippins, I exhausted myself for life that day, and there is nothing more to be got out of me."

Mortimer parries thus, with a sense upon him that elsewhere it is Eugene and not he who is the jester, and that in these circles where Eugene persists in being speechless, he, Mortimer, is but the double of the friend on whom he has founded himself.

"But," quoth the fascinating Tippins, "I am resolved on getting something more out of you. Traitor! what is this I hear about another disappearance?"

"As it is you who have heard it," returns Lightwood, "perhaps you'll tell us."

"Monster, away!" retorts Lady Tippins. "Your own Golden Dustman referred me to you."

Mr. Lammle striking in here, proclaims aloud that there is a sequel to the story of the man from somewhere. Silence ensues upon the proclamation.

"I assure you," says Lightwood, glancing round the table, "I have nothing to tell." But Eugene adding in a low voice, "There, tell it, tell it!" he corrects himself with the addition, "Nothing worth mentioning."

Boots and Brewer immediately perceive that it is immensely worth mentioning, and become politely clamorous. Veneering is also visited by a perception to the same effect. But it is understood that his attention is now rather used up, and difficult to hold, that being the tone of the House of Commons.

"Pray don't be at the trouble of composing yourselves to listen," says Mortimer Lightwood, "because I shall have finished long before you have fallen into comfortable attitudes. It's like—"

"It's like," impatiently interrupts Eugene, "the children's narrative:

"I'll tell you a story
 "Of Jack a Manory,
 "And now my story's begun;
 "I'll tell you another
 "Of Jack and his brother,
 "And now my story is done."

—Get on, and get it over!"

Eugene says this with a sound of vexation in his voice, leaning back in his chair and looking balefully at Lady Tippins, who nods to him as her dear Bear, and playfully insinuates that she (a self-evident proposition) is Beauty, and he Beast.

"The reference," proceeds Mortimer, "which I suppose to be made by my honorable and fair enslaver opposite, is to the following circumstance. Very lately, the young woman, Lizzie Hexam, daughter of the late Jesse Hexam, otherwise Gaffer, who will be remembered to have found the body of the man from somewhere, mysteriously received, she knew not from whom, an explicit retraction of the charges made against her father by another water-side character of the name of Riderhood. Nobody believed them, because little Rogue Riderhood—I am tempted into the paraphrase by remembering the charming wolf who would have rendered society a great service if he had devoured Mr. Riderhood's father and mother in their infancy—had previously played fast and loose with the said charges, and, in fact, abandoned them. However, the retraction I have mentioned found its way into Lizzie Hexam's hands, with a general flavor on it of having been favored by some anonymous messenger in a dark cloak and slouched hat, and was by her forwarded, in her father's vindication, to Mr. Boffin, my client. You will excuse the phraseology of the shop, but as I never had another client, and in all likelihood never shall have, I am rather proud of him as a natural curiosity probably unique."

Although as easy as usual on the surface, Lightwood is not quite as easy as usual below it. With an air of not minding Eugene at all, he feels that the subject is not altogether a safe one in that connection.

"The natural curiosity which forms the sole ornament of my professional museum," he resumes, "hereupon desires his Secretary—an individual of the hermit-crab or oyster species, and whose name, I think, is Chokesmith—but it doesn't in the least matter—say Artichoke—to put himself in communication with Lizzie Hexam. Artichoke professes his readiness so to do, endeavors to do so, but fails."

"Why fails?" asks Boots.

"How fails?" asks Brewer.

"Pardon me," returns Lightwood, "I must postpone the reply for one moment, or we shall have an anti-climax. Artichoke failing signally, my client refers the task to me: his purpose being to advance the interests of the object of his search. I proceed to put myself in communication with her; I even happen to possess some special means," with a glance at Eugene, "of putting myself in communication with her; but I fail too, because she has vanished."

"Vanished!" is the general echo.

"Disappeared," says Mortimer. "Nobody knows how, nobody knows when, nobody knows where. And so ends the story to which my honorable and fair enslaver opposite referred."

Tippins, with a bewitching little scream, opines that we shall every one of us be murdered in our beds. Eugene eyes her as if some of us would be enough for him. Mrs. Veneering, W.M.P., remarks that these social mysteries make one afraid of leaving Baby. Veneering, M.P., wishes to be informed (with something of a second-hand air of seeing the Right Honorable Gentleman at the head of the Home Department in his place) whether it is intended to be conveyed that the vanished person has been spirited away or otherwise harmed? Instead of Lightwood's answering, Eugene answers, and answers hastily and vexedly: "No, no, no; he doesn't mean that; he means voluntarily vanished—but utterly—completely."

However, the great subject of the happiness of Mr. and Mrs. Lammle must not be allowed to vanish with the other vanishments—with the vanishing of the murderer, the vanishing of Julius Handford, the vanishing of Lizzie Hexam—and therefore Veneering must recall the present sheep to the pen from which they have strayed. Who so fit to discourse of the happiness of Mr. and Mrs. Lammle, they being the dearest and oldest friends he has in the world; or what audience so fit for him to take into his confidence as that audience, a noun of multitude or signifying many, who are all the oldest and dearest friends he has in the world? So Veneering, without the formality of rising, launches into a familiar oration, gradually toning into the Parliamentary sing-song, in which he sees at that board his dear friend Twemlow, who on that day twelvemonth bestowed on his dear friend Lammle the fair hand of his dear friend Sophronia, and in which he also sees at that board his dear friends Boots and Brewer, whose rallying round him at a period when his dear friend Lady Tippins likewise rallied round him—ay, and in the foremost rank—he can never forget while memory holds her seat. But he is free to confess that he misses from that board his dear old friend Podsnap, though he is well represented by his dear young friend Georgiana. And he further sees at that board (this he announces with pomp, as if exulting in the powers of an extraordinary telescope) his friend Mr. Fledgeby, if he will permit him to call him so. For all of these reasons, and many more which he right well knows will have occurred to persons of your exceptional acuteness, he is here to submit to you that the time has arrived when, with our hearts in our glasses, with tears in our eyes, with blessings on our lips, and in a general way with a profusion of gammon and spinach in our emotional larders, we should one and all drink to our dear friends the Lammles, wishing them many many years as happy as the last, and many many friends as congenially united as themselves. And this he will add, that Anastatia Veneering (who is instantly heard to weep) is formed on the same model as her old and chosen friend Sophronia Lammle, in respect that she is devoted to the man who wooed and won her, and nobly discharges the duties of a wife.

Seeing no better way out of it, Veneering here pulls up his oratorical Pegasus extremely short, and plumps down, clean over his head, with: "Lammle, God bless you!"

Then Lammle. Too much of him every way; pervadingly too much nose of a coarse wrong shape, and his nose in his mind and his manners; too much smile to be real; too much frown to be false; too many large teeth to be visible at once without suggesting a bite. He thanks you, dear friends, for your kindly greeting, and hopes to receive you—it may be on the next of these delightful occasions—in a residence better suited to your claims on the rites of hospitality. He will never forget that at Veneering's he first saw Sophronia. Sophronia will never forget that at Veneering's she first saw him. They spoke of it soon after they were married, and agreed that they would never forget it. In fact, to Veneering they owe their union. They hope to show their sense of this some day ("No, no," from Veneering)—oh yes, yes, and let him rely upon it, they will if they can! His marriage with Sophronia was not a marriage of interest on either side: she had her little fortune, he had his little fortune: they joined their little fortunes: it was a marriage of pure inclination and suitability. Thank you! Sophronia and he are fond of the society of young people; but he is not sure that their house would be a good house for young people proposing to remain single, since the contemplation of its domestic bliss might induce them to change their minds. He will not apply this to any one present; certainly not to their darling little Georgiana. Again thank you! Neither, by-the-by, will he apply it to his friend Fledgeby. He thanks Veneering for the feeling manner in which he referred to their common friend Fledgeby, for he holds that gentleman in the highest estimation. Thank you. In fact (returning unexpectedly to Fledgeby), the better you know him, the more you find in him that you desire to know. Again thank you! In his dear Sophronia's name and in his own, thank you!

Mrs. Lammle has sat quite still, with her eyes cast down upon the table-cloth. As Mr. Lammle's address ends, Twemlow once more turns to her involuntarily, not cured yet of that often-recurring impression that she is going to speak to him. This time she really is going to speak to him. Veneering is talking with his other next neighbor, and she speaks in a low voice.

"Mr. Twemlow."

He answers, "I beg your pardon? Yes?" Still a little doubtful, because of her not looking at him.

"You have the soul of a gentleman, and I know I may trust you. Will you give me the opportunity of saying a few words to you when you come up stairs?"

"Assuredly. I shall be honored."

"Don't seem to do so, if you please, and don't think it inconsistent if my manner should be more careless than my words. I may be watched."

Intensely astonished, Twemlow puts his hand to his forehead, and sinks back in his chair meditating. Mrs. Lammle rises. All rise. The ladies go up stairs. The gentlemen soon saunter after them. Fledgeby has devoted the interval to taking an observation of Boots's whiskers, Brewer's whiskers, and Lammle's whiskers, and considering which pattern of whisker he would prefer to produce out of himself by friction, if the Genie of the cheek would only answer to his rubbing.

In the drawing-room, groups form as usual. Lightwood, Boots, and Brewer flutter like moths around that yellow wax-candle—guttering down, and with some hint of a winding-sheet in it—Lady Tippins. Outsiders cultivate Veneering, M.P., and Mrs. Veneering, W.M.P. Lammle stands with folded arms, Mephistophelean in a corner, with Georgiana and Fledgeby. Mrs. Lammle, on a sofa by a table, invites Mr. Twemlow's attention to a book of portraits in her hand.

Mr. Twemlow takes his station on a settee before her, and Mrs. Lammle shows him a portrait.

"You have reason to be surprised," she says, softly, "but I wish you wouldn't look so."

Disturbed Twemlow, making an effort not to look so, looks much more so.

"I think, Mr. Twemlow, you never saw that distant connection of yours before to-day?"

"No, never."

"Now that you do see him, you see what he is. You are not proud of him?"

"To say the truth, Mrs. Lammle, no."

"If you knew more of him, you would be less inclined to acknowledge him. Here is another portrait. What do you think of it?"

Twemlow has just presence of mind enough to say aloud: "Very like! Uncommonly like!"

"You have noticed, perhaps, whom he favors with his attentions? You notice where he is now, and how engaged?"

"Yes. But Mr. Lammle—"

She darts a look at him which he can not comprehend, and shows him another portrait.

"Very good; is it not?"

"Charming!" says Twemlow.

"So like as to be almost a caricature?—Mr. Twemlow, it is impossible to tell you what the struggle in my mind has been, before I could bring myself to speak to you as I do now. It is only in the conviction that I may trust you never to betray me, that I can proceed. Sincerely promise me that you never will betray my confidence—that you will respect it, even though you may no longer respect me—and I shall be as satisfied as if you had sworn it."

"Madam, on the honor of a poor gentleman—"

"Thank you. I can desire no more. Mr. Twemlow, I implore you to save that child!"

"That child?"

"Georgiana. She will be sacrificed. She will be inveigled and married to that connection of yours. It is a partnership affair, a money-speculation. She has no strength of will or character to help herself, and she is on the brink of being sold into wretchedness for life."

"Amazing! But what can I do to prevent it?" demands Twemlow, shocked and bewildered to the last degree.

"Here is another portrait. And not good, is it?"

Aghast at the light manner of her throwing her head back to look at it critically, Twemlow still dimly perceives the expediency of throwing his own head back, and does so. Though he no more sees the portrait than if it were in China.

"Decidedly not good," says Mrs. Lammle. "Stiff and exaggerated!"

"And ex—" But Twemlow, in his demolished state, can not command the word, and trails off into "—actly so."

"Mr. Twemlow, your word will have weight with her pompous, self-blinded father. You know how much he makes of your family. Lose no time. Warn him."

"But warn him against whom?"

"Against me."

By great good fortune Twemlow receives a stimulant at this critical instant. The stimulant is Lammle's voice.

"Sophronia, my dear, what portraits are you showing Twemlow?"

"Public characters, Alfred."

"Show him the last of me."

"Yes, Alfred."

She puts the book down, takes another book up, turns the leaves, and presents the portrait to Twemlow.

"That is the last of Mr. Lammle. Do you think it good?—Warn her father against me. I deserve it, for I have been in the scheme from the first. It is my husband's scheme, your connection's, and mine. I tell you this, only to show you the necessity of the poor little foolish affectionate creature's being befriended and rescued. You will not repeat this to her father. You will spare me so far, and spare my husband. For, though this celebration of to-day is all a mockery, he is my husband, and we must live.—Do you think it like?"

Twemlow, in a stunned condition, feigns to compare the portrait in his hand with the original looking toward him from his Mephistophelean corner.

"Very well indeed!" are at length the words which Twemlow with great difficulty extracts from himself.

"I am glad you think so. On the whole, I myself consider it the best. The others are so dark. Now here, for instance, is another of Mr. Lammle—"

"But I don't understand; I don't see my way," Twemlow stammers, as he falters over the book with his glass at his eye. "How warn her father, and not tell him? Tell him how much? Tell him how little? I—I—am getting lost."

"Tell him I am a match-maker; tell him I am an artful and designing woman; tell him you are sure his daughter is best out of my house and my company. Tell him any such things of me; they will all be true. You know what a puffed-up man he is, and how easily you can cause his vanity to take the alarm. Tell him as much as will give him the alarm and make him careful of her, and spare me the rest. Mr. Twemlow, I feel my sudden degradation in your eyes; familiar as I am with my degradation in my own eyes, I keenly feel the change that must have come upon me in yours, in these last few moments. But I trust to your good faith with me as implicitly as when I began. If you knew how often I have tried to speak to you to-day you would almost pity me. I want no new promise from you on my own account, for I am satisfied, and I always shall be satisfied, with the promise you have given me. I can venture to say no more, for I see that I am watched. If you would set my mind at rest with the assurance that you will interpose with the father and save this harmless girl, close that book before you return it to me, and I shall know what you mean, and deeply thank you in my heart.—Alfred, Mr. Twemlow thinks the last one the best, and quite agrees with you and me."

Alfred advances. The groups break up. Lady Tippins rises to go, and Mrs. Veneering follows her leader. For the moment Mrs. Lammle does not turn to them, but remains looking at Twemlow looking at Alfred's portrait through his eye-glass. The moment past, Twemlow drops his eye-glass at its ribbon's length, rises, and closes the book with an emphasis which makes that fragile nursling of the fairies, Tippins, start.

Then good-by and good-by, and charming occasion worthy of the Golden Age, and more about the flitch of bacon, and the like of that; and Twemlow goes staggering across Piccadilly with his hand to his forehead, and is nearly run down by a flushed letter-cart, and at last drops safe in his easy-chair, innocent good gentleman, with his hand to his forehead still, and his head in a whirl.

ULTRAMARINE VIEWS.

"YE who listen with credulity to the whispers of Fancy, and believe" the ravings of mad sailors and mendacious poets, listen to a history more veracious than, and equally instructive with, that of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia!

I would remark, by way of preface, that there are two modes of seeing one's friends off for an ocean voyage: First. You may linger on board with them until the "last syllable of recorded [New York] time" is uttered by the warning bell, then, retreating to the dock, with dislocating backward glances, you may again repeat the round of affectionate adieus by telegraph; and climbing, finally, some perilous roof or rigging, you may make frenzied demonstrations toward them, with whatsoever of your members are not required for the preservation of your physical equilibrium, until the last trace of the vessel has vanished. Second. You may establish your friends comfortably on board, make the actual hand-shakings and audible good-bys as earnest as you please, then turn resolutely away and return to your wife, your merchandise, or your moutons, with a heart more or less heavy.

In the first instance, you condemn your departing friends to the tortures of the rack. He must be on the alert for every signal you vouchsafe him—stretching the facial muscles to their utmost tension, and making spasmodic lurches at the retreating shore, with the grace and—it must be confessed, at last—with the sensibility of a frog, for the heart is paralyzed with the unnatural strain, and subsides as far as possible, leaving only its sullen servitor, the body, to do the last offices. Add to this unselfish consideration the fact that the agony is reciprocal; time seems interminable; the steamer crawls; you recall him of the "Thief and the Cordolier," who

"Oft fitted the halter, oft traversed the cart,

And often took leave, but seemed loth to depart!"— and are on the verge of a delirious wish for the mortal tightening of the halter, or at least find the moment when you and your friend become mutually invisible absolute bliss.

In the other case, your friend is left at liberty to bring all his powers at once to bear upon his novel surroundings, and adjust them for the voyage; and you may be confident that his fond memory of yourself is brightened by the recent exhibition of loving consideration.

So our friends bade us good-by a month ago, first stocking our state-room with ammunition for the coming battle. Yet I confess (such is the weakness of my peculiarly-human nature) that when our fellow-passengers were seen all madly tip-toeing, nodding, and gesticulating at the densely-crowded pier, I, forsaken at once of my philosophy and my philosophical friends, did deliberately select an inoffensive stranger, whom idleness rather than affection had obviously drawn to the spot among the surging mass, and wave toward him an impassioned adieu! And though doubtless an undeserved, it was an unspeakable relief, to recognize at the last moment a bona fide relative, who, detained past the hour of sailing, smiled the farewell he was too late to speak.

But gradually all objects upon the shore faded, and those about us come into sharp relief. First, foremost, and chiefest throughout the voyage, the veritable little "Commodore" who rules the waves of Liliput; him upon whom his sponsors, with prophetic ken, conferred the modest name of GEORGE WASHINGTON MORRISON, surnamed NUTT! Whereupon, it seems, the little victim, instead of imitating that historic infant who ran away from home at the age of two years because he understood his friends were going to call him Caleb, thwarted destiny by declining to add as many cubits to his stature as there were stories to his name, and became one of the wonders prodigally showered on the country of Niagara and the Slaveholders' Rebellion.

Exhilarated by the prospect of such a companion du voyage, we descended to inspect our quarters—we consisting, primarily, of the young divine off on sick leave; and, secondarily, of his wife, in the rôle of Dragon (for this trip only, it is to be hoped), guarding from overmuch speech and sight-seeing, and "all the miseries which in this life do either accompany or flow from" the travels of a lone man.

The state-room struck dismay to the heart and nostrils of No. 2, whose first voyage was yet before her, being in size, odor, and general atmospheric effect, like a neglected refrigerator, situated in the interior of the vessel, with no air or light save that doled out, second-hand, by the port-holes of the outer-cabins. Fortunately, the paucity of passengers enabled the purser to rescue us from a dungeon where instant mould and decay would have been our fate, and we had soon set up such of our household gods as were portable and sea-worthy in a room intended for the aggravation of as many cabin passengers as made the first voyage on record.

Returning to the deck after dinner (which proved the only meal throughout the voyage when dishes and meats were not oppositely electrified), we caught the sunset on the wing; but all its golden glory was to our eyes only the sacred nimbus about a little downy head lying in its crib far away—farther and farther away with every revolution of the wheels.

Eighty-five hours of unintermittent sea-sickness, aggravated by head winds blowing a gale! Can I be absolved if I confess that I was almost goaded into sympathy with a certain desperate woman who, overtaken by a storm during a voyage, exclaimed, "If I ever get safe to shore again, I never'll trust myself in the hands of Providence so much again?"

For several hours No. 2 found consolation in the fact of suffering alone (that must be a very shabby misery whose love of company would sacrifice even its dearest friends); but at last the door burst open, and a tall ghost appeared with a lemon under one arm, a flask under the other, and holding fast a heavily-freighted dinner-plate. After a valiant struggle the apparition succumbed in a long captivity to nausea and Miss Braddon. The latter subjugation was a little triumph to No. 2, who, during her preparations for the voyage, had been adjured to forswear all literature save that conducive to the severest inquisition into the Italian language.

During the reign of terror which ensued we ceased to congratulate ourselves upon the capacity of our room to hold "a few souls, that is, eight," inasmuch as objects propelled gather force from distance, and objects half a foot removed from our berths were absolutely unattainable.

Having once perpetrated an Essay on the "Depravity of Inanimate Things," I lay, desperately clutching the side of my berth, and meditated a salt-water sequel, together with some observations upon the "Animation of Depraved Things." The Lion and Unicorn, stamped upon toilet and table ware, took to themselves wings and contended wildly in mid air. The priest's robes and the matron's crinoline make witch-excursions over and around us. In the midst of our distress we derived grim amusement from the suggestion "how romantic for a bridal tour!" and felicitated ourselves upon bonds thoroughly seasoned to "better or worser."

But a brighter day dawned. Possibly "Britannia rules the waves" no longer, or Thanksgiving-Day, 1864, would have been less calm and beautiful.

Obedient to Father Abraham, we gave thanks, even "by sea," for our country, and so much the more as the day of her redemption draws nigh. Spurred by patriotism and the stewardess, I "made an effort" which would have mollified even Mrs. Chick by its magnitude, and emerged from my berth.

To lift one's head from the pillow, and find hair which was double ratted and waterfalled à la mode, four days before, stiffened into an almost impenetrable conglomerate by a supererogatory cascade of Brown's Jamaica Ginger; to feel one's mortal body dimpled with painful depressions exactly corresponding to the various lemons, bottles of ammonia, chloroform, etc., with which misguided friendship has strewn one's bed; to drag one's self to the wash-bowl and find there Seidlitz powders, pomade, tonic pills, Croton oil, jewelry, and cough mixture, triturated into a pleasing compound by the revolutions of a hair-brush, a Balmoral boot, and a French Testament; to attempt one's toilet while the great vessel plunges on, and the noisy screw and one's dizzy head revolve discordantly, and one's convalescent husband sits by alternately laughing and exhorting; all this and more I found it to go down to the sea in ships.

Half-coaxed and half-dragged upward, I encountered in the gangway a Canadian youth whose wobegone aspect exactly expressed my feelings. He dragged out a miserable existence on shipboard by alternately asking and following the advice of the passengers, one after the other, in regard to his sea-malady. In the present instance he was conscientiously engaged in swallowing with tears and groans a huge tumbler of hot rum and water, the prescription of the last individual consulted. In the midst of his struggles a bluff, hearty Scotchman, whose very presence was an offense to such misery as ours, appeared upon the scene with the exclamation, "Hoot mon! What hae ye there—rum? The worst thing in the wurld for ye!" The piteous look and accent of the sufferer are indescribable as he turned reproachfully upon his tormentor and faltered out, "Ye're allus tellin' what's bad for a man but never what's good!"

Mounting to the upper deck I beheld, for the first time, "water, water every where," and was content with a single glance. Mindless of every thing but the law of gravitation and the instinct of self-preservation, I sank down upon the planks and held fast to the railing. The little Commodore came to the rescue with fatherly advice as to the disposition of my person and drapery, and then strode the deck aggravatingly on his firm little legs. Presently also appeared the typical nice old gentleman who is to be found in every company of travelers, who is inevitably reminded by every thing which occurs, or does not occur, of "a most remarkable circumstance." Beaming on me mildly, he proceeded to relate (apropos of nothing) some facts relative to the "most remarkable resemblance" between himself and a certain Captain Tuey, whom he had never seen. It would seem that all mankind were in league to confound these "remarkable" counterparts. "'Pon my honor, a most remarkable circumstance! One day I was walking in Liverpool when a strange gentleman came up to me in the most friendly manner, seizing both my hands, and said, 'Why, Captain Tuey! when did your ship arrive?' 'You are laboring under a mistake, Sir,' I replied; 'my name is not Tuey.' 'Not Captain Tuey? Impossible! A most remarkable resemblance, 'pon my honor!' The very next day the same gentleman crossed the street to meet me, and exclaimed, 'Ah, Tuey! Here you are at last! A great joke happened yesterday. I met a man who was as like you as two peas, and I asked him when his ship got in! On another occasion I went to the office and inquired if there were any letters for me. 'Yes, Sir. Yes, Sir, a dozen!' And, 'pon my honor, the postman handed me a package of letters every one of which was addressed to Captain Tuey," etc., etc. In default of any perceptible point No. 1 suggested an appendix to these "remarkable circumstances," to the effect, that, once upon a time, said old gentleman and Captain Tuey were on the point of making each other's acquaintance; indeed they actually ran into each other in the hall of a hotel, but each supposing the other to be his own reflection in a mirror turned and walked the other way. After the nice old gentleman had resumed his "constitutional," which consisted of one hundred deck-lengths daily, my vis-à-vis at table took his place as my entertainer. This lady, English, but for thirty years resident in Canada, a person of great kindness, sense, and cultivation, offered a sentiment which is worthy of record as an exponent of British intelligence in regard to America. After some pleasant chit-chat came the inquiry, "You are from the States, are you not?" With justifiable pride, augmented by four days of sea and home sickness, I replied, "Oh yes; from Massachusetts;" and was petrified by the response of my lady (who subsequently stated that she had visited Boston). "Ah, Massachusetts; that must be one of the States of the South, I suppose?" Must it indeed! Exhilarated by this sentiment, together with the keen air, and the "Star-Spangled Banner," rendered impressively by the mighty voice of George Washington Morrison Nutt, I found myself at eight bells equal to a place at the Thanksgiving-table, which was set apart for loyal Americans through the management of our obliging fellow-passenger, the author of "Harper's Guide-Book"—a thorough cosmopolitan, but always a true American.

We number perhaps fifteen. We notice at other tables some who should be with us. We pardon the defection of the little Commodore, not in consideration of his "peculiar position," which is plead apologetically, but of his peculiar size; and meditate profoundly upon the awful majesty of the British Cerberus, which extorts a sop from even this atom of humanity, two thousand miles from its domain! On the other side of the gulf there are also a cadaverous Frenchman, whose cotton-mill General Sherman has fired, and who maintains, with hunger-bitten lips, "You are meestaken! there are too much to eat to Richmond!"—and a Texan blockade-runner, too honest to take an oath he means to break, and consequently on his way homeward by this circuitous route; together with two or three others less pardonable. So much for the goats.

At our table all is peace. We include a German, an Englishman (all things are possible!), a Neapolitan, and a Spaniard, besides those "to the manner born;" but in loyalty to the old flag (which, in diminutive proportions, floats above a royal sirloin, in honor of the day) we are one.

The young divine gives thanks, during which solemnity the noise at the opposite table is suggestive, and the Lion and Unicorn upon the panel above us, and upon the china and silver before us, wax more than ever rampant.

A turkey of portentous magnitude of course holds the place of honor, and proves of loyal flavor, although at first I smell treason or insult in its unnational garniture of sausage-chains.

I venture to say there was no more cheery table in all Yankeedom that day than that on board the good ship City of Baltimore, save when the toast "Our friends at home" suffused our eyes with telescopic tears, which brought dear faces (and chief of all to us that precious little tenant of the crib, far away) too tenderly near us.

This proved to me almost the only white-marked day of all the voyage.

My apparition in the cabin was as uncertain as that of the most erratic of comets; but whenever I emerged, the little Commodore appeared as a star of the first magnitude. He was on terms of equal familiarity with the genial Captain and the imperturbable Boots; and no vicissitudes of weather or eccentricities of motion had power to jostle his charming good-nature. I recall, however, one peculiarly tempestuous evening, when the little elf would have been physically capsized had it not been for the aid and comfort of a friendly candlestick, to which he held fast until the vessel recovered its balance. A moment after he gallantly offered me the support of his puissant arm in crossing the cabin.

But another storm overtook us; I descend again into the inexpressibly disagreeable depths, and see neither sun nor star for many hours.

The cabin-boy (whose society is edifying, although his proffers of food are, to say the least, ill-timed) at last reports that "her jib is carried away." I am rather glad of it; for although I have the vaguest impression as to what a jib may be, yet I suspect it of collusion with the wind and waves in our recent horrors, and rejoice in its final assumption.

The Captain had rashly promised that, although we should lose our own appetite for food at the beginning of the voyage, we should acquire that of a horse subsequently. Our journey drew to its end, with no realization of this equine characteristic, unless it be an inordinate craving for green grass, which, on the eleventh day after our departure, was appeased by the vision of the beautiful coast of Ireland. Antæus was not more invigorated by the touch of mother earth than I by the sight. The terrors and discomforts of the voyage faded like a dream. I found myself gazing complacently, for the first time, upon the exquisite tints of the waves; I listened admiringly to the dolorous refrain of the sailors ("Draw boys, bully boys, draw!"); I even hummed, feelingly, "A life on the ocean-wave," and "The sea, the sea, the open sea!" Nevertheless, the little black water-spider, yclept a pilot-boat, was as welcome to my eyes as the return of the dove to the sea-sick patriarch.

Now culminated the glory of our little Commodore, who assumed command of the vessel, and took us in to Queenstown. Equipped in his dazzling uniform, which the English passengers are told, and solemnly believe, is his by right of an actual commission from the United States Navy, and brandishing a little sword (which is affirmed to be the gift of his brethren in arms), he stood upon the official "bridge," and received the pilot with a gracious "How are you, Murphy!"—while the Captain, holding himself humbly in the back-ground, chuckled convulsively, with something of the emotion with which a good-natured elephant might regard the mimicry of a small mouse.

apparition of the elfin admiral; and I suspect it is small thanks we owe to the bewildered Murphy that we did not come to grief that day in the harbor. Doubtless, Murphys of the third and fourth generation will listen with bated breath to the recital of their grandsire's pilotage of the little water-sprite.

At Queenstown we land the Texan (who finds three or four blockade-runners awaiting orders in neutral British waters) and the majority of steerage passengers. The next morning, at 10 o'clock, we behold the shipping of Liverpool with unutterable joy. On account of the tide we land by means of a tender, and as we are transferred to its deck the little hero of our voyage suggests "Three cheers for Captain M——!" adding, naïvely, "for I think he needs them." We all respond with a will, for Commodore and Captain are universal favorites. Whereupon the amiable little Nutt, pleased with his success, pipes pleasantly, "Three cheers for all the crew!" which unprecedented motion is also carried by the graceful wave of the little morsel of a hand.

We reach the dock: custom-house officials work their own sweet will among such of our possessions as the stormy voyage has spared: then we separate.

The nice old gentleman vanishes in that absurdest of vehicles, a "Hansom," with many a "most remarkable circumstance" (contributed by garrulous or mischievous fellow-passengers) added to the stock of his funny old pate. Our consul at Leeds, whose management of the American question during the voyage, whether with rebel Columbians or gainsaying Britons, has been always fair and admirable, returns to his official duties. George Washington Morrison Nutt takes the high road to fame, and on dit to matrimony. Business, health, and pleasure seekers go their several ways, and so ends the history of my first voyage.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 31st of January. The capture of Savannah and Hood's retreat Southward from Tennessee concluded the campaign of 1864. Up to that time the war for the Union had been for the most part a repeated series of campaigns along the border, or at important points along the coast, rarely overstepping certain pretty well defined limits. Virginia and Tennessee had been the great battle-grounds of the war. Two great inroads, however, had been made in the western part of the Confederacy. The capture of Vicksburg in 1863 had secured to the Federal armies undisturbed possession of the Mississippi River to its mouth, and a partial sway over a wide strip of Mississippi on the one side, and of Arkansas and Louisiana on the other. From Cairo to New Orleans the Federal gun-boats paroled the river, absolutely preventing communication between the Confederate armies on either side. From Chattanooga, also, on the southern border of Tennessee, Sherman had advanced through Georgia; in the first stage, and by the rugged marches and severe battles of the summer campaign, transferring his military centre to Atlanta, and in the second stage, by an easy promenade, in the months of November and December, to Savannah on the Atlantic coast. Proceeding upon this second stage, he had left a campaign behind him and a skillful general to decide it; while he was investing Savannah Hood was being defeated and driven from before Nashville. By this movement through Georgia Sherman, if he had not permanently bisected the cis-Atlantic portion of the Confederacy, had at least done so temporarily, by a pretty thorough mutilation of the railroad system centring at Atlanta.

Such was the military situation in the South and West at the close of our last Record. A new era of the war had begun. The Confederacy, by its reverses in the Shenandoah and in Tennessee, had been driven to a purely defensive policy, and, even for the purposes of defense, had been so far exhausted as to be able against three grand armies to oppose but one—namely, Lee's army in Virginia. That army was immediately threatened from City Point, near at hand, and from Savannah, at a distance. The theatre of impending conflict was narrowed down to the territory between the James and Savannah rivers, including the two Carolinas and the southern half of Virginia. On the James was Grant's army, on the Savannah was Sherman's—both well appointed, confident, and efficient. Lee's army confronted the former; the latter had opposed to it, and in the way of its advance northward, only detachments scattered along the coast and at important points in the interior immediately threatened.

So far as General Sherman is concerned, the last month has been one of elaborate preparation. His army—at the beginning of the year numbering sixty thousand, cavalry and infantry—has been strongly reinforced. Efficient corps formerly associated with it in the West have rejoined it. A portion of the Nineteenth Corps, under General Grover, has relieved General Geary's command from duty in Savannah. The campaign about to be entered upon from this point is stupendous in its proportions, and beset with uncommon difficulties, from the nature of the country in which it is to be conducted. The enemy, too, will be able to oppose an obstinate resistance. It is not unlikely that Sherman will have to confront as large an army as he fought in the Atlanta campaign, and it is quite probable that he will again be opposed to General Joseph Johnston. The Confederate Congress, January 21, passed a measure providing for the office of Generalissimo, with the intent that it should be filled by General Lee. A few days before this bill was passed the General Assembly of Virginia recommended to Mr. Davis the appointment of General Lee as General-in-Chief. Mr. Davis replied that whenever it should be found practicable by General Lee to assume command of all the armies of the Confederate States, without withdrawing him from the direct command of the Army of Northern Virginia, he would place him in such command.

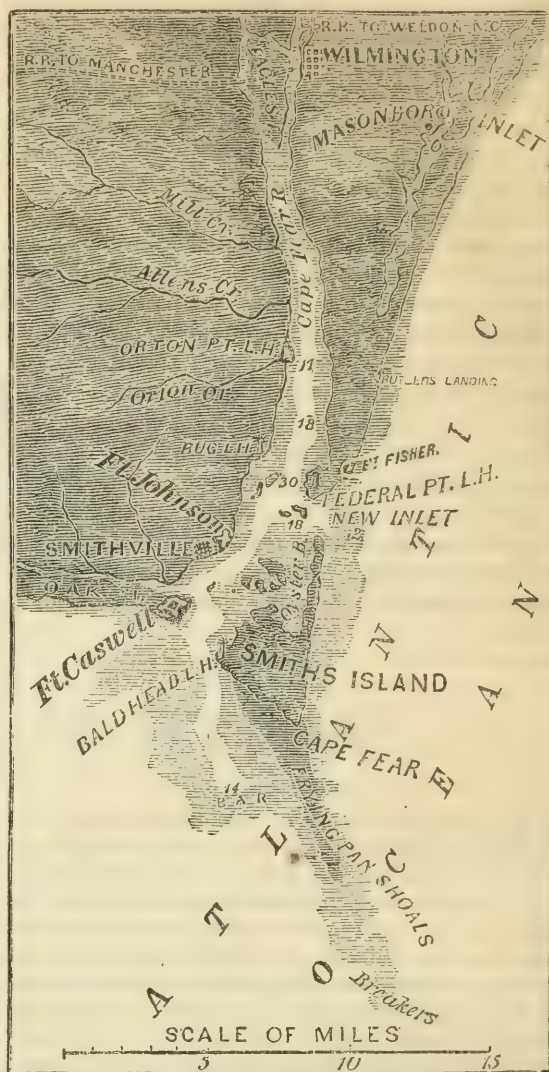

This would seem to indicate that Lee may retain his present position; at least, it is known that up to the 31st he had not even been nominated Generalissimo. If this indication be borne out by facts, it is probable that to General Johnston will be given the command of the army of the Carolinas confronting General Sherman. In that event we shall have repeated the tactics of last summer's campaign in Georgia.

In this opening campaign there are two favorable features. The first arises from the number of available bases of operation along or near the coast from Savannah to Fortress Monroe. Of these there are at least four—Pocotaligo, accessible by Broad River; Charleston; Georgetown, at the mouth of the Santee, which river is navigable to Columbia, as the Savannah River is to Augusta; and Wilmington, accessible by Cape Fear River. The other favorable feature is the temper of the people of Georgia and North Carolina in relation to the war, between which two States South Carolina is sandwiched. The disposition of the people of Georgia to submit to the Federal Government has been greatly increased since the occupation of Savannah. The date of occupation was December 21, 1864. Just one week afterward a meeting of citizens was held, under the call of their Mayor, Doctor Richard Arnold, and resolutions were unanimously adopted "to accept peace, submitting to the national authority under the Constitution, laying aside all differences, and burying by-gones in the grave of the past." Sherman's policy toward the citizens was beneficent and judicious. It was known throughout the State that perfect order reigned in Savannah, and that soldiers were in all instances summarily punished for any interference with the citizens. The charge against Sherman's army, that in its march through the State it had been guilty of outrages upon citizens, was retracted by the Georgia papers as totally unfounded in fact. These facts influenced the people of the State, and more especially the southeastern part, where Union meetings were held, and the people prepared to resist Confederate authority. Among other features connected with Sherman's policy in his Department, which comprises all the territory south of Virginia, the order of January 16, providing homes for freedmen, is noticeable. For this purpose he has appropriated the islands south from Charleston, the abandoned rice plantations along the rivers for 30 miles back from the sea, and the country bordering on the St. John River, Florida. In settlements hereafter to be established no white person is to reside, but the negroes are to have the exclusive management of affairs. General R. Saxton was by this order appointed Inspector of Settlements and Plantations.

The first of the above-mentioned bases of operations in the Carolinas and the one nearest Savannah, Pocotaligo, has already been secured. January 14 the Fifteenth and Seventeenth Corps, under Howard, were transferred to Beaufort, and from that point moved upon the place, which was abandoned by the Confederate force, the latter retreating to the north side of the Combahee River. The point thus gained is 50 miles distant from Charleston, and 30 miles from Branchville.

The most important part of the operations against Wilmington, the naval base nearest to the James, was successfully accomplished by the capture of Fort Fisher on the 15th of the month. After the failure of the first attempt against the fort in December, the fleet returned to Beaufort to refit for a second expedition. General Butler, at the request of the Lieutenant-General, was removed from command of the army of the James, and General Weitzel took a furlough to get married. There had not been a cordial agreement between the military and naval commanders in the first expedition. In the second, Admiral Porter retained command of the fleet; the military command was assigned to General Alfred H. Terry, a skillful though modest soldier, who had in a quiet way distinguished himself at the capture of Fort Pulaski, in the operations against Morris Island and Fort Wagner, and in the summer campaign of Butler's army north of the James. The force given to General Butler in the first expedition had consisted of 6500 men. Terry's force was the same with the addition of a single brigade, making in all about 10,000 men. Besides these Admiral Porter had over a thousand marines available for the assault. The expedition arrived off Federal Point on the morning of the 13th. In the afternoon the troops were landed with provisions for twelve days. At 7.30 A.M. Porter sent in five monitors—the Monadnock, Mahopac, Saugus, Canonicus, and New Ironsides, the latter taking the lead; and the action commenced within a thousand yards of the fort. The effect of the bombardment was soon seen upon the southern angle of the work; traverses were disarranged, and one after another the guns were silenced. The wooden ships following the Brooklyn formed a second line of attack.

The bombardment from the fleet was continued on the 14th with good effect until sunset, when, says Admiral Porter, "the fort was reduced to a pulp." A reconnoissance was made by Terry, and it was arranged between him and Porter that an assault should be made at three P.M. the next day; the bombardment to continue up to that time. At the time fixed upon for this event, Paine's Division of colored soldiers, carefully intrenched, held the entire width of the beach facing toward Wilmington. This was to confront Hoke's Division, which might approach from Wilmington. This division, in the first expedition, was near at hand on Butler's flank. It did not at this time make its appearance, though it had by way of the river reinforced the garrison of the fort with about one thousand men. The assaulting party was formed in two separate columns—one consisting of the naval brigade, 1200 strong, under Commander K. R. Breese, the other, about 3000 strong, under General Ames. The former advanced against the seaward front of the fort under a terrific fire of grape and canister. The fire of the fleet had broken a way through the stockade guarding the approach to this side by flank, and the advance of the column rushed through to scale the fort. It had been intended that while this was being done a portion of the marine force in the trenches would cover the boarding party with their fire. But this was not done. As the stockade was reached Lieutenants Porter and Preston fell mortally wounded. The assault failed, and the brigade fell back. The garrison of the fort, numbering 2300 men, supposed this to be the main column, and that Ames's Division in the woods was intended as a support. But while they were giving their whole attention to this attack, Ames was already entering the eastern side of the fort facing the river. Here began a series of traverses—seventeen in number—on the northeast face. These were immense bomb-proofs, 60 feet in length and 23 in height, between which were mounted the guns on that side. Seven of these had been gained almost by surprise; the top of the eighth was reached, but was regained by the enemy. Here began the fierce contest in the fort which lasted nearly eight hours. The fire of the fleet was successfully directed against the traverses still in the enemy's possession. At four o'clock one half the fort had been gained, and the position was maintained until nine o'clock, when reinforcements arrived, and a final charge drove the enemy from the fort toward the extremity of the point, where the surrender was made. The fight had been severe—hand to hand, musket against musket; and the loss on both sides was great. Of the garrison 1900 men were surrendered, the other 400 being either killed or wounded. Every one of the brigade commanders of Ames's column—Curtis, Pennybacker, and Bell—had been wounded. The entire loss in the military division was 691, of which 88 were killed and 92 missing. Admiral Porter states his loss at 330. Total loss, 1021. The fort mounted 55 heavy guns, which were captured; among them a 150-pound Armstrong gun, bearing the name of its inventor. The capture of Fort Fisher was immediately followed by the possession of Fort Caswell, commanding the Old Inlet, and all the fortifications near the mouth of Cape Fear River. The capture of Wilmington will probably follow soon, when that city will become the grand base of the Carolina campaign.

The next morning after the capture of Fort Fisher a lamentable accident occurred. By some culpable negligence soldiers were allowed to approach the magazine with lighted candles. This occasioned an explosion, from which upward of 200 casualties resulted, which are included in the above estimate of losses.

The Virginia campaign has developed nothing new. The Shenandoah has ceased to be an important theatre of operations on either side. On the 11th a detachment of the enemy, under General Rosser, advanced to Beverly, in West Virginia, and succeeded in surprising and capturing the small national force stationed at that point.—On New-Year's Day the bulkhead of the Dutch Gap Canal was removed by explosion. The result was hardly satisfactory, as a good portion of the earth returned into the crater formed by the explosion. Six tons of powder were used. This was to have been the final step in a bold scheme for cutting off seven miles of the James River by a canal two hundred yards in length across Dutch Gap—the narrow neck of the peninsula known as Farrar's Island. The work, which was originally General Butler's suggestion, was surveyed August 7, and was under the superintendence of General B. C. Ludlow, assisted by Major Peter S. Michie, chief of engineers on Butler's staff.—On the 23d an attempt was made by the Confederate iron-clads on the James to descend the river past the obstructions off Farrar's Island. It was a bold design directed against General Grant's base at City Point, and against the army north of the river. At least three iron-clads—the Richmond, Virginia, and Fredericksburg—were engaged in the raid. These were accompanied by the Drewry, a small wooden gun-boat mounting one gun. This boat got aground and was blown up. The enemy claims that the Fredericksburg passed the obstructions, but says that, owing to the Richmond and Virginia getting aground, the expedition was given up. It was really the land batteries that prevented the success of this daring raid, the most prominent among them being the Curtis House Battery.

General Hood effected his escape across the Tennessee River December 23 at Bainbridge, eight miles above Florence. He owed his safe retreat to Forrest's cavalry, which effectually covered his rear after the stand made at Spring Hill.

On the 21st, General Grierson started from Memphis with a force 3000 strong for a raid against the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, in General Hood's rear. He destroyed the road in great part from Corinth to Okalona. Ten miles south of the latter point he met with formidable resistance, and instead of proceeding to Meridian, as was his first intention, he turned westward, striking the Mississippi Central Railroad below Granada, destroying 30 miles of it with several locomotives and 50 cars, together with extensive factories. About 700 prisoners were captured, including Brigadier-General Gholson. There were also brought away 1000 negroes and as many horses.

On the 7th, a party of Indians attacked the Overland Mail coach near Julesburg, Colorado, and robbed the express mail. The troops at Julesburg started in pursuit, and a fight ensued, in which 35 Indians and 19 whites were killed.

The great political event of the month was the passage by the House, on the 31st, of the following joint resolution:

"Be it resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE 13.—Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The vote stood 119 for to 56 against—being two votes more in favor of the resolution than the requisite two-thirds majority. The following members of the Opposition voted in the affirmative: Messrs. Bailey, Coffroth, and M'Allister, of Pennsylvania, Baldwin of Michigan, English of Connecticut, Hutchins of Ohio, Rollins and King of Missouri, Yeaman of Kentucky, Wheeler of Wisconsin, and Ganson, Griswold, Herrick, Nelson, Odell, Radford, and Steele, of New York. There were eight members absent or not voting. Of the votes in the negative only one was from an Administration member—that of Brutus J. Clay of Kentucky. This joint resolution passed the Senate April 8, 1864, by a vote of 38 to 6, six members not voting. It came up before the House May 31, and was lost, there being only 95 votes for to 66 against.

The State Convention of Missouri, at St. Louis, on the 11th, passed the following ordinance by a vote of 60 to 4:

"Be it ordained by the people of the State of Missouri, in Convention assembled, that hereafter in this State there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except in punishment of crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

Besides the joint resolution above mentioned the following measures have passed the United States Congress: Resolution of inquiry respecting the credits given to the several States on the ground of naval enlistments, and the principle of their apportionment; to which the Secretary of War replied that the number of credits given for naval enlistments from April 17, 1861, to January 24, 1864, was 67,687, which had been apportioned to the places where the enlisted men resided.—Joint resolution to give the Government of Great Britain notice of the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty.—Bill changing the place of holding the United States Circuit and District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia from Richmond to Norfolk.—The Amendatory Loan Bill, providing for no additional loan, but only changing the one already authorized from five-twenties to seven-thirties.—Resolution for the appointment of a Committee to count the votes in the late Presidential election; an amendment was added in the House, excluding from representation in the Electoral College the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee.—The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill: occasion was taken to insert before the word "Mexico" the words "Republic of" instead of "Empire of."

The following measures have passed the Senate: Joint resolution to free the families of colored soldiers.—Bill amending the act defining the pay of army officers so that a brevet rank shall not entitle the holder to any increase of pay.—Resolution to retaliate upon Southern prisoners for the sufferings inflicted upon our own, with amendments restricting its operations so that they shall conform to the law of nations and the usages of civilized war.

In the House, the following have been the principal measures passed: Resolution of inquiry as to the Parrott guns burst in the first bombardment of Fort Fisher, their number, and the cause of explosion; to which the Secretary of the Navy replied that five guns were destroyed, on the Ticonderoga, Juniata, Mackinaw, Quaker City, and Yantic.—Bill providing that in any action by or against any executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other unless called to do so by the other.—Resolution of inquiry relative to prisoners confined in Old Capitol and Carroll prisons.—Amendment to the Legislative Appropriation Bill, appropriating, in addition to the $2,000,000 already appropriated, $1,777,000 for procuring dies, stamps, and paper for printing and circulating Treasury Notes.—Post-office Appropriation Bill.—Resolution to reduce the duty on imported printing paper from 20 to 3 per cent. ad valorem, which was reported in the Senate afterward with an amendment to reduce the duty to 15 per cent.—Resolutions of inquiry into the facts relative to the trade with insurrectionary States.—Resolution providing for the publication of President Madison's correspondence.

The House resolution dropping from the Army List all unemployed general officers was indefinitely postponed in the Senate.

CANADA.

Our relations with Canada have taken a brighter aspect. Burley, who was engaged in the raid on Lake Erie, has been recommitted in spite of Mr. Davis's recognition of him as a Confederate officer. Governor-General Monck includes in his financial estimate of expenses for the current year an appropriation to refund the money captured by the St. Alban's raiders. A bill has been introduced into the Canadian House of Assembly, which passed to a second reading on the 31st, giving power to the Provincial Government, under certain conditions, to remove such aliens from the country as may have proved themselves unworthy of an asylum therein.

EUROPE.

Publicity has been given to a bull signed by the Pope October 8, 1864, condemning all modern religious and political errors having a tendency hostile to the temporal power of the Catholic Church, and exhorting the bishops to confute them. This Encyclical Letter was drawn up by a Committee of Theologians, under the Presidency of Cardinal Caterini. In regard to this bull, which created general surprise throughout Europe, the French Government has decided that it is subversive of the Constitution, and can not be published.

The Spanish Cortes were opened December 22. January 7 Marshal Narvaez submitted a bill to repeal the act reincorporating San Domingo in the Spanish monarchy. The bill met with great resistance from the Opposition. The attitude of Spain toward Peru has become moderate, and it is likely that there will be no hostile collision on the Chincha Islands question.

Victor Emanuel has decreed that the Florentine convents shall be appropriated for the use of Government.

The Russian Emperor has issued an ukase extending the abolition of serfdom to Trans-Caucasia, the only province of the Russian empire where that institution still exists.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE essence of courtesy is kindness. Even when it is merely a form it is still an affectation of good feeling; and a man of truly large heart is generally a man of truly pleasant manners. In a country of travelers like ours courtesy is peculiarly essential to comfort. We live among strangers at hotels and upon railroads and steamers, and a churl is a public nuisance. A kind word, a generous act, a little self-denial, a little consideration of others upon the part of every man, would make a total of national good feeling and comfort to which every one ought to be glad to contribute. Yet it is unpleasantly true that a little meanness and selfishness often carry applause as manliness and shrewdness.

The Easy Chair was painfully reminded of this truth not long ago as it was rolling along the railroad between New York and Boston. The observation it made there will answer for many other railroads and regions in the country.

At Springfield the evening trains from Albany and from New York connect and proceed as an express train to Boston. A gentleman, whom we will call Mr. A—, turned in his seat in the smoking-car as the train moved out of Springfield, and said to Mr. B—, who was sitting behind him:

"From New York, Sir?"

Mr. B—, evidently surprised and a little amused by the abrupt question, answered, briefly,

"Yes, Sir."

"Going to Boston, Sir?" was the prompt rejoinder.

Mr. B—, clearly nettled by what he thought an impertinent inquisitiveness, replied, blandly but decidedly,

"Yes, Sir. Are you?"

There was something in the tone which seemed to ask, politely enough, what business it was of Mr. A—'s where Mr. B— was going. The quiet reproof of the tone was evidently felt by Mr. A—, and he explained:

"I beg pardon for my apparent curiosity, but I asked because I come to-day from beyond Albany; and as I live about four miles out of Boston I am anxious to be dropped near my home instead of being carried on and compelled to return so far after midnight. But the conductor will not stop the train for a passenger with an Albany ticket, while he will do so for one from New York. So if you would kindly exchange tickets with me I shall be at home at a reasonable hour, and the train will be delayed scarcely a minute in arriving at Boston."

It was a perfectly frank and fair request, and Mr. B— replied that he would willingly make the exchange. He gave his ticket to Mr. A—, who thanked him warmly and gave his in return. It was a very simple and natural act, and the conversation between the gentlemen was loud enough to be heard by all the passengers around them. The train rolled on; the conductor passed through and clipped the tickets; and at midnight Mr. B—, with the rest, alighted from the cars in the Boston station. He took his place with others in a sleigh for the hotel; but just as it left the station one of the other passengers said, in a chuckling tone, to his neighbor:

"Did you see the neat thing C— did in the cars to-night?"

"No, what was it?" asked his companion.

"Well, there was a fellow who came by the Albany train and joined us at Springfield, who asked a man from New York to exchange tickets with him, because he wanted to get off before reaching Boston, and he said the conductor would not stop the train except for a New York ticket. The New York man exchanged with him, and C— heard the whole thing. When the conductor came along C— told him the story, and pointed out the men. The conductor smiled, passed on, and said nothing. But after we left Worcester, and he came round again, the Albany man asked him if he would slow the train to give him a chance to jump off at his point. The conductor asked him where he came from. The man showed his New York ticket. 'Yes,' said the conductor, 'but you don't come from New York.' 'Why, here is my ticket,' replied the other. 'Yes, my friend, but you came from Albany, and you have exchanged your ticket with a New York passenger, and the train can not stop, you know.' And the Albany chap was brought all the way in, and has got to get out of town as he can, and a darned cold journey he'll have of it. Smart in C—, wasn't it?"

And the two passengers laughed together at C—'s "neat thing."

Yes, it was smart, but it was ineffably mean. It showed a petty and narrow mind, and a lack of that generosity which ennobles men and makes human intercourse delightful. How instinctively you pity the wife and children of such a man! How poor the riches that come by such smartness! It was not a great crime—it was only an infinitely little discourtesy. It kept a man from reaching his home two hours, or perhaps a night, earlier, and it did not bring any other man five minutes sooner to his home. A small peg on the inside of the sole of your shoe is not a sword-thrust into your heart. But courtesy, generosity, the instincts of a gentleman, no more prick you with a pin than they cut you with a sabre. Every man should remember that he is upon trial when he travels. There is an inquest of a car-ful of other men and women upon his politeness and real manliness.

EDWARD EVERETT died a private citizen, although his whole life had been devoted to public service. He died at a most fortunate moment for his fame; and in the general gratitude for his faithful service during the war every body was willing to forget that his prescience had not been equal to his patriotism. But if a man strikes with all his might when danger comes to his country it is rather hard to reproach him that he did not see it coming. In our recent history we have all had need of much forbearance. If some did not see the approach of danger, they have at least been conspicuously steady and strong when it appeared; and, on the other hand, some who foresaw the attack have been very far from wise in the defense.

Mr. Everett was not a man of genius, nor of that temperament which makes or controls epochs in human affairs. But he had remarkable gifts, and they were remarkably cultivated. His powers of literary acquisition were extraordinary, his memory singularly trained and retentive, his intellectual habit rigidly methodical, and his scholarship, therefore, was not only vast and various, but its resources were constantly at the command of his delicate tact and courtesy. If in public speaking he never inspired his hearers, he was always sure to charm them by the elegance and symmetry of the form, and instruct them by the comprehensive and well-digested substance of his orations.

His various accomplishments made him in many ways a most valuable foreign minister, and he related with a full sense of its humor—for his perception of comedy was acute—a little incident of his official residence as American Minister in London.

One day, at a pleasant country house, where Washington Irving and Bancroft were also guests, the conversation, as was natural among three gentlemen who had all been foreign ministers, fell upon diplomatic life. Irving, with the sly twinkle in his eye, was soon telling comical incidents of his experience when Everett, after listening with an air of great amusement, said:

"One of the drollest incidents in my diplomatic life occurred at my presentation as United States Minister in England. I went to the palace, by appointment, with Lord Melbourne, feeling very uncomfortable in my official toggery, and found that the Neapolitan ambassador, the Prince Castelcicala, was to be presented at the same time. We were introduced to each other, and after a proper interval the official presentations to her Majesty took place. When they were over [probably at Windsor] Lord Melbourne said:

"Your Excellencies will be expected to remain, and in the evening join a game of whist with the Duchess of Kent"—[the Queen's mother].

"We bowed," continued Mr. Everett, "and Lord Melbourne added,

"I play a very poor game myself, in fact, I scarcely understand it; but the Duchess is very fond of it."

"And I," said the Prince Castelcicala, turning to me, "I am a very poor player; and if I should chance to be your Excellency's partner, I invoke your forbearance in advance."

"We were all moving down the corridor toward the Duchess's apartments," said Mr. Everett, with a grave smile, "and it was very amusing to hear our mutual apologies and deprecations, especially as I remarked in my turn that I was not very familiar with the game. Here we were, three dignified personages in middle life, clad in extraordinary attire, and solemnly proceeding to play a game which we imperfectly understood, and for which we did not care in the least.

"When we reached the Duchess's apartments she was seated at the table, and we were formally presented, and, at her gracious invitation, seated ourselves for the game. Just as we were beginning to play, a lady in waiting approached and placed herself at the back of the Duchess's chair. The Duchess then turned to us and said, politely:

"Your Excellencies will excuse me if I rely upon the advice of my friend here, for I really am a very poor player."

"It was inexpressibly droll," said Mr. Everett, "and it was a curious illustration of the ceremonial character of court life."

Yet no man was more punctilious in observing all conventional duties than Mr. Everett. His humorous perception of their frequent absurdity did not disturb his respectful deference to them. So in his oratory he did not disdain any dramatic effects, and sometimes used them very skillfully. The felicitous rhetorical stroke which confirmed his fame as an orator was his appeal to Lafayette at the close of his discourse at Cambridge before the Phi Beta Kappa Society; and in his subsequent eulogy upon Lafayette in Faneuil Hall he turned at the close of his oration and apostrophized the bust of the General which stood beside him, "Speak, marble lips!" amidst the enthusiastic emotion of his audience.

Less fortunate, however, was his display of the piece of the ocean telegraphic cable in his discourse to the Alumni at Harvard, and his striking his pockets, and jingling the keys and coin in them, in the oration upon Washington, when he alluded to Marlborough, the sordid miser. So also a little story told of his delivery of the same oration illustrates his fondness of elaborate dramatic effect in oratory.

There is a passage in the discourse in which he spoke of the soldiers of the Revolution, and as he was waiting in the ante-room before going upon the platform a Revolutionary veteran was introduced to him. Mr. Everett talked with him pleasantly, and, speaking of his oration, asked the old man to rise and stand before the audience when he began the passage. The old soldier was gratified, and said he would certainly do it.

The company proceeded to the platform, the veteran was seated conspicuously in full view of the audience, and the orator began. When he reached the passage alluding to the old soldiers he turned toward the veteran, who began to move and get upon his legs. After some struggling he succeeded, and the old man stood painfully leaning upon his cane, when the orator, raising his hand and addressing him, exclaimed:

"Nay, Sir, sit down, sit down; it is for us to stand in your presence!"

Upon which the bewildered veteran, somewhat confounded, sank back again into his seat, and afterward said, "That Mr. Everett is a very queer man. He told me to stand up, and the moment I stood up he said to me, 'Sit down, Sir, sit down.'"

But even Burke did not hesitate to aid his oratory by such effects.

It was very striking to see how Boston honored her son in his obsequies. Approaching the city from the north and east, and rumbling over the piles that carry the railroads to the main land, you saw the flag upon Bunker Hill monument, and all the lower flags in the city, hanging at half mast. People in the cars coming from the country to see the pageant were consulting where to find the best places, and there was but one topic in all circles. The street near the church was thronged; the building overflowed; the streets through which the procession was to pass were lined with spectators, and many of the shops upon the route were hung in mourning, while business was generally suspended. By-and-by the minute-guns on the Common and at the Navy-yard began to boom slowly; the church bells solemnly tolled; and the roll of muffled drums and the long, pealing, melancholy wail of the wind instruments filled the air. The mounted soldiers, the infantry, the heavily-curtained hearse, the file of carriages passed by, and the orator who, within the week, had made the last speech of his many speeches upon the theatre of his many triumphs, was hidden from human eyes forever.

The public sorrow at Everett's death is in many of the noblest minds also an act of forgiveness. Had he died four years before he would have missed his best fame. No student of his time can forget that, until those four years, the gifts and graces of this noted American citizen were lost to the cause of America. If it were not recorded, his own confession would remind us of it. And the simplest and noblest act of his life, the act which restored him to the old love of his old admirers and the fresh respect of the new, was the avowal that he had mistaken his times. With a happiness and satisfaction he had not known for many a year, he saw at last that America was Liberty, and bowing his heart before her she touched his lips with a sweeter music than they had ever known.

And one of the truest and most honored priests of that Liberty, William Cullen Bryant, born in the same year with Mr. Everett, speaks for all who have lamented the long palliation of fatal wrong which his temperament and training imposed upon Everett, in saying at the Union League Club in New York: "If I have ever uttered any thing in derogation of Mr. Everett's public character, at times when it seemed to me he did not resist with becoming spirit the aggression of wrong, I now, looking back upon his noble record of the last four years, retract it at his grave; I lay upon his hearse the declaration of my sorrow that I saw not then the depth of his worth, that I did not discern under the conservatism which formed a part of his nature that generous courage which a great emergency could so nobly awaken."

THE building of the National Academy of Design is now nearly finished, and is one of the most conspicuous objects in the city. It is well situated, upon the corner of the broad Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street; and in these winter days its pure white marble walls, rising from the white snow, are contrasted with the blue sky in a more daring manner than most of our architects have attempted. White marble, indeed, is no longer a novel building material in New York; but it is always striking, and its treatment in this structure is original in this country.

A work so elaborate and conscientious as this building no man should dismiss with a careless criticism. We have not examined it critically. More than once, however, we have stopped to observe and to delight in the ornaments cut upon the marble, freshly copied from nature. After the Egyptian and Roman and Grecian and Gothic abominations in brick and plaster and wood with which the city abounds, the decoration of which is purely conventional and the effect humiliating, here is the return to nature for which the best art of modern times has been sighing. And how rich, how graceful, how honest, is the effect!

The building is sure to provoke censure. It is enough to do that that it is new. The passengers in the street cars "don't like such a queer looking thing." There are others who will see in it a little Doge's palace. And certainly it recalls that famous building, although its color and proportions are so different. There are others, too, who will find that the grand entrance, however beautiful and effective in itself, somehow dwarfs the whole and suggests a spacious marble cottage. There are many more who will suggest many more objections. But the architect need not wince. A work so fair and sincere as this will plead against all the charges of "queerness," and plead successfully. Let the passenger who stops to contemplate in the winter morning this happy thought wrought out in snow that does not melt, recall the building at the corner of Leonard Street and Broadway, where, a few years since, the Academy was housed. Let him go and look at it, and reflect that there was no outburst of popular indignation when it was built, and then ask himself whether a city may not justly be proud which has advanced in so few years from gravely erecting such a building to this new one upon the Fourth Avenue.

When it is fully finished, what a joyous dedication there ought to be! How all the finest pictures accessible ought to be hung upon the walls, and a very few words be said by the very simplest tongue! When that time comes we hope to say something more about it.

Our kind friend, "A Disappointed Man," will not grudge the little delay in printing his pleasant little essay, for he knows the exigencies of a Magazine, and alas! he has acquired, perhaps, the sad habit of resignation to all kinds of disappointment. But his suggestions are not less true in March than they would have been in February. There is no more royal pleasure than that of music at table. There is no more royal privilege than the power of having it. What a sense of a lordly banquet the last scene in Don Giovanni conveys, when the band enters and plays while the magnifico eats; the band, not the two or three starveling fifers and fiddlers standing around, who sometimes "disfigure or present" it. No, the band, the orchestra rather, as it used to be represented at the Royal Opera in Berlin, where there was a harmonious multitude blowing and scraping in a gorgeous balcony. Music is as much part of a true feast as the mighty sirloin and the ortolan.

"DEAR MR. EASY CHAIR,—When my friend, Mr. Christopher Crowfield, told in the December Atlantic how cooking should be done, he missed one thing, in my opinion. That thing is music. There is more in music, as connected with digestion, than appears at first thought. Let me illustrate my meaning by an instance.

"There is a little dingy cellar on Anna Maria Street, in this city, the proprietor of which is a stalwart, velvet-clad Frenchman. He gives one a dinner of three courses for a mere trifle, and wine at discretion when paid for extra. The soups are rather watery; the entrées not what Soyer would recommend, and the vegetables run pretty much upon one thing—potatoes or spinach. But let that pass. In the wine, I am afraid, there is more than a suspicion of logwood, and the dessert is—one apple. Sometimes, however, there comes into this gloomy, subterranean dining-room a band of three Italians. Two bear harps, and the third a violin. They establish themselves in one corner; and, after the usual amount of thrumming, pour forth a flood of melody that fills every corner. Oh, Sir! that is the secret of this little salon. That is the key to the excellence of that French cookery. Three men, with harps and a violin, banish indigestion, and set the stomach at its work to tuneful measures.

"There are no truffles in the 'civet de lievre'; rather onions instead. The bouquet of the wine is not inspiring until the harps ripple out some tinkling stave, and the bread is, to speak mildly, glutinous and potatoey. But after that band of three have struck the props out from under the song, and let it slide down the wires into the air, the guests are guests of Lucullus, the table linen is damask, the earthenware is china of Sèvres, and the wine of such vintage and flavor that one dreams of it long after.

"When I individually hear these harpers I am persuaded, nay, convinced, that the world is much better than it is represented. Three minutes before perhaps the shambling gargon dribbled a rill of gravy from a 'blanquette de veau' that ran white and oleaginous over my coat-sleeve. I forgave him. I shall pension his family; and I thank the harpers that they turned the tide of my wrath into another channel.

"Dear Mr. Easy Chair, you have seen, in rumbling over the different floors in this country, how our respected fellow-citizens eat themselves to death. You know we are, as a race, lank, lean, and bilious. What I would suggest is this: more music and less grease; more melody and less misery, from a digestive point of view. Little Tommy Tucker sang for his supper, and I have no doubt he was all the better for the performance.

"When the band strikes up at Newport you can see the members from Africa step more lightly under their fragrant or savory loads. You can see Araminta Dulcibella beam all over with courtesy, and Alphonso chuckle with a suppressed joke. Conundrums rise to propound themselves, and jests and laughter supplant saturnine and splenetic countenances. When my friend Jeremiah Higgins eats his Thanksgiving dinner he does penance for a week thereafter; but Amadée Leschaud dines every day, to the tinkling of cymbals and whispering of harps, on 'perdrix au truffes' and 'concomitants' without a shudder.

"Oh, Sir! if we had fiddlers in every dining-saloon we should have fewer savage editorials in the dailies. Mr. Kenepen, fagged out and overworked, rushes to the nearest restaurant, and devours, in nervous haste, a plate of roast pig. In the course of the afternoon he pens a slashing article on the twaddle, fudge, and utter balderdash contained in the Morning Tackhammer. He spells Weekly 'Weakly,' and rejoices as much as his stomach will allow him over this caustic sarcasm. If music can soothe the savage breast, why not the savage stomach? I put it to the Easy Chair: Is it not better to be fluted into a suitable frame of mind during one's repast than to be dinner-pilled after it? Is not a musician better than a physician, and are not songs better than the sighs which emanate from the depths of the stomach? Oh, Sir! when the harp strikes his throbbing wires I feel no mere mortal experience can worry me. There are more guests present than they who sit at meat, and the rustlings that I hear are not merely those made by my neighbor turning his Times.

"Therefore, as I remarked at the outset, I wish Mr. Crowfield had said something about music in connection with cookery or our dinners.

"I once 'boarded out' where the daughter of the landlady was in the habit of betaking herself to the piano and bawling out, 'A watcher, pale and tearful,' whenever a meal was in progress. I do not think that aided any one's digestion; 'on the contrary, quite the reverse.' But I know for a certainty that a harp can soothe and assuage the sorrows of many a sensitive organization, and that a flute can warble, or a violin lull the troubled digestion into tractability. I would bring the soul of song into every house instead of potions, and there should be no grief unallayed.

"At twilight fall my wife sits and sings while the baby at her breast draws its life from her. Rosy little cherub! how sweetly it smiles when the lullaby falls gently upon its ear! But let Louisa scold, for instance (though she never does), and I know that pains and pangs unutterable would tweak the bowels of that unhappy child of our love. Sir, to be at ease when dining one must be sung to or played at skillfully and in harmony, and if the best results do not ensue I am . . . A DISAPPOINTED MAN."

THE Easy Chair is glad to see that traveling manners are still a subject of thought among its friends. How can it be believed that he or she who is not a gentleman or lady in a railroad car is so in any other place?

"If any body leaves a seat without a coat, or shawl, or bag, or something to mark his place, I shall take it," said a person in the seat behind a certain traveler.

"Yes, but if a gentleman comes and says that it is his seat?" asked his friend.

"Can't help it. No man can keep a seat in that way."

"Not by his word?"

"No."

It was very clear that if a gentleman came to claim such a seat he would not find one in it. But hear what a small voice from Washington says:

"DEAR EASY CHAIR,—So very much is said about the courtesy of gentlemen toward ladies manifested in resigning seats and the nameless other little attentions which so much assist ladies traveling alone, I want to tell you something neither you nor Miss Dorinda seem to have noticed. It is, that the same gentlemen who so persistently retain their seats while Miss D. or her friend pass along, looking, not saying, Give me your seats—I am a lady! will rise instantly to resign their seats, even though they are obliged to stand, in favor of that modest little one whose only trouble is fear of troubling others, and her look of thanks, even though she speak not the words, is sufficient recompense. Gentlemen are quick to read the language of the face, and know intuitively whether it says, It is only my due; or, How good you are! Perhaps while Dorinda is thinking, If he were a gentleman he would give me his seat; the same He is thinking, If she were a lady I would give up my seat.

"I speak these words impulsively, not to shield the other sex, but for the right. I am a woman and mean to be womanly; it were simple justice to say a gentle-woman. Once we were proud of that appellation. Why is it Lady now? I have traveled much, and often alone. I am not handsome, and dress only plainly, and I never yet was obliged to stand in coach or car, however crowded. And now, dear Easy Chair, if you think any one may become more of a true lady, through the hint implied in this, please tell it in your own way. Say, too, that the real language of the heart becomes so habitual to the face that it is not easily masked, and especially in those little things. Is it because we are gentlewomen no longer that the name is abandoned? Is it not significant of the change in ourselves that the old name and the old chivalry are departing together?"

"Respectfully, from

A LITTLE ONE."

A VERY judicious friend of this Magazine, as will plainly appear from her saying: "I expect, like Bessie, to enjoy Harper in heaven. She invariably sings the last two lines of the hymn 'I want to be an angel,'

"A crown upon my forehead,
And a Harper in my hand."

adds, after some assurances of friendly esteem, her experiences of the theatre:

"I read the account, in the December Number, of your visit to the Opera, and immediately was seized with a desire to tell you my experience. Very limited it is, to be sure, as far as opera and theatre are concerned. But when I deliberately make up my mind to be deceived, I like to be deceived. Don't you? I don't enjoy seeing the scene-shifters (is that the name?) deliberately pull into view a house where there was nothing before but a garden. Because it does not seem like nature, or art either. I remember going one evening to see a distinguished tragedian in Hamlet, where the ghost came upon the stage dressed in a suit of armor, with a little square of blue turlatan thrown over his head, descending to his elbows, where it stood out from him in every direction. I did not wonder that Hamlet appeared startled at the sight of him. I think most people would have been. As Ophelia came on, singing her little, woeful, crazy song, the gas by some mischance went out, whereupon the king very kindly came out with a tallow-candle in his hand, casting a halo of glory about his head, while another actor, with very slim legs, very red cheeks, and an exceedingly rumpled-looking wig, tried to light the foot-lights, gazing upon us, shrouded in darkness, after each unsuccessful attempt, with a ludicrously amazed expression of countenance. This winter I heard the — Troupe in Robert le Diable. The libretto said that supernatural sights and sounds would issue from a cave. Unfortunately there was no cave, so the sights came from the side of the stage, and the sounds from the drums and fifes of the orchestra. Whether they were supernatural or not I can not say, but they were certainly terrible. I was almost inclined to agree with the friend beside me, who whispered that he thought that Operas were like tomatoes, one must learn to like them."

THIS is the Easy Chair's letter-day. It does not come very often. But here is a cheerful note which comes tumbling briskly out of the bag, and speaks a kindly word for England.

"E. CHAIR, ESQ.,—Now you suppose yourself assailed by one of the people who aspire to be literati. Not so. Yet I am one of those who can write better articles than are published. You will be gratified to learn that notwithstanding this, I keep my MSS. in an old pillow-case in the garret, waiting for paper-rags to be worth ten cents per pound:

"Cold, wire-drawn odes! Bucolics where the cows
Would scare the writer if they splashed the mud
In lashing off the flies.
And counterfeiting epics, shrill with trumps
A babe might blow between two straining cheeks
Of bubbled rose to make his mother laugh;
And elegiac griefs, and songs of love,
Like cast-off nosegays picked up on the road,
The worse for being warm!—

for ten cents per pound.

"Emerson says, 'Whoso expresses the poetry that is in him in some sort loses it.' And Tennyson,

"The poet's deep poetic heart Is better than the poet's fame;"

therefore I am content to be mute.

"I write to thank you for the kindly words that you sometimes say of the English, and to beg you to continue them. It always hurts my heart to see the endeavors of the newspapers to embitter the people's mind against England. I think newspapers give incorrect estimates of public sentiment. Most of us have lived so much in English literature that we have almost lived in England, and it is natural for us to regard England as the nearest and dearest of nations.

"We know London streets and houses by heart, and all the lanes and foot-paths in all the shires—the Hertfordshire lanes, and all the rest. Have we not walked in Oxford Street, Baker Street, the Strand, Pall Mall? Haven't we seen the Monument, and every statue in the British Museum? And have not Mrs. Gore and her friends introduced us to the very bedrooms of Belgravia? And are we not too much attached to them to be forever tilting with their masters? Since my Uncle Toby has made us all cousins, as Southey says he has, we ought to be fond of each other. The mere fact that we have so often been the guests of Doctor Primrose, tasting his best gooseberry wine, and of Elia, drinking tea in old china with himself and his Bridget, to say nothing of the hospitalities of Colonel Newcome, should make us forbearing and complaisant toward England.

"Gramercy for thy courtesy, dear Easy, to England! I kiss thy hands!"

Editor's Drawer.

THERE is great danger of knowing too much. Jones was clerk in the General Post-office Department at Washington. A letter was given to him to copy: it was to be sent to a man applying for a new Post-office, and the letter refused the application on the ground of his proximity to another office. Jones suggested to his principal that the word "nearness" would be better than "proximity;" but was told to mind his own business, and copy the letter as it was written. He did, and very soon an answer came back from the applicant that he would like to know who the scoundrel was that charged him with proximity! This pleased Jones greatly, and when he spoke of it to his principal he got his walking-papers. He was not wanted in an office where he knew more than his betters.

But he got another place. One day a stranger was in, and after finishing his business asked Jones which way he should go to the Patent Office. Jones said he didn't know. The stranger then asked the way to the Capitol, and Jones said he didn't know.

VOL. XXX.—No. 178.—N N

"Well, where is the White House?" and Jones did not know. "What do you know?" demanded the stranger. "Well, you see," said Jones, "I lost my last place because I knew too much, and now I know how to keep these ere books, and that's all I do know." The stranger retired satisfied and thoughtful.

MICHAEL M'HANNIN ran for Congress last fall. Patriotism was the dodge, and his opponent was a wounded officer fresh from the field of battle, covered with blood and glory. Michael stood a poor chance against such odds, and improved on a story he had read in the Drawer after the Mexican war. In addressing his constituents, mostly of the Hibernian denomination, Michael exclaimed:

"My brave fellow-citizens! No man, dead or alive, has done more for the Government than the humble and honorable individual who now addresses you. When this cursed rebellion first bust forth I could not leave you to go personally, but I hired a substitute to go for me; and there, my friends and fellow-citizens, there, on the red field of battle, in the midst of resounding cannon and the clash of arms, I fit and bled and died for my country!"

This unexampled patriotism in a live man carried all the voters that heard him, and the cheers for Michael made the welkin ring, and shook the stars of the tar-bangled spanner. If Michael had let it go at that it would have been well, and perhaps his country would have had his eloquence in Congress next winter. But excited by his success in rousing the enthusiasm of his friends, he went on to say:

"I was born in Munster, and fatched up in Cork, and if it hadn't been for Providence and another jintleman who guv me an edication, I should have been as ignorant as you are, my fellow-citizens!"

This was not very palatable to the merry Irishmen, and Michael subsided without even getting an invitation to liquor.

SOMETIME during the early portion of last winter, pending the proceedings of a military Court of Inquiry instituted in Washington, D. C., to examine the case of Colonel E—, an officer detached from the regular army, in command of a Pennsylvania regiment, the following conversation took place: The Colonel, who was employed in writing a paper, stopped, and asked General R—, sitting on the opposite side of the table, "How do you spell the word fulfill?" The General replied by spelling it. "I have been watching that word for ten years," said the Colonel. "My impression was it was spelled fulfil." "Indeed!" rejoined General R—. "You were not far wrong—you came within an 'L' of it."—[But one way is as right as the other.]

In the town of —, in Connecticut, lived an eccentric character, Squire S—, noted for his oddity and singular speeches. The town-hearse, having by long use got into a dilapidated condition, it was determined to get up a public subscription to repair it. In due time the committee called on Squire S—, and asked him to subscribe for the object. "No!" says the Squire; "I won't give a single cent. Twenty years ago I subscribed five dollars to build the old thing, and neither my family nor myself ever had any use for it from that day to this, and I won't give a cent to repair it!"

Our youngest boy had been reading some of Mayne Reid's thrilling stories of adventures among the Indians till his mind and heart were, for the time, pretty well filled with their spirit, when one day a friend of his mother sent word inviting her to go on Friday to Dr. H——'s church to join the ladies of the congregation in their sewing society. "Don't go, don't go, mother!" burst out young Master Harry; "they are sewing for the missionaries among the Indians, and they are trying to convert 'em, and I don't want 'em to, for when I grow up I want to go out there and have a regular fight!"

AN out-in-the-West correspondent writes:

A friend of ours, residing not far from Lake T——, has near her house a fine mineral spring, supposed to contain great medicinal virtues. She has been in the habit of receiving bottles from an old gent across the lake to be filled with the water. As each batch of bottles would arrive so would complaints that the water lost its medicinal properties on the route. At last, by way of a joke, she filled one with a mixture of water, molasses, cream tartar, and whisky, and sent him word that it would retain its strength. As luck would have it, he sent that bottle, without examining it, to be analyzed. By return express he received a letter advising him by all means to buy that spring, as a whisky cocktail spring was a valuable piece of property.

A WORTHY townsman of ours, who goes by the sobriquet of the Deacon, was met by a lady friend as he emerged from a saloon, and accosted thus: "Good-morning, Deacon; but I am sorry to see you coming out of such a place." To which he dryly replied: "Why, Madam, would you have me stay there all the time?"

NED says that on a visit to a country town last summer he was talking over the gate to a "bonnie damsel," when a rough-looking Hibernian stopped upon the walk and looked admiringly into Dulcinea's eyes. In a moment, as her face glowed with blushes, she asked, "Well, Sir, what will you have?" To which Pat replied, without a moment's hesitation, "Faith, Miss, if I should chuse, 'twould be your own swate self I'd be after having." And upon Ned's request that he should move along he replied, "No offense, honey. 'Twas a civil question from the miss, and a true answer from Pat Malone. Good-morning!"

WHEN General Sherman was in command at Benton Barracks, St. Louis, he was in the habit of visiting every part of that institution, and making himself familiar with every thing that was going on. He wore an old brown coat and a "stove-pipe hat," and was not generally recognized by the minor officials or the soldiers. One day while walking through the grounds he met with a soldier who was unmercifully beating a mule.

"Stop pounding that mule!" said the General.

"Git out!" said the soldier, in blissful ignorance of the person to whom he was speaking.

"I tell you to stop!" reiterated the General.

"You mind your business and I will mind mine," replied the soldier, continuing his flank movement upon the mule.

"I tell you again to stop!" said General S. "Do you know who I am? I am General Sherman."

"That's played out!" said the soldier. "Every man who comes along here with an old brown coat and a stove-pipe hat on claims to be General Sherman."

It is presumed that for once General Sherman considered himself outflanked.

SAM BORING was elected sheriff of one of the counties of California. Sam was educated in the Southwest, in one of those districts where the only alphabet they had was taken from the brands on the hides of stolen cattle—so the story runs, but for the latter statement we do not vouch. Now, in process of time and by process of law, Sam took a horse from a debtor by force because he would not pay. The horse was taken to the nearest town, about ten miles, and left at a livery stable. This town was about four miles from the county seat, where the sheriff kept his office. In a few days the debtor, seeing he could not escape payment, called on the sheriff, saying, if his horse would be allowed him, he would ride down among his neighbors and get the money. The sheriff knew it would be all right, and wrote the following order to the livery man for the horse:

"Mr H C—— pleas let the barrer of this not have his horse
S BORING Sheriff"

It was an awful time for mud; but the "barrer" trudged the four miles on foot and presented the "not." The livery man read the document, nodded and smiled, put it carefully in his pocket, and began to whistle. The other was in somewhat of a hurry, and said so. Livery merely looked at his applicant, as much as to say, "D'ye take me for a sawney?" Owner of horse said, "Come, give me that animal as quick as you can, for I have a long way to go and it is getting late." Livery, bristling up, inquired if the applicant took him to be a fool. "You must think I, like yourself, can't read. Here you come to me asking me to give you the horse, at the same time passing into my hands an order from the sheriff explicitly telling me not to let you have the horse." A sight of the document was demanded, drinks followed, and debtor walked to the county seat and back again through the mud—eight miles of the hardest kind of footing—to get an e added to not, in order to make a note of it!

In a beautiful village away from all the bustle and stir of railroads and steamboats, and not a thousand miles from Detroit, lives Dominie L——, one of the best of men, and pastor of a flourishing church there. Some years ago the Dominie was very much annoyed by the fact that George N——, a godless young blacksmith, who was his nearest neighbor, would persist in sawing his wood under the parson's window on Sunday mornings. Having labored with him to no purpose, and borne the infliction till forbearance had almost ceased to be a virtue, he one morning threw up the window as George was pursuing his accustomed Sabbath morning avocations, saying, "N——, I want to make a bargain with you." George knew what was coming, and looking up with a comical grin, answered, "I make no bargains Sundays."

If you don't care to read how a brave officer in our brave army rejoiced in the conquest of one number of Harper, skip the following and go to the next. The fighting man writes:

I sat down in my quarters this morning, blue, bluer, bluest. An old gunshot-wound had been grumbling in my side till I could hardly walk, and on getting up for the day saw no very encouraging prospect for the same. What to do to while away the day was matter of serious concern. Nothing to read; can't talk all day; I must be interested by something. The November Number caught my eye. Ah! old friend, I am glad to meet you. I went to Arizona with that most clever humorist, J. Ross Browne—rummaged the Drawer—filled the whole of the old Easy Chair—looked in at the Centennial of the Browns—pitied the hard fate of My Refugee—found My Soldier a beauty—and cruised with the Sassacus till the cold round moon looked gently down from a very blunt angle in the heavens. Hark! Taps—Lights out! It was indeed time for honest soldiers to be in bed. The day had surely passed. I had rollicked and laughed, smiled and reflected the livelong day away, in spite of dismal forebodings of the morning. A happy day and contented evening have been given me by the fortuitous visit of your New Monthly. Nor is this the first time the past summer. A blessed Miss —, away off in Puritanic New England, gave me a happy visit to Pegoty Plimpton's Choir once on a day while rebel shot and shell were playing sad havoc among us on the James. I hugged my bomb-proof, read the Monthly, and heard their infernal metal crash by overhead and around, and laughed at the picture she drew of rural life, its ambitions, strifes, and triumphs. To make the confession full I must say the Monthly, many a time during our long and anxious campaign before Richmond, has shone forth from beyond the dark clouds overshadowing us, dispelling them, and giving us a bright and cheerful sky.

BEING recently one of about thirteen passengers upon the platform of a street car where was just comfortable standing-room for about four, I was somewhat annoyed and inconvenienced by two great fellows jumping on to the same platform without troubling the car to stop. The larger one did not seem to care where he stood so that 'twas on some one's feet; and this caused me to remark to him, in an expostulative way, "There's more room on the front platform." To which he immediately replied, "Well, why don't you go there then?" My reply was intended to be unanswerable, but it was not: "Sir, I was on this car first, and I've no idea of moving off to make room for you." "Oh!" said he, "that's what troubles you, is it? Well, you jest rest easy—I've got plenty of room!"

A DRAWER reader writes of a couple of Green Isle friends:

An Irish gentleman in my employ was told one day to dig a hole in a certain place. Having occasion to pass not long afterward, and observing that but small progress had been made, I said to him, "Put in, Jimmy!" Returning, I was surprised to find the excavation filled, and on inquiring the reason why, was asked, in reply, "If I had not told him to put in?"

A SON of Erin was giving me an account of a certain Colonel whose sense of hearing had been affected by being present in a cave when a cannon was fired, said that for two weeks after the gentleman could not hear any thing unless it was written!

EVERY man and woman in Lower Egypt has heard of the pompous Judge K—, a noted lawyer and politician of Cairo, Illinois, and a much better judge of whisky than of legal technicalities. Well, the steamer City of Cairo was finished a few weeks ago, and now "walks the waters like a thing of life"—probably unsurpassed in beauty, speed, and size by any craft that floats the "Father of Waters." In that spirit of liberality by which they are as fully characterized as any people, the citizens of Cairo on land presented to the officers of Cairo on water a full set of national colors—conferring upon the Judge the task of making the presentation speech, in the presence of an immense concourse crowded into the spacious cabin and saloon of the elegant vessel.

His Honor being fully "in the spirit," discharged his arduous duty in the following eloquent language: "Captain, ladies, and gentlemen—I have the honor, in the name of Cairo, in behalf of the ladies and gentlemen of this far-famed and justly celebrated city, to present you, captain of this noble steamer, these colors. Sir, may we all live to see the glorious flag of our country wave triumphantly over our graves! Here, captain, take these things!" Judge K— and the captain liquored.

DURING the last visit of the Federal forces, under Major-General A. J. Smith, to Holly Springs, Mississippi, in August, 1864, the following lines were penned by Colonel A— on the last page of a young lady's album, all others having been appropriated by real or pretended admirers in 1861. The black crape at the top of five loving epistles, and the broad, dark borders of five cards in the album, proved that ten of Miss Clemmie's admirers had fallen victims to Federal bullets, and that Yankee lead and steel were even more potent than Cupid's arrows. The females of the family being at the time residents of the elegant mansion, the book was returned to the centre table:

TO MISS CLEMMIE.

'Tis certain, Miss Clemmie, whether Fed or Confed,
In the plain course of nature you're destined to wed;
Some "Lord of Creation" will lovingly kneel,
And pour forth his tender and fervent appeal,
If the Feds and Confeds will cease this vain strife,
And leave a man living to make you his wife.

FED.

An honest but not very astute individual received written directions from a bereaved husband, living at a distance, to erect a tombstone over the grave of his deceased wife, a copy of the desired inscription being sent in a letter. The agent unfortunately allowed a postscript addressed to himself to remain attached to the inscription, which consequently stands thus:

CAROLINE,
WIFE OF WILLIAM SMITH,
Died Oct. 4, 1864,
AGED 52.

Rest in peace.

If you will attend to the matter you will confer a great favor upon

WILLIAM SMITH,
Husband of the above.

HERE is a fine budget from Providence:

Somewhere in Washington County, Rhode Island—it does not matter as to the precise locality—there used to reside a country grocer, whose store was made exceedingly disagreeable to the timid by the presence of a large, ill-natured bull-dog, that always greeted every one who entered the door with a threatening growl. It is true that Tiger had never bitten any body; but it was very annoying to strangers to be saluted with such savage demonstrations as he usually exercised. In fact, he was regarded as a nuisance by the community, while the only possible good that he ever rendered his master was to keep beggars and children at a distance. Jack Whitehorn, who had been repeatedly bored by him, at length declared he would kill him. Now Jack had sailed twice round the world, and had hunted lions in the African wilds, and professed not to be "afraid of any thing that went on four legs." So one day, as he entered the store, he picked up a small grain-sack and wound it snugly around his left fore-arm and hand. As usual, Tiger came for him with a growl. Jack threw out his protected arm in a threatening manner, and the maddened creature shut his teeth on it at once. Jack then deliberately seized him by the ear with the other hand, which caused Tiger to let go his grip upon Jack's arm, when Jack, by a dextrous movement, secured the other ear. In this position the dog was completely at his mercy. Our hero now coolly dropped upon his knees, and, amidst the applause of the half score of by-standers who were witnesses of the rencontre, fastened his teeth into the victim's nose until he dropped his tail between his legs and fairly yelled with pain. When Jack considered him conquered he let him go. Tiger was killed; for his spirit was broken, and he was worthless ever afterward. He sneaked away to his retreat behind the counter, where he always remained from morning till night. Beggars and children might invade the grocery in battalions, but they could not draw him from his hiding-place.

THE following is a fact. It is one of those neighborhood incidents which are told every now and then as illustrations of character:

Old Peleg C——, long since gone to his account, had been an invalid for several years, both of his arms being rendered useless by a paralytic stroke. But he lived in the days when every body drank ardent spirits, and his disease had not in the least impaired his appetite for strong drink. Thrice a day he used to take his toddy smoking hot from the stove, his indulgent wife holding the cup to his lips as he drank.

On one occasion a nephew of his had called in while the mug of toddy was warming on the stove. When it was ready he was about to call his wife (who was in the adjoining room) to give it to him; but the young man, interpreting his wishes, quickly exclaimed,

"I will hold the cup for you, Uncle Peleg."

"No, no," said the old man, bluntly, "that won't do; for the Scriptures say, 'Cursed is every man who putteth the cup to his neighbor's lips.'"

"But don't you care for aunt?—how will she escape?"

"Why, man, it don't curse women," replied old Peleg, with earnestness; then raising his voice, he exclaimed, "Come, Polly, give me my toddy!"

My attention was once called to a confirmed loafer, who was the pest of the neighborhood where he resided, and of whose boyhood a friend related to me the following circumstance:

When Dick R—— was about eleven years of age he was one day in the field with his father and workmen. It chanced to be in the haying season, and they were provided with a bottle of rum, according to custom. After drinking around, his father passed him the bottle, saying, "Dick, put that in the spring"—meaning for him to set it in the water to keep the contents cool.

About an hour afterward Dick was summoned to bring the bottle. His father took a swallow, while Dick stood near with a broad grin on his face. It contained nothing but water. Turning to his mischievous son, he exclaimed, in an excited tone,

"Dick! what did you do with the liquor that was in this bottle?"

"I poured it into the spring, Sir," he replied, in a hesitating tone, fearing that he had carried the joke too far; for he was in hopes one of the hired men would take the first drink.

"Well, Dick," the parent continued, with a significant flourish of his scythe-rifle, "you did right; but don't never do so again!"

My friend remarked that Dick had evidently followed this advice ever since, for he had never done any thing that was right from that day to the present time.

OVER in Jersey, during the last Presidential canvass, a young lawyer, noted for the length of his neck, his tongue, and his bill, was on the stump blowing his horn for General M'Clellan. Getting on in his eloquence, he spread himself, and said: "I would that on the 8th day of next November I might have the wings of a bird, and I would fly to every city and every village, to every town and every hamlet, to every mansion and every hut, and proclaim to every man, woman, and child George B. M'Clellan is President of these United States!" At this point a youngster in the crowd sang out: "Dry up, you fool! You'd be shot for a goose before you flew a mile!"

AND this reminds us, as the President says, of a little story:

A few years since the noted Tom Marshall was delivering an address before a large audience in Buffalo, when some one in the hall every few moments shouted, "Louder! louder!" Tom stood this for a while; but at last, turning gravely to the presiding officer, said: "Mr. Chairman, at the last day, when the angel shall with his golden trumpet proclaim that 'time shall be no longer,' I doubt not, Sir, that there will be in that vast crowd, as now, some drunken fool from Buffalo, shouting, 'Louder! louder!'" The house roared; Tom went on with his speech; but there were no more cries of "louder!"

UNDER the Internal Revenue Law cases of infraction come before the United States Commissioner here. The other day one of this kind, from the west side of the city, was arraigned before the Commissioner, and the defendant being interrogated replied, "Sure, your Honor, I didn't sell or taste of liquor in a month." Judge W——, who was standing by, spoke up, "I'll swear to that. I tasted some of his so-called whisky the other day when coming from Harlem, and if it was not strychnine I am no judge." "Then," says the Commissioner, "he must take out a license as a vendor of drugs, and I hold you, Judge, as a witness against him."

IMMEDIATELY after the battle of Prairie Grove some rebel officers of rank were sent up to Cane Hill, Arkansas, to negotiate for exchange of prisoners. It was during their visit that the amusing and characteristic scene that I am about to relate occurred:

In a small building close on the only street of that crooked village three Confederate officers, in their best gray uniform, were sitting on one side of a table, and three Federal officers, in blue, on the other. An old gray-headed and gray-bearded man came to the door, and incontinently walked in, with the query:

"Es this the Provo's offis?"

He was dressed in brown homespun, and had an old white wool hat on his head, tied on with a handkerchief, and leaned on a brown stick.

"Es this the Provo's offis? I want a pass."

Some one here attempted to explain to the old gentleman that he was in the wrong shop; but the old fellow, who was a little deaf, it seems, mistook this as a hesitation to give him what he wanted.

"I'm a good l'yal citizen. I've got my perfection papers. I've ben to get paid for my forage. It's all right."

There was a slight inclination to laugh by several present; but the old gentleman continued to make the most earnest protestations as to his "l'yalty."

"Look here, my friend," said Colonel W——, with a smile, "you had better take care what you say about loyalty. Look at these gentlemen"—pointing over the table—"don't you see they are Southern officers?"

The old man's hand trembled as he adjusted a dilapidated pair of spectacles to his eyes, and closely examined the gray uniforms with the velvet collars and brass stars. His hands trembled more violently. For the time being he seemed to forget the place and surroundings in his fear and bewilderment. At last, in great distress, he turned to the gentlemen, and began to stammer out his explanations:

"Well, gentlemen, I didn't think. I—I didn't mean any thing. I've allers ben a Southern man. I've jest got one son, and he's with Marmaduke. The only other man grown that's fit for service is my darter's husband, and he's with Rector, and—and—"

"Hold on, old fellow!" cried Colonel W——; "what about your being a loyal citizen?"

"Will you inform me," asked Colonel P——, who sat next to Colonel W——, "who paid you for your forage?"

The old man turned to look at the other side of the table. Again he adjusted his spectacles, and looked at the blue coats, and in an agony of distress he took off his spectacles and his handkerchief and hat, and while he leaned on both hands on the table, the tears ran down the wrinkles of his old face.

"Well, well, gentlemen," he at last found words to say, "you go on an' fight it out among yourselves. I can live in any government."

I WAS one of some six hundred wounded who had been captured by the enemy during the battle of the Wilderness, and we were placed in open-field hospital at Locust Grove. While lying under a shed, without blankets, scarce food, and a paucity of medical supplies, I was the witness to the following:

We were talking on indifferent subjects when a young man (now dead, poor boy!) spoke up. He told us how he had lain all night upon the battlefield, and in spite of the pain from his shattered limb and the usual dreadful cries round him, he felt much inclined to sleep. This was rendered impossible by an old owl that had perched itself—a fitting serenader on the bloody field—over his head. He said that the confounded thing kept crying, "Who—who hit yer? Who—who hit yer?"

As the surgeon was going his rounds, examining the patients, he came to a sergeant of a New York regiment, who had been struck by a bullet in the left breast, right over the region of the heart. The doctor, surprised at the narrow escape of the man, ejaculated, "Why, my man, where in the name of goodness could your heart have been?"

The poor fellow, with a faint and sickly smile, replied, "I guess it must have been in my mouth just then, doctor!" You will be gratified to learn that he subsequently escaped, and arrived quite safe in our lines.

A KANSAS correspondent at Fort Leavenworth writes:

At our camp on the Arkansas, after the pursuit was ended, the Army of the Border was dissolved, the troops proceeding by different routes to their several stations. In the evening previous to the separation most of the officers were congregated at General Curtis's head-quarters to bid each other good-by. Major P——y, of General Blunt's staff, who has frequently been known to "take something," on this occasion did honor to his prerogative to an alarming extent. General Blunt propounded the following grave question: "What is the difference between Major P——y and a demijohn?" It remained unanswered, and the Major insisted upon the General's telling the difference. "There is none," answered General B., and the Major "passed."

AN officer of our regiment, famous for his misapplication of big words, was present at Fort Garland when certain companies of the regiment were mustered in. The mustering officer, Major W——, had refused to muster the individual who had been appointed captain of one of the companies. During the evening several officers were congregated in the sutler's store, and the conversation turned upon the subject; when Major W—— remarked that he had not mustered Captain H—— principally on account of his antecedents. Our friend pompously threw himself back, placing his thumbs in the arm-holes of his vest, asking, "Major, who were his antecedents, and what did they do?"

MR. DRAWER, you often tell stories at the expense of Western school committees and trustees. But I have heard one about your New York schoolmen that leaves all the rest out in the cold:

Mr. Patrick O'Finnehan, School Commissioner, visits the public school in his ward, and as he enters he sees a pair of globes.

"And what for are these?"

"They are globes," said the teacher; "one to show the heavens above us, and the other the various countries on the earth."

"Oh!" said the learned Patrick. "And I thought you tached chimistery, and these were a pair of stame-bilers!"

JOE and Commodore Rogers, brothers, blacksmiths in Whitewater, Wisconsin, have a great reputation for being practical jokers. Last summer Joe bought an old-fashioned dash churn, for the purpose of manufacturing their own butter; and as the Commodore was a widower and lived with Joe, all such work as churning naturally fell to him. One eve, after supper, the first churning was got ready, and the Commodore was invited to churn. "Hold on," says he, "till I go down town and get some tabacker." He went, and while gone Joe did the churning, took out the butter, and left the butter-milk in the churn.

The Commodore returned, looked at the churn, took off his coat, and says, "Wa'al, old churn, it's you and I, and here's for ye!" and commenced his labor. After churning a couple of hours, he remarked that "he guessed it would be cheaper to buy butter than to make it." "I think so too," says Joe, "if you are going to try to churn it out of butter-milk!"

A few days after that churning process Joe put one end of a small bar of iron into his forge fire, gave the bellows three or four pumps, and stepped into the back-shop. While gone, the Commodore heated the iron to a black heat, then changed ends with it, and stepped out of the front-door to watch progress.

In came Joe, took up the iron, but dropped it instant, holding up his burned hand, and roared with pain. "Put on some butter-milk, Joe—it's good for a burn!" said the Commodore, as he made a masterly retreat amidst a shower of bouquets composed of hammers, hard coal, and old horse-shoes.

THE Rev. James Freeman, who formerly preached at the Stone Chapel, in Boston, was a man very small in stature, but highly respected for his talents and the liberal doctrines which he promulgated. One day he was passing down Beacon Street, in company with two very tall ministers, and Mr. F. happened to be between them, when whom should they meet but the celebrated wit of the day, Matthew Byles. "Well," said Mr. B., "here we have the Bible represented in its three parts; the Old Testament on the left, the New Testament on the right, and the little Apocrypha in the middle!"

SOME years ago the best pilot belonging to Boston was named James Tilley. In his youth he had met with an accident which caused him to become badly humpbacked. He was a genial sort of a man, much liked, and was always called upon to pilot the ships of war in and out of the harbor. One day he took out a British frigate, and as he was leaving the ship a pompous officer on board called out, "I say, old fellow, what have you got on your back?" "Bunker Hill!" replied Tilley; "perhaps you have heard of the place before."

A YEAR or more ago a newly-appointed Provost Marshal out West, who sported a full military uniform on duty as well as off, and "put on a good deal of style" generally, conceived the idea that it would be greatly to the advantage of his department, and increase the dignity of his office, if his numerous deputies should be allowed to wear an appropriate uniform—and he accordingly wrote to head-quarters on the subject. The Provost Marshal General directed that Captain——be informed that no uniform would be allowed to deputies; but if Captain——could not recognize his deputies without, he might mark them!

THIS is written for the Drawer, and is true:

The Rev. John Brodhead, formerly Member of Congress from New Hampshire, commenced his career as a Methodist minister near Stroudsburg, in his native State of Pennsylvania. He was a large man, of powerful frame, and before his conversion had been noted for his prowess in the athletic sports and combats then common in that region. One day, while he was delivering a discourse on the banks of the Delaware, preparatory to administering baptism, quite a disturbance was raised by some of his old companions, more in merriment than malice, however, and they finally, in a laughing way, made preparations for a mock baptism. Mr. Brodhead paused in his discourse, and addressing the disorderlies, said, "Look here, boys! I belong to a denomination that holds to the possibility of falling from grace. If I should happen to fall from grace—and I feel very much like it—while you are cutting your capers, some of you will catch it badly!" The ringleader, a good-natured fellow of some education, saw there was trouble ahead, and after hesitating a moment, turned to the others, and said, "I say, fellows! he's got into the vernacular—we'd better stop!" And stop they did, and the exercises were concluded without further interruption.

In the newspaper of Middletown, Connecticut, a very worthy man who takes people under, and is therefore called an undertaker, publishes the following:

A CARD.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN OF THE TOWN OF MIDDLETOWN AND VICINITY—Permit me to take this method to inform you that I have sold out the Manufacturing part of my Establishment to my Son, Capt. G. M. Southmayd—soon to remove from Danbury—where he has resided fourteen years in the undertaking business. He has given general satisfaction, and his friends and the public feel quite disappointed in his leaving. His object in returning to the place of his birth is the regard he has for Middletown, and to make the remainder of my life comfortable. I am confident that he will spare no pains in trying to please all who will favor him with their custom. As regards myself, I shall continue the undertaking part of the business for the present. I have no desire to make myself wealthy from the business—only a comfortable support. I have returned the money paid me in trying to beautify the city and cemeteries, and I think I can say with a clear conscience, that I have been kind and charitable to the poor and afflicted—I hear no complaint. I commenced the undertaking business with an old horse with four wheels and four posts, not fit to carry a rebel to that bourne from which no traveler returns. It is my opinion, that a man who has no other god but this world, ought to be buried in good style, and I am the man who can do it. Remember the place, near the beautiful elm—the handsomest tree in the city. The north half is St. Patrick tree, the south half, the tree of Liberty—the only one in all New England, that bears the flag of the Union.

I thank you all for your kindness and patronage. I do not wish to boast of my kindness and sympathy, to the afflicted, my heart is as kind and feeling as when I first commenced this unpleasant business. I have to appear as cheerful as possible under circumstances quite affecting. If I permitted my feelings of sympathy to mingle with the mortality I am conversant with, I should die myself. I claim no goodness of my own, am no hypocrite but have unbounded charity for all. I should as soon expect a safe passage on board ship bound from New York to London with a hole in her bottom as big as a porrage pot, as expect to gain heaven by belonging to a church without piety. I do not tell my heavenly Father what a clever fellow I am, but I like to repeat the prayer of the humble publican, not so much as lifting up my eyes to heaven but tapping my breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner.

I have the honor to be very respectfully and truly your obedient servant,
J. BUCKLEY SOUTHMAYD.

MIDDLETOWN, Dec. 27, 1864.

If we lived there—or rather, if we ceased to live while there—Mr. Southmayd is the man for our money.

OUR friend Bull is a glorious good fellow, full of good-humor and common sense, but strangely ignorant of what he calls "the sciences." One day Miss D—— asked him if he had ever seen a bazar. Not knowing exactly what a bazar was, but shrewdly suspecting that it was some sort of an animal, our hero replied, "No, I never saw any wild animals except a bear, two monkeys, and a few other var-mounts. The bazar died before the show got here!"

A LADY relative, who lives in a certain town in Vermont, told me last summer this anecdote of a young clergyman who had come to supply the vacant pulpit of the Congregational Church in that place, as a candidate for settlement:

He was just out of the Theological Seminary, and had the peculiarity of an extremely boyish size and complexion, which, of course, was unknown to most of the congregation. A little before the hour the new minister made his way, almost unnoticed, into the pulpit, where he was concealed from view by the reading-desk in front of him. But an old lady, who sat close on the right of the pulpit in consideration of her deafness, was much concerned to see a boy in the place of the expected clergyman. So she very softly arose, stepped on tip-toe to the pulpit stairs, and beckoning with her forefinger, whispered loudly, in coaxing accents, "Come down, sonny, you mustn't sit there; that's the place for the minister!"

FROM one of our brave boys now in Arkansas we have the following:

When the Eighty-sixth Illinois was stationed at Nashville, the orders in camp were very strict. Sentinels were stationed around camp with instructions to allow no one to cross their beats in the night without the countersign, and no one in the daytime without the proper "pass," except for water, or on other duty, in squads.

One day, as the sentinels were leisurely walking their beats, a furious wind-storm came on, and dashing limbs, shingles, hats, etc., recklessly about, swept into camp, upsetting barrel chimneys, throwing off tent flies, prostrating tents, and spreading confusion generally. A soldier passing at the time, and nearly losing his balance, called out to the sentinel, "Say, John! what did you let that cross your beat for?" The sentinel, nothing at a loss, replied, "Because it came in squads!"

AN army lad writes to the Drawer:

During the summer the Virginia farmers, being much troubled by our boys foraging, were apt to conceal their stock and poultry as much as possible, so as not to tempt the Yankee appetite. On one occasion we were obliged to go down into a dark cellar for the porkers with which to make our dinner. But we were much more amused, another time, to hear one of the boys exclaim, upon returning to camp without any spoils, "There is nothing on the whole plantation but a yoke of oxen, and they were chained to the bed-post in the house!"

SAMH an Old Colony, Massachusetts, man: If the "Maine Law" is not entirely worn out, take the following, which gives the opinion of a friend of the "Irish persuasion:"

Pat lived with a neighbor of ours, and oftentimes; when I was passing that way, I would stop and talk a few moments with him. Pat was fond of the "crayther cumfort wunst in a while;" and whenever there was a wedding or a wake Pat was sure to be there. He became very much interested when they began to discuss the Maine Law in our State Legislature; and the day after it passed, happening to meet Pat, I made it known to him. With a rueful countenance he exclaimed, "Och! murther! don't say it. The haythens!—it gives me hart a big sthroke! Divil a bit a wonder they calls it the mane law, for of all the mane laws this, for that same, would git the ma-jar-i-ty any where intirely! What we will do at the wakes I dunno; it's the bad times intirely whin a man can't bury his frinds dacently, nor himself nayther!" After a short pause, with a very serious face, he said, "It's my opinion that law is kal-ke-lated to bring grate distress not only on the livin' but on the did; and bad luck to it, I say, and all sich!"

OUR correspondent in Virginia City, State of Nevada, writes:

Messrs. R—— and L——, who keep a drug-store in this city, had occasion a short time since to remove their stock during the alteration of their premises. Being given to hospitality, it is their custom to place in an accessible part of their store sundry casks containing spiritual comforts of various kinds. Among others who were in the habit of regaling themselves was an old Irishman of the genus "Bummer," who was in the habit of paying visits, which certainly were not those of angels.

Their temporary premises being rather small, the casks were set up on end to save space, with the cocks pointing upward. Pat came in and proceeded to investigate the same, hoping by some principle of hydraulics to extract a portion of the precious fluid. Finding all his efforts unavailing, he turned, with a mournful air, to Mr. L——, and pointing to the row of casks, exclaimed, "Bedad an' it's hopin' I am ye'll soon be afther movin', for sure ye've no convayniance here at all, at all!"

WE get this from Bridgeport, Alabama:

Some days ago I started, in company with Captain A——, the Quarter-master at this post, to go up the railroad a few miles to inspect a coal-mine. We had just taken our seats in the "caboose" when a gaunt, grim, glassified young man—a real, genuine butternut Alabamian, blundered awkwardly into the car, and addressed the Captain—who is a gruff, sombre-looking man, in a long blue overcoat and high boots: "Say, Captain, can you tell me where that man, Mr. Wright, is, what wants to get men to go down to Savannah for breaksmen to Sherman?"

"Mr. Wright?" said the Captain, mildly.

"Yes, Mr. Wright."

"Ain't you mistaken in the name?"

"No, Sir. Mr. Wright wants to get men to go down to Savannah for breaksmen to Sherman."

"I don't know Mr. Wright, but I know Mr. Davis."

"Mr. Davis! Does he want men?" said the verdant dupe.

"Yes, Sir. Jeff Davis has had a big lot of such fellows as you working as breaksmen to Sherman for some time, and they have scarcely slackened his speed at all yet. And now he wants to get up a new gang—will you go?"

The fellow "dug out" on double-quick time, while we all shouted with laughter.

A HARTFORD friend says: A gentleman in this city, Mr. G——, who has recently become quite bald, went to New York a few weeks since, and met an old friend whom he had not seen for three or four years. After the first cordial greetings had passed, the friend suddenly exclaimed, "Why, G——, how queer you look!" G——, astonished, asks, "What's the matter?" "Well," said the friend, eying him critically, "I don't like the way your hair is frizzed. It's parted altogether too wide in the middle!"

THIS comes from Trenton, Grundy County, Missouri:

When the news reached Trenton of Thomas's great victory over Hood at Nashville, in common with the citizens of the village we illuminated our dwelling. Our children, particularly our little five-year-old, were greatly delighted. Now our little five-year-old is a great boy in his way, and says many cute things. When he had enjoyed the sport for a few hours he became wearied, and went up to his mother, and, says he, "Ma, let's unilluminate, for I'm tired!" This "brought down the house," and his ma unilluminated.

THE following is very likely to be true:

A short time ago two prominent railroad officials, Mr. A—— and Mr. B——, were engaged in a discussion of railroad rules relating to the movement of trains. The discussion grew quite interesting, each party supporting his position with fervent argument, if not always sound reasoning. They finally separated for the night, and each went home with his head full of the subject. The next morning, being Sunday, Mr. A—— went to his office to write some important letters which, by reason of the discussion the night before, had been neglected. While thus engaged Mr. B—— entered the office, and expressing surprise at finding Mr. A—— at work on the Sabbath, asked if he knew what the Fourth Commandment said. "Why, yes," replied Mr. A——, without looking up from his writing. "If the Eastward-bound train gets twenty behind its own time, it must keep out of the way," etc.

A BROOME COUNTY man writes:

You have frequently published certificates of Western Justices of the Peace. If you have any which beats this, given by a New York Justice, I should like to see it. I copy "verbatim et literatim et spellatim" from the original, now in my possession:

"Personly Came before me the within person George N—— and Almira N—— his wife knoon to me to be the person hoo exacuted the within mortige and exnoleged the execution of the same and the said being by me examinde apart from hur husband exknowlige that shee icknowledge the same freiley and without anny compushen on the husband

JOHN W P—— Justice"

IN the town of Gaines, Orleans County, New York, lives an old gentleman named H——, who is more noted for his money-making tact than for his general intelligence. Among his many peculiarities, he is somewhat noted for his dislike for the Scripture and its teachings, and improves every opportunity to make his dislikes known.

Not long since, while in conversation with a neighbor on the merits of the Bible, he was asked to state some of his objections to its teachings. "Wa'al," said he, "there's a great many things that hadn't never ought to 'a been there." Being pressed to be more explicit, he gravely delivered himself of the following original idea: "Wa'al, I'll tell ye: there's the whole book of Job that had better been left out; and," added he, with much earnestness, "it wouldn't never have gone in, neither, if Job hadn't been on the Committee!"

ONE of the cemeteries in which the people of Detroit bury their dead is situated a short distance from the city, with which it is connected by a plank-road. Midway there is a toll-gate. Like most other toll-barred roads, funerals are allowed to pass free. The well-known Dr. B—— was returning from calling on a patient, and stopped at this gate to pay his toll. Says the Doctor to the gate-keeper,

"You ought to pass doctors free of toll."

"Ah! no, Doctor," says the keeper, "you send too many dead heads through here!"

The Doctor paid his toll and drove on.

AFTER Burnside's fight at Fredericksburg, and when the army had become settled in winter-quarters, flour was offered for sale by the commissaries. The officers and men were glad of the chance to eat hot bread. One day I heard a man in the rear of my tent asking my cook if he could lend him a board to knead bread on. Morey, who was always ready with a joke, replied: "A board to knead bread on? Why, I need bread on my stomach!"

THE Delaware Republican has the following advertisement of a remarkable dog that strayed away without its head:

"$5 REWARD.—Strayed from the premises of the subscriber, in Centreville, on the 2d of October, a small dog near the color of an opossum, with yellow legs and head and tail cut off. Any person returning him will receive the above reward.

DANIEL KILROY."

A FRIEND of ours purchases his boots in Hamburg, Germany, and his clothes in New York. He says he is shod by a Dutchman and shoddied by a Yankee.

A "HIRED-HELP" of ours being sent to a distant clearing on the farm, was told to come right in when he heard the dinner-horn. Scratching his head, he rather comically remarked, "Sure, an' maybe I won't hear it at all, at all! Hadn't I better take it with me, and then, you know, I can blow it myself?"

A CLERGYMAN lately traveling in the Oil Region saw a child in the road stumbling and falling. He kindly picked her up, saying, "Poor dear! are you hurt?" when she cried out, "I ain't poor! Dad struck a ile well yesterday!"

WE hear of many mean men and women, but I doubt if any one meaner than this could even be thought of:

Soon after the last new "stamp duty" made its appearance a "down Easter," from Maine, Silas Flint by name, entered one of our large stationers here, in this city (i. e., New York)—the stationer, by-the-way, was a friend of Silas. After buying a few things the stationer, thinking to please Silas, handed him a pack of the best French playing-cards. Silas took them, turned them over slowly in his hand, and then looking up at the stationer, said,

"Much obliged to you, Mr. Rose, much obliged; but I must just fine you a little. These cards are not stamped!"

No. CLXXIX.—APRIL, 1865.—VOL. XXX.

A DOG'S DAY ENDED.

I AM only a dog, and I've had my day;
So, idle and dreaming, stretched out I lay
In the welcome warmth of the summer sun,
A poor old hunter whose work is done.

Dream? Yes, indeed; though I am but a dog,
Don't I dream of the partridge I sprung by the log,
Of the quivering hare and her desperate flight,
Of the nimble gray squirrel secure in his height,

Far away in the top of the hickory-tree,
Looking down safe and saucy at Matthew and me,
Till the hand true and steady a messenger shot,
And the creature up-bounded, and fell, and was not?

Old Matthew was king of the wood-rangers then;
And the quails in the stubble, the ducks in the fen,
The hare on the common, the birds on the bough,
Were afraid. They are safe enough now,

VOL. XXX.—No. 179.—O o

For all we can harm them, old master and I.
We have had our last hunt, the game must go by,
While Matthew sits fashioning bows in the door
For a living. We never hunt more.

For time, cold, and hardship have stiffened his knee;
And since little Lottie died, often I see
His hands tremble sorely, and go to his eyes
For the lost baby-daughter so pretty and wise.

Oh! it's sad to be old, and to see the blue sky
Look farther away to the dim fading eye;
To feel the fleet foot growing weary and sore
That in forest and hamlet shall lag evermore.

I am going—I hear the great wolf on my track;
Already around me his shadow falls black.
One hunting cry more! Oh, master! come nigh,
And lay the white paw in your own as I die.

Oh come to me, master! the last hedge is passed;
Our tramps in the wild wood are over at last;
Stoop lower, and lay down my head on your knee.
What! tears for a useless old hunter like me?

You will see little Lottie again by-and-by.
I sha'n't. They don't have any dogs in the sky.
Tell her, loving and trusty beside you I died,
And—bury me, master, not far from her side;

For we loved little Lottie so well, you and I.
Ha, master! the shadow! fire low! it is nigh!
There was never a sound in the still morning heard,
But the heart of the hunter his old jacket stirred,

As he flung himself down on the brute's shaggy coat,
And watched the faint life in its quivering throat
Till it stopped quite at last. The black wolf had won,
And the death-hunted hound into cover had run.

But long ere the snow over graves softly fell
Old Matthew was resting from labor as well;
While the cottage stood empty, yet back from the hill
The voice of the hound in the morn echoes still.

WHERE THE "WATEREE" WAS.

CHARLOTTE AMALIA, ST. THOMAS.

FROM ice and snow, a half-frozen river and the chilled air of an American winter, to sunny skies and summer. We were to leave the war behind us. Seventeen thousand miles of steaming for our untried river-boat; with long months of waiting for home-news, for words of war or peace. Waiting; with as much heart-sickness, perhaps, from hope deferred, for those we left watching events of each day, as for us to whom the stories of long campaigns, profitless battles, perhaps great victories, would come together, come without warning, in a single day, somewhere in the distant Pacific. Our vessel, the Waterree, was the first iron vessel of war ever built for Government. Of fair sea-going size, her draught was so light—scarcely more than that of a fishing schooner—that the chances of her safely performing the task allotted her were at least problematical.

From Washington, then, early in March, 1864, meeting a thirty-hours' gale when off Cape Hatteras, we steamed in eight days to Charlotte Amalia—a picturesque little town. The Island of Saint Thomas has a single harbor, scooped crater-like from its southern slope—the rendezvous of the various lines of English mail-steamers that connect the principal ports of the West Indies and Mexico. Set like a gem in a ring, but on its inner surface, the town, named for some princess of Denmark, shows brilliantly from the sea in its varied colors of white and yellow walls, red roofs, and blotches of tropical foliage, in dark green, scattered among the masses of buildings. A fortnight there, anchored near the Trent, of unfortunate memory, and we steamed southward again.

The lake-like Caribbean Sea for a few days. Then out into the Atlantic, between Saint Vincent and Santa Lucia, past Barbadoes, steadily southwest till Cape Saint Roque, the farthest eastern point of South America, came in sight; rounding that, passing Pernambuco and its larger suburb, Olinda, in three weeks from Saint Thomas we entered the immense harbor of San Salvador, or Bahia de Todos os Santos, thirteen degrees below the equator, and nearly five thousand miles from home.

Bahia has the beauty of enchantment from the bay at night. Each street is marked out in lines of light from the thousands of gas-burners set profusely along all the avenues, large or small, that wind about the slopes and terraces on which the city is built. Like Constantinople, its beauty is hardly more than external. Two hundred thousand people, of whom the majority are black and slave, with municipal regulations and habits such as ruled European towns in the unclean ages, make it noisome by day and dangerous to one's peace of mind by night. A few streets are exceptions. These, a strange hanging-garden that overlooks the water, a grand Opera-house, and some pleasant suburban roads, offset the generally unpleasant impression given by a walk about the city.

Ten days in the Bay of All the Saints, and southward again. Into cooler and cold weather as we go. Up the great river of La Plata at length, on a foggy morning, and at anchor by noon off Montevideo, the capital of Uruguay, and the cleanest town, it is said, in South America. This neatest, best-regulated, and most home-like city we had seen since leaving America was just preparing for coming winter and a rebel army. May is their last autumn month; and Flores, with an insurgent force outnumbering the national troops, was but eleven miles from the walls, waiting for some one to attack him. Why he did not march in and occupy the town no one seemed to know. At the close of our fortnight's stay in the harbor he had not moved; and so far as we could learn did not intend to do so.

Southward still, leaving Montevideo with its finished civilization in manners, customs, streets, shops, and police regulations, we steamed down the eastern coast of Patagonia. On the 23d of May we entered the Strait of Magalhaen.

Opening winter, in a region as near utter desolation as any thing on earth, met us fairly in the face. We left the familiar Atlantic in the gloom of a sky heavy and black with storm-clouds. By the aid of a few sketches I propose to tell the story of our singular cruise through the Strait, and the almost unknown regions of inland water beyond.

Do many people know that the Strait of Magalhaen has a governor? At Sandy Point—a hundred miles from the Atlantic—there is a village of some fifty houses, where he lives and holds almost absolute rule over his little garrison of one company of Chilean infantry, and a vague number of Patagonian irregulars. Sent there by the Government of Chili, which country claims the barren heritage of Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego, he is now serving his third term of three years. I introduce him with great pleasure. Governor Schutz, a Danish gentleman, of rare scientific ability, more widely known in Europe than America; who knows Patagonia, the Strait, the neighboring islands, and the inhabitants of these regions better than any one else; and who will, I trust, some day give the world the results of his tedious residence and studies at Sandy Point.

I was pleased to find my old idea of the great size of the Patagonian Indians verified. Deriving it as a child from Malte Brun, I had kept it, despite contradiction of all sorts, till the Governor showed me the result of many measurements taken among the native men by himself, resulting in an average height of between five feet eleven inches and six feet.

From Sandy Point to Port Famine, thirty miles further. Here we anchored in a driving snow-storm that would have been creditable to New England in January. In an hour afterward the storm cleared away. The harbor of Port Famine, even in winter weather, is one of the loveliest spots that I ever saw. One singular fact, unnoticed so far as I have seen in any description of the country, is the absence of any deciduous tree in Patagonia, even in midwinter. Not that the ordinary evergreens of the North form the mass of the forests. On the contrary, a great variety of all sorts of trees, among which are duplicates of the maple and oak of our own country, outnumber the spruces, pines, and cedars, common in the higher latitudes all over the world. Grass grows fresh and green beneath the snow, and I gathered butter-cups in a temperature of 32° Fahrenheit, in the old cemetery on the bluff above the harbor mouth at this point.

With sunshine and fair weather we went ashore. Port Famine has a historical fame. Centuries ago a colony from Spain perished wretchedly here from want of food. Some twenty years since a Chilean settlement for convicts met its death by a revolt of the prisoners—who rose on their guards, murdered men, women, and children, captured a trading schooner at anchor in the harbor, massacred its crew, and sailed away. It is pleasant to know that these convict pirates were afterward punished. At Ancud, in Chiloe Island, the place is shown where they were pulled in pieces by horses; in the same style in which a certain King of France put the supposed assassin Damiens to death. Ruins of frame-houses crown the high land on the northern side of the harbor. A square inclosure, surrounded by a half-decayed fence of wooden pickets, shows the plaza of the convict-village, afterward the burial-ground of the victims of the massacre. A wooden cross stood in its centre a few years ago. Visitors to the place, though very few in number, have hacked this away till a stump, a yard in height, is all that remains of it. Graves are scattered thickly around. An old earth-work, with two or three corroding guns, overlooks the cemetery and the ruins. The story of the misfortunes of Port Famine was told to me by Governor Schutz, while I sat in his comfortable library at Sandy Point. The view from the window took in the broad expanse of the Straits, with the snow-covered mountains of Tierra del Fuego on the southern side. A scene of desolation. A region without house or hut in sight, beyond the fifty or sixty that made the Governor's village. Sitting there at ease, in a room whose appointments were the same as those of any similar room at home, smoking a choice cigar and tasting very fine old sherry meanwhile, it was hard to realize that only two mails in a year were possible for the Governor, so far removed is his house from the outer world.

More than a hundred mountain peaks are within range of vision from the plateau where the ruins of Port Famine stand. A vast inland lake terminates thirty miles to the southward in the entrance to Magdalen Sound—a passage to the southern Pacific, cut through the mountains of Tierra del Fuego. Narrow, twisted, walled in by high cliffs, a channel whose waters have never seen the sun, it is filled with shoals and sunken rocks; round and over which the breakers beat unceasingly. The naturalist Darwin says, very truly, that it resembles an avenue to another and a worse world.

From Port Famine to Port Gallant; rounding the southernmost point of the main land of America, Cape Froward, a black and weather-worn rock, a thousand feet in height, in a strong gale from the south. Port Gallant was the first of the many harbors of the same kind in which we were destined to pass dreary southern winter nights before entering the open ocean again. They seem like sunken craters. A crevice in the side admits the ship into a well whose walls are mountains. Hardly one of them is large enough to hold more than one or two ships at a time. As harbors they are perfect. The fiercest storms outside leave their surface unruffled. Their silence at night is something unnatural. In some of them, cascades of pure and cold water come down from thousands of feet above, in dust-falls, shivered into spray far up in the air. In others the strange "side-wheel" duck paddles through the darkness, alarmed by some movement on the vessel. The utter stillness of these little bays was broken by such sounds only.

The "side-wheel" ducks made their first appearance as we entered the Strait. I believe they are found only in Patagonia. Discarding their wings as instruments for flying and their feet as paddles, they use their wings as wheels; never rising from the water even when pursued, but rushing ahead at great speed, leaving wakes behind them precisely like those of paddle-steamers. An examination of their wings showed a cartilaginous projection at the elbow, with which they undoubtedly strike the water; but while in motion the rapidity of their movement was such that any attempt to analyze its nature was impossible. A gray mist at either side of the body was the only visible means of progression; while their feet dragged after them on the surface. When approached too closely they dive. I never saw one leave the water, or make any attempt to fly.

Leaving Port Gallant on Sunday morning, our route for the day lay, straight as if drawn by rules, down the middle of a majestic aisle, sixty miles in length, with side-walls of mountain headlands and cliffs. They met in the clear distance in perspective. This superb channel, with a constant succession of the wildest Alpine scenery on either side, snow-capped mountains, deep ravines, high precipices, and immense glaciers, that filled long gorges, and spread out into seas of ice at intervals, is known as "Crooked Reach." The name seemed to me very illy given.

Borgia Bay, Port Tamar, and the Strait of Magalhaen itself were left behind in two days more. The strange portion of our cruise began.

BORGIA BAY.

From the Strait to Tres-Montes Peninsula, through six degrees of latitude, a series of intricate inland channels lie among the Patagonian islands. Their general course is northward. They are known in succession as Smith's, Sarmiento, and Mesier channels. These principal passages have many connections, short cuts, and intermediate channels, making a somewhat labyrinthine tract of water that is seldom traversed by any other vessels than sealing schooners, and by these at long intervals. The surveys of Admiral Fitzroy, of the English navy, are the basis for the charts of these inland waters; and even those are so far from correct at some points, that our steamer, traveling by daylight only, had to feel her way, sometimes for miles, by the lead-line. We had passed a week in the Strait of Magalhaen, and headed north again for our next port, Valparaiso. An old custom exists among the voyagers of the Strait, of leaving the names of their ships, with some records of their cruises, at the different anchorages. At Borgia Bay was a large collection of records of this sort, painted boards nailed on the trees. Among them the names of the United States ship Decatur, which staid in the Strait weather-bound for two months, about ten years ago; and the Resolucion, one of the Spanish vessels that seized the Chinchas islands. One captain had recorded his command as a "whaling skuner."

At two or three points we found excellent opportunities for hunting the guanaco, a species of lama, valued for its flesh, which resembles beef, and its fur. The Patagonians (literally, "men with large feet") make robes of the guanaco skins, sewing several together, using them for winter clothing. As the men have no beard it becomes difficult to distinguish the sexes when both are seen in company. An intense plainness and similarity of feature characterize the nation. One female of eighteen years that I saw with her mother might have been almost any age or of either sex, so far as any appearance of face, dress, or figure was concerned.

INSCRIPTIONS AT BORGIA BAY.

We hunted guanacos and ostriches. They both abound in the more level country at the eastern end of the Strait. They are very shy, and we met with no success in our hunts. At Sandy Point the natives offered finished robes for sale. I found one an admirable bed-covering in the winter weather.

I use the term "we" in the plural number. The officers of the ship were twenty in all. Eight of us, more nearly allied by a common residence in the ward-room and its eight tributary state-rooms, were the chief explorers and sportsmen. The captain, well known in the service as an expert and daring navigator, led us all, however. Neither cold nor exposure seemed to daunt him whenever, in our numerous anchorages, any signs of game worth securing were seen. He and a young relative who shared his cabin, as ardent a sportsman as the captain, furnished us in the ward-room with many a meal of unknown fowls in the dreary days when cold and impending scarcity of food made the fowling-piece or rifle our only hope.

Twenty officers and one hundred and eighty-six men thrown upon their own resources for amusement in a long voyage find under most favorable circumstances some trouble in realizing any. For some of us in the ward-room it was a first cruise of any length. My own previous sea-going had been wholly on the blockade. Four of the eight had but just entered the naval from the merchant service. Three of us were in the regular service, and five in the volunteer. This mingling of the two branches, far more in the navy than the army, becomes unfortunate. Officers on ship-board are necessarily thrown so much more together than those on shore, and small jealousies have so much fairer a field in which to work. Yet the evil is insurmountable in such a war as ours, and will perhaps work its own cure in time.

With us affairs went on with tolerable smoothness. A punning man, two common-sense men, a careful man, a talkative man, an eccentric man, and two negative men were sufficiently distinct in personality to give some zest to conversation. Then one of the common-sense men was an inveterate grumbler, and afforded enjoyment to the others from that peculiarity.

I ought not to leave the Strait without speaking of its oldest living habitué, Captain Smiley, of the Falkland Islands. The Captain is a remarkable example of the fact that sailors may sometimes live to advanced age and keep in perfect health. He acknowledges a residence of fifty-five years in the high latitudes of the Southern Hemisphere; but an old gentleman of Montevideo told me he had known Smiley personally for over seventy years, and that when he first saw him he was a full-grown man. Smiley's age must, in that event, be nearly ninety. His appearance and actions are those of a well-preserved and active man of fifty years or thereabouts. He is known by every one, civilized and barbarian, from Uruguay round to Chili. I was assured by a captain, who was wrecked on the eastern coast of Patagonia, that Smiley scented the disaster six hundred miles away, and came with assistance. His services to shipwrecked vessels have been numerous and invaluable; and he has, I am glad to know, accumulated a large fortune as the result of a life filled with good actions enough to counterbalance the many hard stories told of him—stories with foundation, I fear, but left to his biographer. Parton or Brantz Mayer would find material for a full volume in the old gentleman's career. He is the only man I have met who has rounded Cape Horn alone. This he did in a fifty-ton schooner. His personal acquaintance with the Fuegian and Patagonian natives is large. He mentioned to me a call that he made a few years since on an old friend, a Fuegian chief, and found him devouring choice cuts from his wife's body, killed, as the chief remarked, to satisfy his curiosity as to the form in which she would prove most pleasing. Cannibalism still exists in Tierra del Fuego.

One canoe-load of these Fuegians boarded us one stormy day; a family party—father, mother, sons, and daughters. Though the thermometer stood at 40°, they were entirely naked, save a small piece of seal-skin, two feet square, worn round the shoulders by the matron and others of the party, about the waist by the rest. I saw no trace of any thing but the most complete barbarism in their appearance. Physically, they were far inferior to the Patagonians. They bartered bows and arrows for tobacco. Their fear of the steamer and her wheels, which last they seemed to think were alive, was something painfully ludicrous.

Northward, up Smith's Channel, snow, rain, bergs of floating ice broken from the glaciers that fill every valley in the mountains and islands of southwestern Patagonia, cold winds, and clouded skies were our greeting to the strange passages we entered. The evergreen vegetation covered all the land that the glaciers left exposed.

We held our course day after day in mid-channel; not to secure sufficient depth of water, for the lead-line rarely found bottom at less than fifty fathoms close to the shore, except in the little crater harbors of which Port Gallant was the type. The outlying islands seem to have been riven from the continent by some splitting force in past ages. The mountains on either hand carry their steep slope down below the surface till they meet hundreds of fathoms deep beneath the sea level. The abomination of desolation covers land and water. Neither human nor brute life could be seen on shore; and the few water-fowls, the cape-pigeon, with its harlequin plumage, the albatross, the mysterious fish-hawk, with face like a death's-head, flew round the ship with melancholy cries that only made the loneliness of the region more real. These sea-birds are tame compared with those on land. Sailors rarely injure them. Many believe, in fact, that the souls of dead mariners are embodied in these restless creatures, and have a kindly feeling for them in consequence. The same birds will follow a ship for weeks. I know of one instance where an albatross, caught and marked with a red ribbon about its leg, and then released, flew three thousand miles in company with a vessel before it left her, from necessity being on the wing almost unceasingly for that immense distance. The Ancient Mariner's yarn is true to fact in that description at least.

Welcome Bay was our first night's anchorage after leaving Port Tamar. Its features were not peculiar. The mountain walls that shut out the sky, with a foamy line of falling water drawn on one precipitous hill-side, showed nothing new. By daylight next morning we were again under way.

Days more of the same superb but wearying scenery, anchoring every night. As far as Saumarez Island at length, where Sarmiento and Mesier channels meet. Here, in the sudden darkness of a snow-squall, just at sunset, we for the first time lost our harbor for the night. The chart gave Sandy Bay as an available anchorage, but to find Sandy Bay in the intense darkness was impossible. The situation was awkward. By daylight every sunken rock is buoyed out by kelp floating on the water, and always meaning possible danger. The sunken rocks are very abundant. The depth on them may be from one fathom to several; and just outside their boundary lines of floating kelp the sounding lead may find no bottom. Moving slowly through the night, we knew that each turn of our paddle-wheels might crash us against some one of them, and end our cruise at once. Boats with lanterns were sent out, but their lights flashed only against the black mountain sides, and showed no opening within which our wished-for harbor might be hidden. All night long the vessel crawled aimlessly about, or lay still, disheartened by continued failures, till at length the morning came and found her safe. Safe, and nearly where the darkness met her. How many times in the night destruction had been near her is known only to Him who guarded her from it.

A novelty came with the morning. Mesier Channel entrance was filled from shore to shore with bergs and floes of ice. Far beyond we could see the open water, but to reach it in that direction was impossible. The chart showed a side channel winding round to the eastward of an island near us, and re-entrant in Mesier some miles further north. To try to pass through this was our only resource. Our very light draught of water enabled us to do feats of navigation impossible to most ships of a thousand tons, and gave feelings of security in such attempts.

From some error in survey, and consequent mistake in the chart, this eastward channel proved a myth. As we moved slowly through its supposed commencement, the mountains on either hand approached, till at length they met. A narrow passage of egress on the right hand, unmarked save as an indentation of the shore upon the chart, seemed to show an outlet from their cul-de-sac. We headed for it. Winding through a tortuous lane of water, a large land-locked bay suddenly opened before us.

If surveys, charts, and records tell the truth, we were the first that ever burst into that silent sea. It spread out like an inland lake. Still and placid, walled by strange cliffs thousands of feet in height, that opened here and there in outlets of ravines that came down from valleys between the distant and overtopping mountains in the back-ground, each valley and its terminal ravine filled with a vast river of ice, overlaid in its frozen billows with drifted snow, the unknown bay was set with islands, each covered to the water's edge by the dense verdure of a Patagonian winter. The high precipices shut out every wind. Our ship moved on among the islands, each turn showing us some new beauty in the strange combination of mountain glaciers, woodland, and unruffled waters.

To its farthest limit, finding no passage out. We turned back. There was no resource left but to try the main entrance to Mesier again; hoping that the tide had set the ice-fields in motion and cleared our way.

"H" CLIFF, WATEREE BAY.

ROUNDING TRES MONTES.

We named the new-found water after our ship. Some of the more marked localities were christened also. One high cliff of curiously intermingled red sandstone and white marble bore on its perpendicular face a giant "H," done in marble mosaic on the dark sandstone. A species of geological eccentricity. Looming behind a glacier at another point there rose a snow-covered mountain, with a broad summit that was shaped, in the smoothest and purest white, in a giant likeness of a woman's breast. As if some Titanic sculptor had begun to fashion the inland mountain range into the effigy of a sleeping Venus, and had ceased when this exquisite fragment of his toil was done.

Mesier Channel was clear when we came to it again. A few small bergs were coming down with the tide, but the great fields of ice had gone. We went on steadily northward. Between us and the open Pacific were only two days more of steaming; and Valparaiso, with news from home, was but a few hundred miles beyond. It was the fifth day of June. Three months had passed since we came away, and in that time neither newspaper nor letter had reached us. The war might have ended for aught we knew. Bets were offered, and found ready takers upon all conceivable contingencies of home affairs. Our careful man had "hedged" to such an extent that when, long after, we reached civilization, no one in the ward-room could unravel the intricate chain of wagers, and we were forced to declare all of them "off."

The two days passed. We left the inland channels with a slight regret. Their canal-like navigation had grown natural by weeks of continuance; and to be under way after sunset was a rather disagreeable novelty. I think on our last night but one we tied up to the bank, in Mississippi river style, finding no bottom in the channel, and no harbor for anchoring.

Round the peninsula of the Three Mountains, and up on the outer side of the islands which lie north of it. And here two unpleasant facts came upon us at once. A heavy gale with rain and snow, and an announcement that only one day's coal remained in our bunkers. We could have weathered the storm, but coal was our life. Our sailing abilities were on a par with those of a ferry-boat destitute of fuel. We left Montevideo with coal stowed in every available part of the ship, but from some deception or misconception there, or some undiscovered waste on board, it was thus nearly gone.

Only one course could be taken. A harbor at once had to be found, and it fortunately existed in Narborough Island, one of the group known as the Chonos Archipelago, twenty miles from us to the northeast. We fought our way toward it against the gale, and let go our anchor there on the 8th of June, a little after mid-day.

Our short cruise to Valparaiso was a thing of the future now. Wood-cutting, slow steaming, crawling by degrees from island to island till some coal station could be found, were to be the rule for weeks, months perhaps. No one could tell how long. The heavy rain and the blank desolation of our anchorage at Narborough aided the vague feeling of misfortune that came over every one on board. I should except our captain. Trained by the severe experience of four shipwrecks (among them that of the steamer San Francisco, where he was forced, although a passenger, to assume the heaviest responsibilities), he seemed little depressed by the delay, and gave courage and hope to others by his equanimity.

Nine days in Narborough with ceaseless rain. Sickness came among the crew. A case of scurvy appeared, with the slight consolation to my mind that its victim was filthy enough in personal habits to contract almost any disease idiopathically. One poor fellow, who had been under medical treatment for a long while, died of tubercular consumption, and was buried on the island. I read the burial-service over his grave with the feeling that others might follow him if our stay in Patagonia should be a lengthened one. I could give little encouragement to my patients when such small prospect of a change for the better in our movements existed.

Through these nine days our men were cutting wood for the furnaces, and bringing it off to the ship. It was water-soaked and almost unflammable. A few tons of coal were left to use as a base for the wood fires; and on the 17th of June we got up steam, after infinite labor, and ran slowly out of the most dismal harbor I ever saw. We hoped to reach some port to the north, where we could again cut wood or find a little coal. We meant at least to get inside the islands again, and run our northward course to Chiloe Island in smooth water. Man proposes. Our nine days' cutting of wood gave us but six hours' steam, and we anchored again in the afternoon in a secluded little harbor in an unnamed island, fifteen miles east of Narborough, trying to solve the problem of our future movements. If more than a week's work at gathering wood resulted in fifteen miles' steaming, how long would it take us to reach Chiloe, two hundred miles away? The answer was unsatisfactory. And fresh discomfort came now from the exhaustion of our choicer provisions in the officers' messes, our "coming down on our rations" in consequence, and the paymaster's announcement that of these even there was but three weeks' supply in the ship. We smoked our pipes, wondered whether our stock of tobacco would give out as well, and reflected gloomily on the probable event of our becoming resident Patagonians during the ensuing season—with mussels, snails, kelp-geese, and other delicacies of the sort, for permanent diet.

I made an interesting culinary discovery during our period of semi-starvation. The kelp-geese, which, when cooked in the ordinary way, has a strong savor of old lamp-oil, may be entirely deprived of that, and every other taste, by boiling it for a day in salt-water, for another day in fresh, and roasting it on the third day. A very tender mass of fibrous and muscular tissue is the result, which satisfies hunger if it does not nourish.

We called this second harbor the Bay of the 17th of June. The chart ignored its existence even. I said the island was unnamed. As I sit writing in my state-room this evening—the ship being some eight hundred miles south of San Francisco, and running for that port against a stiff norther, with one hundred and sixty tons of coal on board, and twenty or thirty cases of remittent fever, a legacy from our last ports, Acapulco and Magdalena Bay—a brother officer reminds me that it was called Stokes's Island. For the benefit of visitors to the Chonos Archipelago I would recommend this Bay of the 17th of June. It lies in the northeastern corner of the island, and is as convenient and safe as an anchorage can be. Kelp-geese are abundant, but very hard to kill. It may be interesting to know that one of them disposed of three Sharpe's or Spencer's rifle-bullets, in some mysterious way, that were fired at him and that certainly hit him, and then flew quietly away. The water-fowls are the only game there. From end to end of the Patagonian coast we found no fish that would bite at a baited hook; and the larger land game ceases at Port Famine, in the Strait of Magalhaen, where the sea-coast forest begins. Seals are as abundant as fish are seemingly rare. Their familiar human eyes reminded me many times of the old Aquarial Gardens in Central Court, in Boston, where Mr. Cutting used to demonstrate how thoroughly they might be tamed. I saw them in Sarmiento Channel swimming in compact column, with curious and regular somersaults of the entire column by files as they swam, completely filling a mile of water in width and more than that in length.

Wood-cutting went on with more ease in Stokes's Island than it did in Narborough. Pleasant weather and more agreeable scenery aided the efforts of the men; and after two days' stay we started out again. The chart gave a winding but broad and deep channel among the northern islands of the Chonos group, that lead into the wide strait between them and the main land, that is known as the Chonos Gulf. Ninulac Channel and Memory Passage are the names given to the different portions of this winding way.

In smooth water we steamed easily along, expecting soon to reach the gulf. An awkward surprise awaited us. In place of Fitzroy's ample egress from the Ninulac Channel, a most decided barrier of firm land stretched right across our path. Evening was near, and our only choice was another anchorage, with more days of wood-cutting to replenish our nearly exhausted stock. Somebody on board shot an albatross one day while the ship was in the channel of Sarmiento. The incident came up in the memory of some of our officers, and the Ancient Mariner's disasters after a similar act were freely cited as likely to find a parallel in our own case. Affairs began to look as if this might be so. Still wood-cutting went on through the next day; and then, retracing our course, and trying every avenue that seemed to run eastward, we at length fairly squeezed through an opening that was never intended for a thousand-ton ship to use, and came out into Chonos Gulf. A clear channel of inland water stretched from where we were to Chiloe Island, fresh provisions, and possible coal. But a hundred and eighty miles of distance—only a day's work with proper fuel; but with nothing save wood to burn, it became a task of very indefinite length. And just here, as we entered the gulf, our wood gave out again.

I hardly remember how many times more we ran in behind some projecting head-land, anchored, and sent our hewers of wood ashore. Sunday Harbor, Delay Harbor, Hindrance Bay—names of our own giving—each mark a place where this sort of work was done. I think that at Hindrance Bay we accomplished the feat of getting wood enough on board to give a hundred miles of steaming, and a hope of going back to civilization again. At noon of the day after we left there we entered the inlet that nearly divides the Island of Chiloe in two, leading up from the Corcovado Gulf to the ancient city of Castro.

For fifteen miles the inlet runs through scenery like that of the Rhine. The high hills on either side come down in slopes and terraces to the water; and every where farm-houses and cultivated fields give a completed appearance to the country. Rarely, even in New England, have I seen such a finished landscape. Fences and walls mark the limits of the different fields that were mapped out on the hill-side in varied shades of green. There seemed to be no waste land. A golden haze, resembling vaguely that of an Indian summer at home, covered shore and river as our ship steamed slowly through the windings of the inlet toward the city. From desolation and a wilderness in the morning into a land of plenty at night!

But one or two steamers were ever in Castro River before. Ours was the first steam-vessel of war to enter it. So the inhabitants told us, at least. As we moved along the hill-sides were dotted with men, women, and children hurrying down to the shore to see the strange sight. Our opera-glasses showed them miles away. Farm-houses emptied themselves of entire families, even to babies in arms and dogs. Padres, with their gowns brailed up, came over the fields from distant villages, bringing their parishioners with them.

The whole country-side population stampeded for the river. The Great Eastern caused no greater proportionate excitement when she entered New York harbor for the first time than our ship created in Chiloe.

A boat met us five miles from Castro containing a wealthy old gentleman, the proprietor of Lemuy Island, his family, and their household priest. They were taking an afternoon sail to the city. They were invited on board, and their boat taken in tow. The padre was a gentleman of refinement and education. He gave us all the news he had heard from America, in a tolerably clear account of two or three great battles where Grant had driven Lee back with great slaughter. As Grant was in the Southwest when we sailed from Washington, we imagined the battles to have been there. It was some weeks afterward before Spottsylvania and the Wilderness became names of any import to us.

The priest acted as pilot up to the city. We anchored at sunset. Our visitors left us with many promises of fresh provisions, fruit, and the many necessities of shore life that are luxuries on board ship. Our sea-fare had held out well. A week's supply remained when we reached Castro, but salt-horse and beans had grown very distasteful. And the padre told us that in Chiloe chickens sold for twenty-five cents each, and potatoes of excellent quality were but seventy-five cents per barrel.

Early next morning the padre's story was verified. Boats began to approach the ship at daylight, bringing every thing eatable that their owners could find on shore. The steamer's deck looked like a meat-market. Officers and men were buying beef, mutton, potatoes, fowls, eggs, hams—any thing with a flavor of land growth about it. One needs a few weeks' or months' subsistence on salted meats to understand how savory a breakfast of steak, ham, eggs, fresh butter, and actual milk may be. Potatoes especially have a substantial relish about them under such circumstances, and these are grown of a superior quality by the thrifty farmers of Chiloe.

The prices of provisions in the island were remarkably low. Chickens from fifteen to twenty-five cents each. Sheep a dollar apiece. Beef three cents a pound. Eggs a cent each. Excellent flour, ground in mills like those in use in Bible times, by hand-power, three cents per pound. Hams of singularly delicate flavor fifty cents each. These hams are prepared by smoking only, and are fresh as the pork of recent killing. The people of Castro showed a want of money-making intelligence that we have never found before or since in our cruising round South America. The Bay of all the Saints held as inveterate a set of swindlers in this particular as most cities with names of less holy import. At Montevideo, Valparaiso, and Callao, prices ruled very high. Excepting cigars in Bahia, for the choicest of which it is impossible to pay more than two dollars per hundred, and beef in Montevideo, where a butcher apologized to me for its very exorbitant price, two and a half cents a pound for sirloin steaks, saying that the Flores rebellion had made every thing high, the necessities of life command a greater price in gold than they did in paper in America when we left Washington in all the coast cities of South America. In Panama ten cents is the charge for a tumbler of iced water. I found, however, that the cigars of San Salvador de Bahia de Todos os Santos and the Montevidean beef were each among the choicest of their kind, even at such low rates. For the benefit of visitors to the Brazilian city, I would suggest that an inquiry at almost any tobacconist's shop there for cigars of the brand "Suspiro," with both ends twisted to points, will give them material for smoking that five times the price could not procure them in America in regard to richness and purity of flavor. I venture the remark from the fact that poor cigars there, as elsewhere, outnumber good ones.

Castro has historic fame. Though now almost unknown and unvisited, it was once the principal political point on the Pacific coast. Its harbor has a length of twenty miles, with an average width of a mile and a half, and is absolutely free from any danger in storms from any quarter. The often-mentioned "navies of the world" might anchor there at once; and a wash-tub could be paddled from ship to ship in a storm with no more risk than on a village pond. Every mile or two in the winding length of this land-locked bay was a projecting headland, where a battery might oppose a fleet. There is deep water and good anchorage from its mouth to the city. Centuries ago the Spaniards had recognized these advantages, and guarded the harbor and city against all hostile intrusion. With the decay of Spain the place became neglected. Castro is now nothing but a village, with grass-grown streets and hardly a thousand inhabitants, though still the centre of one of the finest farming countries in the world. The climate of the eastern slope of Chiloe is a temperate one in the strictest sense. Snow and ice are almost unknown, and the summer heats are never violent. Any vegetable or fruit of the Middle States of our own country will grow there. There seems to be no reason why Castro may not again become a city of importance, and the island a residence for a large population, should the Chilean Government offer requisite inducements for immigration. A plank road connects Castro with Ancud at the northern end of the island, sixty miles distant, where the English mail steamers come twice each month from Valparaiso—a road laid down more than two hundred years ago, and since renewed from time to time. A railway over this road, and southward up the island, would develop the resources of the country as an agricultural region, and in time pay well for itself. Immigration is the one thing needed. Thrifty and successful as the farmers of Chiloe are, they have but a faint idea of their own possibilities in any project of improvement.

Castro is in a state of decay. An old church—how old no one about it knew—stands on one side of the plaza. Faithful and painstaking hands in some past age adorned its interior with rude carvings in wood that still bear the marks of laborious cutting with knives, as a boy whittles a stick. It has long been tenantless. A new building, with residences for the priests attached, occupies another side of the public square, and is the only church of the town. The Governor's house takes up nearly all of a third side, and the fourth has a row of houses where the better class of the town's-people live. Wheeled vehicles are almost unknown. The inevitable donkey, with his omniferous panniers, seemed to do here, as in all the sea-coast towns of South America, the internal carrying trade of the place. Two or three little shops, where hoop-skirts and cigarritos were sold, were the only symptoms of visible business.

We wanted coal, but the Castrians had none. Wood was our only obtainable fuel. After waiting at Castro a week, and taking in a few cords only of this, the ever-present American, who would appear wherever a ship might go if she waited for him, came to us by water from an island in the bay ten miles below the town. His name was Smith, and his trade blacksmith, at Port Famine, or rather at Sandy Point; it would have been Smiley and his trade wrecker, if any disaster had befallen us in Magalhaen Strait. It was Avery in the general brokerage business here. Avery had been in Chiloe and Patagonia for thirty years. Sealing, sea-going, and potato-whisky had left their marks upon him. This last article is a native production of the island, and is, I think, the most horrible distillation ever made. Its flavor is indescribably nauseous. Its purity and great intoxicating powers are its sole recommendations. Avery told us of a hundred cords of wood that might be had at a low price at the place he came from that morning. We took him on board, weighed anchor, and went there.

Wooding again, but this time with greater ease and rapidity than in the Chonos Archipelago. A week at Quehuy Island, during which we celebrated the Fourth of July as well as we could in such a locality, and we left the magnificent harbor or river of Castro, heading up the Corcovado Gulf for Ancud, a hundred miles distant by water. The lonely mountains of Patagonia came into view again as we left the river.

The people of Chiloe labored under a strange delusion about our vessel. News of the seizure of the Chinchas had just arrived in the island; and from the Governor to his valet every one believed us to be Spanish. No argument could undeceive them. They believed we were sent to spy out the weakness of the land, and that our want of wood was a fiction. A peculiar style of paint that disfigured our hull, unlike that of any man-of-war ever seen any where, and our visit to such an out-of-the-world place as Castro, confirmed them in their opinion.

There were one or two more anchorages on the island side of Corcovado Gulf, but Ancud was reached at last. The town is in the extreme north of Chiloe, and is, with Port Montt, a German city on the opposite shore, the terminus of the southern Pacific mail-route. Ancud, or San Carlos—it has both names—was once a place of some importance; but the flourishing immigrant settlers at Port Montt, on the main land, have every thing their own way now, and the island town is drooping. We staid there nearly a week. Rain fell steadily night and day through the whole time. An abundance of wood, and all the coal that the courteous captain of the English mail-steamer Callao could possibly part with, gave us fuel enough to attempt to make Valdivia, a hundred miles further north.

We steamed out into the open Pacific for the second time with some misgivings. There was a possibility of finding coal at Valdivia. Nothing more. Beyond that point two hundred miles intervened between it and the great coal-mines of Lota and Lotilla. A distance almost impossible to pass with wood alone. It was our only course, however, and was fortunately successful. We ran into the harbor of Valdivia on the day after leaving Ancud, were boarded by the usual officials, and found that seventy tons of coal could be purchased. It was all there was in the harbor, and its owner seemed as glad to sell as we were to buy. It had been on his hands for a great many years, how many I have forgotten, and he had long ago lost all hope of ever selling it. The people of the smaller South American towns use only charcoal for heating and cooking purposes.

Valdivia harbor is another of the many land-locked bays on the Pacific coast that have been strangely overlooked; while open roadsteads, like the so-called harbor of Valparaiso, mark the sites of large and important cities. Its natural defenses are almost perfect. Two decaying forts, with a few rusted guns, are the only artificial ones.

Coal came rapidly on board. Valparaiso was fast assuming shape in our minds as a goal that might be reached by a few more efforts. Letters from home, news of the war, the relief of anxiety about our ship, that we knew must have been caused by our many delays, were all objects almost within our grasp. The mail-steamer Callao had taken the report of our arrival at Ancud, but she left us almost destitute of fuel, with several hundred miles of open ocean to traverse before any supply was possible. With our seventy tons on board we bombarded one of the two old forts to please a company of Chilean officers* which came from shore, showed them what heavy rifled cannon could and could not do, and left Valdivia for the coal-regions of Coronel. Two hundred miles were rapidly passed over. Standing in toward the land the curious double mountain of Bio-Bio, and the low coast south of it, marked the entrance to the bays of Lota, Lotilla, and Coronel, three villages among the coal-mines. We anchored off the iron pier of Lota at sunset.

In this portion of Chili coal is found in abundance. Vessels are constantly loading for ports along the coast, as far north even as Panama. The mines are in the southwestern corner of Araucania. Though the government holds nominal sway over this entire province, its actual jurisdiction is limited to the sea-shore. The unsubdued Araucanian Indians are as independent now as in the old days when they stood alone, the only tribe unconquered by the invading Spaniards.

The coal district is owned in great part by a Chilean proprietor resident in Santiago. Its managers are mostly English, as are also the principal subordinate officials. Men trained to mining business in the English coal-fields. I passed an interesting morning in visiting the mines and their machinery. One of the superintendents went about with me, giving me many details in regard to the works. The hills back of Lota are seamed with veins of coal. The richest deposits are known to be under the bay; but at such little depth that any mining there by shafts on shore and horizontal tunneling is impossible.

Two sorts of mines have been excavated. Shafts from thirty to a hundred yards deep are sunk at different points, and from them the veins are followed in some instances for nearly a mile by horizontal digging. At one point a shaft with a dip of about one foot in fifty enters a hill-side from the surface. At another a railway connects a pit with a delivery-shed a half mile distant, on which the loaded cars are drawn up a steep slope by an endless rope of wire and a stationary engine. Every thing works smoothly. Laborers are easily found among the Chilean peons. From six to ten thousand tons per month are taken out at the Lota mines alone.

The hill-sides and cuttings of the coal region show in brilliant colors from the bay. A turf of most vivid green, its grass dense, velvety, and heavy as that of England, has a subsoil of bright red. The many excavations of pits, railways, and roads give a contrast in color to the surface that has an effect of artificiality beyond any thing of the sort that I ever met before. A house here and there among the hills, of white stone or wood, with yellow or red roof, aids the kaleidoscopic appearance of the landscape. Wherever a hill-side is scarped by the action of the sea, as those are skirting the beach, the sectional strata of clay, loam, gravel, and rock show even more contrasting colors than the surface of the country. A pleasant effect of fresh cleanliness results.

The old and new cities of Concepcion were both near by. The mining people offered us horses and guides to take us to them across the country; but time pressed, our coal was on board, and we were forced to decline their services. The constant rain of Ancud had given place to bright sunshine and dry air. July is the midwinter month of the southern hemisphere; but the days at Lota were like those of October in the north. The line of equal cold runs far toward the pole in Chili and Western Patagonia. I think that even in the Strait of Magalhaen the thermometer never goes below 20° Fahrenheit in the coldest weather.

We left Lota with an ample supply of coal. This Chilean coal is ultra-bituminous. It burns rapidly, with great evolution of heat and smoke, becoming any thing but economical for ship's use. Cardiff from Wales and anthracite from America are brought to various ports in the Pacific by sailing-vessels, but in small quantities only. We found anthracite at Saint Thomas, Cardiff at Bahia and Montevideo, an unworked mine of valuable bituminous at Port Famine, anthracite again at Valparaiso, Callao, Panama, and Acapulco. Twenty dollars per ton in gold is asked for anthracite coal in some of the Pacific ports. For a steamer, whose only dependence is upon what her engines can burn, the expenses of a voyage in this ocean are heavy.

I speak of payments in gold. The republics of the South are more fortunate in currency than we have been. Through their unceasing, intestinal wars they have preserved a gold and silver circulating medium, or one of paper redeemable in coin. English and French gold is very common in the cities. American gold and silver are in use in a less degree. A new silver coinage in Brazil, Chili, and Peru, of most beautiful design and finished appearance, had been recently adopted as we visited each country. No coinage of our own can compare with it in workmanship. It is national and distinctive, of course, in each of the three countries, but of similar character in sharp and clear outline. Doubloons and their fractions in gold, as well as the half-worn halves, quarters, and eighths in silver, that were once diagnostic of Mexican or South American production, are growing less common as the new coinage is introduced. Chili has gold dollars, like those first issued in our own country.

The Andes of Chili skirted the horizon as we went down the coast. "Down" the coast, from the southern pole; though "up" seemed from our northern habits the correct adverb to use. Their snow-line grew steadily higher. In the Strait of Magalhaen it came nearly to the sea-level.

The Pacific Ocean had hardly deserved its title, so far as our experience went thus far. Either constant rain and wind, or fair weather with a heavy sea, had been the rule since we entered it. One needs to go to sea in a steamer of eight feet draught, without a keel, and with a powerful engine that forced her against head winds and waves, to understand how uneasily a vessel can move.

We entered the open roadstead in front of Valparaiso on the morning of July 23, after one of the longest passages ever made from Montevideo by a steamer. Our anchor was scarcely aground before a boat came alongside with our mail-bag. The letters were the first that had reached us since we left America, four months and sixteen days before. They were intensely welcome. The mail steamer at Ancud had given us vague accounts of the progress of the war. The full details of the campaigns, battles, and victories of the spring and early summer came to us "in a single day, at this port in the distant Pacific," as I knew they would when we left Hampton Roads.

Valparaiso was a series of pleasant surprises. From the sea its appearance is commonplace. It has none of the picturesqueness of Bahia or Charlotte Amalia, or even of Montevideo. Spurs of the arid table-land, a thousand feet above the sea, run toward the shore in decreasing height, leaving a border of land or sea-beach between their scarped termini and the water, a few hundred yards in width. The ends of the spurs, the valleys between them, and the reclaimed sea-beach make the site of the city.

The streets of the lower town are devoted to wholesale and retail business. There are blocks of warehouses differing in no way save height from those of Europe or America. The occurrence of an earthquake as often as once every fortnight precludes any very imposing architecture; necessitating broad and low buildings, with walls massive enough to sustain the shocks or else so yielding as not to be broken by them. Buildings in the city are usually of the former character. The huts of the peons in the country have bamboo or cane walls covered with clay. Internal plastering is little used even in the most expensive houses. Rooms are finished in paper or boards. The retail shops are as varied in character, as elegant in windows of large plate-glass, as thoroughly stocked with choice goods of every sort, as they are in New York or Boston. I found no want of civilized purchasers uncared for. Shops where nothing but sheet-music is sold, perfectly-supplied furnishing warehouses for both men and women, jewelry shops, confectionery saloons, fruit-shops, tailoring establishments, with fashions as late as our own, bar-rooms, well-arranged restaurants, all the different retail businesses that our own cities have, exist in as good condition in Valparaiso. Milliners alone make little display, from the fact that very few of the female portion of the population ever wear any thing on the head in the streets save a veil or a fold of mantilla. This peculiarity is common to all classes of society. The effect is more singular from the adoption of the latest styles of dress in every other particular, and the entire similarity of the male costume to our own, including the stove-pipe or nail-keg hat. Whether the beautiful and superabundant hair of the South American women is due to this constant exposure of the head I am unable to say. I am inclined to believe that it is so.

The hotels in Valparaiso are not so good as they might be. They are kept in a mixed European and American manner. Their charges are three dollars per day for every thing—board, lodging, and attendance. Soup, as a first course for breakfast, is a novelty that I first met here. A visitor to the city can obtain his meals most satisfactorily at the Exchange Coffee House near the Mole, where the choicest dishes are served by the card.

Horse cars traverse the lower town. They are more commodious than American cars, having as many seats on top—to which comfortable stairways lead—as there are inside. The improvement is one that would be popular in America. The stairways curve outward from each side of the platform, which has its entrance step in the centre, instead of the side as with us. The streets are thoroughly lighted by gas at night, and amply supplied with a uniformed police.

In the valleys leading up to the inland plateau, and upon the summits of the projections of the table-land, are the residences of the middle and upper classes. One gentleman, the senior partner in as large and well-arranged wholesale drug-house as I have often seen, while standing with me in front of his store, pointed out his house to me, three hundred feet above us, and not more than as many yards distant in an air-line. The queer effect of these rocky precipices, crowned with dwellings, rising directly from the streets of the city, is, I think, peculiar to Valparaiso among the sea-coast towns of the Pacific. Their summits are reached by zig-zag foot-paths in the faces of the cliffs, or by winding roads from the intermediate valleys.

We left there after a fortnight's stay. Santiago, the Chilean capital, connected with Valparaiso by rail, where the horrible burning of the Compania Church occurred a year ago, was unvisited by any of us except our captain. He described it as a large and beautiful city of two hundred thousand inhabitants. Valparaiso has a population of seventy-five thousand. As we left the harbor the tall peak of Aconcagua, ninety miles in the interior, stood out grandly against the sky. Its great height, twenty-three thousand feet, dwarfed the many smaller mountains nearer the coast, that rise from eight to fifteen thousand feet above the sea. Our course was northward. Lima and its sea-port, Callao, Tumbes, Panama, Acapulco, Magdalena Bay, were our several prospective ports. They have all been visited and left behind. San Francisco is near. There the ship will recover energies wasted by seventeen thousand miles of cruising. I trust my seventy sick men may do so too.

In a late number of the Army and Navy Journal there was the following item:

"NAVAL.—The missing steamer Waterlee has at last been heard from. She was at Castro, a port in the Island of Chiloe."

The statement was so brief and our cruise so novel, that I thought something more might be told of the reason why we were missing, and "WHERE THE 'WATERLEE' WAS."

LOVE AT SEA.

FOAM-CRESTED waves, from morn to night,
That met all round the deep blue sky,
With here and there a sail in sight,
Which came, then vanished to the eye.

Our glittering wake shone white behind,
A path of silver reaching back;
With shrill voice sang the salt sea wind;
The petrel hovered in our track.

Linked arm in arm, when skies were fair,
We trod the deck with thoughtless aim,
Or sometimes, seated idly there,
Watched the far sails which went and came.

Or, gazing down along the deep,
We marked the long, dark indolent swells,
And saw the bounding porpoise leap,
And heard on board the half-hour bells.

Oh, what to us was Time's swift flight—
Or Time itself, beyond a name?
Oh, what to us the noon or night,
To whom all seasons were the same?

For Love possessed our souls, and drew
His rosy veil before our eyes,
And, steeped in bliss, our souls looked through
The open gates of Paradise.

Left far behind the new world lay;
Dim, distant, shadowy, and vast,
The old world rose before our way,
Replete with records of the Past.

VOL. XXX.—No. 179.—P F

What time fair Hesperus, rising, gleamed
In crimson deeps where sank the breeze,
The red sun from the far west seemed
To drop into the purple seas.

And on the farthest verge of night
Rose the full moon, like some pale nun,
Her face all wet with tears, and white,
When the sweet vesper hymn is done.

Or sailing on from high to higher,
By skirts of silver shining clouds,
She seemed at times a ball of fire
That struggled in the tall dark shrouds.

On one side, spanned with quivering light,
The phosphorescent ocean lay,
And on the other, lost to sight,
The shadowy waves stretched far away.

And sometimes, like a silent ghost,
Dim outlined on the dark night sky,
Some fair ship, from a foreign coast
In distant seas would pass us by.

Oh! soft, still nights; oh! calm, rich days
To which my thoughts like currents tend,
In whose bright wake my fancy plays,
There is no voyage but hath its end.

One morn I woke to scent the breeze
That over English downs had swept;
And round our prow in sluggish ease
The waters of the Mersey slept.

THE PETROLEUM REGION OF AMERICA.

STREET VIEW IN OIL CITY.

WHEN the treasures of California were discovered thousands rushed to its golden shores. The wilderness of the great West teemed with life, and the gulches were compelled to give up their treasures, long hidden from the eye of man. The American mines were no sooner opened than Australia was overrun with eager adventurers seeking for gold. Gold having been found in other parts of the world, skeptics on the subject have ceased to exist, and the golden mines of the eastern and western hemispheres have become realities.

But there is a mineral substance more precious than silver or gold, the occurrence and profitable discovery of which geology alone is able to determine. That substance is coal. Yet when coal was discovered many predicted the almost immediate failure of the supply; but as civilization overspread the land, removing our forests of heavy timber, thus decreasing the supply of the only fuel we then had, Nature came to our assistance and disclosed to us the vast coal-fields hidden for so many ages beneath the earth. The coal "bubble" has never "burst." New fields are being discovered.

Seemingly not satisfied with the present developments of mineral wealth bestowed on us, Nature, keeping pace with the necessities of man, suddenly unfolds another wonder—Oil, Petroleum—which now comes spouting from the bowels of the earth, from inexhaustible basins hidden deep down amidst the sandstone rocks below.

Although Nature has selected the nineteenth century in which to develop her great resources in the article of petroleum, yet history informs us that the existence of "rock-oil" was known through many past ages. The walls of Babylon were built with brick, cemented with hot bitumen or asphaltum, which was found in Judea, afterward discovered in France, and in the sand rock of Albania. This asphaltum is black in color, brittle and solid, and when heated is reduced to a liquid state. It finds its way to the surface in the shape of a thick, waxy fluid, which was used for lubricating purposes, and for the calking of vessels. In the Birmese empire there is a mountain where over five hundred pits have been sunk for the collection of petroleum, which has long been used for burning purposes. It is also found on the shores of the Caspian, where it oozes through a soft soil in the form of vapor or gas, and is led through earthen pipes, and employed for illuminating the neighboring towns and cities. A very light liquid oil, resembling naphtha, is found coming from a spring near the village of Amiano, in the State of Parma, which supplies a sufficient quantity to illuminate the city of Genoa, for which purpose it is employed.

It is evident that the supply of whale-oil is fast decreasing, and that those mighty creatures of the deep have become so few that our once immense whale-fisheries threaten soon to be among the things that were. During the past ten or twenty years the demand for a burning oil has increased so rapidly that lard-oil and burning-fluid were introduced. But these, together with the sperm-oil, not only failed to supply the increased demand, but have gradually become almost extinct. It was at this point that there was disclosed to us, at our thresholds, a never-failing supply of burning oil.

The most celebrated oil-wells as yet discovered and operated on the American continent are located in the western part of Pennsylvania, principally in Venango, Crawford, and Warren counties. The wells next of note are found in Western Virginia and Eastern Ohio; and recently wells have been opened in the States of New York and Michigan, also in Canada.

It has been said that petroleum is only found within a belt running diagonally across the globe, varying from six to sixty miles in width—sweeping across through the centre of the State of New York, passing over the western part of Pennsylvania and Virginia, and the eastern portion of Ohio and Kentucky, and so on down through the wilds of Tennessee. That there is such a belt of oil lands in existence, from the present developments, is not doubted; but the assertion that no oil is found without the belt can not be sustained by facts, because the Canadian wells now flowing hundreds of barrels of oil are located on the borders of Lake Erie, far to the west of the so-called oil belt.

Oil Creek, which has become celebrated as the site of the richest oil-producing region on earth at the present day, is a tortuous mountain stream, taking its rise in the northern part of the State of Pennsylvania, near the south line of Erie County, and, with its tributaries, waters Crawford and Warren counties, and after a course of about thirty miles through these counties empties into the Alleghany River seven miles above the town of Franklin. The valley through which Oil Creek takes its course is narrow, and flanked on each side by high and rugged hills, on the top of which are broad fields of excellent farming land. The scenery on Oil Creek at one time, no doubt, was quite picturesque; but now the bottom lands are dotted with tall derricks, wooden engine-houses, and iron smoke-stacks, out of which columns of black smoke roll upward to the clouds. The pines and hemlock are cleared from the mountain sides, and all is busy life.

Previous to the developments of the petroleum discoveries this entire region supplied the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi with vast quantities of lumber. Thousands of long rafts found their way out into the Ohio and Mississippi rivers during the spring and fall freshets. The extensive lumber saw-mills of Messrs. Brewer, Watson, and Co. were located on Oil Creek, near Titusville, the present metropolis of Petrolia. Near those mills oil first made its appearance in large quantities in this country. Half a mile below Titusville Oil Creek meets its principal confluent, Pine Creek, more commonly known now as the East Branch of Oil Creek; and the delta of these two streams is covered with old oil-pits, which occur at intervals all along the creek below Titusville. These pits are supposed by some to have been the work of the French during their occupancy of the country in 1759, on account of being located almost directly between the French forts of La Bœuf and Venango. The writer is inclined to believe that these pits were constructed by the Indians long before the appearance of the white man in this region; which belief is sustained by the following circumstance: In sinking a well recently in the neighborhood of Titusville, five feet beneath the spot where a tree had stood, which, calculating the layers of its yearly growth, must have been at least two hundred and forty years old, was found a wooden well curb, or mouth, of an old oil-pit in a good state of preservation.

The land of this entire region belonged to the "Holland Company," who obtained it in lieu of moneys lent to Congress during the Revolution. It was divided into four-hundred-acre lots, and sold at a very low price; but so many more attractions were held out to emigrants by the Western States at that time that this Venango region was almost overlooked, and it became settled very slowly. In the year 1797 Jonathan Titus and Samuel Kier arrived from the east and entered lands in this region. Mr. Titus secured a large tract of many hundred acres, part of which is now the site of Titusville and part the lands belonging to the "Titus Estate Petroleum Company" of New York. The Hon. John Reynolds, now of Meadville, with his father, shortly afterward settled at Cherry Tree, seven miles below; and not long afterward Hamilton and James M'Clintock settled on Oil Creek—the former at what is now Petroleum Centre, and the latter on the present site of M'Clintockville.

Petroleum, under the name of "Seneca oil"—so called from the tribe of Indians of that name who once inhabited the country—became early of great importance to the settlers, both as a medicine and for burning and lubricating purposes. The greater portion of oil was obtained from two natural springs. One of these was in the immediate neighborhood of Titusville, on the lands now owned by the "Watson Petroleum Company" of New York, on the spot where now stands the old "Drake Well." The other spring was on the farm of Hamilton M'Clintock, within four miles of the mouth of Oil Creek.

The old salt-wells situated on the Alleghany River, near the town of Tarentum, were owned by the father of Samuel M. Kier, now of the city of Pittsburg. About two years after the opening of these salt-wells oil made its appearance upon the water that flowed into the salt-kettles, and interfered with the quality of the salt to such an extent that Mr. Kier at one time thought of abandoning his wells; but he afterward constructed a canal leading into the river, into which he passed the oil from the water. The oil on the water in the canal and river became very offensive to the people in the neighborhood, and many complaints were made. One day some boys, who were playing near the canal with matches, accidentally set the oil on fire, and it was with the greatest difficulty the village was saved from burning.

During the year 1853 Dr. F. B. Brewer, of the firm of Brewer, Watson, and Co., conceived the idea of collecting surface oil by means of absorbing it in blankets, and wringing the oil out. Great quantities were collected in this novel manner, and used for burning purposes in the lumber mills of the Oil Creek region. The oil produced from the oil springs became so necessary and useful as to suggest the formation of an oil company in 1854 called the "Pennsylvania Rock-Oil Company." This was the first Oil Company ever formed. This was prior to the sinking of any well, or before such a thing was suggested.

The Pennsylvania Rock-Oil Company purchased 100 acres of land on Oil Creek, below Titusville, for the purpose of collecting the surface oil. This project was, however, soon after abandoned, and the original Petroleum Company ceased to exist.

Although Professor Silliman, of New Haven, had in 1854 analyzed the rock-oil, and pronounced upon its properties, no further developments of any importance took place until the winter of 1857, when Colonel E. L. Drake, of Connecticut, arrived at Titusville, and was the first man who attempted to bore for oil. In December, 1857, he visited Titusville, examined the oil springs, and gave the subject of surface oil a thorough investigation. He soon concluded that rock-oil could be obtained by sinking a well; and acting upon this, he in company with James M. Townsend and E. B. Bowditch, leased the lands of the Pennsylvania Rock-Oil Company for the term of twenty-five years for the purpose of boring for oil. The operations were to commence the following spring. Soon after closing this lease, Colonel Drake and friends from Connecticut formed a company called the "Seneca Oil Company" for the purpose of working the lands and sinking wells under the management and control of Colonel Drake. Early in the spring he removed his family to Titusville, then containing not over one hundred and fifty inhabitants. He first informed himself thoroughly on the subject of boring, and visited the salt-wells on the Alleghany River for that purpose, where, after some difficulty, he employed a man who agreed to sink wells for the Seneca Company; but he and others to whom he had applied failed to keep their engagements, and it was not until the following spring that he could obtain a suitable person to commence the well. The first difficulty encountered was the surface water, which would flow into the well and undermine the earth, and cause it to cave in. In sinking the well it was supposed necessary to dig to the first rock; but in consequence of the earth caving in on the workmen so frequently, Colonel Drake invented the iron driving-pipe and mode of driving which is now in universal use, not only in the oil regions, but among the salt borers. He was obliged to go fifty miles to a machine-shop every time his tools needed repairing; but after many delays and accidents, on the 29th day of August, 1859, at the depth of 69 feet 6 inches, he struck a vein of oil, from which he afterward pumped at the rate of thirty-five to forty barrels per day. This is now known as the Drake Well, and was the first well ever sunk for oil, and the first petroleum ever obtained by boring.

Now commenced a scene of excitement beyond description. The Drake Well was immediately thronged with visitors arriving from the surrounding country, and within two or three weeks thousands began to pour in from the neighboring States. Every body was eager to purchase or lease oil lands at any price demanded. Almost in a night a wilderness of derricks sprang up and covered the entire bottom lands of Oil Creek. Merchants abandoned their stores, farmers dropped their plows, lawyers deserted their offices, and preachers their pulpits. The entire western part of the State went wild with excitement.

THE PHILLIPS WELL.

Very soon after the success of Colonel Drake, Messrs. Brewer, Watson, and Co. leased the farm of Hamilton M'Clintock, and commenced a well on it, which was successful at the depth of 70 feet. Then followed the sinking of many wells on the different farms on Oil Creek. The Barnsdell Mead and Rouse Well was opened in the spring of 1860. Then the Crosley Well in April of same year. During this summer many wells were opened in the vicinity of Tideoute on the Alleghany River. In June, 1861, A. B. Funk sunk a well 470 feet deep on the M'Ilheny farm, which was the first large flowing well. Then followed the Brewer, Watson, and Co. Well on the G. W. M'Clintock farm, the Phillips Well on the Tarr farm, the Willard Well on the H. M'Clintock farm, and the Rouse, Mitchell, and Brown Well on the Buchanan farm. This latter well flowed a stream of oil without pumping equal to one thousand barrels per day. Thousands of barrels of oil flowed into the creek before suitable tanks could be prepared to receive it.

In the midst of the excitement, from some cause unknown, the gas and oil from this well took fire, and, as described by an eye-witness, columns of black smoke rolled upward into the air, the blazing oil leaped heavenward, and, falling over on all sides from the fiery jet, formed a magnificent fountain of liquid fire. The sight was awfully grand, but, sad to relate, nineteen human beings were burned to death. Among them was Mr. Rouse, one of the proprietors of the well. Mr. Rouse lived for several days after being injured, and in framing his will, after making certain bequests, left to the County of Warren a handsome sum, to be applied one half for road purposes and one half to the poor of the county. This bequest is now valued at $150,000.

The next large flowing well opened was the Empire, in the vicinity of the Funk Well, that flowed 3000 barrels per day. The Sherman Well was opened in April, 1862, then the Noble and Delemater Well in May, 1863. This celebrated well was commenced in 1860, and was bored to the depth of 167 feet and abandoned. Mr. Noble went further down the creek and became interested in other wells on the Tarr farm, but in the spring of 1863 he recommenced the work on his old well, and went down to the depth of 471 feet without having any indications of oil. At that depth he concluded to tube and pump, abandoning the idea of obtaining a flowing well, but to the great astonishment of himself and every one else, after pumping a very short time, suddenly the great Noble Well commenced to flow. Long before the opening of this well petroleum had become so plenty that most of the pumping wells were abandoned. Every person wanted a flowing well.

Samuel M. Kier, of Pittsburg, was the first man who refined the crude oil, and to him we are indebted for this discovery. W. H. Abbott, of Titusville, erected the first large refinery at that place, which was before the days of railroads in that region. The heavy iron castings and machinery were brought in wagons from Union Mills and Franklin, through mud axle-deep. Parties interested with him became disheartened, and would have abandoned the enterprise had it not been for the energy of Mr. Abbott, who finally succeeded in completing his building.

Brewer, Watson, and Co. were really the great pioneers in the introduction of petroleum in large quantities. This enterprising firm expended the sum of $750,000 in cash for barrels alone before they realized one cent of profit. All they required was the actual cost of the barrel. They have lived to reap a rich harvest from their arduous efforts in the introduction of petroleum, and have been handsomely repaid for the hardships and trials through which they have passed. During the summer of 1861, Samuel Downer, of Boston, established a branch of his works and commenced the refining of oil at Correy, and gave his entire attention to the business, and during that year his refinery absorbed nearly all of the oil product. George M. Mowbray, agent for Schefflin and Co., of New York, made the first extensive purchase of petroleum for shipment. Messrs. Drake, Watson, Brewer, Kier, Abbott, Mowbray, Downer, the firm of Brewer, Watson, and Co., and others, exerted their utmost endeavors to introduce the article, and to create a demand equal to the supply; but before this could be accomplished oil at the wells was offered for sale at prices ranging from ten to fifty cents per barrel, and thousands of gallons were allowed to run into the creek.

The only pumping wells opened at an early day, and not abandoned but worked until the present time, are the celebrated Economite Wells, located opposite the town of Tideoute, on the Alleghany River, in Warren County, Pennsylvania. These wells are four in number, and are each now pumping 30 barrels of oil per day. Many persons at the present time, in passing through the oil regions, wonder at the number of abandoned wells to be seen. These wells were not abandoned because the borers failed to discover oil, but simply because it did not pay to operate them when oil was so plenty and cheap and no great demand existed for it.

The entire oil regions of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Ohio were consequently nearly deserted, and the then so-called "oil bubble" exploded. Most of those who had taken leases and had opened wells removed the tubing, and sold their engines, tools, etc., and retired from the oil trade disgusted with their enterprise, and, no doubt, much displeased with themselves, returning to their deserted homes to be ridiculed by the knowing ones, who "always said the undertaking would prove a failure."

Much time, however, did not elapse before a new demand for petroleum was created, and once more thousands poured into the oil regions; and to-day the use of petroleum is universal; and for a cheap and perfect burning oil it has no equal. The old wells are being opened, and new ones going down every day. The Alleghany River, and its great northern tributaries, are no more crowded with long rafts of lumber floating with the current to the Western cities. Saw-mills have given place to oil refineries and producing wells. Tow-boats, filled with barrels of petroleum, take the place of lumber-rafts. Villages have suddenly grown into cities. The iron horse rushes with lightning speed around the base of the mountain and down the valley of oil. Rich farms are laid waste. The plow turns no more furrows. The scythe cuts no more bending grain. The farmer's barns are no more loaded down with the fruitful harvest. The farmer himself, with his homespun clothes, is seen no more in the fields. All is changed! The farm is sold! The old man and his grown-up sons are worth millions, and the old homestead is deserted forever.

We propose to describe the Oil Region as it appeared at the opening of the present year:

Titusville, situated in Crawford County, Pennsylvania, at the head of Oil Creek, had only 150 inhabitants in 1857. In one year it increased to 350. Lumber was worth from five to ten dollars per thousand feet for the best qualities. The number of buildings were about thirty-five of all kinds. The importation of merchandise about one hundred tons per annum. The trade was local, and every thing was done upon the long credit system, and nothing exported but lumber. In 1865 the population is estimated at from 5000 to 6000. Lumber is worth from $25 to $50 per thousand, and the supply inadequate to the demand. The number of buildings are now over one thousand. The importation of merchandise, etc., during the year 1863, over the Oil Creek Railroad, was 70,000 tons, and the exports of oil alone equal to 750,000 barrels. It is estimated that the exports from Titusville will amount this year to over $18,000,000, and the imports will largely exceed those of last year; at least the local trade has kept even pace with the improvements in the way of building. There are now in progress several fine stone and brick buildings, which give the place a substantial appearance. In 1858 town lots could have been purchased from $30 to $40 each. In 1864 lots were selling from $1200 to $1800 each, and sought after.

The Watson Flat is a tract of flat land, situated in the bend and on both sides of Oil Creek, adjoining and below Titusville. This flat land was at one time greatly in favor; but after the larger flowing wells were discovered below the Shaeffer Farm less attention was given to lands above. Recently, however, the Watson Flat has been brought into notice again, and several flowing wells have been opened, and now hundreds of derricks spot its surface. This extensive tract of rich bottom-land, being in close proximity to Titusville and the dépôt of the Oil Creek Railroad, will no doubt be found more attractive than the territory farther down the creek. It is said that the quality of oil found here is very superior; and it is generally believed that when wells are sunk to the depth of 1200 feet the largest flowing wells will be found.

Oil in quantities having recently been procured north of Titusville, the entire line of Oil Creek above that place, as far as Oil Lake, is now occupied, and numerous wells are in process of drilling, causing great excitement in that region.

The Oil Creek Railroad commences at Correy, on the Great Western and Atlantic Railroad, and passes through Titusville and as far down Oil Creek as the Shaeffer Farm, which is about seven miles below Titusville, and nearly half the distance to Oil City. Shaeffer Farm is a fast-growing place, and contains about ten commission houses and several hotels. The bottom-land at this place not occupied by wells is covered with pyramids of empty oil casks, sometimes reaching fifty feet in height. It is proposed to continue the Oil Creek Railroad down to Oil City, there to connect with a new road from Franklin on the Alleghany River, running up the west shore of the river, and tapping the Philadelphia and Erie Road at Irvine.

Funkville and Petroleum Centre, on Oil Creek, are thriving towns. M'Clintockville, on the H. M'Clintock Farm, is growing rapidly. The wells at this place are principally owned by the M'Clintockville Petroleum Company of Philadelphia.

Oil City, at the mouth of Oil Creek, is situated at the base of a mountain under a bluff, and for want of room can never become a very large city. The town consists of only one street, winding down the west side of Oil Creek and the Alleghany River. It contains five or six hotels, all of which are crowded nightly with anxious oil seekers. All the business being done on one street the town has a very busy look.

The town of Franklin, the county seat of Venango County, situated at the confluence of French Creek, with the Alleghany River, about seven miles below Oil City, is a place of considerable note. It is the terminus of a branch of the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad. A very extensive trade is carried on here. Large dépôt buildings have been erected, and thousands of barrels of petroleum are annually shipped from this point. French Creek is quite a large stream, rising in the southern part of New York, and, flowing almost parallel with Oil Creek, empties into the Alleghany River. The banks of French Creek, on either side, are dotted here and there with derricks, giving evidence of the existence of many oil wells.

The town of Tideoute, in Warren County, is situated on the west bank of the Alleghany River, about twenty miles above Oil City, and fourteen miles below Irvine. The wells of importance at this place are the celebrated Economite Wells, and some ten or twelve others situated in Tideoute Island and on Tideoute Flats. The oil territory, on both sides of the Alleghany River, commencing at Irvine and extending down below Franklin, is considered excellent, and is now being fast developed, having recently changed hands at greatly advanced prices. Large flowing wells have been found at many points on the river, and the Alleghany is now ranked next of importance to Oil Creek.

The view on the Alleghany at the mouth of Gordon Creek, below the town of Tideoute, is very fine. As the stranger approaches the river by a winding road over the mountain and turns the point of a high bluff, he beholds far beneath his feet the clear rippling stream of Gordon Creek. In the distance, to the left, winds the Alleghany, with its steep mountain-shores, covered with tall old pines. The derricks of the Economite Wells line the eastern shore. A tow-boat, loaded with barrels of oil, is struggling against the stream. The next turn of the road brings to view the long row of white painted houses forming the town of Tideoute, reaching for over two miles in length along the shore. On the right, running due south, is the river, dotted here and there with beautiful thickly wooded islands, with clouds of black smoke rolling up from among the tall trees. And as the sombre hue of evening shade is cast over the valley, the mind is filled with wonder that beneath the surface of that beautiful landscape is hidden untold treasures, the possession of which leads so many far from home and friends.

The oil from the wells on the Alleghany River is taken to Irvine in tow-boats drawn by horses. These boats are built very stanch, and are made to carry from one hundred and fifty to two hundred barrels of oil. The horses often cross and recross, and sometimes pull and tug up through the centre of the river. The driver has regular fords to cross, and it requires as much judgment to drive tow-horses up the Alleghany as to pilot a steamboat down the Mississippi.

In passing through the oil regions of Pennsylvania one is struck with the primitive mode used in obtaining oil. Inferior machinery and exceedingly small engines are used in most cases, with hardly sufficient power to raise the sucker-rod out of a deep well. Yet wells are worked in this manner, only producing from one to three, or perhaps five, barrels of oil. Often they entirely fail to get a drop of oil. In such cases the wells are abandoned as worthless. At the same time, if the proper machinery had been applied with more powerful engines, twice or thrice the yield might have been obtained. The air-pump is a great improvement, and its application will no doubt add at least thirty per cent. to the yield of all wells to which it is applied.

Next in importance to the Alleghany River is Cherry Run, on which stream is located the great Reed Well, now flowing 280 barrels of oil daily. The lands on this run and Pit-Hole Creek and Cherry-Tree Run, have been purchased at very high prices, and hundreds of wells are now going down on both sides of these streams. In January of this year the first large flowing well was struck on Pit-Hole Creek, on the Holmden Farm, situated four miles above the mouth of the Creek, and about three miles due east from Funkville, on Oil Creek. Tionesta Creek also bids fair to vie with any other in the region for its oil properties; wells are being put down from its source to its mouth, and already several producing wells are in operation here. The entire counties of Venango, Warren, and Crawford are now being prospected for oil. One can not ride through a lane, over any obscure road, up mountain paths, or, after leaving his horse, climb a ledge of rocks, or work his way through jungles of undergrowth, without meeting with prospecting parties seeking new oil lands. Mud, rain, or floods are no obstacles in the way of oil-land hunters; they ride their livery horses at full speed from well to well, asking a thousand questions.

The oil regions are dotted here and there with refineries, where the crude oil is distilled and prepared for burning purposes. Many changes have taken place, and vast improvements made, in the refineries of oil since the first were erected. The most extensive establishment for this purpose, now in operation in the immediate vicinity of the oil regions, is at the town of Correy, in Crawford County, Pennsylvania—a new and thriving place, situated at the crossing of the Atlantic and Great Western and Philadelphia and Erie Railroads. The building is entirely of brick, and was erected by Samuel Downer, one of the pioneers in the business, at a cost of $150,000, including machinery. Upward of 200 workmen are here daily employed, and when the works are operated to their greatest capacity 300 barrels of crude oil are daily required.

The Virginia oil regions are located in the counties of Pleasants, Richie, Wood, and Wirt. The best territory is found on the Ohio, Little Kanawha, and Hughes Rivers; on Goose, French, Cow, Calf, Bull, Horseneck, Worthington, and Stillwell Creeks; on M'Elroy, Bull, Campbell's, Rawson's, Nettle, and Riffle Runs. The town of Parkersburg, on the Ohio, at the mouth of the Little Kanawha, is the grand headquarters of all oil speculators who visit that region. The entire territory embraced in the above-named counties has already changed hands, and most of it is held by speculators, who are offering it in Eastern markets.

Very little has been accomplished in the development of these Virginia lands compared with the operations in Pennsylvania. Since their discovery some wells have been sunk, and great quantities of oil have been taken from them; but the great developments are yet to be made.

The principal wells now in operation in West Virginia are on "Horseneck," a small creek tributary to Bull Creek. The latter stream flows into the Ohio a few miles above the mouth of the Little Muskingum River. The "Jackson and Peto" Well, on "Cowneck," was sunk to the depth of 587 feet, and flowed, when first opened, 1000 barrels daily of fine quality illuminating oil. The "Jackson" Well, on the "Mansion House Ford," at 100 feet, flowed 200 barrels of the best quality of lubricating oil. A well on "Horseneck," when first opened, flowed 40 barrels, and afterward only water; but when properly tubed, and a new seed-bag supplied, it flowed 1000 barrels daily for three days.

On the territory from French Creek to Bull Creek, on the Ohio River and tributaries, operations are quite brisk. Twenty-five wells have been put down, and nearly fifty more are in process of boring. Many wells are going down on French Creek. The "Gillfillen" Well, on "Horseneck," is 250 feet deep, and at one time yielded 500 barrels per day. On "Rawson's" Run there are two wells, one of which yielded, when first opened, 700 barrels daily, and the other 45 barrels. On the Little Kanawha, at "Burning Spring," many productive wells have been found, yielding at one time from 25 to 1000 barrels daily.

The Ohio oil regions are located principally in Washington, Morgan, and Noble counties. The city of Marietta, situated at the mouth of Great Muskingum River, is one of the oldest places in the State, and is where all Ohio oil speculators congregate. The Ohio lands have very rich surface indications, and promise to be as fruitful as any yet discovered in the country. Capitalists from all parts are flocking to these new regions, and are taking up all of the lands they can get on the Great and Little Muskingum Rivers, Duck Creek, Cow Run, Pawpaw, East and West Branches of Duck Creek, Whipple Run, Wolf and Federal Creeks.

New oil lands have recently been discovered in Adams and Sciota counties, on the Ohio River, about ninety miles above Cincinnati. The surface indications are very promising—such as oil on the water in the marshes and water-courses, the upheaval of the sand rock, and hills of shale saturated with petroleum, one ton of which has produced by distillation fifty gallons of oil. Some 5000 acres have been purchased here by the New York and Ohio Petroleum Company, now operating.

In sinking a well for oil many curious and wonderful discoveries have been made. On the lands belonging to the Story and M'Clintock Petroleum Company, of New York, located on Caldwell's Creek, near Titusville, in sinking a well in October last the drillers passed through a layer of rock four feet in thickness, at the depth of forty feet; and another layer, six feet thick, at the depth of fifty-six feet; and at the depth of seventy feet, after passing through two thick layers of hard rock, the drill passed through a log eighteen inches in diameter.

Oil wells are put down to a variety of depths, from 100 to 1100 feet. The mode of sinking a well is as follows: After the spot is decided upon, which is in most cases in the lower bottom lands, a stake is driven into the ground at the spot where the bore is to be commenced. A derrick is built, from twelve to sixteen feet square at the base, and about forty feet in height, running to a point at the top. The engine-house is erected, and the necessary machinery made ready within. Sections of iron pipe, six inches in diameter, are then driven into the ground, by means of a pile-driver, until the first layer of rock is reached, which, in most cases, is found at a depth of thirty-five or forty feet below the surface of the ground. Great care is taken that this iron pipe is driven plumb. After the rock is reached, and the earth within the pipe is removed, a block and tackle is rigged at the top of the derrick, and the drilling tools, weighing in some cases 900 pounds, are hoisted up and dropped into the driving-pipe down to the rock. A temper-screw is then attached to the top of the drill by means of a rope, and made fast to the end of a walking-beam. The walking-beam is a heavy horizontal piece of timber, supported in the centre by a Samson-post. The other end of the walking-beam connects with the driving pulley by means of a crank. The engine drives the pulley, the end of the walking-beam rises and falls, and thus the drill is raised and lowered at will. At intervals, during the process of drilling, a tool called a "Reamer" is inserted in the well, and the bore is increased to the proper size. A sand-pump is a metal case from five to ten feet in length, constructed with a valve at the bottom. This sand-pump is lowered into the well at intervals, and when it reaches the bottom the valve opens and admits the borings, and when the pump is raised the valve closes, and the contents are brought to the surface. After the bore is thus cleaned the drill is once more inserted, and the drilling is continued.

In boring a well a correct journal is kept, showing the different kinds of rock and earth passed through, and the exact points where water-courses, gas, or shows of oil are found. If a large vein of oil is struck, the well is immediately tubed with a 2 or 2½ inch iron pipe, put together in sections. The water from water-courses and the surface water is prevented from flooding the well by means of a leathern bag, called a seed-bag, filled with flax-seed, which is placed on the outside of the tubing and within the earth chamber below the water-courses. When the flax-seed becomes saturated with water it swells, and completely shuts off all communication with the bottom of the well on the outside of the tubing.

If the vein of oil struck proves to be large, and the pressure of gas is sufficient, the oil will flow out without the aid of a pump; but in most cases a pump is required, in which case a copper working barrel is placed at the bottom of the well, and attached to the lower section of the tubing, with a valve at the bottom. The upper valve is connected with a sucker-rod, the end of which is attached to the end of the walking-beam. The tanks or tubs to receive the oil are mostly made of wooden staves, and are located at some distance from the well, and are connected with it by means of iron tubing attached to the spout of the pump, and through which the oil flows.

It is almost impossible to give the exact cost of sinking and completing a well at this time. Prices vary in different localities, and the cost of drilling ranges from $2 to $3 50 per foot. Including all of the necessary equipments, the present cost of sinking a well complete would be between five and six thousand dollars.

Naphtha, the lightest variety of petroleum, is found in Persia. It consists of carbon 82.20, and hydrogen 14.80, and is the only fluid free from oxygen. The next variety found is the petroleum proper, or American petroleum, which is a much heavier and thicker fluid. Another variety is found, called maltha, which is less fluid than petroleum, resembling tar or pitch. In Derbyshire is found still another variety, called "elastic bitumen," which is flexible and elastic, and about the weight of water. The last variety, called "compact bitumen" or asphaltum, is black in color and solid like coal, its specific gravity is 1 to 1.6. In the island of Trinidad is a lake, three miles in circumference, that is now one solid mass of black compact bitumen, which is supposed to have been at one time a lake of liquid petroleum.

No positive conclusions have yet been arrived at, giving any correct idea of how deep down in the earth the greater basins of petroleum are to be found. The oil from the largest flowing and pumping wells so far discovered is obtained from beneath the third sandstone. Several large producing wells have been sunk without finding this third sandstone. It is, however, believed by most of the experienced borers that the great basins are yet to be discovered at the depth of from 1500 to 3000 feet, where a never-failing supply of petroleum will be reached. It is believed by some that the formation of petroleum is still rapidly going on in the laboratories of Nature, and that enormous quantities of carbonated hydrogen gas, which accompanies the oil, is undoubtedly evolved in its formation, and were it not constantly forming would soon all escape, and flowing wells would be an impossibility. It is impossible, however, to fathom the hidden mysteries of the petroleum world below. Astronomy can pierce the depths of space, but Geology can only guess what is going on a few thousand yards below our feet.

HEROIC DEEDS OF HEROIC MEN.

General Banks Supersedes General Butler.—Farewell.—Effects of Conciliation.—The Opelousas Expedition.—Marchings and Battles.—Corps d'Afrique.—The Texas Expedition.—Brief History of the Lone Star.—Sam Houston's Career.—Texan Secession.—Treason of David E. Twiggs.—War Incidents.—Heroic Death.—Sabine Pass Expedition.—The Red River Expedition.—Triumphs and Disasters.—War's Romance and Ravage.

IN the fall of 1862 General Banks was ordered to New York City to take charge of an expedition being fitted out at that port. This consisted of a fleet of nearly fifty vessels, one half of them steamers, and a force of about ten thousand men. The destination of this fleet was kept a profound secret from the country. Even the officers who accompanied it were ignorant of its purpose.

"General," said one of them to the commander, "we want to know what kind of climate we are going to, in order to know whether to provide ourselves with thick or thin clothing."

"Provide yourselves with both," was the reply, "and then you will be sure."

On the 15th of December this fleet arrived at New Orleans. Its object was to strengthen the military power in Louisiana, redeem the entire State from rebel control, co-operate with General Grant above, in re-opening the Mississippi River, and operate in various expeditions in the trans-Mississippi district. General Banks superseded General Butler. The latter was ordered to report at Washington. He issued on the same day a farewell address to his soldiers. His language resembled, in its terse, laconic character, the eloquence of Napoleon, whom he may almost be said to have rivaled in the vigor of his administration :

"I greet you, my brave comrades, and say farewell!

"This word—endeared as you are by a community of privations, hardships, dangers, victories, successes military and civil—is the only sorrowful thought I have.

"You have deserved well of your country. Without a murmur you sustained an encampment on a sand-bar so desolate that banishment to it, with every care and comfort possible, has been the most dreaded punishment inflicted upon your bitterest and most insulting enemies.

"You had so little transportation that but a handful could advance to compel submission by the Queen City of the rebellion.

"Landing with a military chest containing but seventy-five dollars, from the hoards of a rebel government you have given to your country's treasury nearly half a million of dollars, and so supplied yourselves with the needs of your service that your expedition has cost your Government less by four-fifths than any other.

"By your practical philanthropy you have won the confidence of the 'oppressed race,' and the slave. Hailing you as deliverers they are ready to aid you as willing servants, faithful laborers, or, using the tactics taught them by your enemies, to fight with you in the field.

"You have met double numbers of the enemy and defeated them in the open field. But I need not farther enlarge upon the topic. You were sent here to do that.

"I commend you to your commander. You are worthy of his love.

"Farewell, my comrades! Again farewell!

He addressed himself also to the citizens of New Orleans; defended himself, for the first and last time, in a few brief words, from the calumnies that had been heaped upon him; and appealed to their own consciousness to testify that no one had suffered under his command who had conducted himself with propriety. In a few scorching words he unveiled the hypocrisy of England's assumed horror at his supposed severities :

"I do not feel that I have erred in too much harshness; for that harshness has ever been exhibited to disloyal enemies of my country, and not to loyal friends. To be sure I might have regaled you with the amenities of British civilization, and yet been within the supposed rules of civilized warfare. You might have been smoked to death in caverns, as were the Covenanters of Scotland by the command of a general of the royal household of England; or roasted, like the inhabitants of Algiers during the French campaign; your wives and daughters might have been given over to the ravisher, as were the unfortunate dames in the Peninsular war; or you might have been scalped and tomahawked, as our mothers were at Wyoming by the savage allies of Great Britain in our own Revolution; your property could have been turned over to indiscriminate 'loot,' like the palace of the Emperor of China; works of art, which adorned your buildings, might have been sent away, like the paintings of the Vatican; your sons might have been blown from the mouth of cannon, like the sepoy of Delhi; and yet all this would have been within the rules of civilized warfare, as practiced by the most polished and the most hypocritical nations of Europe. For such acts the records of the doings of some of the inhabitants of your city toward the friends of the Union, before my coming, were a sufficient provocation and justification.

"But I have not so conducted. On the contrary, the worst punishment inflicted, except for criminal acts punishable by every law, has been banishment, with labor, to a barren island, where I encamped my own soldiers before marching here."

He recounted in the same terse and powerful language the principal acts of his administration, and conjured them to return to their allegiance; then declared plainly the only obstacle which prevented such return, and the way to deal with it :

"There is but one thing that at this hour stands between you and the Government, and that is slavery.

"This institution, cursed of God, which has taken its last refuge here, will be rooted out, as the tares from wheat, although the wheat be torn up with it.

"I have given much thought to this subject.

"I came among you by teachings, by habit of mind, by political position, by social affinity, inclined to sustain your domestic laws, if by possibility they might be with safety to the Union.

"Months of experience and of observation have forced the conviction that the existence of slavery is incompatible with the safety either of yourselves or of the Union. As the system has gradually grown to its present huge dimensions, it were best if it could be gradually removed; but it is better, far better, that it should be taken out at once than that it should longer vitiate the social, political, and family relations of your country.

"I am speaking with no philanthropic views as regards the slave, but simply of the effect of slavery on the master. See for yourselves. Look around you and say whether this saddening, deadening influence has not all but destroyed the very frame-work of your society."

On the following day General Banks by public proclamation assumed command of the Department of the Gulf, to which was now added the State of Texas. The change in commanders was very generally believed to be in consequence of a desire on the part of the Government to pursue conciliatory measures. The policy pursued by General Banks confirmed this hypothesis. He suspended all public sales of property on account of the United States until further orders. He released a number of political prisoners. His inaugural proclamation was of a conciliatory and persuasive character. It was followed in ten days by another accompanying the President's emancipation proclamation, the object of which seemed to be to demonstrate to the rebels' satisfaction that "the war is not waged by the Government for the overthrow of slavery," and that the only way to secure its preservation was by a return to the Union.

These measures, however, accomplished no good results. They encouraged but did not conciliate the rebels. The order which had been preserved under the more stringent rule of his predecessor was followed by growing disorders. The soldiers were insulted in the streets. Indecent and threatening letters were sent anonymously to various officers. Jefferson Davis was publicly cheered by crowds of men and boys. Thus experience demonstrated the necessity of rigor.

General Banks found himself compelled to change somewhat his tone. He gave public notice that offensive demonstrations of any kind would be instantly and severely punished. He confirmed the order of General Butler assessing, for the support of the poor, those rich secessionists who had subscribed to the secession fund. And he thus demonstrated both his ability and his purpose to preserve order by measures of severity should those of conciliation fail.

Thus passed the winter of 1862-'63 in arranging the civil government, and in preparing for military movements in the spring. The military operations of General Banks in the Department of the Gulf naturally range themselves under four great expeditions. The Port Hudson, the Opelousas, the Texas, and the Red River expeditions. The first we have described in our last Number. It is to the other three we now direct our readers' attention.

THE OPELOUSAS EXPEDITION.

West of the Mississippi River lies an exceedingly rich and fertile section of country. It is intersected by numerous bayous and large lakes, and embraces much of the richest lands in the State. It is called by the Southerners "The Paradise of the South." The rebels, not anticipating any attack from the Union soldiers in this quarter, had put in their crops as usual. A small force was stationed in the heart of this section for its protection; and its efficiency was greatly increased by the presence of a small gun-boat, the Cotton, which, threading with ease the innumerable bayous and lagoons, afforded very efficient protection against any mere land-forces.

In the midst of this region, some seventy-five miles west of New Orleans, in a straight line, is Lake Chetimacha. It is connected with the Gulf of Mexico by the Atchafalaya River. Near the head of this river, and not far from the shore of the lake is Brashear City, connected with New Orleans by the New Orleans, Opelousas, and Great Western Railroad, of which it is the present western terminus. Flowing into this lake is the Bayou Teche, which rises in St. Landre parish, and flows thence in a southeasterly direction through the towns of Opelousas, Martinsville, and Franklin. After the capture of the capital of the State the remains of the rebel State government had retreated to Opelousas, where the rebel Legislature was in fact assembling in accordance with a proclamation of the Governor on the very day on which General Banks assumed command of the Department of the Gulf.

In October previous General Butler had fitted out a double expedition for the purpose of destroying the rebel gun-boat, capturing rebel crops, especially cotton, and obtaining possession, or at least control, of this part of Louisiana. A fleet of five vessels left New Orleans, sailed up the Atchafalaya River, passed Brashear City, and entered the Teche River. Here, however, they found formidable obstructions and land batteries, and were compelled to withdraw from the pursuit of the rebel gun-boat until the land-forces should arrive.

Meanwhile General Weitzel, with a brigade of five regiments, left on transports, landed at Donaldsonville on the Mississippi River, and commenced a march across the country to join the fleet at Brashear City. About nine miles beyond Donaldsonville they met the enemy, who were drawn up in line of battle to receive them. But after a short though brilliant engagement, the rebels ignominiously fled, leaving two hundred and sixty-eight prisoners in General Weitzel's hands, with one piece of artillery. During the remainder of his march he met with little or no resistance.

The negroes flocked in great numbers to his camps, each bringing some palatable addition to the soldiers' otherwise hard fare. The people, surprised to be kindly treated, learned to regard as friends those whom they had been taught to look upon as enemies. The retreating rebels burned their warehouses, destroyed their crops, took whatever they wanted, and made no other recompense than Confederate scrip. The patriot army provided the rural population with a valuable market in New Orleans for such articles as their professed friends had not stolen or destroyed, and paid fair prices for what they took. Meanwhile the Opelousas Railroad, destroyed by the rebels, was repaired by a force moving directly west from New Orleans, and thus communication was opened between General Weitzel and the former place.

Joining the fleet at Brashear City early in January, the combined expedition proceeded up the Teche River. Here they found formidable preparations made to resist the further advance of the expedition. Rifle-pits and concealed batteries were planted on the shore. Torpedoes and obstructions were placed in the river. The position of the land defenses, flanked by an impenetrable swamp, was such as to prevent a successful attack by the national infantry. And after a brief but gallant engagement the fleet were compelled to fall back. One principal object of their expedition, however, was accomplished. For the rebels, fearing that another attack might prove more successful, and determined not to allow their gun-boat to fall into the hands of their antagonists, applied the torch to the steamer, and floated her down toward the national fleet, one sheet of flame.

Satisfied for the present with this measure of success, General Weitzel retired to Thibodeaux, near the Opelousas River, which he made his head-quarters.

Such was the condition of affairs when General Banks undertook a second expedition up the Bayou Teche. Early in April he rendezvoused his forces at Brashear City. They were organized in two divisions, one under the command of General Emory, the other commanded by General Grover. General Banks accompanied the expedition in person. The rebels had already provided a strong line of intrenchments near Franklin. A palisade of piles and earth, three feet high, protected by a natural ditch or bayou, extended for several miles from the lake on the east, across the Teche River, to impassable swampy woods on the west. The passage of the river itself was most effectually obstructed by the rebels; while the lake and swamp prevented any flank movement.

LIVE-OAKS ON THE TECHE.

The position was a strong one, and easily defended by a small number against a vastly superior force. General Banks sent General Grover with his division to effect a landing on the shore of the lake in the rear of these works, while he advanced upon them in front with General Emory's division. The movement proved successful. General Grover's landing was in vain resisted. After a brief engagement the enemy were routed and compelled to take refuge in the woods and canes. Advancing upon them, General Grover drove them before him until he had nearly reached the bank of the river. Meanwhile Generals Banks and Emory advanced directly upon the rebels by land from Brashear City. Their advance was hotly but vainly contested by the rebels, who gradually fell back to their breast-works. The successes of General Grover had rendered these untenable, and at length, on the 14th of April, after three days of fighting, the enemy abandoned their position altogether, and beat a hasty retreat. Two of their gun-boats and three transports they destroyed to prevent their falling into the Federal hands. One other was destroyed by the Union gun-boats after a hot engagement on the lake.

In this battle General Banks shared all the dangers of the front in common with his soldiers. At one time he and his staff became a mark for the guns of a rebel gun-boat. One or two shells having struck near them, General Banks ordered them to disperse, and rode slowly away himself toward another part of the field. A correspondent present felt inclined to condemn his bravado.

"I expected to see them gallop off at double-quick," said he; "but what was my surprise when I saw them walking their horses as if they were going to a funeral!"

The result proved the superior judgment of the General. In a few minutes a shell from the boat, well-aimed, struck the ground half a mile distant, just about where he would have been had he galloped instead of walking away from the scene of danger.

Curiosity is sometimes stronger than fear. At one period in the engagement a part of the infantry lay concealed upon the ground while a skirmish line was thrown out in advance. The shot and shell were whistling over their heads. Any head exposed became straightway a target for the enemy's batteries. But it was impossible to lie still, ignorant of the events which were transpiring. All along the line heads were raised, one after another, to reconnoitre the field. Some even, in their eagerness, stood upright. The most positive command from the superior officer passed unnoticed. Nor was he able to secure their concealment, till he had threatened to arrest the first man who showed himself to the enemy. The fear of arrest was greater than the fear of shot and shell. The true soldier dreads dishonor more than death.

General Banks left the rebels no time to recover from the effects of their disastrous defeat. Reveille at four, breakfast at five, march at six, was the order given the morning after the battle. First Franklin, then Iberia were taken possession of by the Federal forces. In both places were large foundries. So precipitate was the rebel retreat that they had no time to destroy them. Pushing rapidly forward, meeting the enemy again at Bayou Vermilion, and compelling them to fly, passing the vicinity of Grand Coteau, on the 20th of April, eight days after leaving Brashear City, General Banks entered in triumph the city of Opelousas.

During this time he had defeated the enemy in a hotly contested battle, taken two thousand prisoners, two transports, and twenty guns, and either destroyed or compelled the destruction of eight transports and three gun-boats. He had effectually protected New Orleans from an attack which the rebels had boastfully threatened, and had obtained possession of one of the richest regions of the entire South. Quantities of stores and provisions had also been captured by him. From Opelousas, too, he sent out expeditions into the surrounding country, and on the 7th of May a part of his forces entered Alexandria, which had already the day before surrendered to Admiral Porter, who, operating from above in connection with General Grant, had advanced upon it with his fleet by way of Red River. Hundreds of negroes had flocked to the Union standard during this expedition. The plantations were large, and their owners held many slaves. Soon after his occupation of Opelousas, General Banks issued a proclamation providing for the organization of African troops in regiments of five hundred men. He designed eventually an organization of eighteen regiments. It was to be termed the "Corps d'Afrique."

General Banks, after a fortnight's rest, marched east, recrossed the Mississippi River, and commenced operations against Port Hudson. The rebels reoccupied Opelousas. The west bank of the Mississippi swarmed with guerrilla parties, who fired on the passing boats. On the 23d of May Brashear City was recaptured, with 1200 prisoners, sick and well, and a large quantity of stores, by a party of Texans. But the surrender of Vicksburg and Port Hudson left them without the hope of retaining what they had obtained, and by the middle of July the rebels commenced to withdraw again from the Southern Paradise, once more pursued by General Banks's victorious forces. Such, in brief, is the history and result of the Opelousas expedition.

TEXAS AND THE TEXAS EXPEDITION.

For many years Texas has been the chosen home of America's voluntary outlaws and exiles, and the scene of deeds of daring and desperation, which in the Middle Ages would have been termed chivalric; but which in the nineteenth century, with truer judgment, we characterize as barbaric. For years it was without any settled government. Both Mexico and the United States claimed it as their territory. The people acknowledged allegiance to neither, nor did they possess any stable government of their own. Their almost sole judiciary was Judge Lynch. Their chief reliance for government was in extemporized vigilance committees. Its condition was like that of the Israelites in the time of the Judges—"every man did that which was right in his own eyes." Its people were like those that gathered about David in the wilderness—"every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented" sought refuge in the wilds of Texas. Horse-thieves, counterfeiters, robbers, murderers—in short, all the vagabonds whose crimes had made the States a dangerous residence sought and found security in this territory.

Its condition was such as to invite thither such a population and exclude all others. When the United States bought Louisiana, in 1803, we bought into a quarrel. The boundary line between the French and the Spanish possessions was unsettled. The United States claimed under her purchase to have acquired all the country to the Rio Grande. Spain claimed rights even east of the Sabine River. Where thus each nation claimed the right to govern neither exercised it efficiently. Filibustering expeditions, organized often in the United States, though never by its sanction, entered from time to time this territory, and endeavored to expel the Mexicans and secure an independent government. Of these the most notorious in history is that of the celebrated Aaron Burr. At length, in 1819, by treaty between Spain and the United States, the much vexed question of boundary was apparently settled. Florida was ceded to the United States, and all territory west of the Sabine was guaranteed by the United States to Spain. We say apparently. The Southwest did not acquiesce in this treaty; nor did it prevent the continuation of individual revolutionary enterprises. Meanwhile the great fertility of the soil, salubriousness of the climate, and mineral wealth attracted thither a large emigration, in spite of the disadvantages to which we have referred. A French and German population sought and settled in Western Texas. Colonies, chiefly from the Southwestern States, settled in its eastern portion. Land speculations increased this emigration.

Under Colonel Austin a colony of eight hundred families settled in and about the county which now bears his name. Thus the residents of Texas had very little in common with the government under which they were placed. It treated them often with gross injustice. It proved itself quite incompetent for their adequate protection. At length, in 1835, after some unsuccessful attempts to secure a better government in the Mexican Republic, they proclaimed their independence, and in a brief but decisive campaign of a few short months secured it. In this campaign the Texan troops were commanded by General Sam Houston, then in the forty-third year of his age, and in the zenith of his fame and power.

The life of General Houston is full of romance and adventure. He was born in Virginia, March 2, 1793; taken by his widowed mother to Tennessee while yet a boy; abandoned school because he could not agree with his teacher about his studies; ran away from a store, employment in which was too confining for his tastes; lived among the Indians as an adopted son of one of their chiefs for three years; returned home; entered the army as a private at the age of twenty; earned by his bravery promotions and the lasting friendship of General Jackson, under whom he served; obtained the appointment of Indian agent, in which office he distinguished himself by his zeal in preventing the importation of negroes through Florida, then a Spanish province, into the States; resigned his commission in the army; studied law six months; was forthwith elected prosecuting attorney, and honorably acquitted himself in this position; gained such popularity as to obtain almost without opposition any office the State of Tennessee could give him; was elected, first, Major-General of Militia, then Representative to Congress, then twice Governor of the State; in 1829 separated from his wife, resigned his gubernatorial office, left Tennessee forever to make his home thenceforth with the Indians; proved a faithful and valuable friend to them; accomplished the removal of several Indian agents for fraud; wearied in turn of this half savage life, emigrated to Texas; assumed at once a prominent position in this then nebulous republic as General-in-Chief of all her forces; defeated and captured Santa Anna, and secured the independence of the State in a brief but brilliant campaign; left the military command of the Lone Star Republic to accept its presidency; proved himself as able and efficient in managing its civil affairs as he had in wielding the sword; represented her subsequently for two successive terms in the Senate of the United States; left the Senate only to be made Governor; and continued, until a short period previous to his death, the most popular, as he certainly was the most able, man which the State contained.

The little republic of Texas thus launched, unfurled for its banner the Lone Star. Alone, indeed, it was, and for nine years maintained against the most serious difficulties a struggling and precarious existence until 1845, when it was annexed to the United States, under the administration of President Polk.

Neither the population nor the institutions of Texas are homogeneous. The western counties are settled chiefly by French and German emigrants. They are divided into small farms and plantations, and are tilled by free labor. These people are, upon principle, warm opponents of the slave system, with which they possess no sympathy, in which they have no interest. The eastern counties, on the other hand, are settled largely by political and commercial adventurers from the States, chiefly the Southwest. There are but few of them wealthy enough to be large slaveholders, but they are among the most virulent supporters of the system. Except in the wildest counties of Arkansas and Missouri, it would not be easy to find any where a more desperate class than are assembled in some parts of Eastern Texas.

Still the number of slaveholders is not large. In 1850, out of a population of 212,592, but 7747 were slaveholders. Most of their slaves were apparently household servants. Only a little over 450 of these slaveholders possessed more than 20 slaves. The general sentiment of the State is sufficiently indicated by the fact that in August, 1859, General Sam Houston, then sixty-six years of age, was triumphantly elected Governor of the State. Southern in birth, education, sympathy, and sentiment, he had nevertheless strongly opposed the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and eloquently defended the petition of the 3000 clergymen of New England against it; and he was the distinctive and outspoken candidate of the Union party. It was upon this record he was chosen Governor.

Immediately after the election of President Lincoln in the fall of 1860, both parties in the State of Texas began to take sides. At first it was evident that the Union party were largely in the majority. The Governor was himself entirely opposed to secession. In the western counties of the State the feeling was almost unanimous. Even in the capital strong Union demonstrations were made. An enormous popular meeting was held as late as December. A Union pole was raised, the Stars and Stripes were unfurled, and the national airs were played in the midst of an assemblage the largest which had ever been gathered in the city of Austin. But that same timid inaction which proved so fatal to the Union cause in other States proved equally so here. The Governor, advanced in years, and worn-out by the adventurous life which he had led, longed for repose. Instead of boldly treating treason to the punishment it deserved, he temporized and tampered with it. He would not follow in the lead of fiery South Carolina; but he condemned the imagined invasion of Southern rights by Northern politicians, and demanded a union of the Southern States for their mutual protection. He did not think secession was necessary; but he was clear abolitionism was a crime. He would not call the Legislature together; but he summoned the people to elect delegates to confer in a general Convention with delegates from the other slaveholding States. He would not plunge at once into the vortex of the whirlpool; but he would sail gradually around at the circumference for the purpose of examination.

Dreams of past adventure were sometimes enkindled in the bosom that dared not bare itself bravely to the present and inevitable conflict. He hinted at a possible separation of the State, alike from North and South; the conquest by military arms of its ancient enemy Mexico, and the establishment of a new Southwestern Confederacy. Let us not deal uncharitably with the memory of General Houston. His weakness was his greatest fault. The old man of nearly three-score years and ten was unable to sustain the reputation of the hero of forty-two. If General Houston had been ten years younger the rebel leaders in the State would never have dared what they did.

He refused to call a Convention. An irresponsible call, signed by sixty-one individuals, was issued. He refused to summon the Legislature. It was summoned to meet by one of its own members. A brave man would have called the authors of such revolutionary proceedings to instant account. The punishment of a single ringleader would have saved the State from civil war. But Governor Houston dreaded the conflict which he saw was impending. He took, unwittingly, the very measures to hasten it. He had resisted importunity. He had not the courage to face revolution. He convened the Legislature, but urged them to delay calling a State Convention, and endeavor still to preserve, if possible, the Union. His recommendations were contemptuously disregarded. He should have expected nothing else. They legalized the illegal call for a Convention already issued. They laid on the table resolutions for delay in the secession movements. They condemned coercion. They provided that if an ordinance of secession were passed by the Convention it should be submitted to the people.

The Convention assembled one week after the act of the Legislature legalizing it. The Union party in the State had paid no attention to the first call, signed by irresponsible secessionists. Living in a State but little blessed with railroads and telegraphs, they possessed no intimation of the action of the Legislature until long after the day of election had gone by. In nearly half the counties no election was held at all; in others it was but the merest pretense; in many instances not more than a quarter of the legal voters went at all to the polls. A Convention thus elected was almost unanimously for secession. An ordinance was passed in less than a week after it assembled. Delegates were elected to the Southern Congress. A Committee of Safety was appointed, who effectually took the Government out of the hands of General Houston. In eighteen days after the passage of this ordinance it was submitted to the people. It was carried by a large majority. But many voters either refused to vote or were prevented doing so. The vote was 17,000 less than at the Presidential election. The Governor refusing to acquiesce in the action of the Convention, the gubernatorial chair was declared vacant in March, 1861, and Lieutenant-Governor Clark was directed to assume the place of Governor Houston. Thus cavalierly treated by the secessionists, and despised by the Union party, whose cause his weakness had betrayed, he lived a few months in disgrace at the capital of the State, vainly endeavored to retrieve his fallen fortunes by yielding a tardy acquiescence to the secession cause, and died six months after his expulsion from the chief office of the State, neither honored by his friends nor respected by his foes.

The military operations in the State of Texas were of some importance in their results, but of little in their intrinsic character. At the time of Mr. Lincoln's election General David E. Twiggs was in command of the United States forces in the State of Texas. Before as yet the secession of the State had been accomplished he surrendered the entire army and property of the United States to the traitors in the State, and received as the reward of his treason a commission as Major-General in the Confederate Army. Other detachments of United States troops were easily made prisoners, but were released on parole. The revenue cutter upon the coast was seized, and a vessel which had come to Texas from the North to supply the light-houses was also taken possession of. All citizens of the North were warned to leave the State. The payment of all debts due the North was suspended.

The most cruel and relentless persecution of all loyal men was commenced. The German residents of the western counties were driven from their homes, and in many instances cruelly massacred for no other crime than their loyalty and their Free State principles. The General Government, surprised by the treachery of General Twiggs, and compelled to concentrate all their troops for the defense of the national capital, was obliged to leave the citizens of Texas to protect themselves. The Federal fleet, however, blockaded the coast soon after the consummation of the State's secession. The surrender of Galveston was demanded in May, but no attempt was made to enforce compliance with the demand until October, when Commander Renshaw, with a fleet of four steamers, took possession of the place. No attempt at its recapture was anticipated. No sufficient precautions were taken to guard against such a possible catastrophe.

The city of Galveston is situated on a long, low, narrow island of sand. It is connected with the main land by a bridge, some two miles in length. Upon the shore commanding this bridge the rebels had planted batteries. No attempt had been made to dislodge them from this position. The bridge even had not been destroyed. For a considerable time no infantry even occupied the town. It was considered to be sufficiently guarded by the presence of the Federal fleet. The Harriet Lane, a revenue cutter converted into a gun-boat, stood sentinel at the island end of the bridge. It probably afforded a sufficient protection against any land attack. No attack by water seems to have been anticipated or even thought of. The latter part of December, 1862, some regiments of infantry were ordered from New Orleans to Galveston. Not quite three hundred had already arrived. More were on their way. The previous fleet of four vessels was increased by two more. In a few days the Federal force would have been strong enough to have assumed themselves the offensive. But those few days were not allowed them.

For in the mean time the Confederate General Magruder had been preparing to attack the place. Two steam-packets, running between Galveston and Houston, were fitted up as gun-boats. They were protected by bulwarks of cotton bales. One of them was manned by a squad of sharpshooters. Early in the morning of the 1st of January the rebel batteries opened on the Harriet Lane and the infantry in the city. The latter could only reply with their musketry, having no guns. The former replied with a vigorous fire. Almost at the same time she discovered the rebel gun-boats coming from the bay. She signaled for assistance. The Westfield, flag-ship, started to her aid, ran aground, and was thus left hors du combat in the very beginning of the engagement. The Clifton exhausted her energies in vain efforts to pull the Westfield off the bar. The Owasco dared not venture up the uncertain channel, which had already proved so perilous to her companion, and contented herself with engaging the enemy's batteries on shore. The rebel steamers built for these shallow waters had the Harriet Lane at their mercy.

Struck amidships with a tremendous blow, boarded by an overwhelming force, she was not surrendered until her commander had fallen dead, bravely defending his vessel to the last. The defense of the town thus destroyed, it fell necessarily into the rebel hands without further struggle. The gallant commander of the fleet, Commodore Renshaw, finding all efforts to rescue his flag-ship vain, determined it should not fall into the rebel hands. He allowed his men fifteen minutes to transfer themselves and their baggage to a neighboring transport. He himself prepared the vessel for destruction. For fifteen minutes the most intense activity prevailed. Then all were ordered out of the ship.

The last boat awaited the Commodore's presence. Another, filled with men and baggage, waited close at hand. The Commodore was the last to leave the vessel. He stepped down the stairway into the waiting gig. A few minutes more and all would have been well. But he had hardly taken his seat when a thick cloud of smoke rolled up from the hatches of the vessel. A bright flame leaping up followed close upon it. Then in an instant there followed an explosion which shook the bay, as though an earthquake trembled underneath it. The air was filled with the fragments of the ill-fated vessel, and dark with the smoke of its explosion. For some unexplained cause the explosion had taken place prematurely, and when the smoke had lifted neither boat was to be seen. The Commodore had perished with his ship. The rest of the fleet immediately abandoned a harbor which was no longer tenable.

None of the military movements which have taken place in Texas can be considered of great importance. It was too far removed from the seat of war to afford a field for very active operations by either side. Texas has indeed furnished to the Confederate army as many soldiers in proportion to her population as any other rebel State. But they have fought chiefly upon other fields. Texas has furnished large quantities of supplies to the rebel armies. The chief object of the national Government seemed to be to cut off these supplies, while the rebels endeavored to open some one of the harbors which lie along her coast to the commerce of other nations.

Immediately after the recapture of Galveston General Magruder issued a proclamation declaring the blockade raised, and inviting commerce to the port. But it is hardly necessary to say that the national fleet was too vigilant to allow the invitation to be accepted. On the 21st of January the blockading vessels off Sabine Pass, two in number, were captured, during a dead calm, by two rebel steamers with cotton bulwarks. They were instantly pursued by the Union gun-boats. One of the captured prizes was burned to prevent its recapture. Again General Magruder, by public proclamation, declared the blockade raised; and Commodore Bell, by counter proclamation, warned all concerned that it was as effectual as ever, and that merchant vessels attempting to carry on illicit traffic would do so at their peril.

In September, 1863, General Banks fitted out an expedition under General Franklin, to occupy the mouth of the Sabine River. It consisted of four thousand men, and four steamers. The expedition proved an entire failure. Two of the gun-boats, disabled by a shot through the boilers, at almost the first fire, fell into the rebel hands. Another ran aground and escaped with difficulty. The expedition returned without effecting any injury whatever upon the enemy.

A month later General Banks took command in person of an expedition the object of which was the occupation of the Texan coast. He landed at the mouth of the Rio Grande River, and successfully occupied, without serious opposition, most of the coast of Texas, from its western boundary nearly to the city of Galveston. This campaign, however, produced no important influence upon the general results of the war, and was marked by no striking incidents or important battles.

The rebel leaders in Texas complain bitterly of the manner in which their State has been treated by the Confederate authorities at Richmond. They say her troops have been summoned to other fields, and she herself has been left defenseless. They even threaten to secede from Secession, and set up an independent Southern empire. It is certain that the national control of the Mississippi River forever separates them from the heart of the Southern Confederacy. In truth the battles of Texas and Arkansas were fought on that river. Their fate was determined at Vicksburg and Port Hudson.

THE RED RIVER EXPEDITION.

western boundary of the State east to Vicksburg. The Red River, an important tributary of the Mississippi, flows southeasterly across the State through this region, at once watering the country through which it flows and furnishing an otherwise inaccessible region with easy access to the markets.

Upon the west bank of this river, about one hundred and fifty miles from its mouth, is situated the town of Alexandria, a place of some two or three thousand inhabitants. It had been temporarily occupied by General Banks in his Opelousas expedition, but necessarily abandoned again when he withdrew his forces to lay siege to Port Hudson. Early in the spring of 1864 General Banks fitted out an expedition for the purpose of entering and occupying this territory. He withdrew for this purpose a part of his forces from Texas, concentrating them in and about New Orleans. He divided the army into three corps. He commanded the expedition in person. General Franklin was second in command. Admiral Porter, with a fleet of gunboats and transports, co-operated in the movement.

The rebels, however, were better prepared for resistance than they had been at the time of the previous Opelousas expedition. They constructed a strong fort on the Red River below Alexandria. They entitled it Fort De Russy. A formidable work, quadrangular in shape, with bastions and bomb-proofs covered with railroad iron, strengthened by a powerful water-battery, the whole located in a commanding position, it must be captured or destroyed before the fleet could ascend the river. General Dick Taylor occupied it with a large force.

General Franklin landed from transports early in March, a few miles below this fort, to co-operate with the gun-boats in an attack upon it. General Taylor determined to attack him before the rest of the Union force should come up, and marched out of his works for that purpose. But he committed the fatal mistake of attacking his foe in the rear. General Franklin was quick to avail himself of his enemy's blunder, abandoned his communications, refused battle, and marched straight for the now vacant fort. General Taylor saw his error too late to retrieve it, and hastened after his antagonist in vain. The Union army entered the fort, three hours in advance of the rebels, unopposed, capturing, without a battle, 325 prisoners, 10 guns, a lot of small-arms, and large stores of ammunition. Thus, by a military blunder, the rebels lost the entire advantage of their year's engineering labor, the fleet passed up the river without opposition, and occupied Alexandria on the 15th of March, the army entering it the day following. The rebel army fell back further up the river. It was soon increased by timely reinforcements. General Magruder joined it with 2500 Texans, and General Price with 7000 infantry from Missouri and Arkansas. The entire force was commanded by General Kirby Smith.

Meanwhile the residents of Alexandria suffered alike from friend and foe. Such cotton as was found in store was seized by the fleet as its lawful prize, while orders were given by the rebel commander to burn that which was stored along the river to prevent it from falling into the Federal hands. Rebel cavalry overran the country executing the order. Thousands of bales were thus destroyed. The people, as usual, suffered no less from the protection afforded by their friends than from the captures and confiscations by their supposed enemies.

Near the northwestern boundary of Louisiana is the town of Shreveport. This was supposed to be the ultimate destination of General Banks's expedition. Here, therefore, strong fortifications had been erected; obstructions had been placed in the river; provisions were here accumulated sufficient to last for a siege of six months. The events which followed rendered it unnecessary for the rebels to make use of these their last resort. After about ten days' delay at Alexandria, where General Banks concentrated his forces and prepared for their future movements, he commenced his march. The gun-boats succeeded in passing the falls in the river, which are situated at this point. The army took up its line of march by land. About thirty miles above Alexandria the Federal advance met the rebels strongly posted at Cane River. Their force was considerable, and their position advantageous; but after a short engagement with artillery and skirmishers a general charge was ordered, and the rebels beat a hasty, though well-ordered retreat. This was on the 28th of March.

The army were in high spirits. They thought they were sweeping easily all before them. The rebels were said to be disorganized and dissatisfied. A correspondent had already written:

"It is useless for them (the rebels) to attempt to keep back the irresistible column which General Franklin will hurl against them."

This confidence, apparently shared alike by officer and private, increased by the victory so easily gained at Cane River, brought to a disastrous issue what, more prudently conducted, might have proved a successful expedition. The Union army pressed rapidly forward. The rebels as rapidly retreated. Grand Ecore was passed. Natchitoches (pronounced Nakitosh), capital of the parish of that name, was occupied without opposition; and on the 6th of April the army continued its advance toward Shreveport. At Grand Ecore the road leaves the river bank. It passes through Natchitoches four miles from Grand Ecore, the nearest river town. Then it enters heavy pine-woods. A single road conducts through this uncleared forest. It affords excellent opportunities for ambuscade.

The Union army no longer enjoyed the formidable protection of the gun-boats. The rebels had purposely avoided battle until they could fight without being compelled to encounter these greatly dreaded foes. The elated army, however, neither anticipated nor prepared for serious resistance. The cavalry, five thousand men, constituted the advance. It was commanded by General Lee. They were followed by their wagon-train. Several miles in the rear was the nearest infantry force. This was the Thirteenth Army Corps. The Nineteenth Corps was still further in the rear. On the 7th the cavalry found its progress somewhat resisted. There was slight skirmishing, but nothing worthy of the name of a battle. But on the following day General Lee sent back for reinforcements. He had driven the rebels some eight miles. They had at length made a stand from which he was unable to dislodge them. General Ransom with two divisions was ordered forward to his assistance. Nothing like a general engagement was expected or prepared for. General Ransom indeed urged awaiting the arrival of the rest of the army; but he was overruled.

An order to charge upon the rebels was given. It was obeyed. The issue proved the greatness of the mistake. The rebels, under cover of the trees, had formed an ambuscade in the shape of an enormous V. The devoted soldiers, entering the opened wedge at its base, charged upon the apex. The wings then closed upon them. They were mowed down by a terrific fire both from front and either flank. The cavalry was thrown into disorder, and began to retreat down the road filled with the infantry. The wounded and dying were trodden under the horses' feet. The infantry, surprised by the murderous fire from a concealed foe, were thrown into utter confusion by the retreating cavalry, who, completely routed, cantered in wild disorder through their lines. An attempt was made to withdraw and meet reinforcements from the Nineteenth Corps further back; but the single narrow road was effectually blockaded by the cavalry wagon-train.

An orderly retreat was impossible. Soon all was in the utmost confusion. "Let every man take care of himself!" became the universal cry. General Ransom made the most heroic efforts to rally his men—but in vain. Generals Banks and Franklin, hearing of disaster, hastened to the front, and mingled in the thickest of the fight. The first-named officer was severely wounded in the knee. General Banks received a shot through the hat, and narrowly escaped capture. The wagon-train could not be carried off, and was abandoned to the enemy. Twenty guns fell into the rebels' hands. Among these captures was the Chicago Mercantile Battery. The Federal loss was very heavy. General Franklin is reported to have said that the scene was far more terrible, and the rout more complete, than any thing at Bull Run. One regiment came out of the encounter with but fifty-eight men. Nearly half of the Thirteenth Corps were placed hors du combat. The entire army was only saved from utter demolition by the timely arrival of reinforcements from the Nineteenth Corps and the darkness of approaching night. This engagement is known by the name of the Battle of Mansfield. There seems little reason to doubt that the disaster was the result of mismanagement. General Banks, supposing that he was pursuing a retreating and disorganized foe, was led into a trap, from which he barely succeeded in extricating himself and his command. He engaged the enemy with but two divisions of infantry, expecting only a skirmish, and totally unprepared for a general engagement.

The night of the 8th was full of anxiety. The national army continued its retreat during the darkness, and arrived at Pleasant Hill by early dawn of the 9th—a distance of from twelve to eighteen miles. Here the army, which had been so disastrously defeated only because it fought in fractions, was concentrated. General A. J. Smith, with the Sixteenth Army Corps, held the right; General Franklin, with the Nineteenth Corps, held the left. The Thirteenth Corps, exhausted and almost destroyed by the previous day's fighting, was unable to participate in the anticipated battle.

The army being thus posted to receive an attack, if one should be made, General Banks ordered the retreat to continue to Grand Ecore. The wagon train was immense. It took nearly all day to get it started. The rebels made no attack until toward evening. Then they assailed at once the entire line. It was about five o'clock when the attack was made. At first it proved successful. The Federal soldiers were forced back for nearly or quite half a mile. Several guns were captured. The moment was critical. The reserve line was reached. Here, however, the patriot host made a new stand. The rebels charged upon it with fiery purpose, in two lines—one close behind the other. They were greeted with a terrific fire from concentrated batteries of artillery and thousands of rifles. They trembled and recoiled before the shock. No time was given them to recover from its effect. General Smith ordered a charge. With a wild shout the undaunted soldiery obeyed the command; and the rebels broke and fled, leaving the Union army in possession of the field.

The victory of Pleasant Hill neutralized the disastrous defeat of Mansfield, and saved General Banks's army from threatened annihilation. But that was all. The bleeding and broken fragments of an army left after these terrible encounters was in no condition to continue an expedition which was, indeed, hazardous at the best. The impatient wishes of the soldiery, who were anxious to pursue the fleeing foe, were restrained, and the Federal retreat was continued to Grand Ecore. The fleet, under Admiral Porter, which had already ascended the river to within eighty miles of Shreveport, was ordered to return. The rebels, who now swarmed the river-bank, opened upon it, but after a brief engagement were driven away with great slaughter. After a short rest the Federal army continued its retreat to Alexandria. They were followed by the rebel forces; stragglers were picked up by prowling guerrillas; and an attack was made upon the Federal rear-guard, but it was repulsed with heavy rebel loss. Arrived at Alexandria the adventures of the expedition were not at an end. At this point is a considerable fall in the river. The water, which was now at a low stage, was insufficient to allow the vessels to pass the rapids. Obstructions were placed by the rebels in the river below. The fleet had entered a trap from which it seemed impossible to escape. But an ingenious engineer, Lieutenant-Colonel Bailey, contrived and constructed a dam, 600 feet in length, across the river, at the falls. He thus formed a sort of temporary lock, which enabled him to extricate the entire fleet from its perilous position. This accomplished, General Banks evacuated Alexandria, continuing his retreat to the Mississippi. So ended the Red River expedition.

MISS MILLIGAN'S SERMON.

ON a fine summer day, about ten years ago, the early train going eastward received two female passengers in deep mourning, who being unattended, had come to the station half an hour before the proper time. One of these ladies was advanced in years, and wore a widow's cap. The other, about four-and-twenty, strongly resembled her, except that where a fixed expression of gravity, if not sorrow, appeared on the face of the widow, there was a naturally arch and almost roguish cast on the features of the younger woman. A very careless observer would have guessed that these persons were mother and daughter. Time seemed to show, by the ravages which he had made in the beauty of the elder lady, what would be the daughter's fate some day. He had turned the yellow locks to a drab-like silver, and the varying complexion of bright youth had faded into a delicate paleness. Still the young face and the old face were alike in this—both were pleasant to look upon. The name on their trunks was marked very plainly "Milligan," and the baggage-master had carelessly chalked under it "Wingham," from which we may infer that this was the destination of our travelers.

Mrs. Milligan was very recently widowed. One of those men whose mission it is to get themselves and all their friends into trouble during their whole existence, had just died, leaving, as such people generally do, a helpless family behind him. The city home was broken up, the furniture sold, every debt scrupulously paid, and all the money that they had left was three hundred dollars, which Miss Milligan had prudently fastened in the lining of her dress. They were going to live in a place which had once been a sort of home to the widow in her early youth, and this place was called Appledore.

Miss Milligan did all that she could to make her mother comfortable. She arranged the car window so as to admit the June breeze without the June sunlight. She made the seat more easy by spreading her shawl over it, and as Mrs. Milligan sank wearily into it the affectionate girl tried to refresh and revive her with Cologne water and a fan. A look full of tenderness rewarded the daughter's devotion.

After a time those mysterious sounds which announce the departure of the train made themselves heard. There was the usual quantity of shaking, snorting, grinding, hallooing, and whistling, and they were off. Miss Milligan took the morning paper out of her pocket, and her mother went to sleep very comfortably. The young lady was distracted from her journal by the various odd figures which are always to be seen among the traveling public. Lanky men, much troubled as to what they should do with long legs and tall umbrellas; old ladies, very apprehensive that they had got in the wrong car; large family parties, carrying baskets full of apples, pea-nuts, and oranges, which they began to eat as soon as seated; naughty boys who would run at full speed through the train; politicians squabbling about the candidates for Governor; Miss Milligan, with her gentle but sarcastic smile, looked at, and was amused with them all. Only for a few moments. A name returned to her mind with great interest, and this name was Appledore. It is a place so small that you can not find it on any map; but it was to be the home of her mother and herself; and we are all selfish enough to feel as if any place that we are to inhabit must have a special value of its own.

In the first place, Miss Milligan did not wish to go to Appledore. To gratify her idolized mother she would have consented to almost any thing; but considering, as she did, what was to happen when their slender means were exhausted, and anxious by every exertion to guard this dear mother from privation, Miss Milligan could imagine no possible future for them in this little country place. Her only resource, as a career, seemed to be that of a governess, and to this she had some time before made up her mind. She meant to submit to her fate, and do as well as she could, but she felt pretty sure that Appledore was no place for her. Here, I think, she was wrong. Any place was a good one for Miss Milligan, for cleverness and good sense will always be needed in this world. She could speak good French, and also good English (not an invariable accomplishment), she sang and played finely, and was exceedingly well-read. Nor was this all. She knew how to manage and keep a house with prudence, comfort, and elegance. She could make pies and puddings, cut and fit dresses, and had a decided taste for sewing and embroidery. But a marked quality, indeed one that must immediately strike any observer of Miss Milligan's character, was an abhorrence of defeat, a determination to snatch success, which was a sort of augury of the future.

Our young friend sat revolving various plans in her mind, almost unconscious where she was, when she was aroused by the sound of a loud nasal voice two or three seats off. This voice said, "We're a long way from Appledore yet." Miss Milligan turned and saw that the speaker was a young man of about twenty-five, with sandy hair, a turned-up nose, and a set of features expressing dullness mingled with a sort of cunning. The drollness of this man's appearance was much increased when he added to the number of sleepers in the car, which he soon did. His goggle-eyes closed, a large and ugly mouth fell open, and with his rough locks standing in every direction, he was a spectacle for a caricaturist. "Beauty in repose!" said Miss Milligan to herself; and on the fly-leaf of a French book which she had with her she made, with an end of lead-pencil, a rough, comic sketch of this odd figure. Then, opening the volume carelessly, she became interested in it, and soon forgot the drawing and its subject. Meantime the long and tedious day wore on. The train stopped for refreshments, and people got in and out; Mrs. Milligan woke and went to sleep again with great regularity, and her daughter continued to read. The day waned, and at about sundown the Milligans were aroused by the loud voice of the conductor calling out, "Wingham!" This was the name of the place where they were to take a carriage for Appledore; and Miss Milligan, hurrying her mother along, had just secured her trunks, and was about to step into a conveyance of the country sort, when she saw that the back seat contained the very model of her sketch, now awaked to life and vivacity. "We want to go to Appledore," said Miss Milligan to the driver of the vehicle. "Step in here, ladies," said the sandy-haired man; and with that he awkwardly took himself out of the back seat which he had appropriated. With polite acknowledgments the ladies accepted his civility. He placed himself beside the driver, with whom he seemed to be well acquainted, and an interesting dialogue commenced.

"Well, what's the news, Hiram, since I went away?"

"Well, not much; that's a fact. Jones's gray mare's gone lame."

"What's the matter with her?" inquired the sandy-haired man, who had a straw in his mouth.

"Ring-bone," replied Hiram, concisely.

"Did it rain here a' Sunday?" inquired the first speaker.

"I guess it did, pretty smart. You was preachin' to Middleboro, wasn't ye?"

"Yes. Halloo, Hiram. Stop at the Post-office, can't ye? Ladies, I hope 'twill be no offense?"

"None, Sir," returned Mrs. Milligan; and "Beauty," as Miss Milligan privately called him, and the Rev. Salem P. Cooley, as he was called by the world, scrambled out of the little carriage.

"Is that gentleman a clergyman?" asked Mrs. Milligan of the driver.

"Yes; he is our new minister," replied the reticent Hiram. After a few moments he added, "He hain't ben here long."

An interval of profound silence ensued, when Hiram, driving the flies away from his horses, remarked,

"He don't look like a smart chap any how."

"I should not suppose him one," said Miss Milligan, rather hastily.

"Folks think so though," said Hiram. "Deacon Tinkham has took a powerful likin' to him. He says he's a most various preacher."

"What?" inquired Miss Milligan.

"Well, p'raps that ain't the word; but what I mean is, the Deacon says he's sure he won't get tired on him, for he hain't never heerd him preach twice alike."

Hiram's remarks were cut short by the return of the Rev. Mr. Cooley, who shambled into the rockaway, with a couple of newspapers in his hands. One of these, bearing the name of the Independent Shout of Freedom, he opened and began to read; but Miss Milligan, who watched his proceedings with a strong desire to laugh, remarked that his attention seemed to be principally directed to the advertisements. Meanwhile the two rough horses started off, and another hour or two brought our travelers to Appledore. It was a pretty place. Imagine the long village street of white houses in trim gardens, the wide green, and the lofty elm-trees, and Appledore, as it looked on this June evening, is before you. Glad enough were our tired friends when they and their properties arrived safely at the Widow Kimball's, where two quiet rooms had been engaged by them some weeks before. Hiram and Mr. Cooley had jogged on to a house at some distance.

Mrs. Kimball was glad to see Mrs. Milligan, whom she remembered very well, some forty years back, as a pretty young girl in Appledore. The widow saw a good many changes in her old acquaintance and herself since those days. Mrs. Milligan, once so handsome, rich, and gay, was now grown old, grave, and poor; while Betty Green, the sewing girl, who many a time had toiled for the young beauty, was now comfortable and wealthy—of course I mean for Appledore.

Perhaps it was not without secret satisfaction that Mrs. Kimball, while pouring the tea for her company, out of her best tea-pot, footed up the balance of Time's losses and benefits to them both, and brought it out a good deal in her own favor, though by this I don't mean to say that she was a bad-hearted or malicious woman. But when she remarked what a fine girl Miss Milligan was, and how completely devoted to her mother, and reflected that she had no attached child to cling to her in her old age, and that her hard-earned dollars would all go to an indifferent set of relations, about whom she cared nothing, then I say, she thought the Fates had not used her very well after all.

"I expect I seen Mr. Cooley a sittin' along with Hiram as you come in," said Mrs. Kimball. "He's ben away for a spell."

"Betty," said Mrs. Milligan, "I never was more surprised than by the appearance of that rough-looking Cooley. There is nothing clerical about him."

"Dew you think so, Mrs. Milligan? He's reckoned uncommon smart."

"That is amazing, for he has a foolish countenance. Nature has written him down an ass."

Mrs. Kimball's face bore a look of dismay; but as she could never shake off her awe of one who had befriended her, and always seemed immeasurably above her, she turned the conversation by saying:

"Dew you calc'late to go up to the old place? It's all changed there now."

"So I suppose," said the lady with a sigh. "My dear old aunt and uncle are gone, and the family long dispersed. But we shall walk up there probably. I wish, my child, to see the good old home of former times. But, perhaps, we can go to our rooms, Betty?"

Mrs. Kimball ran to bring her lodgers two of those vile camphine lamps, still to be seen in the rural districts, and the mother and daughter gladly retired.

When Miss Milligan woke the next morning from roseate dreams to find the "blue ethereal sky" shut from view by an equally blue paper curtain, and likewise discovered that a pitcher holding about one pint of water had been judged sufficient for her morning's toilet, her pretty mouth pouted sadly, and two bright tears of disgust fell on Mrs. Kimball's shabby little pillow, as my young friend exclaimed, "Oh, this horrid Appledore!"

The sound of a bell fell on her ear, and diverted her thoughts. It was Sunday morning, and Miss Milligan, as she looked from the window, and at the risk of instant decapitation from the unmanageable sash, took a view of the landscape, felt a pleasant calm steal over her. While dressing, she determined to conceal from her mother her own opinion of things at Appledore. So effectually did she enact her part, that that lady when she appeared, far from detecting the pious fraud, really thought her child was as happy to be in the village home of her youth as she was herself. Was not my little friend an amiable humbug? Well, so she was, and so most kind, self-sacrificing women are. If they did not thus deceive friends, countrymen, and lovers, just tell me how we should all get on. Better to be deceived for good than for evil; a little bit ruse the fair sex is known to be, and always will be in secula seculorum!

There was only one church in Appledore, and rather than remain at home the Milligans resolved to attend it, and listen to the teachings of the Rev. Salem P. Cooley. Plain indeed was the little building, but it had this in its favor, that it was quite unpretending; if there was nothing to admire, at least there was nothing to ridicule.

A clergyman, evidently a stranger, made a prayer; after which the lank form of Mr. Cooley rose in the pulpit, and Miss Milligan, who had composed herself to a quiet attention, felt all her ideas scattered immediately by the sight of his grotesque figure. She anticipated an effusion in keeping with the mind and attainments of the orator when he at once announced his text, which was taken from the story of Balaam. His critic waited in vain for any of the follies she had expected. The sermon was forcible, clear, and elegant; it bore the marks of a superior mind. Strange to say, it had for Miss Milligan the charm of being a previous acquaintance, and after the preacher had proceeded for a few moments, she no longer wondered at the interest he excited. With this sermon, indeed, she had long been familiar, for it was one of Bishop Butler's happiest efforts. That Cooley should so calmly preach it as original showed several things very plainly; his unblushing impudence, his ignorance, and his daring estimate (a correct one too) of the ignorance of his flock. Miss Milligan took a covert survey of the congregation as well as she could. It consisted of the farmers and their families, the doctor (who had been up all night with a patient, and was asleep in his pew), the few shop-keepers and mechanics in Appledore, and the girls from a country boarding-school about two miles off. Not a very critical audience! Deacon Tinkham, indeed, hearkened attentively to the discourse; and his remark that Mr. Cooley had never preached twice alike was now made quite clear to Miss Milligan. She saw that the little country church was provided with a minister, who perhaps too idle, but certainly too incapable to compose any thing original, and yet with a strong desire for applause, was practicing on his flock, and building up a reputation by making a free use of the labors of others.

As Miss Milligan returned home from church her mother spoke of the sermon in terms which showed that the good lady shared in the general unconsciousness of the deceit of the Rev. Mr. Cooley. She commended the preacher's remarks, and observed to her daughter that they had treated him with injustice, as the morning's effort showed that he must be a man of superior abilities. To these observations her daughter gave but little answer. Miss Milligan, indeed, who was sharp and shrewd beyond her years, and rendered a good deal more so by adversity, quietly determined to say nothing of the discovery she had made. She reflected that it was not for her to put herself forward in the matter; that a young unfriended woman is not the person to bring charges, and make enemies; and, finally, that least said is soonest mended. You see by these facts that my friend Miss Milligan was one of the women who not only can keep their own secrets but other people's as well. You might trust her as a friend with any confidences; she was too honorable to betray you under any circumstances. But I must add that she was mighty slow to give you back any information about herself or her own affairs, and she often reminded me of the lady whom Pope means to be so severe upon, when he says:

"Secrets of yours are safe in Chloe's ear,
But none of Chloe's shall you ever hear!"

The great poet surely did not reflect when he penned these lines how many families have been ruined, and how many hearts broken, all for the want of a little sensible reticence!

On Monday morning Mrs. Kimball informed Mrs. Milligan that she feared she had made a mistake about letting the rooms they occupied. "You see them rooms is too dreadful low," said our friend Betty, apologetically. "After the letter had went I mistrusted I couldn't afford it after this month, and I kinder thought tew let ye know, and then there warn't time enough, so the difference ain't much any way."

"Not much certainly to most persons," said Miss Milligan, coolly, "but at present something to us. You ought to have known your own mind, Mrs. Kimball."

"Wa'al, ye see," returned that lady, "the ground-floor back is agoin' to be on my hands. Abby Peters, the cripple that's stopped with me eleven year, is agoin' to Hartford to her sister's to stay constant."

"So you want us to make it up?" said Miss Milligan. "I must say I think this is a rather unusual proceeding." And a flash of indignation gleamed from her blue eyes. Her mother was cooler, and could better allow for Betty's sordid views and narrow mind. Indeed the Widow Kimball was an odd specimen of character; she was not destitute of good feeling, and was far from unfriendly to the Milligans; but her long-hoarded gains had become so dear to her that not even for her most respected friends could she bear to diminish them. It was finally agreed that two rooms, less desirable than those they already occupied, should be assigned to the Milligans as soon as the month for which the engagement had been made was expired; and Miss Milligan, bored with the whole controversy, and sadly reflecting that altered circumstances must bring in their train many such vexatious petty trials, took a book in her hand, and set forth to explore the woods and fields about Appledore.

It was a bright morning. She followed the course of the little stream after it passed under the old stone bridge, and came to where it widens considerably; in fact, it seems more like a pond or small lake than a river. Just here she threw her shawl on a stone under a shady tree, and sat down to rest and look at the surrounding scene.

On this bright summer morning the face of nature wore no smile for Miss Milligan. She only contemplated her own and her mother's position. How small were their resources, and how soon, even with their economy, would they not be exhausted! And how cruel of her fate to plant her here in this obscure Appledore, where her talents and her powers could be of no use to her! "This will never, never do," she thought. "Money must be made; I must make it; and to do this I must quit Appledore. To leave mamma will not be so hard as to see her suffer." As she mused on her troubles she did not observe that a man was fishing in a small boat a short distance from the bank. Presently he rowed nearer; her attention was arrested, and she saw that the coarse hands that pulled the oar, and the big limbs that sprawled over and almost out of the boat belonged to the Rev. Mr. Cooley. His pantaloons were turned up around his ankles, his clothes were wet and muddy, and the brim was nearly torn off his old straw-hat. In short, he reminded the lady of Robinson Crusoe, but without his man Friday. As he neared the bank he rose, bowed awkwardly, yet familiarly, to Miss Milligan, and leaving the boat, he hastened toward the stones where she was seated. He did not look much like a "minister of the Gospill," as he invariably pronounced it, as he advanced, with a tin pot containing worms in one hand, and a string of fish in the other.

"I hope I see you well, Miss," he began. "How is the old lady to-day?" Our young friend, who did not much enjoy this unexpected rencontre, answered politely but frigidly that her mother and herself were both quite well. Mr. Cooley, nothing daunted, seated himself on a stone at a little distance from Miss Milligan; and apparently considering that his toilet might be improved, he laid aside his fishing apparatus, and began to turn down his trowsers. And you, my reader, who know the world, will agree that this perhaps was as much an indication of the dawning of the tender passion as Benedick's "brushing his hat o' mornings." Having finished this operation before Miss Milligan, who contemplated flight, could make her escape our fisherman continued the conversation.

"I hope you're comfortable up to Kimball's?" said he, interrogatively.

"Not so much so as I hoped," said Miss Milligan. "At the end of the month we are to take two less convenient rooms at the same rate. Mrs. Kimball says she made a mistake."

"Well, I vow that's too bad!" exclaimed the Rev. Salem. "A tight one is Betty; I always knew that. Why don't you leave?"

"I don't see exactly that we could do much better. Mamma used to stay in this village when she was young, but knows nobody here now. She can not afford to pay any more than Mrs. Kimball asks her. I intended to give lessons, but from what I see of this place, I have concluded there is no opening here for any thing of the sort."

"Well, no. I should say there wasn't," said Mr. Cooley, reflectively. "There's the boarding-school at Pikeville, two miles off."

"Yes," said Miss Milligan, "I think I saw the scholars in church yesterday. Do you know if they are in want of a teacher there?"

"I'm afraid not," returned Salem, slowly. "It ain't any place for you any how." An unmistakable expression of admiration was painted on his rough features; that is, it would not have been mistaken had it been observed; but Miss Milligan was not thinking of him or his conduct. She was reflecting on her own affairs, and sadly pondered what course she ought to pursue.

"Mr. Cooley," said she at length, after they had both been silent a long time, "perhaps you may hear of something that will suit me. There are many things that I can do. I could teach children, or read aloud to an invalid, or sew, or embroider, or make preserves, or take pupils in French or German, or do copying, or ground young girls in history or belles-lettres."

Salem's eyes were wide open as Miss Milligan enumerated her accomplishments, and as she paused for breath, he exclaimed,

"Land of hope! You must be awful smart! What did you come to Appledore for?"

"Ah! what indeed!" said Miss Milligan. "Simply to please my mother, who wished to live here."

"I see you're a good daughter," said Mr. Cooley, nodding his head approvingly. "I was a good son to the old folks too, as long as they lasted. They made me a minister. I took to preachin' just to please them, though my taste has allers been for farmin'; that's a fact."

Miss Milligan was tempted to smile a little at this confession from a man who would have made a competent farmer, but had been persuaded by unwise parents to gratify them by entering a walk of life for which he obviously could never have been intended by nature, or fitted by any amount of education. Yet she failed not to perceive that this incongruous and even laughable position had, like many other things which seem ridiculous at first sight, its painful and pitiable side. She rose, intending to go home; but if she wished to rid herself of her companion she was unsuccessful, for Salem, taking up his fishing-tackle, prepared to accompany her.

"Wouldn't your mother like some fish?" he inquired. "I'll carry 'em home and give 'em to Betty myself. They'll be nice for tea or breakfast. Your mother was in church on Sunday, wasn't she?"

"Certainly."

"And how did you like the sermon?" asked Salem, unconscious of the pitfall beneath him.

"Do you wish me to tell you the truth?"

"Why yes, of course I do."

"Well, then, mamma thought the sermon very fine, and you a very superior man to have composed something so excellent; but as for me I did not think so."

Here Mr. Cooley was doubtful of the young lady's meaning, and with a puzzled look inquired, "What say?"

"I don't want to hurt your feelings," said Miss Milligan, gently; "but I repeat that I thought no better of your talents after hearing you preach that sermon."

"And why not?" demanded he uneasily, but without any idea of what she meant.

"Because it was not yours. I had read it before."

Salem's coarse features became suffused with a deep peony-red. He stood stock-still in the middle of the road, and after a few moments he ejaculated,

"Law sakes! Good land! Now who would have guessed that?"

Miss Milligan, suppressing a strong desire to laugh heartily, walked on at a brisk pace, and had gone about a hundred yards before he came panting after her.

"What did you mean, Miss, by that statement?" he asked rather gruffly, and yet in an embarrassed tone.

"I meant, Mr. Cooley, to say that I discovered on Sunday that you preached an old sermon of Bishop Butler's as your own; that I said nothing about it, and that I think no one is aware of it but myself, and that I heartily advise you either to preach sermons of your own composition or to select authors who are less known."

"Preach my own sermons!" he broke in. "You don't know what you're talkin' about. Suppose a man can't, what then? Now this is a private conversation, and I'll tell you what it is, I've tried it many a time, but I can't get any further than 'My Christian friends.' When I was a student my friend Smith stuck to me, and he helped me through the seminary; more times I wish he hadn't; well, this is the first time I've been found out, and by a woman too!"

"It is only strange you were not discovered sooner," said Miss Milligan, "between Bishop Butler in the morning and Spurgeon in the afternoon."

"Well," said Salem, "I'm not smart; that's a fact. You are smart; that's another. You know enough to write sermons yourself, and I'll be bound you could do it."

"I dare say I could. Tolerably good ones perhaps, and if I had any object in it," said Miss Milligan, giving him a glance of her blue eyes.

"Well, what would ye think was an objick?" he went on.

"Money," said Miss Milligan, firmly; "and if you will agree to a proper compensation I will furnish you with all that you require."

"You will!" cried he, his eyes sticking out of his head; "and suppose it is found out?"

"It will not be. If you were not afraid to preach Bishop Butler and Mr. Spurgeon, you certainly can not fear delivering a sermon that never was read before, and which every one must suppose your own. You need not think I will mention it—of course you will not—and who will be the wiser?"

"Why, nobody to be sure," answered Salem. "Name what you think is right, and we'll close it up."

Miss Milligan reminded him smilingly that he had better see a specimen of her powers before committing himself. She also added that great caution would have to be observed about the transfer of manuscripts, etc., if they would avoid suspicion. This was arranged by Mr. Cooley, who proposed that the Independent Shout of Freedom, which he was in the habit of taking, should be sent to Miss Milligan every week, and it was to be returned inclosing the manuscript.

Mr. Cooley then accompanied our friend to the widow Kimball's, where, after a short colloquy at the gate and an awkward bow, he left her. "Law sakes alive!" said Betty (who had observed this scene from the window of the "keeping-room"), to Mehetabel Adams, the hired help; "I dew believe the minister has took a likin' tew Miss Milligan. I see him a talkin' tew her for nigh goin' on twenty minits. She mought go furdur and fare wuss; if he is humly his father was a well-to-do man, and I guess Salem's pretty well off, let alone that big farm down on the Penhasset Creek, where the Deacon used to live."

"I've heerd tell he had plenty of bank-stock," said Mehetabel; "my father says he knows Mr. Cooley's purty well off—'specially for a minister."

Miss Milligan ate her dinner as usual; coaxed and petted her mother; was pleasant, gay, and affectionate as she always was. Her poor little heart was sad enough, however—to be engaged in any affair that required concealment was, in spite of what I said about her playful little deceptions, a very unpleasant thing to Miss Milligan. For there is a wide difference between a self-defensive, worldly prudence, and those vile arts by which the wicked seek to deceive that they may injure others.

When the young lady had retired to her room she was tempted to indulge in a fit of crying as she stood looking at the moonlight, which lay streaming over the woods and hillocks of Appledore. But she forcibly drove away her melancholy feelings, and producing writing materials, she began her task. Not till midnight did she enter her little cot, and when she did so, a well-written essay on "Justice in the affairs of common Life" was laid in her port-folio. Nor did her mother suspect, when her child complained of headache the next morning, how the same had been obtained.

So weeks passed, and the trifling means possessed by the mother and daughter would have been nearly exhausted had it not been for those moderate sums which Mr. Cooley was only too glad to pay, in order to have the fearful task of providing two weekly sermons taken from his mind. Miss Milligan informed her mother that she was engaged in doing some writing for Cooley, and obtained from her a promise of complete silence. The secret remained entirely unsuspected; and Miss Milligan used to sit Sunday after Sunday, listening to her own compositions, until she became excessively weary; but no one ever guessed, although she used to gape incessantly during the sermon, the reason of her evident fatigue.

Weeks passed on, I say, and every body in the village was aware of the minister's admiration for Miss Milligan except the young lady herself, who never thought about him, except as concerned in a business matter, and therein of some importance to her mother and herself. Salem, indeed, was too bashful a lover to dare to intrude his attentions. He kept the Milligans constantly supplied with fish and game, greatly to the improvement of Mrs. Kimball's penurious table, and much to that lady's satisfaction; and he made the strangers aware that his comfortable country carriage was always at their service. So things went on.

One morning as Miss Milligan was tying up some geraniums in front of the Hotel Kimball, as she used laughingly to call it, the ungainly form of Cooley was seen shambling along the road. He stopped before the garden gate, and asked Miss Milligan if she would walk with him as far as the bridge. As soon as they had arrived at the destined spot he told her that he desired, on the next occasion that offered, to preach on "Faith."

"This is the second time you have alluded to this matter," said Miss Milligan; "and I warn you that you will get yourself and me into trouble by it. I am not equal to it, nor can you supply what is wanting. Do select something else."

"I've got my reasons, Miss Milligan," returned he; "if you knew 'em, you'd approve of 'em."

"I tell you, Mr. Cooley, I am not capable of writing on that subject; however, if you insist—"

"Wa'al, not insist—seein' it's a lady; but I know you can do any thin'—"

"Very well, then," said she, "take your own way and the consequences both;" and, considerably out of humor, she walked back to the house. Salem followed; he had at last become aware of the state of his feelings, and had nearly gained courage to explain them to Miss Milligan; but her evident dissatisfaction threw cold water on his plans, and he retired in silence, very unhappy for two reasons: first, because he had failed to tell his love; and, secondly, because he knew she was displeased with him.

"What an obstinate fool he is!" said Miss Milligan to herself when she was alone; "and what an unfortunate girl I am!"

It was early in June when the Milligans came to Appledore. It was now the 1st of September; the whole country was in a ferment. A great Agricultural County Fair was to be held at Slocumville, two or three miles from Appledore, and the small village shared in the excitement of the larger town. Every bed and room in Slocumville were engaged, and the surplus of the traveling public surged over into Appledore. The one small hotel for man and beast was crammed, and the citizens had to open their houses to unlooked-for guests. On Sunday there was scarcely standing-room in the little church. No less than three well-known clergymen, of the denomination to which Mr. Cooley belonged, were present; two were with him in the pulpit, and one, a young and handsome man, with the bearing of a gentleman, and a most intellectual countenance, occupied a seat in the minister's pew. It was on this auspicious occasion that the Rev. Salem P. Cooley preached his famous sermon on "Faith," which afterward made such a sensation in Appledore. It was listened to with the deepest attention, not only by Deacon Tinkham and the three clergymen, but every body else who was present. Its whole effect was not observed by Miss Milligan, who, oppressed by the heat of the day and feeling very faint, was obliged to leave the church.

As the congregation dispersed there were murmurs, especially among the elder part of the audience, and Deacon Tinkham, in particular, was loud in debate. Nor was this surprising when we reflect that this unlucky sermon on "Faith" unfortunately contradicted in extremely plain terms certain very decided views entertained by the particular sect of which the Rev. Salem P. Cooley was one of the most ignorant members as well as ministers.

A week passed away, and left Miss Milligan indisposed with a nervous headache, and Mr. Cooley in a sort of typical hornet's nest. Indeed, there was now no peace for this unfortunate man. The great fair at Slocumville was over, and his flock had obtained ample time to bestow upon him. The officers of his church, headed by the three ministers and Deacon Tinkham, had called upon him and requested an explanation of his sermon; and he now for the first time learned that he had been guilty of promulgating views in direct opposition to those held by his sect.

The Rev. Mr. Hartridge, the youngest of the clergymen, pitying the evident agitation and alarm of the unhappy Salem, requested that Cooley might be allowed sufficient time to reflect on the expressions he had used, and to acquire calmness enough to explain himself to his flock; and by this means Tinkham and the rest of the malcontents were prevailed on to depart.

"Now that we are quite alone," said Hartridge to the distressed pastor, who was walking up and down with his hands in his pockets, "I will confess to you that I was amazed at your sermon myself. It was not in the least in your former style—as you preached a year ago, when I last had the pleasure of hearing you. And what on earth can have changed your theological views since then I am at a loss to imagine. Will you let me read over the sermon?"

"That's just what can't be done," said Cooley, gruffly.

"And why not? I wish to read it in order to understand what your system is."

"You can't have it," returned Salem.

"But I must, my dear Sir. It is impossible that justice should be done you unless the matter is thoroughly understood."

"To cut that matter short," returned Cooley, "it ain't here. I haven't got it. It has been sent for by a person—a lady." This was true.

Miss Milligan, with a sort of apprehension of trouble, had sent for the manuscript early on Monday morning, and it was now in her possession.

"What a very singular reason!" replied his persevering friend. "I assure you that the sermon will have to be produced and re-read. I am willing to be of service to you in this matter, and if you will treat me as a friend I think I can assist you materially. Much in the discourse may be readily explained, and I shall be glad to prove that it is so. Write a line to your friend, authorizing me to obtain the manuscript, and I will call for it."

And Mr. Hartridge placed a pen in the pastor's trembling hand. Cooley, stunned by the whole business, and scarce aware of what he did, hastily scrawled a few lines: "Miss Milligan, please deliver the Sermon on Faith to Rev. Mr. Hartridge." The address, "Miss Milligan—Kimball's," was all but illegible, but Hartridge contrived to find out where he was to go.

Mr. Hartridge was shown into the Widow Kimball's shabby little parlor, and nearly struck his stately head against the low door as he entered. A handsome card, bearing "The Rev. Walter Hartridge" upon it, was taken up by Mehetabel to Miss Milligan's room. Our friend had recovered from her headache, and had forgotten most of her annoyances, the unlucky Salem included. She was sitting up stairs, singing an air from "Gemma di Vergy" and embroidering a pocket-handkerchief. She looked as happy as a bird, and as fresh as a rose in her neat white morning dress, as she came gracefully forward to greet Mr. Hartridge in the dingy little parlor. Walter had never seen her before; but Miss Milligan instantly recognized the tall and distinguished-looking man whom she had observed in the minister's pew.

Hartridge had intended to come directly to the point, but somehow he did not. They fell into general conversation, after he had briefly mentioned that he was charged with a commission from Mr. Cooley. It was so long since Miss Milligan had enjoyed the society of an accomplished and elegant man—and Hartridge was both—that she yielded to the pleasure of the moment; she talked, and Walter listened, listened with agreeable surprise. Here, in this wretched little Appledore, to meet so sweet, so interesting a woman! How exceedingly odd it was!

The hour that followed neither of them ever forgot. How in that space of time they learned so much of each other, neither Hartridge nor Miss Milligan could explain; but before it ended she knew all about his previous life, his travels in Egypt and Syria, from whence he had only returned in the previous year, and the events which had led him to become, at least for a time, the pastor of the church at Wingham. Miss Milligan, true to her nature, was not quite so communicative; but if the leaves of the flower were still half coyly folded, Hartridge saw enough to know that all within was sweetness.

"I must not let the charms of conversation prevent me from executing my commission," said Hartridge. "Mr. Cooley has intrusted me with this note," here he took out poor Salem's scrawl, "and I will beg you for the sermon which you have in your possession. He has allowed me to read it; indeed it has excited so much remark, that it will have to undergo a very thorough criticism."

"Will it, indeed?" asked the lady, and she turned as white as the handkerchief in her hand. "Why certainly it will," replied Walter; "here he has been preaching in a most extraordinary way. Nobody knows what to make of it. He was always very eccentric, but this last performance goes beyond any thing that he has yet done." Miss Milligan rose to find the sermon. She was so very pale, and looked so embarrassed, that Hartridge's keen eye remarked her as she left the room, and he said to himself, "I wonder if she can be interested in Cooley? It looks like it." He walked up and down the room, then stopped and turned over the books on the table. On the fly-leaf of one was a rough pencil sketch of a man asleep, with his mouth open. Under it was written, in a lady's hand, "Beauty in repose, S. P. C." "No, no," said Hartridge, bursting into a hearty laugh, "she's not in love with him! It's Salem P. Cooley, I declare!" And with a feeling of positive delight he sat down to wait for Miss Milligan. She soon returned, bearing a small closely folded manuscript, and evidently expected that Walter would put it in his pocket unopened, and then depart. In this she was mistaken, for he took it to the window, opened and examined it. Miss Milligan sat pale and motionless in her chair; she kept her eyes on Hartridge, whose brow grew stern and dark as he rapidly ran over several pages of the manuscript. At last he turned around. "This is a most singular thing!" he observed, dryly and coldly. "The handwriting of this is evidently not Cooley's. I know his hand pretty well. There is an initial M. on the paper. I do not believe he wrote this. There is some gross deception here, I am afraid. Excuse me, but I believe you could explain it if you chose."

"Sir!" said Miss Milligan, coloring scarlet.

"Pray, pray excuse me," said Hartridge, changing his tone instantly; "you have only to say that I am wrong, that you know nothing about it, and I beg ten thousand pardons."

Miss Milligan sat perfectly silent, but her cheeks grew red and then pale.

Hartridge looked at her keenly and coldly. "Miss Milligan," said he, "your silence leaves me but one possible conclusion. You know all about the matter, for you have written this sermon. Is it not so?"

"I can not deny it," said she, trembling all over.

"Then what a very wrong and deceitful part you have been acting, and Cooley also! These things are done in England, I know, under that corrupt system of church government," said Hartridge, who disliked nearly every thing English, "but here they are unjustifiable. And that a lady should lend herself to such an evasion! I am inexpressibly pained and shocked!"

Miss Milligan had listened without reply to Hartridge's remarks, but as he stopped for breath, she covered her burning face with two delicate white hands, and tears streamed through the taper fingers.

At last, in a broken voice, she said, "It was to help my mother I did it, my widowed mother! I could not provide for her in any other way. Mr. Cooley's assistance has been every thing to us. Oh, Sir, you are cruelly severe!"

The tones of her voice were stifled by a deep sigh. It was lucky for her that Mrs. Kimball was ironing in the wing, and Mehetabel gone out to pick vegetables, while Mrs. Milligan was up stairs darning stockings.

Hartridge walked up and down the room. Shocked by the manner in which Cooley had deceived so many people (himself included), and astounded to find that Miss Milligan had dared to be his accomplice, he had been betrayed into a harshness of speech which he almost immediately regretted. For another thing, he observed that Miss Milligan was in tears, and he was not the first man who could not bear to see a pretty woman cry.

So he stopped short in his walk across the room, and stood before Miss Milligan. "A grave offense against truth and propriety has been committed," said he, gently, "though the odium of it must rest upon Cooley. But I will try and hush up the matter, that farther scandal may be prevented. If Cooley is unable to prepare his own sermons, I apprehend his usefulness is at an end; but at any rate, such an arrangement as this, of course, could no longer exist."

No reply. A deep sigh from Miss Milligan.

"I hope," said Walter, not without hesitation, "that you will pardon the apparent harshness of any thing I may have said."

Still no answer.

"I really can not go," said Hartridge, with his hat in his hand, "until you say that you do not entertain any hard feeling toward me. If I have been severe, let me beg you to excuse me. Pray do. Will you not?" he asked, very gently.

"You have been quite right, and I very, very wrong," said Miss Milligan, with a misty smile in her eyes as she took her handkerchief from her face. "But I own that your remarks, though just, were hard to bear."

"But you forgive me, do you not?" he broke in. "We part friends, quite friends; is it not so?"

"Yes. You meant well. Quite friends."

"And may I take your hand?"

She gave it to him; he held the pretty white satin hand for a moment, and pressed it earnestly before he let it go.

He bowed politely and was gone, but half his heart was left behind.

Great was the wrath of Deacon Tinkham and the rest of the flock when they discovered they had been praising and admiring, for more than a year, a man who had been strutting in the borrowed plumes of preachers of all beliefs and denominations. Mr. Hartridge had enough to do to calm down the excited congregation. He managed so well, that, while every one knew that the sermon on "Faith" was not written by Cooley, no one ever was able to detect the real author.

At first a storm of indignation was aroused against Cooley; but by one of those strange fatalities which sometimes occur, Salem, from being an object of wrath, became one of pity. As he was driving over to Wingham his horse took fright, ran away, broke the wagon, and threw him out. One of his own parishioners picked him up, much injured; and his leg was found so badly fractured that he would be crippled for life. He resigned his charge; and Deacon Tinkham and the rest of the congregation at once called another, and, let us hope, a more successful minister.

But through autumn sunlight and autumn showers Mr. Hartridge galloped over from Wingham to Appledore. His horse became a well-known object in the landscape, as, picketed in front of Widow Kimball's dwelling while his master was within, he beguiled the weary hours by nibbling the bark off the widow's trees. And that stupid little parlor had grown to be a heaven on earth to Hartridge. The dull pattern of the carpet, the ugly ornaments on the chimney-piece were associated in his mind only with pleasure and joy; for here in this humble spot he had found his "own heart's home." And Miss Milligan, too, felt that a magic charm had been cast over her dull life in Appledore. Every thing was bright and radiant, for "love was now the lord of all." And papering and plastering and refitting went on at the parsonage in Wingham, and it was whispered among the gossips that winter would not have come before the minister would bring home a young bride.

"Pears like as we made a mistake," said Mrs. Kimball to Mehetabel; "it warn't Cooley arter all. Wa'al, he was awful humly; I guess she has done a sight better."

"I guess so tew," said Mehetabel. "Ain't it strange what things goes on in our midst?"

The Indian Summer had come. Mrs. Milligan sat knitting in the keeping-room. The fair-haired Alice was on the little sofa, and Walter lounged by her side. In one hand he held an open book; in the other a long golden curl that hung from the pretty head that was so close to his own.

"Why do you not read, you lazy Walter?" said his Alice's silvery tones. "Ah, how idle you have grown!"

"Study is a good thing," said Hartridge, roguishly. "To the perusal of one rather eccentric literary work I may say I owe all my present happiness."

"And what may that be?"

Walter seized her hand, and drawing her toward him, whispered in her ear—

"Miss Milligan's Sermon!"

THIEVES' JARGON.

THAT the noble society of thieves and beggars have a language of their own is tolerably well known; but few of the honest readers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, probably, suspect that this jargon is very complete; that it is understood and used in this country as well as in England—the French having an argot of their own—and that it includes a simple but complete set of hieroglyphics, with the help of which one of the fraternity can make known to those who follow him all the useful information he has acquired as a "tramp."

Mr. John Camden Hotten, of London, has set himself the task of compiling a Dictionary of Cant and Slang—an amusing volume to the uninitiated, though perhaps not so welcome to the professional rogue, whose "mystery" it lays bare. As the thieves' cant is founded upon English, it may seem to some that any ingenious person might unravel it without Mr. Hotten's assistance. To such we have the pleasure of presenting the following communication, written by a "chaunter," an English vendor of street ballads, to a gentleman who had taken some interest in his welfare:

DEAR FRIEND,—Excuse the liberty, since i saw you last i have not earned a thickun, we have had such a Dowry of Parny that it completely Stumped or Coopered Drory the Bossman's Patter therefore i am broke up and not having another friend but you i wish to know if you would lend me the price of 2 Gross of Tops, Dies, or Croaks, which is 7 shillings, of the above-mentioned worthy and Sarah Chesham the Essex Burick for the Poisoning job, they are both to be topped at Springfield Sturaban on Tuesday next. i hope you will oblige me if you can for it will be the means of putting a Quid or a James in my Clye. i will call at your Carser on Sunday Evening next for an answer, for i want a Speel on the Drum as soon as possible. hoping you and the family are All Square, I remain Your obedient Servant.

Without a glossary it would be difficult to make out the meaning of this letter, though it is pretty simple.*

Mr. Hotten assures us that in all languages the thieves and beggars have their jargon; and certainly as the policeman is nearly as universal as the thief in this over-civilized world of ours, the poor persecuted fraternity of pirates, by land and water, have occasion for all the defenses they can muster. In French, the secret language of thieves and cut-throats is called argot. The Spanish thief calls his private tongue Germania,

* The writer, a street chaunter of ballads and last dying speeches, alludes in his letter to two celebrated criminals—Thos. Drory, the murderer of Jael Denny, and Sarah Chesham, who poisoned her husband, accounts of whose trials and "horrid deeds" he had been selling. Below is a glossary of the Cant words:

Thickun , a crown-piece.	Topped , hung.
Dowry of Parny , a lot of rain.	Sturaban , a prison.
Stumped , bankrupt.	Quid , a sovereign.
Coopered , spoiled.	James , " "
Bossman , a farmer.	Clye , a pocket.
Patter , trial.	Carser , a house or residence.
Tops , last dying speeches.	Speel on the Drum , to be off to the country.
Dies , " "	All Square , all right, or quite well.
Croaks , " "
Burick , a woman.

holding that gipsies and other loose fellows came from Germany; the German robber uses what he calls Roth-wälsch, pointing to his conviction that thieves came from Italy. In Malta and other places in the Mediterranean they use a mongrel tongue called Lingua Franca, which is, as it were, the universal or court language of the looser part of society. The Lazaroni and the Italian brigands use a secret jargon which they call Gergo; and we are assured that even the Hottentots have a set of parasites and vagabonds, with a peculiar lingo called cuze-cot.

In the language of the English rogue, to cant has meant "to speak" for more than three hundred years. It came, doubtless, from chaunt; the professional beggar, and the amateur who turns from thieving to begging for a change, or for a purpose, have always found their account, in England, in singing for the street public. A chaunter—a canter—was a street-ballad singer, one of a tribe not yet extinct. A writer of the 16th century mentions that the beggars and gipsies "have devised a language among themselves, which they name Canting, or Pedlar's Frenche." In more recent times this has been known as St. Giles's Greek.

Mr. Hotten is careful to distinguish between cant and slang as very different: a thief in cant language would term a horse a prancer or a prad; while in slang a man of fashion would speak of it as a bit of blood, or a spanker, or a neat tit. A handkerchief, too, would be a billy, a fogle, or a kent rag, in the secret language of low characters; while among vulgar persons, or those who ape their speech, it would be called a rag, a wipe, or a clout. He points out that a number of words which have crept into our language, or are used by the English canters, are of Gipsy origin. Thus bamboozle is Gipsy, and means there to perplex or mislead by hiding; bosh is Gipsy; gad means wife, in that tongue—in ours it applies more narrowly to a woman with a sharp tongue. Gibberish is the name of the Gipsy language; with us it is applied to unmeaning collocations of words.

But the thieves' jargon being an unwritten tongue, has greatly changed in the last three hundred years—so much so that Mr. Hotten tells us the modern "Greeks" of St. Giles could not understand much of the old cant, and would be puzzled to guess the meaning of many of the older canting songs, as that famous one of which the following is a verse:

"Bing out, bien Morts, and toure and toure,
Bing out, bien Morts, and toure:
For all your duds are bing'd awast;
The bien cove hath the loure."*

But it is curious to remark that in the old cant are some words which look akin to some others now in common English use. For instance, boogit signified basket; it is no longer used in the thieves' jargon; but it reminds us of our word budget, a parcel, which Worcester derives from the French. So cofe was, in the old slang, a man; gentry cofe, a gentle man; gentry cofe's ken, a gentle man's house. From cofe we have cove, a slang term for a man; but may it not also be the origin of the word coffee, which is applied to the negro?

In Thomas Harman's Canting Dictionary, published in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and embodied in this later work by Mr. Hotten, we find these and some other amusing words and phrases. Harman gives the term freshe-water-mariners, saying, "These kind of caterpillars counterfet great losses on the sea: their shippes were drowned in the playne of Salisbury."—"Prigger of prouncers," he says, "be horse-stealers, for to prigge signifieth in their language to steale, and a prouncer is a horse; so, being put together, the matter was playn." He concludes his description of this order of "pryggers" by noting, "I had the best gelding stolen out of my pasture, that I had amongst others, whyle this book was first a printing." It is not often that a lexicographer can justify a definition by such a personal experience.

All languages and all jargons seem to have been laid under contribution to furnish the English thieves' cant. Argot, the name by which they call it, is from the French. Booze, a house, comes from the Dutch buysen. Domine, a parson, is from the Spanish. Donna and feeles, a woman and children, is from the Latin; and don, a clever fellow, has been filched from the Lingua Franca, or bastard Italian; while duds, the vulgar term for clothes, may have been pilfered either from the Gaelic or the Dutch. Feele, a daughter, from the French; and frow, a girl or wife, from the German—are common tramps' terms. So gent, silver, is from the French argent; and vial, a country town, also from the French. Horrid-horn, a fool, is believed to be from the Erse; and gloak, a man, from the Scotch. Mayhew says: "There are several Hebrew terms in our cant language, obtained, it would appear, from the intercourse of the thieves with the Jew fences (receivers of stolen goods); many of the cant terms, again, are Sanscrit, got from the gipsies; many Latin, got by the beggars from the Catholic prayers before the Reformation; and many, again, Italian, got from the wandering musicians and others; indeed, the showmen have but lately introduced a number of Italian phrases into their cant language." The Hindostanee also contributes several words, which have been introduced by the Lascar sailors.

Moreover, the English thieves' jargon has preserved many words of English which were formerly in common and respectable use, but are now dropped from the Dictionaries as low or vulgar. Mr. Hotten has made a curious collection of such words, which would now, but did not once, shock ears polite: "A young gentleman from Belgravia, who had lost his watch or his pocket-handkerchief, would scarcely remark to his mamma that it had been boned—yet bone, * Which, literally translated, means:

"Go out, good girls, and look and see,
Go out, good girls, and see;
For all your clothes are carried away,
And the good man has the money."

in old times, meant, among high and low, to steal. A young lady living in the precincts of dingy but aristocratic May-Fair, although enraptured with Jenny Lind or Ristori, would hardly think of turning back in the box to inform papa that she made no bones of it; yet the phrase was most respectable and well-to-do before it met with a change of circumstances. 'A crack article,' however first-rate, would, as far as speech is concerned, have greatly displeased Dr. Johnson and Mr. Walker; yet both crack, in the sense of excellent, and crack up, to boast or praise, were not considered vulgarisms in the time of Henry VIII. Dodge, a cunning trick, is from the Anglo-Saxon; and ancient nobles used to 'get each other's dander up' before appealing to their swords—quite flabbergasting (also a respectable old word) the half score of lookers-on with the thumps and cuts of their heavy weapons. *Gallavanti*g, waiting upon the ladies, was as polite in expression as in action; while a clergyman at Paule's Crosse thought nothing of bidding a noisy hearer 'hold his gab,' or 'shut up his gob.' Gadding, roaming about in an idle and 'trapesing' manner, was used in an old translation of the Bible; and 'to do any thing gingerly' was to do it with great care. The great Lord Bacon spoke of the lower part of a man's face as his gills." Shakspeare has preserved many such words, which he now enjoys in communing with costermongers and others of the lower sort. Thus, "clean gone," in the sense of out of sight; "it won't fade," or suit; "I'll make him buckle under."

There is a limited literature of the thieves' jargon, of which an example, in the shape of a tailor's advertisement, is subjoined. This we take from Mr. G. W. Matsell's "Rogue's Lexicon":

"WILLIAM BRISTOL, whose chant used to be Bristol Bill, wishes to nose his old pals, and the public generally, that he has tied up priggings, and is now squaring it at No. 350 Back Hill, Hatten Garden, where he keeps on hand, for ready cole—tick being no go—upper benjamins, built on a downy plan; slap-up velveteen togs, lined with the same broady; moleskin ditto, any color, lined with the same broady; kerseymere kicksies, any color, built very slap with the artful dodge; stout cord ditto, built in the 'Melton Mowbray' style; broad cord ditto, made very saucy; moleskin, all colors, built hankyspanky, with double fakement down the side, and artful buttons at the bottom; stout ditto, built very serious. Out and out fancy sleeve kicksies, cut to drop down on the trotters. Waist benjamins, cut long, with moleskin back and sleeves. Blue cloth ditto, cut slap-up. Mud-pipes, knee-caps, and trotter-cases, built very low.

"A decent allowance made to Seedy Swells, Tea Kettle Purgers, Head Robbers, and Flunkeys out of Collar.—N.B. Gentlemen finding their own Broady can be accommodated."

The uninitiated reader would find some difficulty in deciphering the above, and we subjoin, therefore, a translation of it:

"WILLIAM BRISTOL, formerly known as Bristol Bill, wishes to inform his old friends, and the public generally, that he has given up stealing, and is now getting his living honestly, at 350 Back Hill, Hatten Garden, where he keeps on hand for ready money, overcoats of a superior style and pattern; superior velveteen coats, lined with the same material; moleskin, any color, lined with the same stuff; kerseymere knee-breeches, any color, made very fashionable, with the yellow neckhandkerchief included; cord ditto, made in the 'Melton Mowbray' style; broad cord ditto, made the top of the fashion; moleskins, of all colors, made in the latest fashion, with double stripes down the side, and buttons at the bottom; stout ditto, very strongly made. Waistcoats, cut long-waisted, with moleskin back and sleeves. Blue cloth ditto, fashionably cut. Gaiters, leggins, boots, and shoes, made very reasonable.

"An allowance made to poor men of fashion, men who exchange old clothes, butlers, and footmen out of place.—N.B. Gentlemen finding their own materials can be accommodated."

But, besides this, there are hieroglyphic signs, well understood by the whole fraternity, and used by the noble order of "tramps"—which includes, in England, beggars, peddlers, "fresh-water mariners," sneaks, and thieves of the humbler and less enterprising kind. These marks may be seen on corners of streets, on door-posts, and on house-steps; they inform the succeeding vagrants of all they require to know; and a few white scratches may say, "Be importunate," or "Pass on." A writer in Notes and Queries remarks, on this subject: "Every door or passage is pregnant with instruction as to the error committed by the patron of beggars; the beggar-marks show that a system of freemasonry is followed, by which a beggar knows whether it will be worth his while to call into a passage or knock at a door. Let any one examine the entrances to the passages in any town, and there he will find chalk marks unintelligible to him, but significant enough to beggars. If a thousand towns are examined, the same marks will be found at every passage entrance. The passage mark is a cipher with a twisted tail: in some cases the tail projects into the passage, in others outwardly; thus seeming to indicate whether the houses down the passage are worth calling at or not. Almost every door has its marks: these are varied. In some cases there is a cross on the brick-work, in others a cipher: the figures 1, 2, 3, are also used. Every person may for himself test the accuracy of these statements by the examination of the brick-work near his own doorway—thus demonstrating that mendicancy is a regular trade, carried out upon a system calculated to save time and realize the largest profits." An English "tramp" described to Mayhew the method of "working" a small town. He said: "Two hawkers (pals) go together, but separate when they enter a village, one taking each side of the road, and selling different things; and in order to inform each other as to the character of the people at whose houses they call, they chalk certain marks on their door-posts."

The English love of system has indeed turned begging into an industry. It is a trade or occupation; as such, it is followed by thousands; and they avail themselves very ingeniously of labor-saving devices. Thus in many cases, over the kitchen mantle-piece of a thieves' lodging-house, is hung a map of the district, marked with certain signs which denote failure or success in mendicant applications. Mr. Hotten has been so fortunate as to procure one of these charts, of the district of Maidstone, in Kent, which we copy on this page, with the explanations given of the marks or hieroglyphics. Who " $\frac{3}{4}$  Sarah" is, or what relation this mysterious and homely creature has to the district, Mr. Hotten was unable to ascertain.

When no artist appears to make a map for the fraternity, Mayhew tells us that the "walks" are described in writing. "In almost every one of the padding-kens, or low lodging-houses, in the country, there is a list of walks pasted up over the kitchen mantle-piece. At St. Albans, for instance, at the —, and at other places, there is a paper stuck up in each of the kitchens. This paper is headed, 'Walks out of this Town,' and underneath it are set down the names of the villages in the neighborhood at which a beggar may call when out on his walk, and they are so arranged as to allow the cadger to make a round of about six miles each day, and return the same night. In many of these papers there are sometimes twenty walks set down. No villages that are in any way 'gam-my' [bad] are ever mentioned in these lists; and the cadger, if he feels inclined to stop for a few days in the town, will be told by the lodging-house keeper, or the other cadgers that he may meet there, what gentlemen's seats or private houses are of any account on the walk that he means to take. The names of the good houses are not set down in the paper for fear of the police." This custom appears to be very old; it was noticed by English writers three hundred years ago. The communication by signal reaches even to the gallows. The display of a red handkerchief by the "sufferer" is a token that he has not betrayed any professional secrets.

The origin of the mark of direction, the third in the list given below, is explained by the following paragraph in an English "Constable's Guide:" "Gipsies follow their brethren by numerous marks, such as strewing handfuls of grass in the day time at a four-lane or cross-roads: the grass being strewn down the road the gang have taken; also, by a cross being made on the ground with a stick or knife—the longest end of the cross denoting the route taken. In the night time a cleft stick is placed in the fence at the cross-roads, with an arm pointing down the road their comrades have taken. The marks are always placed on the left-hand side, so that the stragglers can easily and readily find them." It is curious to learn that the publication of these hieroglyphics has enabled some persons to escape the importunities of beggars. A clergyman writes that by himself marking the characters □ (Gammy) and ⊙ (Flummuxed) on the gate-posts of his parsonage, he enjoys a singular immunity from alms-seekers and cadgers on the tramp.

Mr. Hotten has some amusing paragraphs about slang, which he separates entirely from thieves' jargon. Slang is low English; and the English are perhaps the most slangy of civilized nations—though they accuse us Americans of being their masters in this art of indirect expression. If we speak of our President as "Uncle Abe," they call their Queen "Little Vic," their Prime Minister "Pam," the leader of the Opposition "Dizzy;" and every grade of society in England, if we may believe Mr. Hotten, has its own peculiar slang. In English politics, for instance, a plumper is a single vote at an election—not a split-ticket; and electors who have occupied a house, no matter how small, and boiled a pot in it, thus qualifying them-

EXPLANATION OF THE HIEROGLYPHICS.

- NO GOOD; too poor. and know too much.
- STOP—if you have what they want, they will buy. They are pretty "fly" (knowing).
- GO IN THIS DIRECTION, it is better than the other road. Nothing that way.
- BONE (good). Safe for a "cold tatur," if for nothing else. "Cheese your pater" (don't talk much) here.
- COOPER'D (spoiled), by too many tramps calling there
- GAMMY (unfavorable), likely to have you taken up. Mind the dog.
- FLUMMUXED (dangerous), sure of a month in quod (prison).
- RELIGIOUS, but tidy on the whole.

selves for voting, are termed pot-wallopers. A quiet walk over is a re-election without opposition and much cost. A caucus meeting refers to the private assembling of politicians before an election, when candidates are chosen and measures of action agreed upon. This term originated in America. A job, in political phraseology, is a government office or contract obtained by secret influence or favoritism. Only the other day the London Times spoke of "the patriotic member of Parliament potted out in a dusty little lodging somewhere about Bury Street." The term quockerwodger, although referring to a wooden toy figure which jerks its limbs about when pulled by a string, has been supplemented with a political meaning: a pseudo-politician, one whose strings of action are pulled by somebody else, is now often termed a quockerwodger. The term rat, too, in allusion to rats deserting vessels about to sink, has long been employed toward those turn-coat politicians who change their party for interest. Stout or careful members of Parliament shout to the cabmen on the rank, "Four-wheeler!" meaning a four-wheeled cab.

There is university slang, religious slang, and military, which is synonymous with dandy slang. In this last, inconvenient friends, or elderly and lecturing relatives, are pronounced dreadful bores. Four-wheeled cabs are called bounders; and a member of the Four-in-hand Club, driving to Epsom on the Derby Day, would, using fashionable phraseology, speak of it as tooling his drag down to the Derby. A vehicle, if not a drag (or dwag), is a trap, or a cask; and if the turn out happens to be in other than a trim condition, it is pronounced at once as not down the road. The cockney swell would say it is not up to the mark; while the costermonger would call it very dickey. In the British army a barrack or military station is known as a lobster-box; to "cram" for an examination is to mug-up; to reject from the examination is to spin; and that part of the barrack occupied by subalterns is frequently spoken of as the rookery. In dandy slang any celebrity, from Paul Bedford to the Pope of Rome, is a swell. Wrinkled-faced old professors, who hold dress and fashionable tailors in abhorrence, are called awful swells—if they happen to be very learned or clever; a title is termed a handle; trousers, inexpressibles, or, when of a large pattern, or the inflated Zouave cut, howling bags; a superior appearance, extensive; a four-wheeled cab, a bird-cage; a dance, a hop; dining at another man's table, "sitting under his mahogany;" any thing flashy or showy, loud; the peculiar make or cut of a coat, its build; full-dress, full-fig; wearing clothes which represent the very extreme of fashion, "dressing to death;" a reunion, a spread; a friend (or a "good fellow"), a trump.

On the English Stock Exchange, "breaking shins" means borrowing money; "rigging the market" is playing tricks with it; a "stag" is a speculator without money; bank-notes are called "long-tailed ones," and also "flimsies;" a monkey is £500; a "plum" is £100,000; and a million sterling is called a "marygold." Money, in its various shapes, is known by not less than one hundred and thirty slang terms in England. Specie is called beans or blunt—to distinguish it from stiff, and rags, which mean bank-notes; brads, brass, bustle, coppers, chunk, chinkers, chips, corks, dibbs, dinarly, dimmock, dust, feathers, gent (silver—from argent), haddock (a purse of money), horse nails, loaver, lour (the oldest cant term for money), mopusses, needful, nobbings (money collected in a hat by street-performers), ochre (gold), pewter, palm-oil, posh, Queen's pictures, quids, ready, or ready gilt, redge (gold), rhino, rowdy, shiners (sovereigns), skin (a purse of money), stiff (paper, or bill of acceptance), stuff, stumpy, tin (silver), wedge (silver), and yellow boys (sovereigns). So attentive is slang speech to financial matters, that there are seven terms for bad, or "bogus" coin. Bogus, by-the-way, is American slang. A case is a counterfeit five-shilling piece; half a case represents half that sum; grays are half-pence made double for gambling purposes; queer-soft is counterfeit or lead coin; schofel refers to coated or spurious coin; sheen is bad money of any description; and sinkers bears the same and not inappropriate meaning. Flying the kite, or obtaining money on bills and promissory notes, is closely connected with the allegorical expression of raising the wind. In winter or in summer any elderly gentleman who may have prospered in life is pronounced warm; while an equivalent is immediately at hand in the phrase, "his pockets are well lined."

Each separate piece of money has its own slang term, and often half a score of synonyms. To begin with a farthing: first there is fudge, then fiddler, then gig, and lastly quartern. A half-penny is a brown or a madza saltee (cant), or a mag, or a posh, or a rap—whence the popular phrase, "I don't care a rap." The penny has for slang equivalents a copper, a saltee (cant), and a winn. Two-pence is a deuce; and three-pence is either a thrums or a thrups. Four-pence, or a groat, may in vulgar speech be termed a bit, a flag, or a joey. Six-pence is well represented in street talk, and some of the slang substitutes are very comical—for instance, bandy, bender, cripple, and downer; then fye-buck, half a hog, kick (thus, "two and a kick," 2s. 6d.), lord of the manor, pig, pot (the price of a pot of beer—thus half a crown is a "five pot piece"), snid, sprat, sow's baby, tanner, tester, tizzy—sixteen vulgar words to one coin. Seven-pence, being an uncommon amount, has only one slang synonym, setter. The same remarks apply to eight-pence and nine-pence, the former being only represented by otter, and the latter by the cant phrase nobba-saltee. Ten-pence is dacha-saltee, and eleven-pence dacha-one—both cant expressions. One shilling boasts eleven slang equivalents; thus we have beong, bob, breaky-leg, deaner, gen (either from argent, silver, or the back slang), hog, levy—a word which made its way to this country, and was formerly used in Pennsylvania and Ohio for the old twelve-and-a-half-cent piece; the "long bit" of New Orleans—peg, stag, tevis, and twelver. One shilling and six-pence is a ky-bosh. Half a crown is known as an alderman, half a bull, half a tusheroon, and a madza caroon; while a crown piece, or five shillings, may be called either a bull, or a caroon, or a cart-wheel, or a coach-wheel, or a thick-un, or a tusheroon. The next advance in slang money is ten shillings, or half a sovereign, which may be either pronounced as half a bean, half a couter, a madza poona, or half a quid. A sovereign, or twenty shillings, is a bean, canary, couter, foont, goldfinch, James, poona, portrait, quid, a thick-un, or a yellow-boy. Guineas are nearly obsolete, yet the terms neds, and half-neds, are still in use. Bank-notes are flimsies, long-tailed ones, or soft. A finuf is a five-pound note.

Mr. Hotten suggests that many of these slang terms bear the mark of their mintage; they came from the work-shops: thus brads, from the ironmonger; chips, from the carpenter; dust, from the goldsmith; feathers, from the upholsterer; horse-nails from the farrier; had-dock, from the fishmonger; and tanner, from the leather-dresser. Here the object itself is called by the name of an article which procures it. A tailor, by-the-way, is called by the collegians and "fast" men a "sufferer"—a very significant term. Intoxication, in its various forms, has also a number of slang synonyms. Thus to be mildly drunk is to be beery, bemused, boozy, bosky, buffy, corned, foggy, fou, fresh, hazy, elevated, kisky, lushy, moony, muggy, muzzy, on, screwed, stewed, tight, and winey. A higher or more intense state of intoxication is represented by the expressions podgy, bearger, blued, cut, primed, lumpy, plowed, muddled, obfuscated, swipey, three sheets in the wind, and top-heavy. But the climax of fuddlement is only obtained when the disguised individual can't see a hole in a ladder, or when he is all mops and brooms, or off his nut, or with his main-brace well spliced, or with the sun in his eyes, or when he has lapped the gutter, and got the gravel rash, or is on the rantan, or on the re-raw, or when he is sewed up, or regularly scammered—then, and not till then, is he entitled, in vulgar society, to the title of lushington or recommended to put in the pin. We can add but one slang phrase to Mr. Hotten's collection; in New England it is sometimes said of a tipsy fellow that he "has been to see his uncle."

Shakspeare was well read in the slang of his day. Falstaff abounds in slang, more witty than is commonly heard in these days; and the plays are a mine of old slang. But the other and later play-wrights were adepts as well. Thus, an Abram-Man was a wandering beggar; but Beaumont and Fletcher give a number of curious synonyms for this phrase:

"And these, what name or title e'er they bear,
Jarkman, or Patrico, Cranke, or Clapper-dudgeon,
Frater, or Abram-Man; I speak to all
That stand in fair election for the title
Of king of beggars."

A few specimens of the jargon in which rogues delight to speak will give the reader some notion of the humor of these "lewd fellows of a baser sort." Poor soft cheese is called beeswax; a large foot is a beetle-crusher; food is grub, or belly-timber; a "Bible-carrier" is a person who sells songs, but does not sing them. The generic term for handkerchief is wipe; but eleven different phrases describe as many different patterns of this indispensable article: a Billy, or fogle, is a silk handkerchief; a clout, one of cotton; a Bird's-eye wipe, is one with a darkish-blue ground, and large round white spots, with a spot in the centre of darker blue than the ground. This was adopted by Jim Belcher, the pugilist, and soon became popular among "the fancy." It is also called a Belcher, a handkerchief much patronized by Sam Weller, Senior, if we may believe Mr. Dickens. Then there is the Blood-red fancy, which is red; the Blue-billy, blue ground with white spots; the Cream-fancy, any pattern on a white ground; the Green-king's-man, any pattern on a green ground; the Randal's-man, green, with white spots, named after Jack Randal, pugilist; the Water's-man, sky-colored; the Yellow-fancy, yellow, with white spots; the Yellow-man, all yellow.

A bloke is a cove, and a cove is a man. "The bloke with the jasey" means the Judge; jasey signifying wig. A policeman is called a blue-bottle. The term buffer, which is now common slang, and means a jolly good fellow, has a curious origin. It is probably from the French bouffard—a clown or fool; but in the middle of the last century a buffer was, according to one of the dramatists of that day, "a rogue who killed good sound horses, for the sake of their skins, by running a long wire into them." A buster is a small loaf of bread; a man goes into a low beer-shop for lunch, and calls for "a penn'orth of beeswax and a two-penny buster." The term "fast," as "a fast young man," Mr. Hotten describes as an Americanism, which has taken root in England, where they now have not only fast men but fast young women. Of the latter our author has a story which certainly shows that the young British female may be an adept in slang. It is of a bishop's daughter, now living, who was skilled in horses:—Being desirous of ascertaining the opinion of a candidate for ordination, who had the look of a bird of the same feather, as to the merits of some cattle just brought to her father's palace for her to select from, she was assured by him they were utterly unfit for a lady's use. With a knowing look at the horses' points, she gave her opinion in these choice words, "Well, I agree with you; they are a rum lot, as the devil said of the ten commandments." Dickens wittily remarked that, when applied to men, the words fast and loose are synonymous.

To drain is to drink; hot gin and beer, spiced, is called flannel; brandy and port-wine mixed is flesh and blood; and beer is gatter, a shant of gatter being a pot of beer. In Australia, which has a peculiar slang of its own, what is in England called a "go," and here a "drain" or "drink," is spoken of as a "nobbler." A lady's veil is known as a midge-net; to milvader a man is to beat him; paw-cases are gloves.

By-the-way, the misuse of the word "allow," which is common in the South and West—as, "he allowed he would go to-morrow," "he allowed he would give me a dollar," is of English origin. It is used, for instance, in an old-folk rhyme, "Tom Clodpole's Journey to London:"

"He 'lowed he'd gi' me half a crown,
And treat me wud sum beer,
If I wud make it up wud him,
And let un go off clear."

PLEASANT VALLEY AND DEACON MARVIN.

"How dear to this heart are the scenes of my childhood,
When fond recollection presents them to view!"

MY earliest recollections cluster around the beauties of Pleasant Valley. It is one of the loveliest spots on the borders of Long Island Sound, within thirty miles of New London. It seemed very lovely to my childish eyes long time ago. But that proves nothing as to its beauty. Every school-boy, every urchin, admires and loves the scenes of his early fun and frolic, and sees Heaven itself reflected in every pool or puddle on which his chip boat floats, or in which his naked feet have paddled. Were we as wise and clear-sighted in our manhood as we were in our youth, we should all our lives long discover in like manner the image of celestial beauty, of all that is fair and bright in the firmament above, smiling upward to our appreciative glance from every fountain by life's dusty way-side, and every dew-drop that sparkles on the grass beneath our feet. I have seen Pleasant Valley with the eyes of both manhood and youth; and at my last visit, made after an absence of half a lifetime, it looked lovelier than ever. Not from its associations merely; not because it was

"The school-boy spot

We ne'er forget, though we are there forgot;"

not because of childish day-dreams and time-hallowed reminiscences; not because I there first learned to love—to love the delights of home, and "the mother who watched o'er my childhood," and the father who stood instead of God to my young mind, and breathed into me that breath of intellectual life which made me truly a living soul, and the bright, unbroken circle of sisters and brothers, long since become a memory only, and the crowd of school-mates and playmates who people the play-grounds of my young memory; and the bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked girls—the sweet Marys, and Almiras, and Mildreds, and Phebes, and Lucindas, who awakened in my worshipping heart its first dim notions of an affection still more tender and warm—not merely because of these did Pleasant Valley look lovelier in 1863 than it did in 1816, but also because it really was, and is, as its name would indicate, a charming spot, and of itself worthy to be visited, admired, described, and celebrated in song—lovely enough to inspire the poet's wish to "Gar our streams and burnies shine Up wi' the best;"

and my eyes long trained to the observation and study of natural beauty, were here delighted by a hundred sylvan charms, so that both taste and memory combined to fill my mind with gratification.

The name of Pleasant Valley was worthily bestowed upon this spot nearly two hundred years ago by some adventurous settler who pushed out westwardly from Pequot along the margin of "the Sound," and paused here in the glorious sunset of a summer afternoon to regale his eyes with its delightful scenery.

A lively little stream serpentine through the Valley, bounded on the west by graceful hills whose feet dip gently into its sparkling water, and on the east by bluffs of wild and picturesque beauty. All which fertile field and meadow—all that rude and rocky precipices, wooded slopes, flourishing orchards, and fields of green or golden grain; and all that babbling brook and murmuring cascade can contribute to the varied beauty of the scene may be found and admired in this Valley of Delights.

Here too abound the softening and refining touches of human industry and taste—the impress of successive generations of inhabitants—an intelligent and pious race, as substantial dwellings, and pretty cottages, meeting-houses, and school-houses, those inseparable companions in every New England village, most clearly demonstrate.

How much, it is really surprising and delightful to notice—how much remains almost unchanged in the aspect of the Valley, although so long an interval has passed since my last visit! There lies the village green in whose centre stood "the whipping-post," and around whose margin there stood and stand the churches, the school-house, the village shops, and the houses of the squire and parson, with the old familiar look of 1816. The whipping-post, to be sure, has disappeared from the village green. But even in 1816 it was a "whipping-post" only in name, serving merely as a peaceable bulletin-board, whereon were posted probate notices and vendue advertisements. The old well, just opposite the post, whose well-curb, post, sweep, pole, and bucket I saw caught up like cobwebs by the great September gale of 1815, and whirled aloft until they vanished in the clouds—the old well has been filled up, and no longer furnishes cooling draughts from "the old oaken bucket," to thirsty boys and girls who come rushing out at "recess" from the adjacent school-house. Alas for the rash innovator who was not here content "to let well alone!" But the school-house—no, not the, but a school-house, yet stands on the old familiar spot, and its appearance summons up a troop of curious recollections. On the very school-ground where I used to play ball are now visible the foot-marks of the same old games: "one old cat," and "two old cat," and "base ball," and "prison base," and "pi-son," and "gould," and "tag," and "I spy." "Goodness gracious!" how I would like to jump out of my buggy, and try my hands and legs over again at those boyish sports, the very recollection of which "puts life and mettle in my heels." And here is the bridge across the brook beyond the school-house, over which goes the road to Smith Hill. Over that bridge how often have I watched the pretty feet of pretty Charlotte Smith on her way to school! Dear little lisping Charlotte! how I loved to hear you read, the "Ode on Solitude" was it? in "Murray's English Reader," beginning

"O thou, the nymph with plathid eye, Though theldom found, yet ever nigh."

Oh, Charlotte, Charlotte! where now are those pretty feet, and where is now thy sweet, bewitching lisp, and yet more bewitching smile of lip and eye? "Eheu fugaces!"

By the side of the bridge once stood, but no longer stands, a "hatter's shop"—Hurlbut's hatter's shop—and back of that was a deep hole, or pool, in the brook—a sort of aneurismic or varicose development of the stream, forming a natural baptistry, in which the holy ordinance of immersion was oftime administered by good "Elder" Palmer, or some other Baptist minister of that day. "That day" was a day of religious intolerance in Connecticut, when every other sect and denomination of Christians was taxed, and compelled to pay taxes, for the support of the Presbyterian, or "Standing Order." I speak now of a period that ended with the year 1818, and not of the epoch of "toleration," the beginning of religious equality, which came in with the Constitution and the "toleration ticket" of that year. The Baptists and baptisms of Pleasant Valley were sneered at by the stiff-backed Presbyterians, and many were the affronts, indignities, and wrongs heaped upon Elder Palmer and his Baptist brethren. This pool recalls one of them distinctly to mind. Several persons were immersed here one summer Sunday afternoon by that godly man. The sacrament of baptism had been witnessed by a motley multitude of persons, old and young, male and female, devout and impious, decent and disorderly. A parcel of noisy boys, of Presbyterian families, occupied a part of the bridge just above the pool, misbehaving in various ways, and at last throwing a dog into the water just as one of the candidates was led down into the pool by the officiating clergyman. (I have great comfort in recollecting that I "thrashed" one of those boys the next day in such thorough style that he ever after remembered at least one Baptist with becoming respect.) On the following night Elder Palmer's barn was broken open, his "chaise" taken out and drawn down to the bridge, and then cast, like the dog, into the very middle of the pool, where it was discovered on Monday morning by the hatters at Hurlbut's shop. But enough of these disagreeable reminiscences. Let me turn to more amusing topics.

Just across the brook, on that little peninsula, where you now see a group of lofty sycamores, there stood in my school-boy days a grove of slender saplings—the self-same growth that stands there now: but while I have grown old they have followed my example, and are now huge trees. Imagine me and a dozen other youngsters perched like robins, each among the topmost branches of one of those saplings, twenty feet above ground, swinging in great curves through the air, and singing aloud, "Who sees me in this button-ball tree?" enjoying the exercise and the peril, but longing also to be observed and admired for our daring and our agility by travelers along the road. Even then ambition stirred our hearts, and each one of us was impatient to be a man, and every little heart was singing, not in the boyish rhymes just quoted, nor in any other self-conscious words, the Jean Ingelow song:

"I wait for my story; the birds can not sing it,
Not one, as he sits on the tree;
The bells can not ring it, but, long years, O bring it,
Such as I wish it to be!"

Now, speaking of birds brings to mind a certain birds-nesting expedition of my boyhood on yonder rocky ridge, whose perpendicular end juts almost into the brook, and whose precipitous southern walls impend for nearly a mile, like the battlements of some huge fortress, over the road to Niantic. The summit of that ridge was then, and now is, clothed with wood, and furnished a cover for countless birds, whose nests we boys regarded as lawful spoil, and whose eggs as our legitimate prey. Some feeble attempts to restrain our egg-hunting propensities, on the ground of compassion for the parent bird, were scoffingly met by our recommendation to "pity the pullets and old hens," whose nests we were taught and commanded to discover, and all whose eggs, excepting the "nest-egg," we were ordered to bring home. So, when importuned by mother or sister to pity Mrs. Robin or Madame Blue Jay, we answered, "Oh yes, we will; we'll leave 'em all a 'nest-egg!'" And we invariably did, not so much out of mercy as out of policy, leave one egg in every rifled nest, in the expectation that the female bird would thereto lay the full complement required for a legitimate incubation.

It happened on one occasion that a boy kinsman of ours, whom we somewhat inaccurately called "Cousin Elf" (that being "the short" for Eliphaz), came from a distance to make us a visit in the very nick of time for birds-nesting. Never shall I forget that visit and the consequent raid on the feathered tribe which occupied Mount Mather. "Res magna erat." It was "a big thing." Robin and "brown thrasher," cat-bird and king-bird, bobolink and redwing, firehang-bird and sparrow, and many another fowl of the air had reason to remember that day. The number of eggs that we brought home was something quite unparalleled in the various and ovarious statistics of Pleasant Valley. They were measured rather than counted, and by measure they just filled the biggest hind pocket of Cousin "Elf." He had been endowed with all our earnings, and our homeward march was a complete ovation. Elf's pocket and all of our hearts were full as we entered the house and rushed up stairs to "mother's room" to announce our splendid success. But alas! in our precipitancy we rushed to destruction—from eggs to ill-luck (a free translation). Elf's pocket was dashed against a chair, every egg was smashed, while shell, and yolk, and white were mingled in one conglomerated chaos, from one rash plunge into which Elf's fingers were withdrawn in a state not to be described of dripping viscosity and gelatinous abomination. After a minute of speechless grief and horror the fun of the thing burst upon our imagination, and then ensued a concert of laughter of every key, pitch, and tone that goes to make the full diapason of cachinnation, followed by jokes and gibes innumerable upon poor Elf and his dreadful pocket. One of the girls—my sisters—proposed to call him "Cousin Custard," and asked if she had not better grate some nutmeg into his pocket; another suggested that we should drop in a lump of butter, hold him to the fire, and "poach" him; and my oldest brother gravely remarked that a little old Jamaica would convert him into "egg-nog." Elf bore it heroically. But to this day we—those of us who survive—love to joke him on his disappointed "egg-spec-tations."

Usque ad mala"—

A mile or two down stream lies Marvinville, a cluster of shops and dwellings situated in a bend of the brook, and famous in the annals of Pleasant Valley as the scene of Deacon Marvin's life and exploits. He flourished long before my day, and was a very aged man when I was yet below my teens. A hundred anecdotes were current in the neighborhood illustrating his industry, his eccentricity, his awkward shrewdness, and his invariable success in every enterprise to which he turned his mind and hand. Pleasant Valley folks regarded him as one of the world's wonders. He was reputed to be of Scotch descent, and had, as they said, "gumption" enough for a whole clan, although, unlike most Scotchmen, he was so good-natured and serene that nothing ever seemed to disturb the stagnant pool of his sensibilities. Pachydermatous as a rhinoceros, and sagacious as an elephant, you could neither take him in, nor irritate him, neither outwit nor annoy, neither gull in trade, humbug by a "sell," nor disturb by a practical joke. If assailed by wit or ridicule he usually repelled the attack by his apparent insensibility, though now and then he surprised you by a return blow so sharp, sudden, and unexpected, that you were prostrate before you beheld the movement; and by the time you recovered your powers of observation, he had regained his wonted stolidity so utterly as to make you doubt whether the coup had come from him.

Deacon Marvin, at the age of thirty, was a farmer, a tanner, and a shoemaker. On the bench (the shoemaker's bench) he wore his leather apron with as much gravity as ever "Me Lud" Chancellor wore his robes on the wool-sack. Among his tan-vats and in his corn-fields, at home and abroad, every where and always, he was the same solemn incarnation of awkward good-nature; every where and always industrious, quiet, sober, and earnest. In religious matters he was as diligent and devoted as he was in secular affairs. His worldly employments were as much a devotion as were his spiritual, and his piety was as thoroughly industrious as was his money-making. The one mode of devotion soon made him rich. The other soon made him a deacon. Long days' works earned for him "friends of the mammon of unrighteousness;" and long and laborious prayers and exhortations established him on a firm basis as a pillar in the church, and the odor of sanctity gave fragrance even to his filthy lucre.

There are men that Nature manifestly designed for Presbyterian deacons—native deacons "to the manor (manner) born." Their parents are church-members, whose children being baptized after the fashion of that church, which finds a handful of water a sufficient Jordan for a whole generation of communicants, are, by the virtue of "the half-way covenant," admitted when infants within the holy pale of membership. Of these privileged children there is now and then one who takes to his Catechism as kindly as to his mother's milk, and seems to grow and fatten upon texts and doctrines as readily as Hophni and Phinehas did on the priestly perquisites of Eli, without developing any of the evil tendencies that misled those two unfortunate young scions of the Hebrew priesthood. Such a one was Deacon Marvin from his cradle upward. With such it is merely a question of time; and when the time comes he is, as matter of course, officially designated and set apart as deacon. So was it with Marvin; and in his case he would have been thus promoted long before he was but for the fact that he was yet unmarried; and the Presbyterians, remembering Paul's exhortation, "Let your deacons be the husbands of one wife," were reluctant to elect a bachelor to that ecclesiastical office. This difficulty was duly made known to him, and he was kindly asked to remove the stumbling-block by taking to himself a wife. He modestly suggested that, as Deacon Smith already had a wife, there might be a bachelor elected to the second deaconship, and that even Paul would then admit that the "one wife" did exist as an actual fact. But the church were inclined, Elder Mack and some of the brethren smiling at Marvin's queer reply, to insist that the text required and meant "one wife apiece." Mr. Marvin, apparently wondering a little at their smiles, told them he would "take the matter into prayerful consideration."

This promise was known at once all over the parish, as in a country village invariably happens, and it created an immense sensation among the artless Ruths and artful Naomis of Pleasant Valley. It is said that, within a fortnight afterward, the future deacon was called upon as shoemaker to take the measure of every unmarried female foot of Presbyterian ownership between the ages of eighteen and forty in the whole valley; nay, that customers of this description came from the remoter regions of Hamburgh, Brockway's Ferry, Niantic, and Rise Head to be measured for slippers, shoes, overshoes, boots, and moccasins of every kind known in those unsophisticated days to that primitive locality. And it was noticed, not seemingly by Mr. Marvin, but by others more observing, or less careful than he to conceal their observation, that of these candidates for fits a considerable number came more than once—first to be measured, and then to try on, and then a third time to suggest trifling alterations. Within the month Mr. Marvin received fifteen invitations to tea-parties and kindred entertainments, at which he was regaled with every delicacy, solid and fluid, that the housekeepers of Pleasant Valley could invent and produce for his delectation; and it was a curious coincidence that every one of his entertainers had at least one marriageable daughter, and that upon her, the heroine of the evening, the "Cynthia of the minute," was bestowed all the credit of the remarkably light bread, or wonderfully sweet butter, or rich cheese, or toothsome "apple-saas" and "preserves," or crisp "short-cakes," or "flaky" pie-crust, or any other good thing which seemed to attract the regard of this highly-esteemed friend and guest.

These uncommon manifestations of neighborly regard and of friendly feeling were not the only extraordinary phenomena which exhibited themselves about that time to watchful eyes in and around this agitated community. New dresses, new bonnets, new ribbons broke out, like an eruption, all over the parish; and on Sundays the meeting-house was gay with unwonted colors, and attractive with young beauty decorated with fresh and manifold feminine adornments.

Let it not be supposed that Deacon Marvin was all unmoved by this revolutionary excitement. He did not betray any unwonted emotion, but kept on the even tenor of his way just as though every body else were as calm as he himself seemed to be. His mind, however, was deeply moved. As a truly conscientious man he began diligently to inquire "whether or no," to use his favorite formula, "it was the will of the Lord" that he should marry, and if it were, who was the divinely-appointed she? It is now (I speak of more than forty years ago) the village tradition that he actually went, night after night, to a thicket of alders in the river bend behind his house—the house in which he lived with an aged mother—and there knelt down alone beneath the stars, and prayed for divine wisdom to guide him first to a righteous decision, and next to a becoming choice. That tradition is founded partly on the well-known devotional habits of Mr. Marvin, and partly on the testimony of two of the village boys of that period, who testified that, as they were engaged one night on the opposite side of the brook fishing for horn-pouts and "bobbing" for eels, they heard Deacon Marvin earnestly praying as above described. It rather detracted from the credibility of their story that these boys were two of the most ill-behaved scamps in the Valley, and that the prayer, as they repeated or pretended to repeat it, was so very personal and peculiar that no man of ordinary character, and with the average notion of devotional propriety, could be supposed to have addressed it to the Almighty. But, on the whole, omitting divers names of the reigning beauties of the place, and sundry descriptions of their "dough-nuts" and "bunnets," the story was believed. One thing at least is certain—Marvin resolved to marry, and so he informed Elder Mack in season for the next "church meeting," whereat a deacon was to be chosen. Another thing is certain. He determined to marry an individual who had, like himself, seemed to be unmoved by the village disturbance and uproar of which he had been the innocent cause or occasion—an individual who had not ordered from him new shoes, or from milliner or mantua-maker new bonnet, ribbon, or dress; who had neither invited him to her house, nor been invited to meet him elsewhere, and about whom nobody, unless it were Deacon Marvin himself, seemed to have taken any matrimonial thought in this connection. The person thus fixed upon by our hero was a widow lady of about seven-and-twenty, some three years his junior—Widow Becket, who had, after something less than one year of wedlock, lost her husband, and remained for five or six years in mourning for her loss. She was still a very comely young woman; was a member of the same church as the Deacon; was of excellent character; owned and "carried on" with notable skill and discretion a farm of nearly a hundred acres, on which she lived in a very pretty cottage, and was without children. Widow Becket was known to possess some property in the city of New York, which yielded her three or four hundred dollars of annual revenue; and she had the further good fortune to be respected by all who knew her. She did not go much into society, and was rather looked upon as a widow for life. Always in her seat at public worship on Sunday, and generally present at the Friday evening "conference meeting" in the school-house, to which, like most of the housekeepers who came, she brought a candle to help light up that simple sanctuary. Deacon Marvin had, of course, seen her and her modest widow's weeds a thousand times, although no living soul, unless perchance the widow herself, had ever imagined that he bestowed on her a look or a thought. He had seen her, and she had observed that he had seen her. More than this. By some queer process that neither physiologist nor psychologist has ever yet explained or understood, the widow, about the time of that apocryphal prayer among the alders, became conscious—perhaps I ought to say convinced—that she had somehow entered into Deacon Marvin's mind, and that about her image in his breast new and peculiar thoughts, feelings, and fancies were rapidly crystallizing. It might have been one single, momentary, magnetic flash from his eye, unseen by, nay, invisible to, any other person, that gave her this information. If “—— there are looks and words that dart

An instant sunshine through the heart,” so are there lightning-like gleams of intelligence, or rather sparks of knowledge, that convey from one soul to another, in the ten thousandth part of an instant, whole folios of information. One of these sparks had traveled from Deacon Marvin's eyes to Widow Becket's bosom. Each of them was aware of the fact. And I suppose that some responsive electric messenger had, in like manner, found its entrance into the manly breast of Deacon Marvin. But this is conjecture rather than knowledge. What I do know is only this: Deacon Marvin, at the close of a long day's work, which ended as usual with the washing of his hands and face for supper, and was as usual followed by a quiet supper at home, was heard by his mother to exclaim, as if talking to himself, “My stars! the Widow Becket is the very cretur! Thanks be praised, she's ready broken to the yoke!” In about fifteen minutes after this unwonted explosion, Deacon Marvin, with a clean shirt on, his hair nicely brushed, and in his “Sunday suit,” mounted his horse, and rode slowly and gravely over to Widow Becket's house—a distance of nearly two miles—humming, not noisily but audibly, a succession of jolly old “psalm tunes,” like “Wells,” “Mear,” “Bangor,” and “Silver Street,” thereby conforming to the Pauline precept, “If any man be merry let him sing psalms.”

Arriving “about dusk” at the widow's door, he knocked without dismounting. She came to the door so promptly as to indicate that she had either seen or heard him coming.

“Good-evening, Sister Becket,” said Deacon Marvin.

“Good-evening, Brother Marvin,” said the quiet widow. “Won't you get off your horse and come in?”

But instead of answering her question he replied, “Widow Becket, after earnest prayer I have come to the conclusion that it is the will of the Lord that I marry thee!”

The widow had in her hand a lighted candle, and she looked down upon its blaze with a pleasant smile, as she instantly answered,

“The Lord's will be done, Brother Marvin! Won't you tie your horse and come in?”

“Wa'al, I guess I will call for a few minnets,” said he. And so while she held the light he dismounted, fastened his horse by the bridle to a post conveniently near, and then went in. He did not “go in and win,” but he won and went in.

The visit was brief. The wedding-day was fixed—the day, or rather the evening, before the church-meeting for election, on the following week—Marvin took the widow's measure, and then he came away. It is said by his posterity that before going to bed that night he finished for the widow a pair of wedding shoes of white satin covered with silver spangles, and with narrow heels two inches high.

The marriage ceremony was performed very quietly in the evening at the widow's house. The whole town knew, of course, what was to happen, for on the preceding Sunday the widow, dressed for the first time since Captain Becket's death, “in colors,” had sat in old Mrs. Marvin's pew, and the “publishment” had been read by Elder Mack from the pulpit, to the disappointment of all the aforescribed Ruths and Naomis, who now felt vexed at having thrown away so much money on needless shoes, finery, and tea-party entertainments.

After the wedding the Deacon's horse was brought to the door, the Deacon got into the saddle, Mrs. Marvin—no longer Widow Becket—was helped upon the pillion, and as soon as she had secured herself against the possibility of a fall, by passing her plump and well-formed arm around her new husband's waist, the happy couple rode quietly home to old Mrs. Marvin's house, wherein they spent not only their honeymoon, but a series of quiet and happy years.

On the day after the wedding he whom we have been calling Deacon Marvin became a deacon by election, as he had all his life been one by nature. The next Sunday being “Communion Sunday,” Deacon Marvin entered upon the performance of his public duties, acquitting himself, if not gracefully, at least with tolerable decorum, and without any very manifest agitation or embarrassment. His wife did, in after-years, tease, or playfully try to tease, him by pretending that he spilled a little wine in her lap in passing the cup; and the other deacon, it is said, was heard to remark that “Brother Marvin must have held the plate uncommon tight to have left the dent of his thumb on the edge on't.” I have grave doubts, however, on both of these points. For the Deacon showed so much coolness and imperturbability under circumstances far more trying, that I don't feel quite free to believe in his tremors or spasms on that occasion. The truth is, that his friends looked on his uniform calmness and quietude as a fair subject of joke, and their jests took this form of satire on his pretended nervousness and excitability.

The Deacon had made a fortunate marriage, and his prayers were so answered that he could never doubt having exactly accomplished “the will of the Lord” in that transaction. His wife was intelligent and good—good in disposition and temper, good in judgment and understanding, good in taste—and she had a wonderful share of good looks, for her face told all this so plainly that no one could look at her without seeing it all to be true. She was in no hurry to change any of the habits of her husband, as to his person, dress, style of living, modes of business, or peculiarities of taste, feeling, or opinion. She did ultimately modify them all, and some of them were, without the Deacon's being aware of the modus operandi, greatly changed within a tolerably brief period of time; but none of them suddenly or violently. Great is this gift of "patient waiting." In the sweet circle of home, no less than in God's "kingly state," is it true that

"They also serve who only stand and wait."

Mrs. Deacon Marvin did this and more. She waited, but did not "only" wait. She acted and waited; and while half of our newly married wives destroy their influence altogether by impatient and impetuous attempts, and would have pulled the Deacon's hair about his ears in an instant, and have teased him to distraction for the sake of proving and showing their influence over him, the sagacious Mrs. Marvin, though not altogether satisfied with her husband's phenomenal manifestations, or outward surroundings, or inward convictions and notions, was content to wait for opportunity and bide her time. And the result demonstrated her sagacity; for while her forbearance insured that domestic tranquillity which is the nearest-earthly approach to the rest and repose of heaven, it led also to the accomplishment of every change that she really cared to have made.

Very soon after his marriage the Deacon, who liked to ride with his wife, and to look at her as they rode, discarded the pillion, and turned out to grass the family horse-skeleton, whose twenty years' hard service entitled him to be put on the retired list with free rack and manger for life, purchased a sedate but well-looking nag and a comfortable chaise, in which, with an express stipulation that his wife should "hold on to him just as if she was on the pillion," the Deacon thenceforward transported her to and from "meetin'," or wherever else they felt inclined to travel.

In the course of a year the personal aspect of the worthy man was wonderfully metamorphosed. The grub had become a butterfly; not to be sure a very gay and flighty one, but one of a neat and deaconly aspect; not such a fanciful insect as entomologists chase after, catch, cure, and pin up in collections, but a "grave and reverend," a Quakerish and unpretending papilionaceous, Presbyterian deacon butterfly, whom it was quite a comfort to look upon.

At the end of about two years the Deacon began to talk about building a new "meetin'-us," with steeple, bell, and clock. Not only did he talk but he acted, giving liberally and collecting subscriptions industriously, so that on the anniversary of his wedding, and just three years after that happy conjunction, or conjugation, he actually helped raise the frame of the new church. While engaged in this public and pious duty a messenger from home announced to him that his wife had just become the mother of two noble boys. Not pausing in his work—he was just heaving the "king post" into place—the Deacon smiled all over, and with a slight tremor of voice ejaculated, "My stars! Sister Marvin, you've done well." The birth of these twins upon the very day "the new meetin'-house was raised" the Deacon considered providential, and he resolved to give the boys some appropriate Scripture names. Jachin and Boaz was his first thought; but with his wife's help he finally settled down on Caleb and Joshua; and they were christened accordingly.

It was in the training and treatment of those children, the only children he ever had, that the Deacon's peculiarity was most strikingly developed, as we shall presently see. First, however, let me relate an odd adventure or two connected with this new church edifice.

The funds which had been raised to pay for that building were not sufficient to complete it on the original plan. It was all done, however, except the galleries. Some of the church-members proposed to borrow a few hundred dollars and finish the whole interior. "No," said Deacon Marvin, with unusual emphasis. "No. Let us wait. Don't run in debt. I believe in worshiping God on cash principles." This settled the matter, and they waited. But meantime the house was dedicated and used for public worship, and answered the purpose very well, notwithstanding the somewhat ghastly look of the uncovered timbers of the galleries. A provisional arrangement for the choir was made in what may be called the organ-gallery by a loose flooring of rough boards laid across the beams without any fastening, but so arranged as to support the benches on which sat some fifteen or twenty singers, and as many aspiring boys, who instead of remaining below, climbed, boy-like, to the highest seats in the synagogue. The Deacon at this time "led the singing," and acted as chorister, and of course took his seat among the singers and the sinners of tender years. As chorister he "led" the one, and as tithing-man (who was the Puritan beadle) repressed and silenced the other. On one occasion, just as Elder Mark had announced his text, the eyes of Deacon Marvin unfortunately fell on some roguish urchins who were "mocking" the minister's motions, and giggling together in a very ungodly manner, at the distance of about a board's length from his own seat. To rise promptly, and move with outstretched arm toward the offenders, was the Deacon's first act; to step with his whole weight on the unsupported end of a board directly over the "broad aisle" was his next; and as the board tipped up at one end, and let the unhappy Deacon rush down like an avalanche upon the floor below, his seating himself involuntarily, but with terrific force, on the uncarpeted aisle, exclaiming aloud "O Lord!" was his last and final act in that acrobatic performance. The minister paused in the midst of his second reading of the text and gazed with horror on the Deacon; everybody looked around, many of them "snickered out" (as the Deacon used to say when he told the story) and giggled aloud, and poor Mrs. Marvin started to her feet, but was too weak and faint to go immediately to her husband's rescue. For half a minute the unhappy man, with a general feeling of being knocked all to pieces, "a sort of all-overishness of the bones and joints," he said, and a special and particular conviction that his os coccygis was knocked up into close vicinity with his shoulder-blades, and that, in the elegant language of Mrs. Partington, he had "got a spine into his back-bone," sat and stared like an owl by daylight at the minister. At the end of that time, by the use of both hands and feet, he regained a standing position, walked gravely into the "entry," and with one hand supporting the upper portion of each leg, crept up the gallery stairs, amidst the most profound silence of minister and people, and resumed his seat on the front bench of the orchestra.

Then, and not till then, did Elder Mack proceed with the appropriate exercises of the day. Then, and not till then, did the people of Pleasant Valley fully appreciate the moral courage and heroic self-control of their junior deacon. A common man, or a common deacon, nay, any one but a man of supernatural self-possession and coolness, would have blushed, would have faltered, would have crawled off and gone home, and appeared no more in public that day. But Deacon Marvin did not turn red, at least on any part of him "visible to the naked eye"—did not feel abashed, "though cast down yet not abased," never dreamed of deserting his post, or of slinking away from the scene of his disaster. Like Milton's Satan, he continued "great though fallen;" and, unlike that fallen "son of the morning," the Deacon did not "— fail to reascend,

Self-raised, and repossess his native seat."

From that moment Deacon Marvin was considered a great man in Pleasant Valley. As he resumed his seat the whole congregation regarded him as superior to any person present except the parson. Before the morning service ended he was universally acknowledged to be greater than Elder Mack.

The minister began his discourse as soon as he well could, after order was once more restored, and proceeded without further let or hindrance to his "fifth head." Sermons in those days were like serpents in the days of Hercules, or like "beasts" in the times of John at Patmos, and the number of their "heads" was wonderful. I think that Deacon Marvin's head must have received a heavy blow as he fell through the floor, or that the shock transmitted to his brain upward from his bulkier parts as they struck the floor below, had transiently dulled his powers of attention. Whatever may have been the cause, truth constrains me to declare that Deacon Marvin's mind, I will not say wandered off from Elder Mack's discourse, but remained stationary, or dropped behind, and fell into a dreamy condition, so that the discourse wandered off from him, and when the worthy minister was about to assail with Herculean energy the fifth head of his hydra-headed sermon, the Deacon was sound asleep, nodding forward most alarmingly toward the unfenced verge of the gallery, and threatening at every nod to dive into the depths below. Once already had he fallen stern foremost, and now he seemed bent on plunging head foremost into the congregation. Angry and alarmed, angry at this insult to his oratory, and alarmed by the impending danger of the deacon, Elder Mack resorted to various expedients familiar to pulpit orators to waken the sleeper. He elevated his voice almost to a scream, and was met by a nod. He lowered it, as Seguin used to let down his voice and inquire, gaspingly and gutturally, "what do you think of my double G?" in the opera of the Bohemian Girl. But what did Deacon Marvin care for his ventriloquial or bellicose mutterings? He pounded the pulpit and the pulpit cushion with an energy that filled the air with dust, amidst which dimly shone the minister's red and threatening face

"—as when the sun, now risen,
Looks through the horizontal misty air
Shorn of his beams."

But he might have pounded the pulpit to pieces without disturbing that obstinate, "nid-nid-nodding" deacon. As his last oratorical resort Elder Mack came to "an awful pause," and waited a full half minute in a silence which, as poets say, "was enough to awaken the Seven Sleepers;" but, alas! Deacon Marvin was not one of the Seven Sleepers, and only leaned the more dangerously forward and nodded the nearer to his fall, the longer the silence lasted. The clergyman was horrified—the sweat started from his brow, trickled down his nose, and made dimples in the dust as the drops fell upon the cushion and the big Bible below his nose; his eyes rolled wildly. It was more than man or minister, nay, more than angel or archangel, could have borne any longer in silence. Even Gabriel would have blown one blast on his trumpet. And so Elder Mack screamed aloud in his agony, "Deacon Marvin! Deacon Marvin! it is hard work to preach to a sleepy congregation!" The effect of that cry was instantaneous and electrical. Deacon Marvin awoke, and as his head flew up to its natural position he called back in stentorian voice to the horror-stricken preacher, "Elder Mack! Elder Mack! it's hard listening to a sleepy sermon! Go on with your discourse!"

The explosion of laughter that followed was something quite diabolical. Nobody could help laughing, yet every body was horrified by the dreadful, the impious, the damnable, impropriety of his laughter, and the meeting broke up in dire confusion. There was no more preaching that day. Deacon Marvin alone maintained his self-possession, and went home as calm and demure as though nothing had happened "out of the common." The result was that old Elder Mack resigned, a new minister was settled in his place, and the Deacon remained the "monarch of all he surveyed."

Not long after the birth of the twins, Caleb and Joshua, their worthy father became greatly exercised in his mind upon the subject of their education. Two opposite systems of training embarrassed and divided his judgment. As Joshua was afterward wont to say, Deacon Marvin hesitated between the phlog-istic and the anti-phlog-istic methods. He had great faith in Solomon and in his exhortations not to spare the rod. So, also, he believed in moral suasion. He thought it an excellent plan to make striking appeals to the cutaneous conscience of children. And yet he remembered that in his own case no resort to the oil of birch had ever been attempted by his own father, and was sure that he had himself never needed a flogging. The result was what few men would have either reached or imagined. He resolved to adopt, and he did adopt, both systems. For Caleb, the eldest boy, he selected the discipline recommended by the wise king of Israel and Judah. For Joshua, the younger, he resolved on the gentler system of wholesome advice and tender admonition.

It might reasonably be expected that such diversity of treatment would have spoiled one or the other of these twin boys: that Caleb would hate his father for his apparent partiality and injustice, and dislike Joshua because he seemed to be the paternal pet and favorite. Such would have been the case in any other family. But, strange to say, no such result was produced in the domestic administration of the Deacon. Joshua, fortunately, was a quiet, orderly, and gentle soul, who never misbehaved except when Caleb tempted him into mischief, and was then so patient and anxious to atone for his misdeeds that whipping him was out of the question. But Caleb, the whippee, was a boisterous and turbulent youngster, full of the very devil of active mischief, fun, frolic, and childish misconduct—not malignant or malicious, but riotous and wild as an unbroken colt. His experiments in mischief were infinite in both number and variety. Mud-pies were his delight; and so fond of water was he that he seemed almost amphibious. One day, while yet in petticoats, he was discovered seated in a tub of water playing with a shad which had been immersed there to keep fresh for dinner. Whipping never troubled him. He bore it heroically, and forgot it instantly, and cherished no malice. Sometimes he drew Joshua into his mischievous enterprises. Being expelled on one occasion from his mother's sick chamber with his noisy willow whistle, and forbidden to blow it in or near the house, he went out with Joshua and both mysteriously disappeared. Presently a distant and seemingly subterranean whistling was heard, and, like Ferdinand perplexed by the song of the "gentle Ariel," every person in the house was led to inquire "Where should this music be? 'i' the air, or the earth?" Search was made, and the two lads were found in the bottom of the well, blowing their bark trumpets in wonderful unison.

But Caleb's activity subsided into good order by the time he was fourteen years of age; and from that time forward he never deserved a flagellation; nor from any one but his father would he ever have received one. He became his father's "right-hand man" in all branches of his multifarious business, and was sober and discreet as the Deacon himself. Joshua manifested a decided passion for study, and in due time was "sent to college." Caleb, in accordance with his natural tastes and aptitudes, adhered to the farm and the shop.

But Deacon Marvin could not altogether give up the old discipline. Fearing, or seeming to fear, that Caleb, though now so exemplary, might relapse into his old habits of mischief, his father hit upon a method of prevention quite new and original. It was this. Precisely as the old clock in the kitchen struck the hour of twelve on the night preceding Caleb's birthday every year, Deacon Marvin, having previously called his son out of bed, read to him some elegant extracts from the book of Proverbs, and lectured him on filial duty and what the old gentleman called "PARENTAL and MARENTAL love;" administered to him a thorough basting, and then, mingling his tears with those of the boy and the boy's mother, dismissed him to repose.

This annual expression of paternal regard was continued until Caleb entered on his twenty-first year. The young man loved and respected his father, knew all his foibles, and submitted to them with patience, feeling that in this world there is no purer affection than parental love, and no sentiment more pleasing to God than filial affection. He bore his stripes, therefore, with Spartan courage and Christian patience until the last year of his minority came round.

On the morning preceding his twenty-first birthday he was, however, devoutly thankful that he had but one more striking exhibition to witness of "parental and marental" solicitude. "Thank Heaven," said he, "to-night puts an end to corporeal proofs of my father's regard. To-morrow I am a man, and then, by Jove! good-by to birth-night castigation."

As he came home to supper that night the approaching ceremony filled his imagination with lively apprehensions. "The closing scene," thought he, "will be doubly tragical and touching. I wish there were any way fairly to escape this last annual dividend of castigation." A happy idea just then dawned upon his mind, and with flashing eyes he inquired, "Where is mother?" She was at hand, and they retired to her room for consultation. Half an hour later the family met at supper, Caleb gay and full of fun, his mother smiling and serene, the Deacon unusually serious and abstracted. He had become partially deaf, and this infirmity seemed to-night to be greatly increased by his absence of mind, insomuch that in saying grace he forgot his usual brief formula, and indulged in a prayer of formidable length, although quite unconscious that the family cat, on whose tail he had accidentally planted his foot, was howling furiously during the whole invocation. The supper passed by without much conversation, and the old folks at nine o'clock went to bed, leaving Caleb up and reading in the kitchen. Soon after the departure of his parents Caleb went to the clock, removed the striking weight ("A good omen that," said he to himself), and set forward the hands an hour. He then retired to his own room, and waited.

At half past 11 o'clock, with characteristic punctuality, the Deacon arose and called his son, and began the annual lecture. "Caleb, my dear son," said he, "you are now almost a man, and are about to enter on the world as your own master. It is a serious crisis, my son, in your life. Hereafter there will be no one to administer wholesome correction, for to-night for the last time must I perform that solemn duty. My son, take off your coat!" Caleb obeyed, but lifted the candle toward the clock and looked so earnestly toward it as to excite his father's attention. The old man's eyes followed in the same direction, and, behold! it was almost one o'clock! "My stars, Caleb!" cried he, "I've overslept myself. It's too late. 'The sceptre has departed.' You are a man. Go back to bed. Good-night."

For once in his life the Deacon had been taken in. Caleb was prompt in his obedience, his mother quite accidentally let fall the candle and thus put out the light, and then, tenderly slipping her arm around her husband, gently drew him out of the room.

And here must now end my sketch of good old Deacon Marvin. He has long since "been gathered to his fathers," and "slept the sleep of the just." I will only add that to the day of his death, and when Caleb and Joshua were men in middle life, alike prosperous and honored, their father fully believed in the wisdom of his twin system of education, and proudly pointed to his "boys" for proof.

WALL STREET IN WAR TIME.

"THE battle of Bull Run," said a late eminent financier, who would have been worth millions and might have ruled the monetary spheres, had he only kept to the straight path, and eschewed Indiana State Bonds—"the battle of Bull Run makes the fortune of every man in Wall Street who is not a natural idiot."

He foresaw a long war, great expenditures, and consequently, taxes being almost unknown, vast issues of paper-money, with their inevitable results, namely, active speculation, an advance in the price of all articles exchangeable for money, and unparalleled vicissitudes of fortune. And he went to work and bought 75,000 shares of stock on the spot. It was moderate, under the circumstances, considering the low prices of stocks, and the improving condition of the railways, to look for an average advance of twenty per cent. This would give him a profit of $1,500,000. But the advance would probably be nearer forty than twenty. Forty would give him three millions. With that he would for the present remain satisfied. So he counted his brood in the egg.

Unfortunately, in Wall Street, the soundest calculations are apt to fail where the speculator is hampered by considerations of time. The laws of trade always vindicate themselves in the end, but sometimes they are a long time about it. So it fell out that our wise friend, after waiting an unconscionable time, and going through panic after panic with sore loss, was brought up standing, just before the realization of his plans, by one of those accidents which will happen to enterprising people. How shall I describe it? He had a quarrel with the District Attorney about some bonds. Out West, they print their State bonds in a book like a primer. When the State wants money, the Treasurer cuts out a page or two, and signing his name, sells them. Some States are said to have whole libraries of such books. It would be handy for a Wall Street speculator to have a few volumes of such a library lying loose in his desk, and a complaisant friend to sign the pages as required. Of course no one in Wall Street ever had such books, or "sportèd" pages of them till they were thick in the hands of money-lenders as leaves in Val-lombrosa. But still our far-seeing friend did have a controversy of some bitterness with the District Attorney about bonds, and the end of it was that he (not the Attorney) was blotted out of Wall Street, and went away to die in the West, leaving others to reap the harvest he had counted on. His profits, but for this accident, would have been far more than double his most sanguine hopes.

Paper-money brought every one into Wall Street, and interested every family in the ups and downs of stocks. It circulated like fertilizing dew throughout the land, generating enterprise, facilitating industry, developing internal trade; the railways found their business increase beyond their most sanguine expectations; dividend-paying roads had extra profits to divide; embarrassed enterprises cleared off their debts, and became lucrative to their owners; every body wanted to own railway property. Within a few weeks after the first issue of legal tenders, stocks began to rise, and rose steadily, with slight interruptions, till April, 1864, when Mr. Chase, by selling his surplus gold for legal tenders, created an unexpected money panic, and the whole fabric of stock speculation toppled to the earth, overwhelming in the ruin thousands of unlucky operators.

It is keeping within bounds to say that $250,000,000—in paper-money—was realized as profits by the operators in stocks between 1862 and 1864. The difference between the aggregate price of the railroad and miscellaneous shares and bonds dealt in on our Stock Exchange at mid-summer, 1862, and the price of the same securities on 1st August, 1864, is more than that sum. Many popular shares rose 300 per cent.

This profit was divided among many thousands of people. In 1863, and in the first quarter of 1864, every body seemed to be speculating in stocks. Nothing else was talked of at clubs, in the streets, at the theatres, in drawing-rooms. Ladies privately pledged their diamonds as margin with brokers, and astonished their husbands with the display of their gains. Clergymen staked their salary, and some of them realized in a few months more than they could have made by a lifetime of preaching. One man, who had nothing in the world but a horse, sent him to a broker's stable, and persuaded the broker to buy him a hundred shares; he drew from the broker, a few months after, a balance of $300,000. There is no record in Wall Street, as there was in the Rue Quincampoix, of a humpbacked man making a fortune by renting out his hump as a desk to street gamblers; but two or three different people realized a handsome competency by hiring a convenient room for stock gamblers to meet in, and charging a moderate entrance-fee. The same subject was uppermost in every man's mind. A party of travelers were seated in a public room at the Delavan House, at Albany. A man rushed in breathless, exclaiming: "It sold at twenty!"

They all sprang to their feet, with exclamations of astonishment and delight. None of them required to be told that "it" was Erie, and "twenty" was 120.

The labors and profits of the brokers were enormous. One house checked more than once for $4,000,000 in a day. A day's commissions, in the case of a leading firm, were not unfrequently $5000. Nearly all the leading members of the board lost their voices from constant bawling, and talked in the evening as though they were in the last stage of bronchitis; clerks seldom left their offices before 11 or 12 P.M., a liberal dinner at Delmonico's being allowed by their employers as a stimulus to exertion. The day was not long enough for the gamblers.

At half past 8 A.M. they began to collect in William Street, and by half past 10 the police could hardly keep the thoroughfare open. All day long the crowd ebbed and flowed between the boards and the street, shouting, screaming, swearing, quarreling, tussling, and not a few of them cheating and lying. A man-milliner from up-town, of short stature but prodigious lungs, was always a leading personage in the crowd: his bids rose like muffled thunder from under other men's coat-tails. The little rogue made $100,000, and went off to Europe with it, to study, as he said, "de newe fashions for my emporium." When evening fell the throng adjourned to the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and the rooms adjacent, which were hired for the purpose. There night was made hideous by discordant bids and offers—often till every one in the neighborhood was or wished to be asleep. The Fifth Avenue Board, on an exciting night, was probably the nearest approach to Pandemonium we can hope to witness on this earth.

OF BULLS AND BEARS.

Nobody needs to be told that a bull is an operator who buys stocks for the rise, and a bear one who sells them for the fall. The former is said, in Wall Street parlance, to "go long" of a stock when he buys; the other to "sell short." When a man has bought 500 Erie expecting it to rise he is said to be "long of Erie;" if he has sold 500 Hudson for future delivery, expecting it to fall, he is pronounced "short of Hudson." There are many ways of buying and selling stocks. People who have plenty of money buy for cash or "regular"—which means that the stock will be delivered and paid for next day. Others buy on "buyer's option," so many days; in which case the buyer has a right to call for the stock at any time before the maturity of the contract, and does not pay for it till then. Stocks may be sold for cash, or regular; or on seller's option, so many days, in which case the seller may deliver on any day prior to the maturity of the contract and can not be called upon for the stock till then. As a rule, outsiders—by which term is meant all persons who speculate in stocks without being brokers or professional speculators—buy on buyers' options, and sell on sellers' options.

Most Wall Street operators are bull or bear by turns, according to their views of the tendency of the market. These persons very seldom make money. The gift of average foresight is rare, and the variety of circumstances which influence prices in Wall Street so vast, that no mortal can presume to foresee them all. Exceptional periods occur every few years when shrewdness will enable an operator to discern the general drift of the market. But, in ordinary times, chance rules the day. If Smith or Brown make $100 to-day by bulling Erie, ten to one he loses it to-morrow by bearing Central or bulling Hudson. There are, and always have been, a very large number of persons in Wall Street who have no other means of living than speculations in stocks, and yet who live and live well. But if the private affairs of these gentry were known, it would be found that all or nearly all have been "lame ducks" at some time or other; that is to say, owe money which they can not pay. It was a saying of one of the oldest and boldest operators of the street that he intended some day to paper his study with the promissory notes of his brethren. His own are cheap enough now.

The clerk—a confidential clerk of a very leading Wall Street operator, a man who sold and bought tens of thousands of shares daily on his own account, according to his view of the market—was charged with frequenting a gambling-house.

"Can this be true, Sir?" angrily asked his employer. "Are you not ashamed of yourself?"

"Not in the least, Sir. The only difference between us is that you gamble for thousands at the Board while I gamble for hundreds at a faro-table."

It will not do, however, to regard the parallel as exact. A man who buys Erie because he knows that the earnings of the road are increasing largely, or who sells Hudson because he knows it has a floating debt which will interfere with dividends, has some reason for his act which the faro gambler has not. But the bulk of the Wall Street operators buy and sell with very little more ground for the faith that is in them than the man who bets on the red, or "goes his pile" at poker.

The true bull and the true bear are born so. They do not change. Marcus is a man you can place at a glance: a cheerful, jovial fellow, who thinks the world a good place to live in, and its arrangements generally satisfactory; who has faith in human progress, takes stock in new enterprises, believed in the telegraph, railroads, the oceanic cable from the first; is ready to help a poor fellow in distress, or to credit any reasonably probable good news. He looks on the bright side of things, and is a bull. He was a bull at his games at school, and will die a bull in Wall Street. He regards the crisis of 1857 as artificial, and all declines in values as the nefarious work of rascally speculators. When the bears have sway Marcus loses money and sometimes temper. But his indignation is honest, open, and manly. You can't persuade him that men are all rogues and railroad reports all lies. "There's a good time coming, boys," is his favorite air. He gets constantly imposed upon by knaves, owing to his credulity; but experience does not harden his heart. Genial old fellow, he has hosts of friends and hardly an enemy!

Cassius is a very different mould of man. He was born, bred, and lives a bear. Distrust is his prominent trait. From his youth he was a doubter and scorner. He sneered at the telegraph, and for a long time expected railways to be done away with and stage-coaches to be reinstated. He has no faith in men or things. The former are generally knaves, the latter perishable. He sells railway stocks so confidently on the expectation of accidents that he is rather disappointed when he don't find one in the morning paper. He is ready to take the odds against the happening of any expected event which is generally wished for. He don't believe in news unless it is bad news, or in men, unless, like himself, they are laden with distrust. Twenty years' indulgence in these feelings render him at forty a sour, unsavory companion, apt to be snappish in conversation, and uncongenial. For, you see, he makes his money out of misfortune. Bankruptcy, Civil Turmoil, Disaster, and Accident, are the evil spirits which bring him riches. The sight of prosperity annoys him. A companion who had listened impatiently, on a walk down Broadway, to his demonstration of the utter unsoundness of every thing and every body, and of the impending ruin of the whole commercial community, at last in despair pointed to Stewart's building on Chambers Street, and said:

"That building is substantial, at all events!"

"Bet you it comes down in some storm," was the prompt answer.

All bulls, of course, are not like Marcus, and all bears are not Cassiuses. There is Trimalchio, for instance, a steady bear, but not a bad fellow in his way; he has made and lost three or four fortunes; is apt to strut and look over men's heads when he has made a hit, but is very friendly and polite when fortune deserts him: he alludes to the impending collapse with a sigh of sympathy, and, I dare say, would give a trifle to the widows and orphans whose ruin will make his fortune. Many men are bears from natural caution, and abstain from operating except in times of general excitement and speculation when values are inflated. The leaders of the street have generally been bears, from the veteran Jacob, who thought nothing of selling short the entire capital stock of a road in a morning, down to Mr. Slyboots, who knows so much more than other people that betting against him is like playing with loaded dice.

Both classes of operators are useful and even essential. But for the bulls no enterprise would ever be carried into effect. And when rogues try to gull the public with fraudulent schemes, and to foist worthless stock on unsuspecting investors, the bear looms up as the protector of his species, and by selling the trash "short" develops its want of value and warns the dupes of their danger. When values are too low, the bull reinstates them. When they rise too high, the bear interposes and checks the enthusiasm of the sanguine.

The bulls had their carnival in 1863 and the beginning of 1864. The bears had theirs in 1857, and again in the later months of 1864, and the commencement, thus far, of 1865. The contest of 1857 was severe, though the result was never doubtful. Our railroads were inefficiently managed. There was not traffic enough for all of them, and a large number were declaring dividends which had not been earned. Most of them were groaning under constantly increasing floating debts. Under these circumstances it was clear that they must decline in public favor as investments, and it was merely a question of time when the fall would come. An organization of about a dozen large operators was formed under the title of "The Observatory," comprising a large proportion of the capital and financial skill of the street. They operated for the fall with vigor and ability. It is not a little curious to note, however, that their ultimate success was due to an event which had by no means entered into their calculations. They had based their sales exclusively on the unsound condition of the railways, whereas the crisis of 1857, which caused the great decline in values, was the result of general overtrading and an excessive drain of specie to Europe. The Observatory made a net profit of $1,500,000 @ $2,000,000 less than some individuals realized on the bull side in 1863. The loss to the public, exclusive of losses in merchandise, was not less than $200,000,000.

The bulls had a carnival, based on the development of gold in California, which lasted from 1852 to 1855, and made many fortunes. But the most brilliant of their campaigns was that of 1863. Paper-money was its base; its success was due to the large earnings of the railroads caused by the development of internal trade.

The crisis of 1857, and the short crops which followed, had impoverished the West, reduced railroad receipts to so low an ebb that they barely paid expenses, and destroyed public confidence in railroad property. Many railroads had passed out of the hands of their owners into those of receivers, and had been reorganized. Others were struggling painfully under an intolerable load of floating debt. The bountiful crops of 1859 and 1860 were beginning to restore them to something like prosperity when the war panic—which followed the election of Mr. Lincoln—again revived distrust, checked trade, and plunged holders of railroad property into despair. It was not till two years afterward that the depression began to be overcome.

In 1862 the bulls showed their heads again—fortified by paper-money and increased railroad earnings. Two brothers, not associated in business, but both clear-headed, bold, and with that instinct d'agiotage which a man must have to be very successful in stocks, began to attract attention by the boldness of their purchases. Another man, whom few persons knew, but who was said to have been an unlucky curbstone operator for some years, commenced dealing on a capital of two or three thousand dollars, and soon became a prominent figure at the "coal-hole." He enjoyed the acquaintance if not the patronage of a great millionaire; and when he was most audacious in his purchases, it was always suspected that he was acting for his potential friend—which helped his credit and gave him prestige to no small extent. Keen, shrewd, and now at last lucky, his first ventures were successful beyond his hopes; in six months his $3000 had swelled to one hundred times that amount, and he was recognized as a leader. When he rose in the coal-hole to bid, as he generally did, "seller three or thirty," with his eyes flashing, and his slender frame vibrating with excitement—an associate or friend beside him with book and pencil to note down his purchases—by-standers looked on with admiration, bears hastened to cover their shorts, and the large class of speculators, who get their thinking done by other people, lost no time in following in his track. A man with prestige can operate à coup sûr: he has always following enough to relieve him of his stocks at a profit if he repents his purchases. This was the fortune of this man; for a long time every thing he touched turned to gold, because he could make his operations certain. And his shrewdness did not fail him at the last. For some time before the great crash of April he had foreseen and foretold it. It found him prepared; and of the great fortunes won in 1863, his is one of the very few which has been preserved.

Another leading operator made a display not less brilliant, but more meteoric. He, too, had read the signs of the times, and after feeling his way for some months, at length struck a vein. He achieved fame and fortune in a few days. His personal prestige was at one time greater than was ever enjoyed by any man in Wall Street. People of all kinds thronged his office and begged him to give them just a hint—the least hint, and they would be his friends forever. If he whispered "Rock Island," scores of sensible men rushed to their brokers and ordered Rock Island bought. Not that they knew why they were buying it: they had a hint from the Great Man, and that was sufficient. A Company, respectable enough, and with a fine property which they were desirous of bringing before the public, actually paid him the enormous fee of $165,000 to allow the subscription books to be opened at his office, and his name to appear in the list of directors. Speculators paid him extravagant commissions to buy stocks for them, in the hope that the public might think he was buying them for himself. To his friends he was a generous fellow, and in his wild, extravagant way would tell them:

"Boys, I'll make a million for each of you before I've done."

He was something more than a mere gambler. As an arithmetician he never had his equal in the street, and his grasp of financial questions was so true and comprehensive that, at one meeting, he persuaded one of our soundest Boards of railroad managers to depart from the policy they had established, and pursue a new one under his guidance. The misfortune with him was that at last he began to believe in himself. From that moment he was a doomed man. The moment a man in Wall Street begins to think he knows more than other people his ruin is a mere question of time. When this misfortune befell the operator of whom we speak, he determined to make not two or three millions but eight or ten; not to control one stock, but half a dozen. Bankers and banks were ready enough to humor him. Where he had borrowed a million they lent him two; and president and cashier slyly examined his collaterals, and laid in a couple of hundred each of the same sort for their private pocket. If Mr. Chase had not been seized with the fine notion of selling gold for greenbacks, and if nothing else of the like nature had happened, there is no saying how many millions this great operator might not have realized, and what income-tax he would have paid. Unfortunately, the dread day of April came, and found him expanded to the utmost extent. Banks and bankers called for their money, and would hear of no excuse. Private lenders called for more margin. Customers called for their balances. The struggle was brief. One morning the word was passed round:

"M—— has failed!"

It was the culminating point of the crisis of April. The great leader went down, under full sail, with all hands on board, and all the little smacks and other craft which had followed in his wake shared his fate.

It was a bad time for Uncle Sam's income-tax commissioners. The decline was so rapid that not only did speculators lose, but brokers, money-lenders, and others, who had no interest in the operations of the day, were involved in the general catastrophe. Stocks fell 15 per cent. on Saturday, and then, though every body said they would naturally react on Monday, they fell 15 per cent. more on that day. No such decline had ever been witnessed in Wall Street, and people were new to the alternate inflations and panics which are the characteristics of paper-money eras. Very few had time to save themselves. Several thousands of individuals who had made during the year preceding fortunes varying from $25,000 to $250,000 found themselves stripped in a week. Of those who survived the subsequent decline slaughtered the greater part. Speculation in stocks received a blow from which it has not since recovered.

A few figures will explain the extent of the losses which have fallen upon stock gamblers since last 1st of April. Erie, which sold when the war began at 30, rose to 130, fell in April to 105, and has since sold at 66. Reading, which sold in 1861 at 55, rose to 160, and has since sold at 102. Toledo sold at 28 in 1861, at 160 in 1863, and at 103 since. Michigan Southern sold at 30 in 1862, at 118 in 1863, and at 61 since. Pittsburg rose from 22 to 129, and has since fallen to 80. Rock Island rose from 40 to 150, and has since sold at 88. It will be remembered that the figures at which these properties sold at the beginning of the war were in gold, and that the roads were not then earning money; whereas the subsequent figures are in a currency worth 50 per cent. in gold, and the roads are all earning dividends.

OF CORNERS.

Every body knows what the corner of a street is, or the corner of a room. A Wall Street "corner" has no affinity with either of these. It is derived from the popular verb to "corner," i. e., to embarrass beyond chance of escape. A stock operator is cornered when he has sold stock short which he can not procure for delivery, and a stock is said to be cornered when a bold operator or a clique buys it all up, and then calls upon the bears who have sold it short to "stand and deliver." Great corners are among the memorable events of the street.

The first great corner on record was engineered some twenty or thirty years ago in Morris Canal stock, a long since forgotten fancy. Most of the operators in the Board and in the street believed it to be ruling above its value and sold it short. On this a shrewd clique bought up all the loose stock and locked it in a trunk. The shorts discovered, as their contracts matured, that there was no stock to be had except of the cornering clique, and they demanded an exorbitant price. Dismay prevailed on all sides. There was no precedent for the case. The bears accused the cornerers of conspiracy, and denounced the corner as a piece of roguery; the bulls retorted by inquiring why their antagonists had sold that which they did not possess and apparently could not procure. After much altercation, the dispute was referred to the Board of Brokers, and that body, new to such points, actually decided in favor of the shorts, pronouncing a verdict which virtually relieved them from the necessity of fulfilling their contracts, on the ground that the corner was a conspiracy.

The Board has grown wiser since then. In our time, if a man is cornered, he can get neither relief nor sympathy by applying to the Board. He must deliver or break. The trouble with the parties who cornered Morris Canal was that, like Galileo, they were before their time.

There have been three great corners within the past year or two; one in Hudson River, one in Harlem, one in Rock Island—each of the three organized by a master of the art. Of these the most profitable was the one in Hudson River, the most thorough the one in Harlem.

Hudson came to be cornered accidentally. In a dull, inanimate state of the market the chronic bears were amusing themselves by "hammering," i. e., pressing down the price of Hudson, which did not happen to have any particular friend in the Board. This pastime of theirs was not relished by a large holder of Hudson, then disporting himself during the dog days on board his yacht; and chancing to revolve the matter in his head as he lay with a friend on a pile of deals on a wharf in the North River one morning between four and five, it occurred to him that with proper ingenuity a rod might be set in pickle for these trespassers. Orders went that morning to confidential brokers to take all the sellers' options in Hudson. This was repeated for several days, until the buyers had a pretty large pile of options. Cash stock was then taken as quietly as possible, until the market was bare. A brief calculation showed that the buyers had secured either as cash or contract stock, all the Hudson in existence, with the exception of a very few shares which were not likely to come on the market. A new manœuvre was then developed. Application was made to several leading bear houses to "turn" Hudson; that is to say, to buy it for cash from the cornering party, and to sell it back to them on buyers' option for ten, twenty, or thirty days. This indicated or was regarded as indicating weakness on the part of the cornerers; it looked as though they were short of money; the bears eagerly "turned" several thousand shares for the usual difference, and instantly threw on the market the cash stock, which the cornerers privately bought.

All being now ripe, the trap was sprung. Many of the sellers' options began to mature. There was no Hudson to be had. On that morning when the chief of the party lay on the deals thinking of his margins Hudson was 112; it now rose to 180. On one hundred shares, thoughtlessly sold, the loss was $6800. There could not have been less than 50,000 shares contracted to be delivered to the party which had cornered the stock by members of the Board and others. Bear cries of anguish rose to heaven. In the course of a day or two the clique notified the parties who had turned the stock to deliver. They considered themselves very badly treated. They claimed to have turned the stock merely to oblige the bulls, and now to be asked to lose $5000 or $6000 on every 100 shares! But the bulls were inexorable. They must have their property. On one point they were willing to oblige their foes. They would lend stock at the modest rate of 5 per cent. a day. Enormous as this charge was, there were many who, believing that the corner was a mere spasm of a day or two, paid it and borrowed stock. They were the worst punished of all. The corner lasted many days, over two weeks. After paying 5 per cent a day for several days, the victims despaired, and bought the stock. Never in its history had Wall Street been so cruelly scourged.

What distinguished the Hudson River corner from almost all others was the skill with which the clique extricated themselves at last. Every one can see that with plenty of money it is an easy matter to buy up all the shares of a stock which the rank and file of Wall Street are blindly selling short, and to bleed the sellers for their presumption. But the natural end of such an operation is to load the bulls with the entire capital stock of the concern cornered. And no man wants to buy a stock which has just been cornered. Now the clique in Hudson secured the services of a prominent bear broker, and directed him to sell all the stock he could on seller's option during the heat of the contest. While the unfortunate bears were buying stock for delivery at 170 @ 180, this broker was selling at 140, or even lower, on sellers' thirty-day options, which were taken by many in the belief that he was prosecuting the contest and would fail in the end. Whereas, when most of the stock really sold short had been delivered, and the bears squeezed as thoroughly as they could be, the clique quietly delivered the stock apparently sold short by their broker, and found themselves loaded with no exorbitant amount remaining.

The Harlem corner is an instance of the opposite style of management. We have seen lately two corners in Harlem; one in which Commodore Vanderbilt cornered the Common Council and their friends by way of punishment; the other, in which like measure was meted out to the Legislature and their friends for operating on the repeal of the Broadway grant. This was an operation in which feeling seems to have predominated over calculation. The severity of the punishment was unequalled. Many contracts to deliver Harlem at 110 were settled at 280. Probably no less than $3,000,000 in money were taken out of the pockets of the bears in Harlem. Several houses went down in the struggle, and others which survive still wear its scars. But the end of the campaign saddled the bulls with the entire capital stock of the Harlem, which, as it doesn't pay dividends, and may never do so, is not a cheerful load to carry. A man who bid 60 for Harlem—the last sales being at something like 240—would probably be promptly supplied. People won't buy it at any price.

A fair joke was developed in the course of the Harlem corner. The bulls had purchased from a leading operator certain "calls" on Harlem. A call is a document which states that for value received the bearer may call upon the subscriber for so many shares of such a stock at such a price within a stated time. It need hardly be mentioned that the shrewd old speculator who sold these calls on Harlem did so in perfect ignorance of the fact that the stock was being cornered at the time. When he discovered the trap into which he had fallen his wrath was pungent. The calls were sold at 130 or thereabouts. When the stock rose to 250 or so, the holders "called." The seller refused to deliver. Being asked his reasons, he replied in the language of the Morris Canal victims, that the corner was a conspiracy, and furthermore, said he:

"This paper says you may call on me for Harlem. Well, call. I don't mind it. Call again, as often as you like. I don't see any thing here about my delivering any stock."

The Rock Island corner made a great noise in its time, and some of its features were brilliant. The bulls bought, counting cash and contract stock together, about 20,000 more shares of Rock Island than exist. Of course when the deliveries were called for the bears were at the mercy of their opponents, and the price rose from 110 to 150. In the middle of the contest the bull leader suddenly sold out with such surprising swiftness and dash that none of the bears had an opportunity of disputing the market with him. Fully 40,000 shares were sold in a day, the price falling from 141 to 118. Had he hesitated, or attempted to rally the price, the bears would infallibly have pressed him with their options, and deprived him of a market on which to sell.

Corners, as a rule, are not profitable operations, unless the stock cornered be of such quality that the bulls are satisfied to own the whole of it, and they have the means to do so. The Hudson River corner paid 12 per cent.; the Rock Island showed a profit of 4½. In the old days before 1857, the leading operator was once or twice broken by corners, but I doubt whether the cornerers made much, even when he didn't break. In London, they have a horror of corners. One important reason why they objected to putting our railway shares on their exchange list was that their capitals were generally so small that they were liable to be cornered by any one of several great operators.

OF GOLD GAMBLING.

The legal tender Acts demonetized specie, and rendered it an article of merchandise, like flour or pork. At first there were many who contended that it should not rise to any premium. It had not done so during the suspension of 1857; and had the war ended as soon as some sanguine patriots expected, legal tender notes might have maintained their value in coin. As the war did not end, but, on the contrary, pursued its weary course with the usual vicissitudes of fortune, it soon became evident to sound thinkers that gold must eventually command a substantial premium. Leading foreign houses put their capital in gold, and converted their profits into gold as fast as they made them. Speculators began to buy gold for the rise.

At that time dealings in gold were confined to the Board of Brokers and the outside Board, popularly known, from the dinginess of its apartments, as the "Coal-hole." There were bear operators enough in the Board to sell on time all the gold wanted to the disbelievers in the currency. Their sales on sellers' options carried interest; and one house believed that it had discovered the royal road to fortune by selling so many millions of gold short that its monthly receipts from interest amounted to $10,000. No better business, as the partners boasted, could possibly be discovered. Unfortunately, one day, the Union arms met with a reverse, and gold jumped up five or six per cent. This gave courage to the buyers for a rise, and they bought with freedom. In three days the profits from interest account were swallowed up, and the confident bears were forced to cover their contracts at a severe loss.

Gold was then about 125. It rose from that point, almost without a check, to 173. This steady advance in a few weeks was mainly due to the large issues of paper-money at Washington, and the poor success of the Union armies. But the rise was considerably aided by the operations of a clique known as the "Washington party."

The Washington party consisted, as its name imported, of men resident at or temporarily placed at Washington. They were members of Congress, Republicans and Democrats; newspaper correspondents; clerks high in office in the Departments; lobby agents; and Washington bankers. They enjoyed remarkable facilities for procuring early intelligence from the armies, and correct information regarding the designs of Government. Commencing with a small capital and a few adherents, they attracted money and associates by the rumor of their large profits, and in January, 1863, they were by far the most powerful body of operators in this market. No one knows precisely the rules which governed their method of operating, but they were bulls in every thing, and their ostensible engineers were Washington bankers, who hailed from some one of our up-town hotels. Not content with buying gold, they bought exchange in enormous amounts, and likewise tobacco, cotton, and other merchandise. It was currently reported in February, 1863, that they had made not less than $6,000,000.

Their operations were so vast that concealment of them was impossible, and they were traced with ease. More than once, at the closing Board of the day in the "coal-hole," the well-known broker of the party would beg the President to "dwell" on gold, as he had "a little order." Members knew what that meant. He wanted a million or so. The report would run through the Board into the street, and through Wall Street to all the brokers' offices, that the Washington party were buying. There must be news. Every body wanted to buy too. Before the close of business a substantial advance in the premium had been established. At that time large dealings in gold were rare. Now a man buys or sells a million, and nobody is surprised or curious.

In February, 1863, a New York banker went to Washington. He had some talk with the Secretary of the Treasury and the members of the Committee of Ways and Means. He was known in this city as a man who had always been a believer in gold, and a holder of at least a million. One morning he telegraphed his partners here:

"Sell my gold!"

It was then 172 @ 173. The order was obeyed, and many were the surmises to which the laconic message gave birth. The market was in that condition that it seemed impossible for gold not to rise. It had risen steadily for several months, and every one who had sold it had lost money. The Washington party was said to hold over $4,000,000 of gold, besides exchange. There was no prospect of a diminution of paper-money, and the military horizon was not brilliant.

A day or two after the New York banker had sold his gold a little bill was rushed through Congress. It was a silly little bill. It forbade loans of over par on gold, and threw some other pottering little difficulties in the way of traffic in coin. But though it was "neither as wide as a church door nor as deep as a well, it was enough" to prick the bubble which had been inflated by the Washington party. A panic in gold ensued.

It fell from 173 to 160, from 160 to 140, from 140 to 130, and at last, at midsummer, sold at 120. The dismay in Wall Street and William Street was appalling. Men with haggard faces and woe-begone expression hung listlessly on the corners of the streets. Hebrews of German birth bewailed themselves in Teutonic accents. One pillar of the synagogue was heard to declare that "nothing like this had been witnessed since the crossing of the Red Sea." It was no laughing matter. The fall in gold involved a corresponding fall in exchange, and in produce, groceries, and dry-goods. How many millions of apparent wealth were wiped out by this panic imagination only can figure. The Washington party were overwhelmed. They might possibly have stood their losses on gold. But when to these were added their losses on exchange, on tobacco, and other merchandise, even their gains were insufficient to carry them through, and they went down and were heard of no more. Some bankers who sold them options are said to remember them still.

The panic culminated in August, 1863, when Fort Wagner was taken, and our sanguine people pictured General Gillmore razing Charleston to the earth and sowing its site with salt. Gold then sold, for a day at least, at 120. From that point it rose, with many fluctuations, under the influence of natural causes, to 165 @ 175. Merchants were recovering from the losses they had suffered; exports were increasing; trade was improving; farmers were getting better prices for their produce. Every thing seemed quiet and, under the circumstances, as satisfactory as could have been expected.

At this juncture Mr. Chase put his foot in it. Mr. Chase is now Chief Justice of the United States, and will probably make the best Chief Justice we have had for half a century. But it is due to truth to say that he was a most miserable financier at this crisis. In the first place, instead of confining himself to his proper business, which was the providing of ways and means for the war, he persuaded himself that he was called upon to regulate prices. And then, instead of seeking light in history, he must needs repeat all the blunders which were made by France, Austria, and England during their suspensions of specie payments, though every book of history shows plainly how fatal those blunders had been. He first calmly swept aside the law which requires a sinking fund to be set apart for the redemption of the debt, and the other law which requires the customs duties to be paid in coin. He announced that he would receive payment of duties in paper at 165 cents for the gold dollar. Then he took a lesson from the example of the French Directory, and gave out that he would announce the price of gold every morning at the sub-treasury, and that this price should be the price for all day, no matter what news came to hand to vary it.

These absurd measures had their natural effect. The shrewd operators in gold—who by this time had established an exchange of their own—played on Mr. Chase as a man plays with a child. They made him vary his rate for gold to suit their speculations. They could easily foresee how long he could continue to dispense with gold receipts for customs; when the limit was reached, they knew he was at their mercy. Among merchants, the effect was still more grave. The violations of law perpetrated by the Secretary of the Treasury alarmed them, and shook their confidence in Government credit. Enormous quantities of goods were entered at the Custom-house, in the belief that when the time came for the resumption of the payment of duties in gold, the premium would advance. A general distrust in the wisdom of Government began to pervade the mercantile community. When Mr. Chase stopped receiving duties in paper, gold jumped up five to ten per cent.

Still the Secretary was not satisfied. He had borrowed a hint from the French Directory. He now took a lesson from the Committee of Public Safety, and persuaded Congress to pass the most insane measure ever placed on our statute book—the Gold Bill, as it was called. This preposterous enactment, seeking to prevent all dealings whatsoever in gold, pronounced a variety of ordinary and legitimate acts of commerce criminal, and exposed all persons engaged in foreign trade to prosecutions at law. Had this measure retained its place among our laws, the trade of the sea-board cities would have been destroyed, and the currency would long ere this have been worth no more than the rebel shin-plasters. The day the gold bill passed gold was quoted 200. It rose next day to 210, next day to 220, next day to 240, and in a week to 280. One reason alone sufficed to account for the advance. There were a large number of persons who believed in the Union, in the success of our armies, and in the ultimate redemption of the currency in coin. These persons had either sold gold short, believing it to be too high, or had postponed their payments of gold for duties and their remittances to Europe. When the gold bill passed, the gold-room was closed, and the trade in gold was at an end. One or two gold brokers still professed to deal in the article, but they were unwilling to make large engagements. A man who had to pay $100,000 duties on a cargo of teas or silks could not tell where to get the coin. The bears in gold—who were generally extra loyal men—were still more embarrassed. One man was short half a million of gold. He was called upon by his buyers to deliver. He went to every broker in the city; no one would sell him so large an amount. Of course he broke—owing to his excessive faith in the currency and in the soundness of Mr. Chase's system. If he had been a Copperhead and a believer in the worthlessness of greenbacks he would have made a fortune. Many contracts were settled during the few days of panic which followed the passage of the gold bill at a loss of 80 per cent., or $80,000 on every $100,000. Mr. Chase had certainly slaughtered his friends most thoroughly.

After a few days' experience of this monstrous bill Congress came to its senses and repealed it. Gold fell 25 per cent. on the repeal. The gold-room was re-opened, and merchants and speculators dealt therein as before. It has fluctuated since then with the fluctuations in public confidence, rising as high as 260 on bad news from the war, and falling on peace rumors to 185. But the trade in gold has been free, and hence, in the long-run, the fair trader may rely upon its finding its level.

Large fortunes have been made in gold, but it is very doubtful whether any of them have been kept. The fluctuations have been so severe that the most fortunate operators have been caught sooner or later. At least half a dozen men have been pointed out in Wall Street at different times as having realized their million by gold gambling; but not one of them has taken any of his gains away. There was a clique of rebels at Montreal, and another clique at Louisville, Kentucky, which used to operate largely in gold. So long as the premium advanced they did well enough, and not only made money, but laid the flattering unction to their souls that they were discrediting our currency. But by-and-by some victory of Sherman's or some peace canard in the papers caused a stampede in the gold-room, and away went profits and margins too. So with the loyal gamblers. So long as all seemed bright they saw money piling up on their side fast enough. But some day a reverse in the field, or a new currency issue—necessitated by the inexorable wants of Government—swept away their gains, and left them poorer than when they began. Whether it be the destiny of gold to advance even after the peace, as many now seem to think will be the case, in consequence of the enormous accumulation of debt which the Government will have to liquidate; or whether it fall to or near par, on the success of our armies and the restoration of the prolific South to the fold of the Union, one thing seems pretty clear: little or no money will be made by gambling in gold. Gentlemen in the country, who aspire to this short and easy road to fortune, try certain well-known "hells" at Newport and Saratoga. If you can make a fortune in the comfortable salons of these worthies, you may also make it in gold. But it is as easy to do it in one as in the other.

MR. FURBUSH.

IT is not very long since the community was startled by the report of an extraordinary murder that occurred at one of our fashionable hotels, under peculiar circumstances and in broad daylight, and without affording, as it appeared, the slightest clew to motive or murderer. Public curiosity, finding that nothing was likely to satisfy it, gradually dropped the matter, and as gradually it died out of the newspapers.

The person who was thus abruptly ushered from this world into the unknown region of the next was a young girl, some twenty summers old, and possessed of great personal charms. She was the heiress to a small fortune, a mere annuity, but had resided since her childhood with her guardian, the wealthy and generous Mr. Denbigh, who had always surrounded her with every luxury and elegance. When Mr. Denbigh married, he and his wife took their ward with them on the foreign tour they made, and the three had but just returned to America, residing temporarily at a hotel till their up-town mansion should be suitably prepared, when the sudden and terrible death of Miss Agatha More threw such a gloom over all their plans that the preparations were for a time abandoned, and Mr. Denbigh's energies were called upon to assist his wife in rallying from the low nervous fever into which she had been thrown and prostrated by this tragedy, when returning with her husband from a drive they had discovered it in all its horror.

Mr. Denbigh was himself greatly afflicted by the death of his ward and the fearful manner of it—she had been strangled in her own handkerchief—for besides the debt of affection he owed her as the child of a dear dead friend, long years of familiarity, her extreme loveliness, and the winning gentleness of her sweet and timid ways, had given her a deep and warm place in his heart. Of late she had been a little out of health, not recovering rapidly from the great exhaustion and weakness of severe sea-sickness, and he had been unremitting in his endeavors to promote her comfort and happiness; while in making ready their new abode, both he and his wife had paid such heed to the tastes and needs of Agatha, meaning, as Mr. Denbigh said, that it should be felt by her to be as much her own home as theirs, without any sense of obligation, that now the place without her seemed too much a desert ever to enter upon it again.

Mrs. Denbigh, moreover, must have felt sorely, it would seem, the loss of the gentle daily companion of three years; but even more than on her own account she appeared to resent the deed for the sake of her husband to whom she was so passionately devoted, and no sooner was she able to lift her head from its pillow once more than she interested herself with revengeful vigor in the proceedings that had been undertaken. Mr. Denbigh, personally, cared little to discover the perpetrator of the atrocious crime; he felt that no human justice of cord or gibbet could restore Agatha; but his wife, burdened with their bereavement and with her own weight of indignation, would not rest with the mystery unraveled. In the deepest mourning, discarding almost every ornament, impressing so upon them more deeply the emergencies of the case and commanding their sympathies, she was closeted every morning with the detectives of the police, sparing her husband as much of the painful duty as possible, as she would have walked over burning plow-shares at a word from him.

It was at first supposed that the deed had been done for plunder, as various valuable jewels, gifts of the Denbighs, and heir-loom from Miss More's own mother, were discovered to be missing; but they afforded in themselves insufficient reason, and were subsequently discovered in a package picked up by one of the police themselves at the crossing of a crowded thoroughfare where they had apparently been purposely dropped. Neither did Miss More's lovers afford any clew to the miscreant; she had had several suitors and attendants, none of whom had Mr. Denbigh favored; and though Mrs. Denbigh had urged Agatha to regard young Elliot with kindness, Mr. Denbigh had frowned, Agatha had remained indifferent, and young Elliot, having taunted Mr. Denbigh with the assurance that since he countenanced none of Miss More's lovers it could be but from sinister intentions on his own part, had withdrawn, vowing vengeance, and declaring that, since he could not have her, nobody else should. Still that was hardly murder. And the poor fellow was found, besides, to be in such a heart-broken state as to disarm suspicion. The only other accusation that could take shape and breath might have been directed toward Agatha's maid; but as she was able to prove that she was down in the laundry, and had remained there uninterruptedly from nine till one, while the occurrence had taken place between the hours of eleven and twelve in the morning, and as she had evidently nothing to gain and much to lose by it, that idea also was dismissed, though both young Elliot and the servant-maid remained under surveillance. Finally, in despair the Denbighs abandoned the investigation, and departed to spend the winter in Madeira, returning in the spring to their city abode, whose adornment had been left to the tender mercies of the upholsterers, since they had themselves so completely lost interest in it.

Here the general course of the matter rested. One officer alone, Detective Furbush—a man of genteel proclivities, fond of fancy parties and the haut ton, curious in fine women and aristocratic defaulters and speculators—who had not at first been detailed upon the case, but had been interested in the reports of it, having become at last much in earnest about it, pursued it still, incidentally, on his own account and in a kind of amateur way. It seemed to him a fatal fascination, a predestination of events that kept his steps nearly always about the purlieus of the Margrand House.

One day that Detective Furbush had happened, in a spare hour, to take his little daughter into a photograph gallery, he lounged about a window while the child was undergoing the awful operation. Along the opposite side of the street from this window ran one end of the Margrand House, with its countless windows and projections. The Margrand House fronted on a square, one end of it running down this street, and always receiving, on its stone facings and adornments, the whole sheet of the noon sun. A thought suddenly occurred to Mr. Furbush. So soon as the operator was at leisure he attacked him with the inquiry if there were any picture of that fine building, the Margrand House? To which the operator replied affirmatively, and showed him one taken from the square. "However," said the operator, "though it doesn't take in so much, and was only what this window could do for itself, I call this a prettier picture," and he produced something which, having been taken at such short focal distance, resembled the photographs of the rich architecture of some Venetian façade. "It was the morning of the Great Walden Celebration," continued the operator.

"What one?" asked Mr. Furbush.

"The Great Walden Celebration."

"Ah yes," responded Mr. Furbush, not letting the rest of his thought reach the air, running as it did, "that was the morning of the More murder."

"And we let one of the boys try his hand at the craft," resumed the operator, there being nothing doing; and it was such a lively scene in the street below, narrow as it is. And, as was to be expected from him, the crowd and procession turned into dot and line, and the whole of that part of the building opposite came out as if it had sat for its picture."

"Exactly," said Mr. Furbush, as, rubbing his finger over his lips, he looked at the sheet on which the central portion of that side of the hotel, with its quaint windows and lintels and ornamentation were most minutely given. It was in that very portion of the house that Miss Agatha More's room had been situated; nay, so well was it all impressed upon him, that Mr. Furbush could tell the very window of the room in which she had met her cruel fate. Never was there such a coincidence, to Mr. Furbush's mind, before or since, never such an interposition of Providence: the day that an unknown hand had brought Agatha More to her doom, perhaps the very hour, the sun had made a revelation of that room's interior upon this sheet of sensitized paper, his Ithuriel's spear had touched this shapeless darkness and turned it into form and truth. The Walden Celebration had defiled through the street and into the square, at a somewhat earlier hour than the supposed hour of the murder, since it was to see the procession from a more advantageous point of view that Mr. and Mrs. Denbigh had driven out, and while they were gone the terrible action was thought to have been committed. Still the window might have a secret of its own to tell even concerning that.

Straightway Mr. Furbush made a prize of the operator; and procuring, through channels always open to him, the strongest glasses and most accurate instruments, had the one chosen window in that picture magnified and photographed, remagnified and rephotographed, till under their powerful, careful, prolonged, and patient labor, a speck came into sight that would perhaps well reward them. Mr. Furbush strained his eyes over it; to him it was a spot of greater possibilities than the nebula in Orion. This little white unresolved cloud, again and again they subjected to the same process, and once more, as if a ghost had made apparition, it opened itself into an outline—into a substance—and they saw the fingers of a hand, a white hand, doubled, but pliant, strong, and shapely; a left hand, on its third finger wearing rings, one of which seemed at first a mere blot of light, but, gradually as the rest, answering the spell of the camera, showed itself a central stone set with five points, each point consisting of smaller stones: the color of course could not be told; the form was that of a star. Held in the tight, fierce fingers of that clenched hand, between the pointed thumb and waxy knuckles, and one edge visible along the tips deep dented into the thumb's side, was grasped an end of a laced handkerchief. Now the handkerchief of Agatha More, the instrument of her destruction, was always carried folded in the shape of its running knot in Mr.

Furbush's great wallet, a large, laced, embroidered handkerchief; that this was its photograph he needed but a glance to rest assured. All the rest of the dark deed was hidden beyond the angle of light afforded by the window-frame. And whosoever the murderer might be, Mr. Furbush said to himself with the pleasantry of the headsman, it was evident that the owner of this picture had a hand in it. And here he paid the photographer for his labors and bade him adieu.

Mr. Furbush was now, however, not much better off than he had been before. He had the hand that did the deed in his possession, to be sure, but to whose body was he to affix that hand, and how was he to do it? And in what did it differ from any other hand? In nothing but that fetter which made it his prisoner, that five-pointed star, that blot of light upon the third finger, above a wedding-ring. A wedding-ring—that would seem to prove the hand to be a woman's; the five-pointed glittering ring—that proved the woman to be no pauper. Worn above the wedding-ring, it must be its guard, and was probably as inseparable as that. To identify that hand, to certify that ring, became the recreation of Mr. Furbush's days and nights, so much to the detriment of all his other business that he fell into sad disrepute thereby at the Bureau. Mr. Furbush became all at once a gay man, plunged into the dissipations of fashionable life; he had been there before, on similar necessity, and knew how to carry himself. His costume grew singularly correct, he handled his lorgnette at the Opera like a coxcomb of the first milk-and-water; he procured invitations to ball and party, and watched every lady who for the moment daintily ungloved herself; he was as constant at church as the sexton; he made a part of the beau-monde. It was all in vain. And though Mr. Furbush carried the photograph in his breast-pocket, ready at any moment to descend like the hand of the Inquisition upon its victim, he might as well have carried there a pardon to all concerned, for all the good it did him.

But the world goes round.

One starlit night Mr. Furbush, pursuing some scent of other affairs along the princely avenue with its rows of palaces, took in, as was his wont, with every wink, a whole scene to its last details. He saw the beggar on these steps shrink into shadow, the house-maid in that area listening to the beguiling voice of the footman-three-doors-off no longer keeping his distance; he saw, there, the gay scene offered by the bright balcony casement with its rich curtains still unclosed; he saw, yet beyond, the light streaming from between open doors down the shining steps at whose foot the carriage waited, while a gentleman at its door hurried, with a pleasant word, the stately woman who came down to enter it beside him. She came down slowly, Mr. Furbush noted, moving like a person whom organic difficulty of the heart indisposes to quick exertion; she was one of those whom Mr. Furbush called magnificent—great coils of blue-black hair, twisted with diamonds, wreathing her queenly head tiara-wise, her features having the firmness and the pallor of marble, her eyes rivaling the diamonds in their steady splendor. A heavy cloak of ermine wrapped her velvet attire, and she was buttoning a glove as she descended. She paused a moment under the carriage-lamp, giving her husband the ungloved hand with which to help her in. The carriage-light flashed upon it, and in that second of its lingering Mr. Furbush saw, plainly as he saw the stars above him, on the third finger of that left hand, above the wedding-ring, the circlet with its five-pointed star whose duplicate he carried.

Mr. Furbush was thunder-struck. Here was what he had sought for thrice a twelvemonth; and unexpectedly blundering upon it it turned him into stone. When he recovered himself with an emphatic "Humph!" the carriage had rolled away and the doors were closed.

Mr. Furbush was not the man to lose opportunities. The business in hand might go to the dogs; to-morrow would answer as well for that as to-night; for this there was no time like the present. Fortified with an outside subordinate he demanded entrance into the mansion alone, and announcing his intention to await the arrival home of the master and mistress, made himself agreeable to the footman and butler in the upper hall till hour after hour pealing forth at last struck midnight as if they tolled a knell. The footman was asleep in his chair, the butler heard the mellifluous murmur of the visitor's voice by starts with a singing sensation as if his fingers were in his ears and out again momentarily. The wheels grated on the curb below, the horses hammered the pavement, the doors were flung apart, and the master and mistress of the house returned from the entertainments they had shared. She was a little paler, a little more magnificent, a little more imposing in her height and dignity than before; there was only one emotion, though, apparent through it all—that she valued her beauty and her power only for its influence upon the man beside her. Mr. Furbush's keen eye saw the quick heave and restless agitation that the heart kept up beneath the velvets, simply in the moment when her husband touched her hand helping her across the threshold, and saw the whole story of her eye as it rested that instant on his. He would have had the entire case at once—if he had not had it before.

"Mr. and Mrs. Denbigh," said he, approaching them then, "may I beg to see you alone for a few moments on a matter of importance?"

And in conformity with his request he was conducted, through other apartments, into a library, a place more secluded than they, a rather sombre room, wainscoted all its lofty height in book-cases, and with here and there a glimmering bust. Mr. Denbigh himself turned up the gas and closed the door.

"Your business, Sir?" said he then to Mr. Furbush.

"My business, Sir, is more particularly with Mrs. Denbigh; although I desire your presence. I am a member of the police—"

Mrs. Denbigh, who yet stood with her hand laid passively along the back of a chair, slowly grasped the back till the glove that she wore with a quick crack ripped down the length of the finger, and the five-pointed ring protruded its sparkling face like the vicious head of a serpent.

"I am a member of the police," continued Mr. Furbush, quietly. "I have something in my possession which I desire Mrs. Denbigh to look at and see if it belong to her." Perhaps the woman breathed again. Whether she did or not he proceeded to open his great leathern wallet on the library-table beneath the chandelier.

Mrs. Denbigh moved forward with her slow majesty, dragging her velvets heavily, and the cloak dropping from her shoulder.

"Queer subjects—women," thought Mr. Furbush. "Ah! you had more spring in you once. As handsome a thing as a leopard!"

But in spite of that calm deliberate step Mr. Furbush saw her heart fluttering there like a white dove in its nest. She did not speak, but waited a moment beside him. "Will you be so kind," said he, "as to remove your glove?"

She quietly did so. Perhaps wonderingly.

"Excuse me, madame," then continued he, lifting her hand as he spoke, doubling its cold fingers over one end of a running-knot that a soiled handkerchief made, a laced embroidered handkerchief he had produced, and, powerless in his grasp, he laid hand and all—a white hand, doubled, but pliant, strong, and shapely, holding in its fingers, between the pointed thumb and waxy knuckles, the laced handkerchief's end, just an edge visible along the tips deep-dented into the thumb's side; and with the five-pointed ring burning its bale-fire above it, laid hand and all on the table beside the photograph that he spread there.

"Is it yours?" said he.

A detective has perhaps no right to any pity;

but for a moment Mr. Furbush would gladly have never heard of the More murder as he saw in the long, slow rise and fall of the bosom this woman's heart swing like a pendulum, a noiseless pendulum that ceases to vibrate. Her eyes wavered a moment between him and the table, then, as if caught and chained by something that compelled their gaze, glared at and protruded over the sight they saw beneath them. Her own hand—her own executioner. A long shudder shook her from head to foot. Iron nerve gave way, the white lips parted, she threw her head back and gasped; with one wild look toward her husband she turned from him as if she would have fled and fell dead upon the floor.

"Hunt's up," said Mr. Furbush to his subordinate, coming out an hour or two later, and the two found some congenial oyster-opener, while the Chief explained how he had gone to get his wife's spoons from the maid who had appropriated them and taken service elsewhere. Mr. Furbush made a night of it; but never soul longed for daylight as he did, he had a notion that he had scarcely less than murdered—himself; and good-fellow as he must needs be abroad that night, indoors next day he put his household in sackcloth and ashes.

You will not find Mr. Furbush's name on the list of detectives now. He has sickened of the business. He says there was too much night-work. He has found a patron now—a wealthy one apparently. He has opened one of the largest and most elegant photographing establishments in the city; he was always fond of chemicals, he says. He has still, in an inner drawer, some singular but fast-fading likenesses of a hand, a clenched, murderous hand—among them not the one which Mr. Denbigh burned. He has a few secrets appertaining to his profession, which no one else has yet obtained. Meanwhile it has never been exactly explained how the story of the ring found the light.

Perhaps it was in order that Mr. Furbush might never be convicted of compounding a felony!

CHAPTER I.

LURKING MISCHIEF.

1.—From Ozias Midwinter to Mr. Brock.

"THORPE-AMBROSE, June 15, 1851.

"DEAR MR. BROCK,—Only an hour since we reached this house, just as the servants were locking up for the night. Allan has gone to bed, worn out by our long day's journey, and has left me in the room they call the library, to tell you the story of our journey to Norfolk. Being better seasoned than he is to fatigues of all kinds, my eyes are quite wakeful enough for writing a letter, though the clock on the chimney-piece points to midnight, and we have been traveling since ten in the morning.

"The last news you had of us was news sent by Allan from the Isle of Man. If I am not mistaken, he wrote to tell you of the night we passed on board the wrecked ship. Forgive me, dear Mr. Brock, if I say nothing on that subject until time has helped me to think of it with a quieter mind. The hard fight against myself must all be fought over again; but I will win it yet, please God; I will indeed.

"There is no need to trouble you with any account of our journeyings about the northern and western districts of the island; or of the short cruises we took when the repairs of the yacht were at last complete. It will be better if I get on at once to the morning of yesterday, the fourteenth. We had come in with the night-tide to Douglas harbor; and, as soon as the post-office was open, Allan, by my advice, sent on shore for letters. The messenger returned with one letter only; and the writer of it proved to be the former mistress of Thorpe-Ambrose—Mrs. Blanchard.

“You ought to be informed, I think, of the contents of this letter; for it has seriously influenced Allan's plans. He loses every thing, sooner or later, as you know, and he has lost the letter already. So I must give you the substance of what Mrs. Blanchard wrote to him, as plainly as I can.

“The first page announced the departure of the ladies from Thorpe-Ambrose. They left on the day before yesterday—the thirteenth—having, after much hesitation, finally decided on going abroad, to visit some old friends settled in Italy, in the neighborhood of Florence. It appears to be quite possible that Mrs. Blanchard and her niece may settle there too, if they can find a suitable house and grounds to let. They both like the Italian country and the Italian people, and they are well enough off to please themselves. The elder lady has her jointure, and the younger is in possession of all her father's fortune.

"The next page of the letter was, in Allan's opinion, far from a pleasant page to read. After referring, in the most grateful terms, to the kindness which had left her niece and herself free to leave their old home at their own time, Mrs. Blanchard added that Allan's considerate conduct had produced such a strongly favorable impression among the friends and dependents of the family, that they were desirous of giving him a public reception on his arrival among them. A preliminary meeting of the tenants on the estate, and the principal persons in the neighboring town, had already been held to discuss the arrangements; and a letter might be expected shortly from the clergyman, inquiring when it would suit Mr. Armadale's convenience to take possession personally and publicly of his estates in Norfolk.

"You will now be able to guess the cause of our sudden departure from the Isle of Man. The first and foremost idea in your old pupil's mind, as soon as he had read Mrs. Blanchard's account of the proceedings at the meeting, was the idea of escaping the public reception; and the one certain way he could see of avoiding it, was to start for Thorpe-Ambrose before the clergyman's letter could reach him. I tried hard to make him think a little before he acted on his first impulse in this matter; but he only went on packing his portmanteau in his own impenetrably good-humored way. In ten minutes his luggage was ready, and in five minutes more he had given the crew their directions for taking the yacht back to Somersetshire. The steamer to Liverpool was alongside of us in the harbor, and I had really no choice but to go on board with him, or to let him go by himself. I spare you the account of our stormy voyage, of our detention at Liverpool, and of the trains we missed on our journey across the country. You know that we have got here safely, and that is enough. What the servants think of the new squire's sudden appearance among them, without a word of warning, is of no great consequence. What the committee for arranging the public reception may think of it, when the news flies abroad to-morrow, is, I am afraid, a more serious matter.

"Having already mentioned the servants, I may proceed to tell you that the latter part of Mrs. Blanchard's letter was entirely devoted to instructing Allan on the subject of the domestic establishment which she has left behind her. It seems that all the servants, indoors and out (with three exceptions), are waiting here, on the chance that Allan will continue them in their places. Two of these exceptions are readily accounted for: Mrs. Blanchard's maid and Miss Blanchard's maid go abroad with their mistresses. The third exceptional case is the case of the upper house-maid; and here there is a little hitch. In plain words, the house-maid has been sent away at a moment's notice, for what Mrs. Blanchard rather mysteriously describes as 'levity of conduct with a stranger.'

"I am afraid you will laugh at me, but I must confess the truth. I have been made so distrustful (after what happened to us in the Isle of Man) of even the most trifling misadventures, which connect themselves in any way with Allan's introduction to his new life and prospects, that I have already questioned one of the men-servants here about this apparently unimportant matter of the house-maid's going away in disgrace. All I can learn is, that a strange man had been noticed hanging suspiciously about the grounds; that the house-maid was so ugly a woman as to render it next to a certainty that he had some underhand purpose to serve in making himself agreeable to her; and that he has not as yet been seen again in the neighborhood since the day of her dismissal. So much for the one servant who has been turned out at Thorpe-Ambrose. I can only hope there is no trouble for Allan brewing in that quarter. As for the other servants who remain, Mrs. Blanchard describes them, both men and women, as perfectly trust-worthy; and they will all, no doubt, continue to occupy their present places.

"Having now done with Mrs. Blanchard's letter, my next duty is to beg you, in Allan's name and with Allan's love, to come here and stay with him at the earliest moment when you can leave Somersetshire. Although I can not presume to think that my own wishes will have any special influence in determining you to accept this invitation, I must nevertheless acknowledge that I have a reason of my own for earnestly desiring to see you here. Allan has innocently caused me a new anxiety about my future relations with him, and I sorely need your advice to show me the right way of setting that anxiety at rest.

"The difficulty which now perplexes me relates to the steward's place at Thorpe-Ambrose. Before to-day I only knew that Allan had hit on some plan of his own for dealing with this matter; rather strangely involving, among other results, the letting of the cottage which was the old steward's place of abode, in consequence of the new steward's contemplated residence in the great house. A chance word in our conversation on the journey here led Allan into speaking out more plainly than he had spoken yet; and I heard, to my unutterable astonishment, that the person who was at the bottom of the whole arrangement about the steward was no other than myself!

"It is needless to tell you how I felt this new instance of Allan's kindness. The first pleasure of hearing from his own lips that I had deserved the strongest proof he could give of his confidence in me was soon dashed by the pain which mixes itself with all pleasure—at least with all that I have ever known. Never has my past life seemed so dreary to look back on as it seems now, when I feel how entirely it has unfitted me to take the place of all others that I should have liked to occupy in my friend's service. I mustered courage to tell him that I had none of the business knowledge and business experience which his steward ought to possess. He generously met the objection by telling me that I could learn; and he promised to send to London for the person who had already been employed for the time being in the steward's office, and who would, therefore, be perfectly competent to teach me. Do you, too, think I can learn? If you do, I will work day and night to instruct myself. But if (as I am afraid) the steward's duties are of far too serious a kind to be learned off-hand by a man so young and so inexperienced as I am—then, pray hasten your journey to Thorpe-Ambrose, and exert your influence over Allan personally. Nothing less will induce him to pass me over, and to employ a steward who is really fit to take the place. Pray, pray, act in this matter as you think best for Allan's interests. Whatever disappointment I may feel he shall not see it.

"Believe me, dear Mr. Brock,

"Gratefully yours,

"OZIAS MIDWINTER.

"P.S.—I open the envelope again to add one word more. If you have heard or seen any thing since your return to Somersetshire of the woman in the black dress and the red shawl, I hope you will not forget, when you write, to let me know it.—O. M."

2.—From Mrs. Oldershaw to Miss Gwilt.

"LADIES' TOILET REPOSITORY, DIANA STREET, PIMLICO: Wednesday."

"MY DEAR LYDIA,—To save the post I write to you after a long day's worry at my place of business, on the business letter-paper, having news since we last met, which it seems advisable to send you at the earliest opportunity.

"To begin at the beginning. After carefully considering the thing, I am quite sure you will do wisely with young Armadale if you hold your tongue about Madeira, and all that happened there. Your position was, no doubt, a very strong one with his mother. You had privately helped her in playing a trick on her own father—you had been ungratefully dismissed, at a pitifully tender age, as soon as you had served her purpose—and when you came upon her suddenly, after a separation of more than twenty years, you found her in failing health, with a grown-up son, whom she had kept in total ignorance of the true story of her marriage. Have you any such advantages as these with the young gentleman who has survived her! If he is not a born idiot, he will decline to believe your shocking aspersions on the memory of his mother; and—seeing that you have no proofs at this distance of time to meet him with—there is an end of your money-grubbing in the golden Armadale diggings. Mind! I don't dispute that the old lady's heavy debt of obligation, after what you did for her in Madeira, is not paid yet, and that the son is the next person to settle with you, now the mother has slipped through your fingers. Only squeeze him the right way, my dear, that's what I venture to suggest—squeeze him the right way.

"And which is the right way? This brings me to my news. Have you thought again of that other notion of yours of trying your hand on this lucky young gentleman, with nothing but your own good looks and your own quick wits to help you? The idea hung on my mind so strangely after you were gone, that it ended in my sending a little note to my lawyer to have the will under which young Armadale has got his fortune examined at Doctors' Commons. The result turns out to be something infinitely more encouraging than either you or I could possibly have hoped for. After the lawyer's report to me there can not be a moment's doubt of what you ought to do. In two words, Lydia, take the bull by the horns—and marry him!!!

"I am quite serious. He is much better worth the venture than you suppose. Only persuade him to make you Mrs. Armadale, and you may set all after-discoveries at flat defiance. As long as he lives you can make your own terms with him; and if he dies the will entitles you, in spite of any thing he can say or do—with children, or without them—to an income, chargeable on his estate, of twelve hundred a year for life. There is no doubt about this—the lawyer himself has looked at the will. Of course Mr. Blanchard had his son and his son's widow in his eye when he made the provision. But as it is not limited to any one heir by name, and not revoked any where, it now holds as good with young Armadale as it would have held under other circumstances with Mr. Blanchard's son. What a chance for you, after all the miseries and the dangers you have gone through, to be mistress of Thorpe-Ambrose if he lives; to have an income for life if he dies! Hook him, my poor dear; hook him at any sacrifice.

"I dare say you will make the same objection when you read this which you made when we were talking about it the other day—I mean, the objection of your age. Now, my good creature, just listen to me. The question is—not whether you were five-and-thirty last birthday; we will own the dreadful truth, and say you were—but whether you do look, or don't look, your real age. My opinion on this matter ought to be, and is, one of the best opinions in London. I have had twenty years' experience among our charming sex in making up battered old faces and worn-out old figures to look like new—and I say positively you don't look a day over thirty, if as much. If you will follow my advice about dressing, and use one or two of my applications privately, I guarantee to put you back three years more. I will forfeit all the money I shall have to advance for you in this matter, if, when I have ground you young again in my wonderful mill, you look more than seven-and-twenty in any man's eyes living—except, of course, when you wake anxious in the small hours of the morning; and then, my dear, you will be old and ugly in the retirement of your own room, and it won't matter.

“‘But,’ you may say, ‘supposing all this, here I am, at my very best, a good six years older than he is; and that is against me at starting.’ Is it? Just think again. Surely your own experience must have shown you that the commonest of all common weaknesses in young fellows of this Armadale's age is to fall in love with women older than themselves? Who are the men who really appreciate us in the bloom of our youth (I'm sure I have cause to speak well of the bloom of youth; I made fifty guineas to-day by putting it on the spotted shoulders of a woman old enough to be your mother)—who are the men, I say, who are ready to worship us when we are mere babies of seventeen? The gay young gentlemen in the bloom of their own youth? No! The cunning old wretches who are on the wrong side of forty.

“‘And what is the moral of this, as the story-books say? The moral is that the chances, with such a head as you have got on your shoulders, are all in your favor. If you feel your present forlorn position, as I believe you do; if you know what a charming woman (in the men's eyes) you can still be when you please; and if all your old resolution has really come back, after that shocking outbreak of desperation on board the steamer (natural enough, I own, under the dreadful provocation laid on you), you will want no further persuasion from me to try this experiment. Only to think of how things turn out! If the other young booby had not jumped into the river after you, this young booby would never have had the estate. It really looks as if fate had determined that you were to be Mrs. Armadale, of Thorpe-Ambrose—and who can control his fate, as the poet says?

“Send me one line to say, Yes or No; and believe me,

“Your attached old friend,

“MARIA OLDERSHAW.”

3.—From Miss Gwilt to Mrs. Oldershaw.

“RICHMOND, Thursday.

“YOU OLD WRETCH,—I won't say Yes or No till I have had a long, long look at my glass first. If you had any real regard for any body but your wicked old self, you would know that the bare idea of marrying again (after what I have gone through) is an idea that makes my flesh creep.

“But there can be no harm in your sending me a little more information while I am making up my mind. You have got twenty pounds of mine still left out of those things you sold for me: send ten pounds here for my expenses, in a post-office order, and use the other ten for making private inquiries at Thorpe-Ambrose. I want to know when the two Blanchard women go away, and when young Armadale stirs up the dead ashes in the family fire-place. Are you quite sure he will turn out as easy to manage as you think? If he takes after his hypocrite of a mother, I can tell you this—Judas Iscariot has come to life again.

“I am very comfortable in this lodging. There are lovely flowers in the garden, and the birds wake me in the morning delightfully. I have hired a reasonably good piano. The only man I care two straws about—don't be alarmed; he was laid in his grave many a long year ago under the name of BEETHOVEN—keeps me company in my lonely hours. The landlady would keep me company, too, if I would only let her. I hate women. The new curate paid a visit to the other lodger yesterday, and passed me on the lawn as he came out. My eyes have lost nothing yet, at any rate, though I am five-and-thirty; the poor man actually blushed when I looked at him! What sort of color do you think he would have turned if one of the little birds in the garden had whispered in his ear and told him the true story of the charming Miss Gwilt?

“Good-by, mother Oldershaw. I rather doubt whether I am yours, or any body's, affectionately; but we all tell lies at the bottoms of our letters, don't we? If you are my attached old friend, I must of course be “Yours affectionately,

“LYDIA GWILT.”

“P.S.—Keep your odious powders and paints and washes for the spotted shoulders of your customers; not one of them shall touch my skin, I promise you. If you really want to be useful, try and find out some quieting draught to keep me from grinding my teeth in my sleep. I shall break them one of these nights; and then what will become of my beauty, I wonder?”

4.—From Mrs. Oldershaw to Miss Gwilt.

“LADIES' TOILET REPOSITORY, Tuesday.

“MY DEAR LYDIA,—It is a thousand pities your letter was not addressed to Mr. Armadale; your graceful audacity would have charmed him. It doesn't affect me; I am so well used to it, you know. Why waste your sparkling wit, my love, on your own impenetrable Oldershaw? it only splutters and goes out. Will you try and be serious this next time? I have news for you from Thorpe-Ambrose, which is beyond a joke, and which must not be trifled with.

“An hour after I got your letter I set the inquiries on foot. Not knowing what consequences they might lead to, I thought it safest to begin in the dark. Instead of employing any of the people whom I have at my own disposal (who know you and know me), I went to the Private Inquiry Office in Shadyside Place; and put the matter in the inspector's hands, in the character of a perfect stranger, and without mentioning you at all. This was not the cheapest way of going to work, I own; but it was the safest way, which is of much greater consequence.

“The inspector and I understood each other in ten minutes; and the right person for the purpose—the most harmless-looking young man you ever saw in your life—was produced immediately. He left for Thorpe-Ambrose an hour after I saw him. I arranged to call at the office on the afternoons of Saturday, Monday, and to-day for news. There was no news till to-day; and there I found our Confidential Agent just returned to town, and waiting to favor me with a full account of his trip to Norfolk.

“First of all, let me quiet your mind about those two questions of yours; I have got answers to both the one and the other. The Blanchard women go away to foreign parts on the thirteenth; and young Armadale is at this moment cruising somewhere at sea in his yacht. There is talk at Thorpe-Ambrose of giving him a public reception, and of calling a meeting of the local grandees to settle it all. The speechifying and fuss on these occasions generally wastes plenty of time; and the public reception is not thought likely to meet the new Squire much before the end of the month.

“If our messenger had done no more for us than this I think he would have earned his money. But the harmless young man is a regular Jesuit at a private inquiry—with this great advantage over all the Popish priests I have ever seen, that he has not got his slyness written in his face. Having to get his information through the female servants, in the usual way, he addressed himself, with admirable discretion, to the ugliest woman in the house. ‘When they are nice-looking, and can pick and choose,’ as he neatly expressed it to me, ‘they waste a great deal of valuable time in deciding on a sweet-heart. When they are ugly, and haven’t got the ghost of a chance of choosing, they snap at a sweet-heart, if he comes their way, like a starved dog at a bone.’ Acting on these excellent principles, our Confidential Agent succeeded, after certain unavoidable delays, in addressing himself to the upper house-maid at Thorpe-Ambrose, and took full possession of her confidence at the first interview. Bearing his instructions carefully in mind, he encouraged the woman to chatter, and was favored, of course, with all the gossip of the servants’ hall. The greater part of it (as repeated to me) was of no earthly importance. But I listened patiently, and was rewarded by a valuable discovery at last. Here it is.

“It seems there is an ornamental cottage in the grounds at Thorpe-Ambrose. For some reason unknown young Armadale has chosen to let it; and a tenant has come in already. He is a poor half-pay major in the army, named Milroy—a meek sort of man, by all accounts, with a turn for occupying himself in mechanical pursuits, and with a domestic encumbrance in the shape of a bedridden wife, who has not been seen by any body. Well, and what of all this? you will ask, with that sparkling impatience which becomes you so well. My dear Lydia, don’t sparkle! The man’s family affairs seriously concern us both; for, as ill-luck will have it, the man has got a daughter!

“You may imagine how I questioned our agent, and how our agent ransacked his memory, when I stumbled, in due course, upon such a discovery as this. If heaven is responsible for women’s chattering tongues, heaven be praised! From Miss Blanchard to Miss Blanchard’s maid; from Miss Blanchard’s maid to Miss Blanchard’s aunt’s maid; from Miss Blanchard’s aunt’s maid to the ugly house-maid; from the ugly house-maid to the harmless-looking young man—so the stream of gossip trickled into the right reservoir at last, and thirsty mother Oldershaw has drunk it all up. In plain English, my dear, this is how it stands. The major’s daughter is a minx just turned sixteen; lively and nice-looking (hateful little wretch!), dowdy in her dress (thank Heaven!), and deficient in her manners (thank Heaven again!). She has been brought up at home. The governess who last had charge of her left before her father moved to Thorpe-Ambrose. Her education stands woefully in want of a finishing touch, and the major doesn’t quite know what to do next. None of his friends can recommend him a new governess, and he doesn’t like the notion of sending the girl to school. So matters rest at present, on the major’s own showing—for so the major expressed himself at a morning call which the father and daughter paid to the ladies at the great house.

“You have now got my promised news, and you will have little difficulty, I think, in agreeing with me, that the Armadale business must be settled at once, one way or the other. If—with your hopeless prospects, and with what I may call your family claim on this young fellow—you decide on giving him up, I shall have the pleasure of sending you the balance of your account with me (seven-and-twenty shillings), and shall then be free to devote myself entirely to my own proper business. If, on the contrary, you decide to try your luck at Thorpe-Ambrose, then (there being no kind of doubt that the major’s minx will set her cap at the young squire) I should be glad to hear how you mean to meet the double difficulty of inflaming Mr. Armadale and extinguishing Miss Milroy.

“Affectionately yours,

“MARIA OLDERSHAW.”

5.—From Miss Gwilt to Mrs. Oldershaw. (First Answer.)

“RICHMOND, Wednesday Morning.

“MRS. OLDERSHAW,—Send me my seven-and-twenty shillings, and devote yourself to your own proper business.

“Yours,

“L. G.”

6.—From Miss Gwilt to Mrs. Oldershaw. (Second Answer.)

“RICHMOND, Wednesday Night.

“DEAR OLD LOVE,—Keep the seven-and-twenty shillings, and burn my other letter. I have changed my mind.

“I wrote the first time after a horrible night.

I write, this time, after a ride on horseback, a tumbler of claret, and the breast of a chicken. Is that explanation enough? Please say yes—for I want to go back to my piano.

"No; I can't go back yet—I must answer your question first. But are you really so very simple as to suppose that I don't see straight through you and your letter? You know that the major's difficulty is our opportunity, as well as I do—but you want me to take the responsibility of making the first proposal; don't you? Suppose I take it in your own roundabout way? Suppose I say—pray don't ask me how I propose inflaming Mr. Armadale and extinguishing Miss Milroy; the question is so shockingly abrupt I really can't answer it. Ask me instead, if it is the modest ambition of my life to become Miss Milroy's governess? Yes, if you please, Mrs. Oldershaw—and if you will assist me by becoming my reference.

"There it is, for you! If some serious disaster happens (which is quite possible), what a comfort it will be to remember that it was all my fault!

"Now I have done this for you, will you do something for me? I want to dream away the little time I am likely to have left here in my own way. Be a merciful mother Oldershaw, and spare me the worry of looking at the Ins and Outs, and adding up the chances For and Against, in this new venture of mine. Think for me, in short, until I am obliged to think for myself.

"I had better not write any more, or I shall say something savage that you won't like. I am in one of my tempers to-night. I want a husband to vex, or a child to beat, or something of that sort. Do you ever like to see the summer insects kill themselves in the candle? I do, sometimes. Good-night, Mrs. Jezabel. The longer you can leave me here the better. The air agrees with me, and I am looking charmingly.

7.—From Mrs. Oldershaw to Miss Gwilt.

"Thursday.

"MY DEAR LYDIA,—Some persons in my situation might be a little offended at the tone of your last letter. But I am so fondly attached to you! And when I love a person, it is so very hard, my dear, for that person to offend me! Don't ride quite so far, and only drink half a tumblerful of claret next time. I say no more.

"Shall we leave off our fencing-match and come to serious matters now? How curiously hard it always seems to be for women to understand each other—especially when they have got their pens in their hands! But suppose we try.

"Well, then, to begin with—I gather from your letter that you have wisely decided to try the Thorpe-Ambrose experiment—and to secure, if you can, an excellent position at starting, by becoming a member of Major Milroy's household. If the circumstances turn against you, and some other woman gets the governess's place (about which I shall have something more to say presently), you will then have no choice but to make Mr. Armadale's acquaintance in some other character.* In any case, you will want my assistance; and the first question therefore to set at rest between us, is the question of what I am willing to do, and what I can do, to help you.

"A woman, my dear Lydia, with your appearance, your manners, your abilities, and your education, can make almost any excursions into society that she pleases, if she only has money in her pocket and a respectable reference to appeal to in cases of emergency. As to the money, in the first place. I will engage to find it, on condition of your remembering my assistance with adequate pecuniary gratitude, if you win the Armadale prize. Your promise so to remember me, embodying the terms in plain figures, shall be drawn out on paper by my own lawyer, so that we can sign and settle at once when I see you in London.

"Next, as to the reference. Here, again, my services are at your disposal—on another condition. It is this: that you present yourself at Thorpe-Ambrose, under the name to which you have returned, ever since that dreadful business of your marriage—I mean your own maiden name of Gwilt. I have only one motive in insisting on this; I wish to run no needless risks. My experience, as confidential adviser of my customers, in various romantic cases of private embarrassment, has shown me that an assumed name is, nine times out of ten, a very unnecessary and a very dangerous form of deception. Nothing could justify your assuming a name but the fear of young Armadale's detecting you—a fear from which we are fortunately relieved by his mother's own conduct in keeping your early connection with her a profound secret from her son, and from every body.

"The next and last perplexity to settle relates, my dear, to the chances for and against your finding your way, in the capacity of governess, into Major Milroy's house. Once inside the door, with your knowledge of music and languages, if you can keep your temper, you may be sure of keeping the place. The only doubt, as things are now, is whether you can get it.

"In the major's present difficulty about his daughter's education, the chances are, I think, in favor of his advertising for a governess. Say he does advertise, what address will he give for applicants to write to? There is the real pinch of the matter. If he gives an address in London, good-by to all chances in your favor at once; for this plain reason, that we shall not be able to pick out his advertisement from the advertisements of other people who want governesses, and who will give them addresses in London as well. If, on the other hand, our luck helps us, and he refers his correspondents to a shop, post-office, or what not, at Thorpe-Ambrose, there we have our advertiser as plainly picked out for us as we can wish. In this last case I have little or no doubt—with me for your reference—of your finding your way into the major's family circle. We have one great advantage over the other women who will answer the advertisement. Thanks to my inquiries on the spot, I know Major Milroy to be a poor man; and we will fix the salary you ask at a figure that is sure to tempt him. As for the style of the letter, if you and I together can't write a modest and interesting application for the vacant place, I should like to know who can?

"All this, however, is still in the future. For the present, my advice is—stay where you are, and dream to your heart's content, till you hear from me again. I take in the Times regularly; and you may trust my wary eye not to miss the right advertisement. We can luckily give the major time without doing any injury to our own interests; for there is no fear, just yet, of the girl's getting the start of you. The public reception, as we know, won't be ready till near the end of the month; and we may safely trust young Armadale's vanity to keep him out of his new house until his flatterers are all assembled to welcome him. Let us wait another ten days, at least, before we give up the governess notion, and lay our heads together to try some other plan.

"It's odd, isn't it, to think how much depends on this half-pay officer's decision? For my part, I shall wake every morning now with the same question in my mind. If the major's advertisement appears, which will the major say—Thorpe-Ambrose, or London?

"Ever, my dear Lydia,

"Affectionately yours,

"MARIA OLDERSHAW."

CHAPTER II.

ALLAN AS A LANDED GENTLEMAN.

EARLY on the morning after his first night's rest at Thorpe-Ambrose Allan rose and surveyed the prospect from his bedroom window, lost in the dense mental bewilderment of feeling himself to be a stranger in his own house.

The bedroom looked out over the great front-door, with its portico, its terrace and flight of steps beyond, and, farther still, the broad sweep of the well-timbered park to close the view. The morning mist nestled lightly about the distant trees; and the cows were feeding sociably, close to the iron fence which railed off the park from the drive in front of the house. "All mine!" thought Allan, staring in blank amazement at the prospect of his own possessions. "Hang me, if I can beat it into my head yet. All mine!"

He dressed, left his room, and walked along the corridor which led to the staircase and hall, opening the doors in succession as he passed them. The rooms in this part of the house were bedrooms and dressing-rooms—light, spacious, perfectly furnished; and all empty, except the one bedchamber next to Allan's, which had been appropriated to Midwinter. He was still sleeping when his friend looked in on him, having sat late into the night writing his letter to Mr. Brock. Allan went on to the end of the first corridor, turned at right angles into a second, and, that passed, gained the head of the great staircase. "No romance here," he said to himself, looking down the handsomely carpeted stone stairs into the bright modern hall. "Nothing to startle Midwinter's fidgety nerves in this house." There was nothing indeed; Allan's essentially superficial observation had not misled him for once. The mansion of Thorpe-Ambrose (built after the pulling down of the dilapidated old manor-house) was barely fifty years old. Nothing picturesque, nothing in the slightest degree suggestive of mystery and romance, appeared in any part of it. It was a purely conventional country-house—the product of the classical idea, filtered judiciously through the commercial English mind. Viewed on the outer side, it presented the spectacle of a modern manufactory trying to look like an ancient temple. Viewed on the inner side, it was a marvel of luxurious comfort in every part of it, from basement to roof. "And quite right too," thought Allan, sauntering contentedly down the broad, gently-graduated stairs. "Deuce take all mystery and romance! Let's be clean and comfortable—that's what I say."

Arrived in the hall, the new master of Thorpe-Ambrose hesitated, and looked about him, uncertain which way to turn next. The four reception-rooms on the ground-floor opened into the hall, two on either side. Allan tried the nearest door on his right hand at a venture, and found himself in the drawing-room. Here the first sign of life appeared, under life's most attractive form. A young girl was in solitary possession of the drawing-room. The duster in her hand appeared to associate her with the domestic duties of the house; but, at that particular moment, she was occupied in asserting the rights of nature over the obligations of service. In other words, she was attentively contemplating her own face in the glass over the mantle-piece.

"There! there! don't let me frighten you," said Allan, as the girl started away from the glass, and stared at him in unutterable confusion. "I quite agree with you, my dear: your face is well worth looking at. Who are you? oh, the house-maid. And what's your name? Susan, eh? Come! I like your name to begin with. Do you know who I am, Susan? I'm your master, though you may not think it. Your character? Oh, yes! Mrs. Blanchard gave you a capital character. You shall stop here; don't be afraid. And you'll be a good girl, Susan, and wear smart little caps and aprons and bright ribbons, and you'll look nice and pretty, and dust the furniture, won't you?"

With this summary of a house-maid's duties, Allan sauntered back into the hall, and found more signs of life in that quarter. A man-servant appeared on this occasion, and bowed, as became a vassal in a linen jacket, before his liege lord in a wide-awake hat.

"And who may you be?" asked Allan. "Not the man who let us in last night? Ah, I thought not. The second footman, eh? Character? Oh, yes; capital character. Stop here, of course. You can valet me, can you? Bother valeting me! I like to put on my own clothes, and brush them, too, when they are on; and, if I only knew how to black my own boots, by George I should like to do it! What room's this? Morning-room, eh? And here's the dining-room, of course. Good Heavens, what a table! it's as long as my yacht, and longer. I say—by-the-by, what's your name? Richard, is it? well, Richard, the vessel I sail in is a vessel of my own building! What do you think of that? You look to me just the right sort of man to be my steward on board. If you're not sick at sea—oh, you are sick at sea? Well, then, we'll say nothing more about it. And what room is this? Ah, yes; the library, of course—more in Mr. Midwinter's way than mine. Mr. Midwinter is the gentleman who came here with me last night; and mind this, Richard, you're all to show him as much attention as you show me. Where are we now? What's this door at the back? Billiard-room and smoking-room, eh? Jolly. Another door! and more stairs! Where do they go to? and who's this coming up? Take your time, ma'am; you're not quite so young as you were once—take your time."

The object of Allan's humane caution was a corpulent elderly woman, of the type called "motherly." Fourteen stairs were all that separated her from the master of the house: she ascended them with fourteen stoppages and fourteen sighs. Nature, various in all things, is infinitely various in the female sex. There are some women whose personal qualities reveal the Loves and the Graces; and there are other women whose personal qualities suggest the Perquisites and the Grease Pot. This was one of the other women.

"Glad to see you looking so well, ma'am," said Allan, when the cook, in the majesty of her office, stood proclaimed before him. "Your name is Gripper, is it? I consider you, Mrs. Gripper, the most valuable person in the house. For this reason, that nobody in the house eats a heartier dinner every day than I do. Directions? Oh no; I've no directions to give. I leave all that to you. Lots of strong soup, and joints done with the gravy in them—there's my notion of good feeding, in two words. Steady! Here's somebody else. Oh, to be sure—the butler! Another valuable person. We'll go right through all the wine in the cellar, Mr. butler; and if I can't give you a sound opinion after that, we'll persevere boldly, and go right through it again. Talking of wine—hullo! here are more of them coming up stairs. There! there! don't trouble yourselves. You've all got capital characters, and you shall all stop here along with me. What was I saying just now? Something about wine; so it was. I'll tell you what, Mr. butler, it isn't every day that a new master comes to Thorpe-Ambrose; and it's my wish that we should all start together on the best possible terms. Let the servants have a grand jollification down stairs, to celebrate my arrival; and give them what they like to drink my health in. It's a poor heart, Mrs. Gripper, that never rejoices, isn't it? No; I won't look at the cellar now: I want to go out and get a breath of fresh air before breakfast. Where's Richard? I say, have I got a garden here? Which side of the house is it? That side, eh? You needn't show me round. I'll go alone, Richard, and lose myself, if I can, in my own property."

With those words Allan descended the terrace-steps in front of the house, whistling cheerfully. He had met the serious responsibility of settling his domestic establishment to his own entire satisfaction. "People talk of the difficulty of managing their servants," thought Allan. "What on earth do they mean? I don't see any difficulty at all." He opened an ornamental gate leading out of the drive at the side of the house, and, following the footman's directions, entered the shrubbery that sheltered the Thorpe-Ambrose gardens. "Nice shady sort of place for a cigar," said Allan, as he sauntered along, with his hands in his pockets. "I wish I could beat it into my head that it really belongs to me."

The shrubbery opened on the broad expanse of a flower-garden, flooded bright in its summer glory by the light of the morning sun. On one side an archway, broken through a wall, led into the fruit-garden. On the other, a terrace of turf led to ground on a lower level, laid out as an Italian garden. Wandering past the fountains and statues, Allan reached another shrubbery, winding its way apparently to some remote part of the grounds. Thus far not a human creature had been visible or audible any where; but as he approached the end of the second shrubbery, it struck him that he heard something on the other side of the foliage. He stopped and listened. There were two voices speaking distinctly—an old voice that sounded very obstinate, and a young voice that sounded very angry.

"It's no use, miss," said the old voice. "I mustn't allow it, and I won't allow it. What would Mr. Armadale say?"

"If Mr. Armadale is the gentleman I take him for, you old brute!" replied the young voice, "he would say, Come into my garden, Miss Milroy, as often as you like, and take as many nosegays as you please."

Allan's bright blue eyes twinkled mischievously. Inspired by a sudden idea, he stole softly to the end of the shrubbery, darted round the corner of it, and, vaulting over a low ring-fence, found himself in a trim little paddock, crossed by a gravel-walk. At a short distance down the walk stood a young lady, with her back toward him, trying to force her way past an impenetrable old man, with a rake in his hand, who stood obstinately in front of her shaking his head.

"Come into my garden, Miss Milroy, as often as you like, and take as many nosegays as you please," cried Allan, remorselessly repeating her own words.

The young lady turned round with a scream; her muslin dress, which she was holding up in front, dropped from her hand, and a prodigious lapful of flowers rolled out on the gravel-walk.

Before another word could be said the impenetrable old man stepped forward, with the utmost composure, and entered on the question of his own personal interests, as if nothing whatever had happened, and nobody was present but his new master and himself.

"I bid you humbly welcome to Thorpe-Ambrose, Sir," said this ancient of the gardens. "My name is Abraham Sage. I've been employed in the grounds for more than forty years, and I hope you'll be pleased to continue me in my place."

So, with vision inexorably limited to the horizon of his own prospects, spoke the gardener—and spoke in vain. Allan was down on his knees on the gravel-walk, collecting the fallen flowers, and forming his first impressions of Miss Milroy from the feet upward. She was pretty; she was not pretty—she charmed, she disappointed, she charmed again. Tried by recognized line and rule she was too short, and too well-developed for her age. And yet few men's eyes would have wished her figure other than it was. Her hands were so prettily plump and dimpled that it was hard to see how red they were with the blessed exuberance of youth and health. Her feet apologized gracefully for her old and ill-fitting shoes; and her shoulders made ample amends for the misdemeanor in muslin which covered them in the shape of a dress. Her dark gray eyes were lovely in their clear softness of color, in their spirit, tenderness, and sweet good humor of expression; and her hair (where a shabby old garden hat allowed it to be seen) was of just that lighter shade of brown which gave value by contrast to the darker beauty of her eyes. But these attractions passed, the little attendant blemishes and imperfections of this self-contradictory girl began again. Her nose was too short, her mouth was too large, her face was too round and too rosy. The dreadful justice of photography would have had no mercy on her, and the sculptors of classical Greece would have bowed her regretfully out of their studios. Admitting all this, and more, the girdle round Miss Milroy's waist was the girdle of Venus nevertheless—and the pass-key that opens the general heart was the key she carried, if ever a girl possessed it yet. Before Allan had picked up his second handful of flowers Allan was in love with her.

"Don't! pray don't, Mr. Armadale!" she said, receiving the flowers under protest, as Allan vigorously showered them back into the lap of her dress. "I am so ashamed! I didn't mean to invite myself in that bold way into your garden; my tongue ran away with me—it did indeed! What can I say to excuse myself?"

Oh, Mr. Armadale, what must you think of me!"

Allan suddenly saw his way to a compliment, and tossed it up to her forthwith with the third handful of flowers.

"I'll tell you what I think, Miss Milroy," he said, in his blunt, boyish way. "I think the luckiest walk I ever took in my life was the walk this morning that brought me here."

He looked eager and handsome. He was not addressing a woman worn out with admiration, but a girl just beginning a woman's life, and it did him no harm, at any rate, to speak in the character of master of Thorpe-Ambrose. The penitential expression on Miss Milroy's face gently melted away: she looked down, demure and smiling, at the flowers in her lap.

"I deserve a good scolding," she said. "I don't deserve compliments, Mr. Armadale—least of all from you."

"Oh, yes you do!" cried the headlong Allan, getting briskly on his legs. "Besides, it isn't a compliment; it's true. You are the prettiest—I beg your pardon, Miss Milroy! my tongue ran away with me that time."

Among the heavy burdens that are laid on female human nature, perhaps the heaviest, at the age of sixteen, is the burden of gravity. Miss Milroy struggled—tittered—struggled again—and composed herself for the time being.

The gardener, who still stood where he had stood from the first, immovably waiting for his next opportunity, saw it now, and gently pushed his personal interests into the first gap of silence that had opened within his reach since Allan's appearance on the scene.

"I humbly bid you welcome to Thorpe-Ambrose, Sir," said Abraham Sage, beginning obstinately with his little introductory speech for the second time. "My name—"

Before he could deliver himself of his name Miss Milroy looked accidentally in the horticulturist's pertinacious face, and instantly lost her hold on her gravity beyond recall. Allan, never backward in following a boisterous example of any sort, joined in her laughter with right goodwill. The wise man of the gardens showed no surprise, and took no offense. He waited for another gap of silence, and walked in again gently with his personal interests the moment the two young people stopped to take breath.

"I have been employed in the grounds," proceeded Abraham Sage, irrepressibly, "for more than forty years—"

"You shall be employed in the grounds for forty more, if you'll only hold your tongue and take yourself off!" cried Allan, as soon as he could speak.

"Thank you kindly, Sir," said the gardener, with the utmost politeness, but with no present signs either of holding his tongue or of taking himself off.

"Well?" said Allan.

Abraham Sage carefully cleared his throat, and shifted his rake from one hand to the other. He looked down the length of his own invaluable implement with a grave interest and attention, seeing apparently not the long handle of a rake, but the long perspective of a vista, with a supplementary personal interest established at the end of it. "When more convenient, Sir," resumed this immovable man, "I should wish respectfully to speak to you about my son. Perhaps it may be more convenient in the course of the day? My humble duty, Sir, and my best thanks. My son is strictly sober. He is accustomed to the stables, and he belongs to the Church of England—without encumbrances." Having thus planted his offspring provisionally in his master's estimation, Abraham Sage shouldered his invaluable rake and hobbled slowly out of view.

"If that's a specimen of a trust-worthy old servant," said Allan, "I think I'd rather take my chance of being cheated by a new one. You shall not be troubled with him again, Miss Milroy, at any rate. All the flower-beds in the garden are at your disposal—and all the fruit in the fruit-season, if you'll only come here and eat it."

"Oh, Mr. Armadale, how very, very kind you are! How can I thank you?"

Allan saw his way to another compliment—an elaborate compliment, in the shape of a trap, this time.

"You can do me the greatest possible favor," he said. "You can assist me in forming an agreeable impression of my own grounds."

"Dear me! how?" asked Miss Milroy, innocently.

Allan judiciously closed the trap on the spot in these words: "By taking me with you, Miss Milroy, on your morning walk." He spoke—smiled—and offered his arm.

She saw the way, on her side, to a little flirtation. She rested her hand on his arm—blushed—hesitated—and suddenly took it away again.

"I don't think it's quite right, Mr. Armadale," she said, devoting herself with the deepest attention to her collection of flowers. "Oughtn't we to have some old lady here? Isn't it improper to take your arm until I know you a little better than I do now? I am obliged to ask; I have had so little instruction; I have seen so little of society; and one of papa's friends once said my manners were too bold for my age. What do you think?"

"I think it's a very good thing your papa's friend is not here now," answered the outspoken Allan; "I should quarrel with him to a dead certainty. As for society, Miss Milroy, nobody knows less about it than I do; but if we had an old lady here, I must say myself I think she would be uncommonly in the way. Won't you?" concluded Allan, imploringly offering his arm for the second time. "Do!"

Miss Milroy looked up at him sidelong from her flowers. "You are as bad as the gardener, Mr. Armadale!" She looked down again in a flutter of indecision. "I'm sure it's wrong," she said, and took his arm the instant afterward without the slightest hesitation.

They moved away together over the daisied turf of the paddock, young and bright and happy, with the sunlight of the summer morning shining cloudless over their flowery path.

"And where are we going to now?" asked Allan. "Into another garden?"

She laughed gayly. "How very odd of you, Mr. Armadale, not to know, when it all belongs to you! Are you really seeing Thorpe-Ambrose this morning for the first time? How indescribably strange it must feel! No, no; don't say any more complimentary things to me just yet. You may turn my head if you do. We haven't got the old lady with us, and I really must take care of myself. Let me be useful; let me tell you all about your own grounds. We are going out at that little gate, across one of the drives in the park, and then over the rustic bridge, and then round the corner of the plantation—where do you think? To where I live, Mr. Armadale; to the lovely little cottage that you have let to papa. Oh, if you only knew how lucky we thought ourselves to get it!"

She paused, looked up at her companion, and stopped another compliment on the incorrigible Allan's lips.

"I'll drop your arm," she said, coquettishly, "if you do! We were lucky to get the cottage, Mr. Armadale. Papa said he felt under an obligation to you for letting it, the day we got in. And I said I felt under an obligation, no longer ago than last week."

"You, Miss Milroy!" exclaimed Allan.

"Yes. It may surprise you to hear it; but if you hadn't let the cottage to papa, I believe I should have suffered the indignity and misery of being sent to school."

Allan's memory reverted to the half crown that he had spun on the cabin-table of the yacht, at Castletown. "If she only knew that I had tossed up for it!" he thought, guiltily.

"I dare say you don't understand why I should feel such a horror of going to school," pursued Miss Milroy, misinterpreting the momentary silence on her companion's side. "If I had gone to school in early life—I mean at the age when other girls go—I shouldn't have minded it now. But I had no such chance at the time. It was the time of mamma's illness and of papa's unfortunate speculations; and as papa had nobody to comfort him but me, of course I staid at home. You needn't laugh; I was of some use, I can tell you. I helped papa over his troubles by sitting on his knee after dinner, and asking him to tell me stories of all the remarkable people he had known when he was about in the great world, at home and abroad. Without me to amuse him in the evening, and his clock to occupy him in the daytime—"

"His clock?" repeated Allan.

"Oh yes! I ought to have told you. Papa is an extraordinary mechanical genius. You will say so, too, when you see his clock. It's nothing like so large, of course, but it's on the model of the famous clock at Strasbourg. Only think, he began it when I was eight years old; and (though I was sixteen last birthday) it isn't finished yet! Some of our friends were quite surprised he should take to such a thing when his troubles began. But papa himself set that right in no time; he reminded them that Louis the Sixteenth took to lock-making when his troubles began; and then every body was perfectly satisfied." She stopped, and changed color confusedly. "Oh, Mr. Armadale," she said, in genuine embarrassment this time, "here is my unlucky tongue running away with me again! I am talking to you already as if I had known you for years! This is what papa's friend meant when he said my manners were too bold. It's quite true; I have a dreadful way of getting familiar with people if—" She checked herself suddenly, on the brink of ending the sentence by saying, "if I like them."

"No, no; do go on," pleaded Allan. "It's a fault of mine to be familiar too. Besides, we must be familiar; we are such near neighbors. I'm rather an uncultivated sort of fellow, and I don't know quite how to say it; but I want your cottage to be jolly and friendly with my house, and my house to be jolly and friendly with your cottage. There's my meaning, all in the wrong words. Do go on, Miss Milroy; pray go on."

She smiled and hesitated. "I don't exactly remember where I was," she replied. "I only remember I had something I wanted to tell you. This comes, Mr. Armadale, of my taking your arm. I should get on so much better if you would only consent to walk separately. You won't? Well, then, will you tell me what it was I wanted to say? Where was I, before I went wandering off to papa's troubles and papa's clock?"

"At school," replied Allan, with a prodigious effort of memory.

"Not at school, you mean," said Miss Milroy; "and all through you. Now I can go on again, which is a great comfort. I am quite serious, Mr. Armadale, in saying that I should have been sent to school if you had said No, when papa proposed for the cottage. This is how it happened. When we began moving in Mrs. Blanchard sent us a most kind message from the great house, to say that her servants were at our disposal if we wanted any assistance. The least papa and I could do, after that, was to call and thank her. We saw Mrs. Blanchard and Miss Blanchard. Mrs. was charming, and Miss looked perfectly lovely in her mourning. I'm sure you admire her? She's tall and pale and graceful—quite your idea of beauty, I should think?"

"Nothing like it," began Allan. "My idea of beauty at the present moment—"

Miss Milroy felt it coming, and instantly took her hand off his arm.

"I mean I have never seen either Mrs. Blanchard or her niece," added Allan, precipitately correcting himself.

Miss Milroy tempered justice with mercy, and put her hand back again.

"How extraordinary that you should never have seen them!" she went on. "Why, you are a perfect stranger to every thing and every body at Thorpe-Ambrose! Well, after Miss Blanchard and I had sat and talked a little while I heard my name on Mrs. Blanchard's lips, and instantly held my breath. She was asking papa if I had finished my education. Out came papa's great grievance directly. My old governess, you must know, left us to be married just before we came here, and none of our friends could produce a new one whose terms were reasonable. 'I'm told, Mrs. Blanchard, by people who understand it better than I do,' says papa, 'that advertising is a risk. It all falls on me, in Mrs. Milroy's state of health, and I suppose I must end in sending my little girl to school. Do you happen to know of a school within the means of a poor man?' Mrs. Blanchard shook her head—I could have kissed her on the spot for doing it. 'All my experience, Major Milroy,' says this perfect angel of a woman, 'is in favor of advertising. My niece's governess was originally obtained by an advertisement, and you may imagine her value to us when I tell you that she lived in our family for more than ten years.' I could have gone down on both my knees and worshiped Mrs. Blanchard then and there—and I only wonder I didn't! Papa was struck at the time—I could see that—and he referred to it again on the way home. 'Though I have been long out of the world, my dear,' says papa, 'I know a highly-bred woman and a sensible woman when I see her. Mrs. Blanchard's experience puts advertising in a new light: I must think about it.' He has thought about it, and (though he hasn't openly confessed it to me) I know that he decided to advertise no later than last night. So, if papa thanks you for letting the cottage, Mr. Armadale, I thank you too. But for you we should never have known darling Mrs. Blanchard; and but for darling Mrs. Blanchard I should have been sent to school."

Before Allan could reply they turned the corner of the plantation and came in sight of the cottage. Description of it is needless; the civilized universe knows it already. It was the typical cottage of the drawing-master's early lessons in neat shading and the broad pencil touch—with the trim thatch, the luxuriant creepers, the modest lattice-windows, the rustic porch, and the wicker bird-cage, all complete.

"Isn't it lovely?" said Miss Milroy. "Do come in!"

"May I?" asked Allan. "Won't the major think it too early?"

"Early or late, I'm sure papa will be only too glad to see you."

She led the way briskly up the garden path, and opened the parlor door. As Allan followed her into the little room he saw, at the further end of it, a gentleman sitting alone at an old-fashioned writing-table, with his back turned to his visitor.

"Papa! a surprise for you!" said Miss Milroy, rousing him from his occupation. "Mr. Armadale has come to Thorpe-Ambrose, and I have brought him here to see you."

The major started—rose, bewildered for the moment—recovered himself immediately, and advanced to welcome his young landlord with hospitable outstretched hand.

A man with a larger experience of the world and a finer observation of humanity than Allan possessed would have seen the story of Major Milroy's life written in Major Milroy's face. The home-troubles that had struck him were plainly betrayed in his stooping figure and his wan, deeply-wrinkled cheeks, when he first showed himself on rising from his chair. The changeless influence of one monotonous pursuit and one monotonous habit of thought was next expressed in the dull, dreamy self-absorption of his manner and his look while his daughter was speaking to him. The moment after, when he had roused himself to welcome his guest, was the moment which made the self-revelation complete. Then there flickered in the major's weary eyes a faint reflection of the spirit of his happier youth. Then there passed over the major's dull and dreamy manner a change which told unmistakably of social graces and accomplishments, learned at some past time in no ignoble social school. A man who had long since taken his patient refuge from trouble in his one mechanical pursuit; a man only roused at intervals to know himself again for what he once had been. So revealed, to all eyes that could read him aright, Major Milroy now stood before Allan, on the first morning of an acquaintance which was destined to be an event in Allan's life.

"I am heartily glad to see you, Mr. Armadale," he said, speaking in the changelessly quiet, subdued tone peculiar to most men whose occupations are of the solitary and monotonous kind. "You have done me one favor already by taking me as your tenant, and you now do me another by paying this friendly visit. If you have not breakfasted already, let me waive all ceremony on my side, and ask you to take your place at our little table."

"With the greatest pleasure, Major Milroy, if I am not in the way," replied Allan, delighted at his reception. "I was sorry to hear from Miss Milroy that Mrs. Milroy is an invalid. Perhaps my being here unexpectedly; perhaps the sight of a strange face—"

"I understand your hesitation, Mr. Armadale," said the major; "but it is quite unnecessary. Mrs. Milroy's illness keeps her entirely confined to her own room. Have we got every thing we want on the table, my love?" he went on, changing the subject so abruptly that a closer observer than Allan might have suspected it was distasteful to him. "Will you come and make tea?"

Miss Milroy's attention appeared to be already pre-engaged: she made no reply. While her father and Allan had been exchanging civilities she had been putting the writing-table in order, and examining the various objects scattered on it with the unrestrained curiosity of a spoiled child. The moment after the major had spoken to her she discovered a morsel of paper hidden between the leaves of the blotting-book, snatched it up, looked at it, and turned round instantly, with an exclamation of surprise.

"Do my eyes deceive me, papa?" she asked. "Or were you really and truly writing the advertisement when I came in?"

"I had just finished it," replied her father. "But, my dear, Mr. Armadale is here—we are waiting for breakfast."

"Mr. Armadale knows all about it," rejoined Miss Milroy. "I told him in the garden."

"Oh yes," said Allan. "Pray don't make a stranger of me, major. If it's about the governess, I've got something (in an indirect sort of way) to do with it too."

Major Milroy smiled. Before he could answer, his daughter, who had been reading the advertisement, appealed to him eagerly, for the second time.

"Oh, papa," she said, "there's one thing here I don't like at all! Why do you put grandmamma's initials at the end? Why do you tell them to write to grandmamma's house in London?"

"My dear, your mother can do nothing in this matter, as you know. And as for me (even if I went to London), questioning strange ladies about their characters and accomplishments is the last thing in the world that I am fit to do. Your grandmamma is on the spot; and your grandmamma is the proper person to receive the letters and to make all the necessary inquiries."

"But I want to see the letters myself," persisted the spoiled child. "Some of them are sure to be amusing—"

"I don't apologize for this very unceremonious reception of you, Mr. Armadale," said the major, turning to Allan, with a quaint and quiet humor. "It may be useful as a warning, if you ever chance to marry and have a daughter, not to begin, as I have done, by letting her have her own way."

Allan laughed, and Miss Milroy persisted.

"Besides," she went on, "I should like to help in choosing which letters we answer, and which we don't. I think I ought to have some voice in the selection of my own governess. Why not tell them, papa, to send their letters down here—to the post-office or the stationer's, or any where you like? When you and I have read them, we can send up the letters we prefer to grandmamma, and she can ask all the questions and pick out the best governess, just as you have arranged already, without leaving me entirely in the dark, which I consider (don't you, Mr. Armadale?) to be quite inhuman. Let me alter the address, papa—do, there's a darling!"

"We shall get no breakfast, Mr. Armadale, if I don't say Yes," said the Major, good-humoredly. "Do as you like, my dear," he added, turning to his daughter. "As long as it ends in your grandmamma's managing the matter for us, the rest is of very little consequence."

Miss Milroy took up her father's pen, drew it through the last line of the advertisement, and wrote the altered address with her own hand as follows:

Apply, by letter, to M., Post-office, Thorpe-Ambrose, Norfolk.

"There!" she said, bustling to her place at the breakfast-table. "The advertisement may go to London now; and if a governess does come of it, oh, papa, who in the name of wonder will she be? Tea or coffee, Mr. Armadale? I'm really ashamed of having kept you waiting. But it is such a comfort," she added, saucily, "to get all one's business off one's mind before breakfast!"

Father, daughter, and guest sat down together sociably at the little round table—the best of good neighbors and good friends already.

Three days later one of the London news-boys got his business off his mind before breakfast. His district was Diana Street, Pimlico; and the last of the morning's newspapers which he disposed of was the newspaper he left at Mrs. Oldershaw's door.

SOFT SHINETH THE MOON.

ONE poor heart by sore sorrow branded;
Cold shineth the moon to-night!
Alone in her grief she thinks of the sea
So treacherous, though smiling and smooth it be;
She remembers well that tiny boat
Which then they saw so merrily float
Through bright moonlight
To deep midnight,
To be found on the morrow stranded!
One poor heart by sore sorrow branded;
Cold shineth the moon to-night!

On one still'd heart, through a casement streaming,
Soft shineth the moon to-night!
Away to where shall be no more sea,
To where for the weary peace shall be;
Supported by more than earthly bands—
And beckon'd by more than human hands—
Gone to her rest;
Supremely blest;
Humbled to lowest abasement seeming,
On one still'd heart, through a casement streaming,
Soft shineth the moon to-night!

WILLIAM T. SHERMAN.

RECOLLECTIONS OF SHERMAN.

OF the few prominent men developed by this war who will leave a lasting impression on the mind of the nation W. T. Sherman may be ranked as among the first and most original. The recollections which are here given are those of one who, at a respectful distance, has watched his career almost from the beginning.

The language of his resignation of the position as President of the Louisiana State Military Academy, January, 1861, first brought General Sherman to the notice of the Government, and he was appointed a Captain in the regular army, a position he had previously held, but which he had resigned. It is now known that before the bombardment of Fort Sumter he held very enlarged views of the crisis then upon the country; but they were not appreciated. A letter addressed to the Secretary of War, tendering his services and urging his views of the imminent danger of war, as well as the expression of the same views to the President, were disregarded, and met at the time with some ridicule.

Of the campaign of Bull Run, in which Sherman figured as a Colonel in command of a brigade, the writer has no personal recollections. Colonel Sherman acquitted himself with distinction during the battle of July 21 and the rout which ensued. During the quiet which followed the retirement to Washington he was engaged at the capital in aiding in the reorganization of the army.

General Robert Anderson, of Fort Sumter fame, was the first to appreciate the sterling qualities which were then latent in Sherman, and to reintroduce him to active service. Early in August, 1861, General Anderson was assigned to the command of the "Department of the Ohio," and accepted on the express understanding that Colonel Sherman should be created a brigadier, and, as his second in command, be assigned to the direction of the troops in the field. This condition was observed by Secretary Cameron, and thus, early in September, 1861, Sherman was assigned to duty in the West. At the time Kentucky was being indulged in her false notions of neutrality, and the command of General Sherman consisted really of but two men, General Nelson and Colonel Rousseau, these two officers being at the time the only persons in the department holding United States military commissions. The former had, however, established a recruiting camp in Middle Kentucky, known as "Camp Dick Robinson," and had gathered together a large number of East Tennessee refugees and some loyal Kentuckians, but they had not been mustered into the service. Rousseau had also established a rendezvous, since called "Camp Joe Holt," on the Indiana side of the Ohio River, and opposite Louisville, where he had collected about fifteen hundred loyal Kentuckians. None of these had been mustered into the service, however, and it was not until Sherman had been in command for a fortnight that he really had any troops under his control. During this time he acted as the counselor and, in a manner, as the aid of Anderson.

General Sherman may be described as "a bundle of nerves," all strung to the greatest tension. The most striking feature of his character is a peculiar nervous energy which knows no cessation, and which is resistless. He is untiring in his efforts, and hesitates at no amount of detail; matters great and small receiving his attention. A hard, earnest worker, he devotes but little time to sleep. When he first assumed command at Louisville, in 1861, the agents of the New York Associated Press throughout the country were employed by the Government in transmitting its cipher messages. In consequence of this arrangement Sherman frequented the office of the Louisville press agent. He was always at this office during the evening, often remaining until three o'clock in the morning, when the closing of the office would force him to retire to his rooms at the hotel. During these hours he would pace the floor of the room apparently absorbed in thought and heedless of all that was going on around him. He would occasionally sit at the table to jot down a memorandum or compose a telegram. He would sometimes stop to listen to any remark addressed to him by other occupants of the room, but would seldom reply even though the remark had been a direct question, and would appear and act as if the interruption had but momentarily disturbed his train of thought.

Perhaps the most remarkable instance of this characteristic energy occurred at Nashville, Tennessee. When Sherman assumed command there in March, 1864, the military agent of the railroads to Chattanooga was running through to the army at that point about ninety car-loads of rations per day. This merely served to feed the army then gathered there. Nothing was accumulating for the spring campaign. The agent reported a want of cars and locomotives as the cause of this insufficient supply of rations, and added that it was impossible to obtain them. Sherman answered that nothing was impossible, and immediately went to work to remedy the evil. In two days' time he extended the northern terminus of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad through the former city, a distance of three miles, to the Ohio River. On the levee he built an inclined plane to the water's edge. One of the ferry-boats which plied between Louisville and Jeffersonville was seized and especially prepared to carry cars and locomotives. On the Indiana side of the river he extended the Jeffersonville Railroad through that town to the Ohio River and built another inclined plane. At the same time he ordered the impressment of the necessary cars and locomotives from the various northwestern railroads, taking them off roads as far north as Chicago, and rushed them off to Nashville, crossing the Ohio by the means he had provided. The effect was soon visible. In a month after this movement began the railroad agents reported that they were running two hundred and seventy cars per day through to Chattanooga. Sherman required them to report the increase made each day, and would appear as well satisfied at the addition of a few cars per day to the number as if he had won a battle. By the 20th of April, the day Sherman left Nashville to begin his Atlanta campaign, he had accumulated at Knoxville eighteen days', and at Chattanooga thirteen days' rations for his whole army of 120,000 men. The energy which inspired the railroad agents was communicated to the quarter-masters located at Nashville, and the result was the increase of the laboring force of this department from four or five thousand to nearly sixteen thousand men.

In July, 1864, while besieging the enemy's position at Kenesaw Mountain, an incident occurred which may be given as illustrative of Sherman's energy. When the campaign opened he had published an order informing the army that he intended moving without a tent; and during the greater part of the march his headquarters actually consisted of nothing more than a tent-fly for the use of his Adjutant-General. He generally slept under a tree during dry weather, and in very wet weather in any convenient house. When the army was concentrated in the gorge of Snake Creek Gap, in which there was not a house of any character, General Logan "raised the laugh" on Sherman by sending him a tent to protect him from the rain, and which, owing to the terrible state of the weather, Sherman was compelled to use. Early one morning a regiment of troops passed Sherman's quarters or bivouac, near Kenesaw Mountain, and saw him lying under a tree near the road-side. One of the men, not knowing the General, and supposing him to be drunk, remarked aloud, "That is the way we are commanded, officered by drunken Major-Generals." Sherman heard the remark and instantly arose. "Not drunk, my boy," he said, good-humoredly; "but I was up all night, and am very tired and sleepy." He soon after broke up headquarters, and, passing the regiment on the march, was received with loud and hearty cheers.

This energy of Sherman's nature is characterized by a peculiar nervousness of manner and expression. He talks with great rapidity, often in his haste mingling his sentences in a most surprising manner; and accompanying his conversation by strange, quick, and ungraceful gestures. As a natural result of this nervous energy he has acquired the habit of decision in the most perfect degree. He never seems to reason, but decides by intuition. His decisions are generally final. In conversation of importance, and particularly on a battle-field, he seldom gives a person time to finish his remarks or reports. He replies as soon as he has heard enough to convey the idea, never waiting its elaboration. He jumps at conclusions with tremendous springs. His own speeches and documents are never more than skeletons. His sharp, pointed sentences quickly convey the idea intended to the dullest imagination. In giving his instructions and orders he will take a person by the shoulder and push him off as he talks—following him to the door, all the time talking and urging him off.

This peculiarity of expression may be traced even in his letters, some of which, though lacking in grace, but not in vigor, are already accepted among the model documents of the war. They are never elaborations, though his ideas are given in them more fully than in his conversations. He has expressed in some of them many wise and practical views on the existing state of affairs; and in his treatment of his peculiar theory of suppression has evinced a clear appreciation of the proper mode of dealing with rebels in arms. His whole theory, in which he has been consistent from the very first, is embraced in the proposition to "fight the devil with fire." His vindication of his action in depopulating Atlanta contains his "theory of suppression" in a few words. He says: "We must have peace not only in Atlanta but in all America. To secure this we must stop the war that now desolates our once happy and favored country. To stop war we must defeat the rebel armies that are arrayed against the laws and Constitution, which all must respect and obey. To defeat these armies we must prepare the way to reach them in their recesses, provided with the arms and instruments which enable us to accomplish our purpose." His expression in the same letter, "War is cruelty—you can not refine it," is a sharp, terse rendition of an undisputed truth.

While endeavoring to fill up his dépôts at Chattanooga and Knoxville, preparatory to the campaign against Atlanta, Sherman was asked by members of the United States Christian Commission for transportation for their delegates, books, tracts, etc. for the army. His reply is very characteristic of the man. "Certainly not," he wrote; "crackers and oats are more necessary to my army than any moral or religious agency." His letter to Hood on the proposed depopulation of Atlanta is a curious document, an impromptu reply, thrown "off-hand" from his pen, and it reads as if it were Sherman speaking. He begins this document by acknowledging the receipt of a letter at the hands of "Messrs. Bull and crew."—The bearers who were designated by this undignified title were members of the Common Council of Atlanta. The letter ends by advising Hood to tell his tale of oppression "to the marines." During the campaign of Atlanta communication with the rear was very much obstructed, the news correspondents found many difficulties in forwarding information, and telegrams to the press seldom reached New York. During the movement around Atlanta Sherman was applied to directly by the news agent at Louisville for the details of the movement. In reply the General telegraphed, "Atlanta is ours and fairly won;" following up the expression, which has already passed into song, with a brief and graphic report of the flank movement around Atlanta and the battle of Jonesborough.

The idea generally prevails that commanding generals are very didactic on the battle-field, and give their orders in precise language and stentorian voice. A little familiarity with actual war will soon dispel this false impression in any one who sees Sherman on the battle-field. At Chattanooga he gave his orders for his advance to his brother-in-law, General Hugh Ewing, in the words, uttered between two puffs at a bad cigar, "I guess, Ewing, if you are ready you might as well go ahead." Ewing asked a few questions in regard to retaining the échelon formation of his command as then marshaled for the advance. Sherman replied, "I want you to keep the left well toward the creek (the Chickamauga) and keep up the formation, four hundred yards distance, until you get to the foot of the hill." "And shall we keep it after that?" asked Ewing. "Oh! you may go up the hill as you like—if you can;" and then he added, hastily, as he pushed Ewing away, "I say, Ewing, don't call for help until you actually need it." It is also recorded of Sherman that, on witnessing from the top of a rice-mill on the Ogechee River the capture of Fort M'Allister, he exclaimed, imitating the voice of a negro, "Dis chile don't sleep dis night;" and hurried off to meet General Foster.

Some writer has pictured Sherman in repose. The article circulated throughout the daily press of the country, and was generally accepted as a fine picture of the warrior in the quiet of camp. He was represented as listening to the music of a regimental band with quiet demureness and decorum. It is impossible that the picture could ever have been a correct one. Music may have charms to soothe the most savage breast, but it has no power to quiet the nerves of Sherman. He may have been silent during the serenade, but undoubtedly his eyes were dancing in every direction and upon every thing. He is never quiet. His fingers nervously twitch his red whiskers—his coat buttons—play a tattoo on his table or chair, or run through his hair. One moment his legs are crossed, and the next both are on the floor. He sits a moment, and then rises and paces the floor. He never sat out a serenade of the ordinary length in his life, and as to remaining silent for that length of time it would be impossible for him to do it. He must talk, quick, sharp, and yet not harshly, all the time making his odd gestures, which, no less than the intonation of his voice, serve to emphasize his language. He can not bear a clog upon his thoughts, nor an interruption to his language. He admits of no opposition. He overrides every thing. He never hesitates at interrupting any one, but can not bear to be interrupted himself. He is very well aware, and candidly admits, that his temper is uncommonly bad, but he makes no attempt to control and correct it. In once speaking of a general in his army he remarked, that he was “as good an officer as I am—is younger, and has a better temper.”

His gruffness often amounts to positive rudeness. While in command at Louisville, in 1861, the wife of the rebel commander, Ingraham, passed through the city en route to the South. The lady, who was rebelliously inclined, pleaded consumption as her excuse for wishing to inhale the Southern air. Sherman gruffly advised her to “shut herself up in a room and keep up a good fire—it would do her just as much good.” He once took great offense at having his manners, and particularly this habit of gruffness, compared to the manners of a Pawnee Indian, and expressed his contempt for the author of the slur in a public manner. He was much chagrined shortly after to find that the correspondent who had been guilty of the offensive comparison had heard of his contemptuous criticism, and had amended it by publicly apologizing to the whole race of Pawnees!

He is not a very firm believer in the utility of Christian or Sanitary Commissions, or aid societies generally, and thinks female nurses about a hospital or an army a great nuisance. He once alluded contemptuously to the efforts of a large number of Kentucky ladies to send clothing, lint, sweetmeats, etc., to his troops; but was induced, in lieu of discouraging their efforts, to take steps to properly direct them. He met the ladies by agreement in one of the public halls at Louisville, now known as Wood's Theatre, and made an address to them. He went among the lambs with all the boldness and dignity of a lion; but the rough, uncouth manner of him who had frowned on thousands of men melted in the presence of a few hundred ladies. They found that, though “he was no orator as Brutus is,” he could talk very tenderly of the soldier's wants, very graphically of the soldier's life and sufferings, and very gallantly of woman and her divine mission of soothing and comforting.

Until Sherman had developed his practicality this peculiarity of expression and manner were accepted as evidences of a badly-balanced mind. It will be remembered that in his early career a report was widely circulated to the effect that he was a lunatic; but the origin of this story, if properly stated, will redound to his credit as evincing admirable foresight and sagacity. The true origin of this report is as follows: Sherman succeeded Anderson in command of the Department of the Ohio, October 13, 1861. Up to that time about ten thousand United States troops had been pushed into Kentucky. The Western governors were under a promise to send as many more, but were slow in doing so. General A. Sidney Johnston, the rebel commander at Bowling Green, was endeavoring to create the impression that he had about seventy-five thousand men, when he really had only about twenty-eight thousand. In this he succeeded so far as to cause it to be supposed that his force largely exceeded Sherman's. Sherman urged upon the Government the rapid reinforcement of his army, but with little effect. The troops did not come, for the reason that the Government did not credit the statements of the perilous condition of Sherman's army. So repeated and urgent were Sherman's demands for reinforcements that at last the Secretary of War, Mr. Cameron, visited Louisville in order to look into the situation of affairs. An interview was had at the Galt House at Louisville, Sherman, Cameron, and Adjutant-General Thomas being present. Sherman briefly explained the situation of affairs—stated his own force and that of the enemy, and argued that reinforcements were necessary to hold Kentucky, to say nothing of an advance. “My forces are too small for an advance,” he said—“too small to hold the important positions in the State against an advance of the enemy, and altogether too large to be sacrificed in detail.” On being asked how many men were required to drive the enemy out of the State, he answered, without hesitation, “Two hundred thousand.” The answer was a surprise to the two officers, which they did not attempt to conceal. They even ridiculed the idea, and laughed at the calculation. It was declared impossible to furnish the number of men named. Sherman then argued that the positions in Kentucky ought to be abandoned, and the army no longer endangered by being scattered. This was treated more seriously, and vigorously opposed by Cameron and Thomas. They declared the abandonment of Kentucky was a step to which they could not consent. Subsequently they broached a plan which had been devised for dividing the Department and Army of the Ohio into two; one column to operate under Mitchel from Cincinnati as a base against Knoxville, and the other from Louisville against Nashville. To this Sherman was strongly opposed. Satisfied by the persistence of Cameron on this point that the Government was not disposed to second his views of conducting the affairs of the Department, Sherman asked to be relieved and ordered to duty in the field. Cameron gladly acquiesced in his wishes, and he was relieved by Buell, November 30, 1861.

On the same evening of the famous interview between Cameron and Sherman the latter paid his customary visit to the Associated Press rooms at Louisville. Here, while still in a bad humor over the result of the interview, he was approached by a man who introduced himself as a correspondent of a New York paper, and asked permission to pass through his lines to the South in the capacity of a correspondent. Sherman replied that he could not pass. The correspondent, with unwarrantable impertinence, replied that Secretary Cameron was in the city and he would get a pass from him. Sherman at once ordered him out of his department, telling him that he would give him two hours to make his escape. If found in his lines after that hour he "would hang him as a spy." The fellow left the city immediately, and on reaching Cincinnati very freely expressed his opinion that the General was crazy. A paper published in that city, on learning the story of the interview between Cameron and Sherman, which soon became public, employed the fellow to write up the report which was thus first circulated of Sherman's lunacy. His opinion that two hundred thousand men were required to clear Kentucky of rebels was quoted as proof of it by this man, and thus the story came into existence.

Subsequent events have already revealed the fact that Sherman had not much exaggerated the force necessary to carry on the war in the central zone. Although we have never had a single army numbering two hundred thousand men in the West, much larger armies have been necessary to the accomplishment of the campaign of the Mississippi and Tennessee rivers than any person other than Sherman thus early in the war imagined. The army of Grant at Fort Donelson and Shiloh, combined with that of Buell, was not over eighty thousand men. That of Halleck before Corinth numbered exactly one hundred and two thousand. Sherman left Chattanooga in May last with one hundred and twenty thousand men, the largest army ever gathered in one body in the West. At the same time he had under his command at different points on the Mississippi River and in Kentucky an additional force of about fifty thousand, while the forces operating under other commanders in the West would, if added to his, make a grand total of two hundred and fifty thousand men, operating on the Mississippi River, every one of whom was necessary to the conquest and retention of the Mississippi Valley.

When this report of his lunacy was first circulated Sherman was much chagrined at it, and often referred to it in bitter terms. Time and success have enabled him to frown it down, and justified him in laughing at it. During the siege of Corinth he commanded the right wing of Thomas's corp, while General T. W. Sherman, of Port Royal memory, commanded the left wing. The latter was very unpopular with his division on account of a painfully nervous manner and fretful disposition, and the officers of the command discussed him critically with great freedom, many condemning his manner as offensive. One day General W. T. Sherman was visiting General Stedman—then a brigade commander in T. W. Sherman's division—and the latter's name was brought up, Stedman giving a very ludicrous account of Sherman's conduct.

"Oh!" said William Tecumseh, "this is the crazy Sherman, is it?"

Great difficulty was found during the operations before Corinth in distinguishing the two Shermans. The soldiers solved the problem by giving each Sherman a nickname. T. W. Sherman was called "Port Royal Sherman," in allusion to his services in South Carolina; while W. T. Sherman was known as "Steady-old-nerves," in contradistinction to the other who, as before stated, was painfully nervous.

Sherman has not entirely escaped "nicknames," though he has been more fortunate in this respect than some other commanders. In 1861 the Home Guards of Louisville gave him a name which has never been used by any other body of troops. It was under the following circumstances: The Home Guard marched under Sherman's leadership from Louisville to meet the invasion of Buckner. While moving to Lebanon Junction the General spoke to the men, telling them of the necessity which had arisen for their services, and proposed to muster them into the United States service for thirty days. Few of them had blankets, none had haversacks, and no tents were at the time on hand. The men were really not prepared to remain long in the field, and some demurred at the length of time mentioned. Sherman grew very angry at this and spoke very harshly, intimating that he considered the Home Guards a "paltry set of fellows." The men were chagrined at this and much embittered against him, and on the spot voted him "a gruff old cock." They soon found, however, that they had to accept him as a commander, when one of them remarked, "It was a bitter pill." Out of this grew the title of "Old Pills," which was at once fastened upon the General. The men consented to be mustered for fifteen days. This put Sherman in an excellent humor again, and he promised them tents, blankets, etc., immediately. This in turn put the Guards in a high glee, and one of them suggesting that "Old Pills" was sugar-coated, the nickname was modified, and he was known ever after as "Old Sugar-Coated."

Sherman is an inveterate smoker. He smokes as he does every thing else, with an energy which it would be supposed would deprive him of all the pleasure of smoking. He is fully as great a smoker as Grant, but very unlike him in his style of smoking. Grant smokes as if he enjoyed his cigar. Sherman smokes as if it were a duty to be finished in the shortest imaginable time. Grant will smoke lying back in his chair, his body and mind evidently in repose, his countenance calm and settled. He blows the smoke slowly from his mouth, and builds his plans and thoughts in the clouds which are formed by it about his head. He smokes his tobacco as the Chinese do their opium, and with that certain sort of oblivious disregard for every thing else which it is said characterizes the opium smoker. He enjoys his mild Havana in quiet dignity, half-smoking, half-chewing it. Sherman puffs furiously, as if his cigar was of the worst character of "penny grabs" and would not "draw." He snatches it frequently, and, one might say, furiously, from his mouth, brushing the ashes off with his forefinger. He continually paces the floor while smoking, generally deep in thought of important matters, doubtless; but a looker-on would imagine that he was endeavoring to solve the question of how to draw smoke through his cigar. He seldom or never finishes it, leaving at least one half of it a stump. When he used to frequent the Associated Press rooms at Louisville, in 1861, he would often accumulate and leave upon the agent's table as many as eight or ten of these stumps, which the porter of the rooms used to call "Sherman's old soldiers."

Even until long after Anderson's assumption of command at Louisville the agent of the New Orleans papers continued sending his telegrams for the rebel papers to New Orleans. This man was a rabid secessionist, and disliked Sherman exceedingly. He used to say of him that he smoked as some men whistled—"for want of thought." This is undoubtedly a mistake; for close observers say that, while smoking, Sherman is deepest absorbed in thought. He is certainly, when smoking, almost totally oblivious to what is going on around him. This peculiar absence of mind had an excellent illustration in a circumstance which occurred at Lebanon Junction, Kentucky, when first occupied by Sherman and the Home Guards. While walking up and down the railroad platform at that place, awaiting the repair of the telegraph line to Louisville, Sherman's cigar gave out. He immediately took another from his pocket, and approaching the orderly-sergeant of the "Marion Zouaves"—one of the Home Guard companies—asked for a light. The sergeant had only a moment before lighted his cigar, and taking a puff or two to improve the fire, he handed it, with a bow, to the General. Sherman carefully lighted his weed, took a puff or two to assure himself, and having again lapsed into his train of thought, abstractedly threw away the sergeant's cigar. Rousseau and several other officers were standing by at the time, and laughed heartily at the incident; but Sherman was too deeply buried in thought to notice the laughter or mishap. Three years subsequently, at his head-quarters in Nashville, Rousseau endeavored to recall this occurrence to Sherman's mind. He could not recollect it, and replied, "I was thinking of something else. It won't do to let to-morrow take care of itself. Your good merchant don't think of the ships that are in, but those that are to come in. The evil of to-day is irreparable. Look ahead to avoid breakers. You can't when your ship is on them. All you can then do is to save yourself and retrieve disaster. I was thinking of something else when I threw the sergeant's cigar away." And then he added, laughing, "Did I do that, really?"

On the battle-field where he commands Sherman presents a somewhat different appearance from the Sherman before described. His nervous manner is toned down. He grits his teeth, and his lips are closed more firmly, giving an expression of greater determination to his countenance. His eyes are somewhat closed, as if endeavoring to see the furthestmost limits of the battle-field, and, as it were, peer into the future and see the result. His cigar is between his lips, but he suffers its fire occasionally to die out. He is less restless of body; his arms are more confined to their proper limits; and he is content to stay in one spot. He talks less at such moments than at calmer ones.

During the battle of Shiloh, while hotly engaged, near the log church which gave its name to the battle-field, Sherman met a brigade of Buell's fresh troops moving forward to his support, and hastily asked whose troops they were. Rousseau, who commanded the brigade, rode hastily through the line to meet Sherman, who had been dismounted by the fire of the enemy for the third time, and had one wounded arm in a sling, while his face was blackened by the fire of his own artillery.

"Rousseau's brigade," said that officer—"your old troops, General Sherman."

At the mention of his name Rousseau's men, who had made their first campaign under Sherman, recognized him. "There's old Sherman," ran along their lines, and in an instant more there broke above the din of the battle three loud ringing cheers for "Old Sherman." Sherman took no notice of the cheers at the time; but his subsequent report of the battle showed that he was not oblivious to the compliment. At the moment he simply ordered the brigade forward. It was about the time the rebels began falling back, and soon the advance thus ordered became a pursuit of the foe.

With the personal appearance of General Sherman the public are but little acquainted. Very few full-length pictures of him have been made. Of the numerous engravings and photographs which have been published since he became famous very few are good likenesses, and none conveys a proper idea of his general appearance. The best photograph which the writer has seen of him is the one by Brady, from which the accompanying engraving is made. The outlines of the features are given with great accuracy, and any one familiar with the General's physiognomy will pronounce it a faithful likeness, though the position in which the subject serves to conceal the extreme Romanism of his nose. The expression is that of Sherman in a good-humor. He seldom has such a self-satisfied air. A critical observer of the picture in question would remark that Sherman has done in this case what he seldom takes time or has inclination to do, and has given the artist a special sitting. He has "made himself up" for the occasion. If the critic were one of Sherman's soldiers he would notice the absence from his lips of the inevitable cigar. The coat, it will be observed, is buttoned across the breast, and is the chief fault of the engraving, for Sherman seldom or never buttons his coat either across his breast or around his waist. His vest is always buttoned by the lower button only, and, fitting close around his waist, adds to his appearance of leanness. It is doubtful if at this time any one can be found, except the General's tailor, who can tell when his coat was new. He appears to have an aversion to new clothes, and has never been seen in complete suit or heard in creaking boots. It may be said that he never conforms to the regulations in respect to the color of his suit; for the uniform he generally wears has lost its original color, and is of that dusty and rusty tinge, and with that lack of gloss which follows constant use. One would readily imagine, judging by its appearance, that he purchased his uniform second-hand. The hat which he generally wears is of the same order of faded "regulation," with the crown invariably puffed out instead of being pushed in, in the "Burnside style." The regulation cord and tassel he does not recognize at all.

With the exception of his eyes none of the features of Sherman's countenance are indicative of his character. Altogether he is commonplace in appearance, neither excessively handsome nor painfully repulsive, and attracts less notice than his peculiar style of dress. At the same time divest him of his regulations, and in a crowd his face would attract attention and afford a study. His eyes, conforming to his general character, are as restless as his body or mind. They are rather of a dull though light color, their restlessness giving them whatever they possess of brilliancy and animation. His lips close firmly and closely, and with the deep lines running from his nostrils to either corner of his mouth, give to the lower half of his face an air of decision indicative of his character. His hands are long, slender, and tapering, like those of a woman, and are in admirable keeping with his figure. His short, crisp whiskers, which grow unshaven, and which appear to be stunted in growth, are of a dingy red, or what is commonly called "sandy" color. He takes very little care of his whiskers and hair, each having to be content with one careless brushing a day. He has, perhaps, as great a disregard for his personal appearance as he has for what others may say or think of him.

He has by the success of his later grand campaigns fully established his originality, and has added to the theory and art and history of war two of its most interesting chapters. The campaign of Atlanta was prosecuted on a plan as extensive as bold, and gave rise not only to a new system of warfare but even to new systems of tactics. Never before in the history of war had an army been known to be constantly under fire for one hundred consecutive days. Men whom three years of service had made veterans learned during that campaign a system of fighting they had never heard of before. The whole army became at once from necessity pioneers and sharp-shooters.

The march through Georgia is still the wonder of the campaign of 1864, filled as it was with strange events and startling and original movements. Undertaken with deliberation and from choice, it is now recognized as the boldest movement of the war. Its originality may be said to have insured its success. It was so startling and unexpected to the enemy that he could take no steps to oppose it. On these successes Sherman could have with safety risked his reputation as an original strategist.

HEARTS AND TREES.

FROM laughing lips of gray-eyed morn
A fresher tide of life is gushing;

About the bottom of the thorn

The maiden bud is coyly blushing.

I feel upon me, like a hand

Lifting me up, the weight of Spring;

And as the baby-leaves expand

My spirit seems awakening.

Hath then this mingled life of ours

Aught of a tidal ebb and flow?

Hath man a sympathy with flowers,

And with them droop, revive, and grow?

It may be so; for Life is Life,

Intense or subtle, less or more;

And wages the eternal strife

With death and darkness world all o'er.

In youth we seek to carve our name

Deep-lettered on some hearts of worth,

And fancy we may trace the same

Till Time restoreth earth to earth:

Nor know that, as on living tree,

Rough bark will overgrow our toil,

As surely will the world; and we

But hail this knowledge with a smile;

A smile, to think it 'scaped our sense

How like in this were hearts and trees;

So soft to court our confidence,

So swift to hide our memories!

CHAPTER I.

LODGERS IN QUEER STREET.

IT was a foggy day in London, and the fog was heavy and dark. Animate London, with smarting eyes and irritated lungs, was blinking, wheezing, and choking; inanimate London was a sooty spectre, divided in purpose between being visible and invisible, and so being wholly neither. Gaslights flared in the shops with a haggard and unblessed air, as knowing themselves to be night-creatures that had no business abroad under the sun; while the sun itself, when it was for a few moments dimly indicated through circling eddies of fog, showed as if it had gone out and were collapsing flat and cold. Even in the surrounding country it was a foggy day, but there the fog was gray, whereas in London it was, at about the boundary line, dark yellow, and a little within it brown, and then browner, and then browner, until at the heart of the City—which call Saint Mary Axe—it was rusty black. From any point of the high ridge of land northward, it might have been discerned that the loftiest buildings made an occasional struggle to get their heads above the foggy sea, and especially that the great dome of Saint Paul's seemed to die hard; but this was not perceivable in the streets at their feet, where the whole metropolis was a heap of vapor charged with muffled sound of wheels, and enfolding a gigantic catarrh.

At nine o'clock on such a morning, the place of business of Pubsey and Co. was not the liveliest object even in Saint Mary Axe—which is not a very lively spot—with a sobbing gaslight in the counting-house window, and a burglarious stream of fog creeping in to strangle it through the keyhole of the main door. But the light went out, and the main door opened, and Riah came forth with a bag under his arm.

Almost in the act of coming out at the door Riah went into the fog, and was lost to the eyes of Saint Mary Axe. But the eyes of this history can follow him westward, by Cornhill, Cheap-side, Fleet Street, and the Strand, to Piccadilly and the Albany. Thither he went at his grave and measured pace, staff in hand, skirt at heel; and more than one head, turning to look back at his venerable figure already lost in the mist, supposed it to be some ordinary figure indistinctly seen, which fancy and the fog had worked into that passing likeness.

Arrived at the house in which his master's chambers were on the second-floor, Riah proceeded up the stairs, and paused at Fascination Fledgeby's door. Making free with neither bell nor knocker, he struck upon the door with the top of his staff, and, having listened, sat down on the threshold. It was characteristic of his habitual submission, that he sat down on the raw dark staircase, as many of his ancestors had probably sat down in dungeons, taking what befell him as it might befall.

After a time, when he had grown so cold as to be fain to blow upon his fingers, he arose and knocked with his staff again, and listened again, and again sat down to wait. Thrice he repeated these actions before his listening ears were greeted by the voice of Fledgeby, calling from his bed, "Hold your row! I'll come and open the door directly!" But in lieu of coming directly, he fell into a sweet sleep for some quarter of an hour more, during which added interval Riah sat upon the stairs and waited with perfect patience.

At length the door stood open, and Mr. Fledgeby's retreating drapery plunged into bed again. Following it at a respectful distance, Riah passed into the bedchamber, where a fire had been sometime lighted, and was burning briskly.

"Why, what time of night do you mean to call it?" inquired Fledgeby, turning away beneath the clothes, and presenting a comfortable rampart of shoulder to the chilled figure of the old man.

"Sir, it is full half past ten in the morning."

"The deuce it is! Then it must be precious foggy?"

"Very foggy, Sir."

"And raw, then?"

"Chill and bitter," said Riah, drawing out a handkerchief, and wiping the moisture from his beard and long gray hair as he stood on the verge of the rug, with his eyes on the acceptable fire.

With a plunge of enjoyment Fledgeby settled himself afresh.

"Any snow, or sleet, or slush, or any thing of that sort?" he asked.

"No, Sir, no. Not quite so bad as that. The streets are pretty clean."

"You needn't brag about it," returned Fledgeby, disappointed in his desire to heighten the contrast between his bed and the streets. "But you're always bragging about something. Got the books there?"

"They are here, Sir."

"All right. I'll turn the general subject over in my mind for a minute or two, and while I'm about it you can empty your bag and get ready for me."

With another comfortable plunge Mr. Fledgeby fell asleep again. The old man, having obeyed his directions, sat down on the edge of a chair, and, folding his hands before him, gradually yielded to the influence of the warmth, and dozed. He was roused by Mr. Fledgeby's appearing erect at the foot of the bed, in Turkish slippers, rose-colored Turkish trowsers (got cheap from somebody who had cheated some other somebody out of them), and a gown and cap to correspond. In that costume he would have left nothing to be desired, if he had been further fitted out with a bottomless chair, a lantern, and a bunch of matches.

"Now, old 'un!" cried Fascination, in his light raillery, "what dodgery are you up to next, sitting there with your eyes shut? You ain't asleep. Catch a weasel at it, and catch a Jew!"

"Truly, Sir, I fear I nodded," said the old man.

"Not you!" returned Fledgeby, with a cunning look. "A telling move with a good many, I dare say, but it won't put me off my guard. Not a bad notion though, if you want to look indifferent in driving a bargain. Oh, you are a dodger!"

The old man shook his head, gently repudiating the imputation, and suppressed a sigh, and moved to the table at which Mr. Fledgeby was now pouring out for himself a cup of steaming and fragrant coffee from a pot that had stood ready on the hob. It was an edifying spectacle, the young man in his easy-chair taking his coffee, and the old man with his gray head bent, standing awaiting his pleasure.

"Now!" said Fledgeby. "Fork out your balance in hand, and prove by figures how you make it out that it ain't more. First of all, light that candle."

Riah obeyed, and then taking a bag from his breast, and referring to the sum in the accounts for which they made him responsible, told it out upon the table. Fledgeby told it again with great care, and rang every sovereign.

"I suppose," he said, taking one up to eye it closely, "you haven't been lightening any of these; but it's a trade of your people's, you know. You understand what sweating a pound means; don't you?"

"Much as you do, Sir," returned the old man, with his hands under opposite cuffs of his loose sleeves, as he stood at the table, deferentially observant of the master's face. "May I take the liberty to say something?"

"You may," Fledgeby graciously conceded.

"Do you not, Sir—without intending it—of a surety without intending it—sometimes mingle the character I fairly earn in your employment with the character which it is your policy that I should bear?"

"I don't find it worth my while to cut things so fine as to go into the inquiry," Fascination coolly answered.

"Not in justice?"

"Bother justice!" said Fledgeby.

"Not in generosity?"

"Jews and generosity!" said Fledgeby. "That's a good connection! Bring out your vouchers, and don't talk Jerusalem palaver."

The vouchers were produced, and for the next half hour Mr. Fledgeby concentrated his sublime attention on them. They and the accounts were all found correct, and the books and the papers resumed their places in the bag.

"Next," said Fledgeby, "concerning that bill-broking branch of the business; the branch I like best. What queer bills are to be bought, and at what prices? You have got your list of what's in the market?"

"Sir, a long list," replied Riah, taking out a pocket-book, and selecting from its contents a folded paper, which, being unfolded, became a sheet of foolscap covered with close writing.

"Whew!" whistled Fledgeby, as he took it in his hand. "Queer Street is full of lodgers just at present! These are to be disposed of in parcels; are they?"

"In parcels as set forth," returned the old man, looking over his master's shoulder; "or the lump."

"Half the lump will be waste-paper, one knows beforehand," said Fledgeby. "Can you get it at waste-paper price? That's the question."

Riah shook his head, and Fledgeby cast his small eyes down the list. They presently began to twinkle, and he no sooner became conscious of their twinkling, than he looked up over his shoulder at the grave face above him, and moved to the chimney-piece. Making a desk of it, he stood there with his back to the old man, warming his knees, perusing the list at his leisure, and often returning to some lines of it, as though they were particularly interesting. At those times he glanced in the chimney-glass to see what note the old man took of him. He took none that could be detected, but, aware of his employer's suspicions, stood with his eyes on the ground.

Mr. Fledgeby was thus amiably engaged when a step was heard at the outer door, and the door was heard to open hastily. "Hark! That's your doing, you Pump of Israel," said Fledgeby; "you can't have shut it." Then the step was heard within, and the voice of Mr. Alfred Lammle called aloud, "Are you any where here, Fledgeby?" To which Fledgeby, after cautioning Riah in a low voice to take his cue as it should be given him, replied, "Here I am!" and opened his bedroom door.

"Come in!" said Fledgeby. "This gentleman is only Pubsey and Co. of Saint Mary Axe, that I am, trying to make terms for an unfortunate friend with in a matter of some dishonored bills. But really Pubsey and Co. are so strict with their debtors, and so hard to move, that I seem to be wasting my time. Can't I make any terms with you on my friend's part, Mr. Riah?"

"I am but the representative of another, Sir," returned the Jew, in a low voice. "I do as I am bidden by my principal. It is not my capital that is invested in the business. It is not my profit that arises therefrom."

"Ha ha!" laughed Fledgeby. "Lammle?"

"Ha ha!" laughed Lammle. "Yes. Of course. We know."

"Devilish good, ain't it, Lammle?" said

Fledgeby, unspeakably amused by his hidden joke.

"Always the same, always the same!" said Lammle. "Mr.—"

"Riah, Pubsey, and Co., Saint Mary Axe," Fledgeby put in, as he wiped away the tears that trickled from his eyes, so rare was his enjoyment of his secret joke.

"Mr. Riah is bound to observe the invariable forms for such cases made and provided," said Lammle.

"He is only the representative of another!" cried Fledgeby. "Does as he is told by his principal! Not his capital that's invested in the business. Oh, that's good! Ha ha ha ha!" Mr. Lammle joined in the laugh and looked knowing; and the more he did both, the more exquisite the secret joke became for Mr. Fledgeby.

"However," said that fascinating gentleman, wiping his eyes again, "if we go on in this way we shall seem to be almost making game of Mr. Riah, or of Pubsey and Co., Saint Mary Axe, or of somebody; which is far from our intention. Mr. Riah, if you would have the kindness to step into the next room for a few moments while I speak with Mr. Lammle here, I should like to try to make terms with you once again before you go."

The old man, who had never raised his eyes during the whole transaction of Mr. Fledgeby's joke, silently bowed and passed out by the door which Fledgeby opened for him. Having closed it on him, Fledgeby returned to Lammle, standing with his back to the bedroom fire, with one hand under his coat-skirts, and all his whiskers in the other.

"Halloa!" said Fledgeby. "There's something wrong!"

"How do you know it?" demanded Lammle.

"Because you show it," replied Fledgeby in unintentional rhyme.

"Well then; there is," said Lammle; "there is something wrong; the whole thing's wrong."

"I say!" remonstrated Fascination very slowly, and sitting down with his hands on his knees to stare at his glowering friend with his back to the fire.

"I tell you, Fledgeby," repeated Lammle, with a sweep of his right arm, "the whole thing's wrong. The game's up."

"What game's up?" demanded Fledgeby, as slowly as before, and more sternly.

"The game. Our game. Read that."

Fledgeby took a note from his extended hand and read it aloud. "Alfred Lammle, Esquire. Sir: Allow Mrs. Podsnap and myself to express our united sense of the polite attentions of Mrs. Alfred Lammle and yourself toward our daughter, Georgiana. Allow us also wholly to reject them for the future, and to communicate our final desire that the two families may become entire strangers. I have the honor to be, Sir, your most obedient and very humble servant, JOHN PODSNAP." Fledgeby looked at the three blank sides of this note, quite as long and earnestly as at the first expressive side, and then looked at Lammle, who responded with another extensive sweep of his right arm.

"Whose doing is this?" said Fledgeby.

"Impossible to imagine," said Lammle.

"Perhaps," suggested Fledgeby, after reflecting with a very discontented brow, "somebody has been giving you a bad character."

"Or you," said Lammle, with a deeper frown.

Mr. Fledgeby appeared to be on the verge of some mutinous expressions, when his hand happened to touch his nose. A certain remembrance connected with that feature operating as a timely warning, he took it thoughtfully between his thumb and forefinger and pondered; Lammle meanwhile eying him with furtive eyes.

"Well!" said Fledgeby. "This won't improve with talking about. If we ever find out who did it we'll mark that person. There's nothing more to be said, except that you undertook to do what circumstances prevent your doing."

"And that you undertook to do what you might have done by this time if you had made a prompter use of circumstances," snarled Lammle.

"Hah! That," remarked Fledgeby, with his hands in the Turkish trowsers, "is matter of opinion."

"Mr. Fledgeby," said Lammle, in a bullying tone, "am I to understand that you in any way reflect upon me, or hint dissatisfaction with me, in this affair?"

"No," said Fledgeby; "provided you have brought my promissory note in your pocket, and now hand it over."

Lammle produced it, not without reluctance. Fledgeby looked at it, identified it, twisted it up, and threw it into the fire. They both looked at it as it blazed, went out, and flew in feathery ash up the chimney.

"Now, Mr. Fledgeby," said Lammle, as before; "am I to understand that you in any way reflect upon me, or hint dissatisfaction with me, in this affair?"

"No," said Fledgeby.

"Finally and unreservedly no?"

"Yes."

"Fledgeby, my hand."

Mr. Fledgeby took it, saying, "And if we ever find out who did this, we'll mark that person. And in the most friendly manner let me mention one thing more. I don't know what your circumstances are, and I don't ask. You have sustained a loss here. Many men are liable to be involved at times, and you may be, or you may not be. But whatever you do, Lammle, don't—don't—don't, I beg of you—ever fall into the hands of Pubsey and Co. in the next room, for they are grinders. Regular flayers and grinders, my dear Lammle," repeated Fledgeby with a peculiar relish, "and they'll skin you by the inch, from the nape of your neck to the sole of your foot, and grind every inch of your skin to tooth-powder. You have seen what Mr. Riah is. Never fall into his hands, Lammle, I beg of you as a friend!"

Mr. Lammle, disclosing some alarm at the solemnity of this affectionate adjuration, demanded why the devil he ever should fall into the hands of Pubsey and Co.?

"To confess the fact I was made a little uneasy," said the candid Fledgeby, "by the manner in which that Jew looked at you when he heard your name. I didn't like his eye. But it may have been the heated fancy of a friend. Of course if you are sure that you have no personal security out, which you may not be quite equal to meeting, and which can have got into his hands, it must have been fancy. Still, I didn't like his eye."

The brooding Lammle, with certain white dints coming and going in his palpitating nose, looked as if some tormenting imp were pinching it. Fledgeby, watching him with a twitch in his mean face which did duty there for a smile, looked very like the tormentor who was pinching.

"But I mustn't keep him waiting too long," said Fledgeby, "or he'll revenge it on my unfortunate friend. How's your very clever and agreeable wife? She knows we have broken down?"

"I showed her the letter."

"Very much surprised?" asked Fledgeby.

"I think she would have been more so," answered Lammle, "if there had been more go in you?"

"Oh!—She lays it upon me, then?"

"Mr. Fledgeby, I will not have my words misconstrued."

"Don't break out, Lammle," urged Fledgeby, in a submissive tone, "because there's no occasion. I only asked a question. Then she don't lay it upon me? To ask another question."

"No, Sir."

"Very good," said Fledgeby, plainly seeing that she did. "My compliments to her. Good-by!"

They shook hands, and Lammle strode out pondering. Fledgeby saw him into the fog, and, returning to the fire and musing with his face to it, stretched the legs of the rose-colored Turkish trowsers wide apart, and meditatively bent his knees, as if he were going down upon them.

"You have a pair of whiskers, Lammle, which I never liked," murmured Fledgeby, "and which money can't produce; you are boastful of your manners and your conversation; you wanted to pull my nose, and you have let me in for a failure, and your wife says I am the cause of it. I'll bowl you down. I will, though I have no whiskers," here he rubbed the places where they were due, "and no manners, and no conversation!"

Having thus relieved his noble mind, he collected the legs of the Turkish trowsers, straightened himself on his knees, and called out to Riah in the next room, "Halloa, you Sir!" At sight of the old man re-entering with a gentleness monstrously in contrast with the character he had given him, Mr. Fledgeby was so tickled again, that he exclaimed, laughing, "Good! Good! Upon my soul it is uncommon good!"

"Now, old 'un," proceeded Fledgeby, when he had had his laugh out, "you'll buy up these lots that I mark with my pencil—there's a tick there, and a tick there, and a tick there—and I wager twopence you'll afterward go on a squeezing those Christians like the Jew you are. Now, next you'll want a check—or you'll say you want it, though you've capital enough somewhere, if one only knew where, but you'd be peppered and salted and grilled on a gridiron before you'd own to it—and that check I'll write."

When he had unlocked a drawer and taken a key from it to open another drawer, in which was another key that opened another drawer, in which was the check-book; and when he had written the check; and when, reversing the key and drawer process, he had placed his check-book in safety again, he beckoned the old man, with the folded check, to come and take it.

"Old 'un," said Fledgeby, when the Jew had put it in his pocket-book, and was putting that in the breast of his outer garment; "so much at present for my affairs. Now a word about affairs that are not exactly mine. Where is she?"

With his hand not yet withdrawn from the breast of his garment, Riah started and paused.

"Oho!" said Fledgeby. "Didn't expect it! Where have you hidden her?"

Showing that he was taken by surprise, the old man looked at his master with some passing confusion, which the master highly enjoyed.

"Is she in the house I pay rent and taxes for in Saint Mary Axe?" demanded Fledgeby.

"No, Sir."

"Is she in your garden up atop of that house—gone up to be dead, or whatever the game is?" asked Fledgeby.

"No, Sir."

"Where is she then?"

Riah bent his eyes upon the ground, as if considering whether he could answer the question without breach of faith, and then silently raised them to Fledgeby's face, as if he could not.

"Come!" said Fledgeby. "I won't press that just now. But I want to know this, and I will know this, mind you. What are you up to?"

The old man, with an apologetic action of his head and hands, as not comprehending the master's meaning, addressed to him a look of mute inquiry.

"You can't be a gallivanting dodger," said Fledgeby. "For you're a 'regular pity the sorrows,' you know—if you do know any Christian rhyme—'whose trembling limbs have borne him to'—et cetera. You're one of the Patriarchs; you're a shaky old card; and you can't be in love with this Lizzie?"

"Oh, Sir!" expostulated Riah. "Oh, Sir, Sir, Sir!"

"Then why," retorted Fledgeby, with some slight tinge of a blush, "don't you out with your reason for having your spoon in the soup at all?"

"Sir, I will tell you the truth. But (your pardon for the stipulation) it is in sacred confidence; it is strictly upon honor."

"Honor too!" cried Fledgeby, with a mocking lip. "Honor among Jews. Well. Cut away."

"It is upon honor, Sir?" the other still stipulated, with respectful firmness.

"Oh, certainly. Honor bright," said Fledgeby.

The old man, never bidden to sit down, stood with an earnest hand laid on the back of the young man's easy-chair. The young man sat looking at the fire with a face of listening curiosity, ready to check him off and catch him tripping.

"Cut away," said Fledgeby. "Start with your motive."

"Sir, I have no motive but to help the helpless."

Mr. Fledgeby could only express the feelings to which this incredible statement gave rise in his breast by a prodigiously long derisive sniff.

"How I came to know, and much to esteem and to respect, this damsel, I mentioned when you saw her in my poor garden on the house-top," said the Jew.

"Did you?" said Fledgeby, distrustfully.

"Well, perhaps you did, though."

"The better I knew her, the more interest I felt in her fortunes. They gathered to a crisis. I found her beset by a selfish and ungrateful brother, beset by an unacceptable wooer, beset by the snares of a more powerful lover, beset by the wiles of her own heart."

"She took to one of the chaps then?"

"Sir, it was only natural that she should incline toward him, for he had many and great advantages. But he was not of her station, and to marry her was not in his mind. Perils were closing round her, and the circle was fast darkening, when I—being as you have said, Sir, too old and broken to be suspected of any feeling for her but a father's—stepped in, and counseled flight. I said, 'My daughter, there are times of moral danger when the hardest virtuous resolution to form is flight, and when the most heroic bravery is flight.' She answered, she had had this in her thoughts; but whither to fly without help she knew not, and there were none to help her. I showed her there was one to help her, and it was I. And she is gone."

"What did you do with her?" asked Fledgeby, feeling his cheek.

"I placed her," said the old man, "at a distance;" with a grave, smooth, outward sweep from one another of his two open hands at arm's-length; "at a distance—among certain of our people, where her industry would serve her, and where she could hope to exercise it, unassailed from any quarter."

Fledgeby's eyes had come from the fire to notice the action of his hands when he said "at a distance." Fledgeby now tried (very unsuccessfully) to imitate that action, as he shook his head and said, "Placed her in that direction, did you? Oh you circular old dodger!"

With one hand across his breast and the other on the easy-chair, Riah, without justifying himself, waited for further questioning. But that it was hopeless to question him on that one reserved point, Fledgeby, with his small eyes too near together, saw full well.

"Lizzie," said Fledgeby, looking at the fire again, and then looking up. "Humph, Lizzie. You didn't tell me the other name in your garden atop of the house. I'll be more communicative with you. The other name's Hexam."

Riah bent his head in assent.

"Look here, you Sir," said Fledgeby. "I have a notion I know something of the inveigling chap, the powerful one. Has he any thing to do with the law?"

"Nominally, I believe it his calling."

"I thought so. Name any thing like Lightwood?"

"Sir, not at all like."

"Come, old 'un," said Fledgeby, meeting his eyes with a wink, "say the name."

"Wrayburn."

"By Jupiter!" cried Fledgeby. "That one, is it? I thought it might be the other, but I never dreamt of that one! I shouldn't object to your balking either of the pair, dodger, for they are both conceited enough; but that one is as cool a customer as ever I met with. Got a beard besides, and presumes upon it. Well done, old 'un! Go on and prosper!"

Brightened by this unexpected commendation, Riah asked were there more instructions for him?

"No," said Fledgeby, "you may toddle now, Judah, and grope about on the orders you have got." Dismissed with those pleasing words, the old man took his broad hat and staff and left the great presence: more as if he were some superior creature benignantly blessing Mr. Fledgeby than the poor dependent on whom he set his foot. Left alone, Mr. Fledgeby locked his outer door and came back to his fire.

"Well done you!" said Fascination to himself. "Slow, you may be; sure, you are!" This he twice or thrice repeated with much complacency, as he again dispersed the legs of the Turkish trowsers and bent the knees.

"A tidy shot that, I flatter myself," he then soliloquized. "And a Jew brought down with it! Now, when I heard the story told at Lamble's, I didn't make a jump at Riah. Not a bit of it; I got at him by degrees." Herein he was quite accurate; it being his habit not to jump, or leap, or make an upward spring, at any thing in life, but to crawl at every thing.

"I got at him," pursued Fledgeby, feeling for his whisker, "by degrees. If your Lamblies or your Lightwoods had got at him anyhow, they would have asked him the question whether he hadn't something to do with that gal's disappearance. I knew a better way of going to work. Having got behind the hedge, and put him in the light, I took a shot at him and brought him down plump. Oh! It don't count for much, being a Jew, in a match against me!"

Another dry twist in place of a smile made his face crooked here.

"As to Christians," proceeded Fledgeby, "look out, fellow-Christians, particularly you that lodge in Queer Street! I have got the run of Queer Street now, and you shall see some games there. To work a lot of power over you and you not know it, knowing as you think yourselves, would be almost worth laying out money upon. But when it comes to squeezing a profit out of you into the bargain, it's something like!"

With this apostrophe Mr. Fledgeby appropriately proceeded to divest himself of his Turkish garments, and invest himself with Christian attire. Pending which operation, and his morning ablutions, and his anointing of himself with the last infallible preparation for the production of luxuriant and glossy hair upon the human countenance (quacks being the only sages he believed in besides usurers), the murky fog closed about him and shut him up in its sooty embrace. If it had never let him out any more, the world would have had no irreparable loss, but could have easily replaced him from its stock on hand.

CHAPTER II.

A RESPECTED FRIEND IN A NEW ASPECT.

IN the evening of this same foggy day when the yellow window-blind of Pubsey and Co. was drawn down upon the day's work, Riah the Jew once more came forth into Saint Mary Axe. But this time he carried no bag, and was not bound on his master's affairs. He passed over London Bridge, and returned to the Middlesex shore by that of Westminster, and so, ever wading through the fog, waded to the door-step of the dolls' dress-maker.

Miss Wren expected him. He could see her through the window by the light of her low fire—carefully banked up with damp cinders that it might last the longer and waste the less when she was out—sitting waiting for him in her bonnet. His tap at the glass roused her from the musing solitude in which she sat, and she came to the door to open it; aiding her steps with a little crutch-stick.

"Good-evening, godmother!" said Miss Jenny Wren.

The old man laughed, and gave her his arm to lean on.

"Won't you come in and warm yourself, godmother?" asked Miss Jenny Wren.

"Not if you are ready, Cinderella, my dear."

"Well!" exclaimed Miss Wren, delighted. "Now you ARE a clever old boy! If we gave prizes at this establishment (but we only keep blanks), you should have the first silver medal for taking me up so quick." As she spake thus, Miss Wren removed the key of the house-door from the keyhole and put it in her pocket, and then bustlingly closed the door, and tried it as they both stood on the step. Satisfied that her dwelling was safe, she drew one hand through the old man's arm and prepared to ply her crutch-stick with the other. But the key was an instrument of such gigantic proportions, that before they started Riah proposed to carry it.

"No, no, no! I'll carry it myself," returned Miss Wren. "I'm awfully lopsided, you know, and stowed down in my pocket it'll trim the ship. To let you into a secret, godmother, I wear my pocket on my high side, o' purpose."

With that they began their plodding through the fog.

"Yes, it was truly sharp of you, godmother," resumed Miss Wren with great approbation, "to understand me. But, you see, you are so like the fairy godmother in the bright little books! You look so unlike the rest of people, and so much as if you had changed yourself into that shape, just this moment, with some benevolent object. Boh!" cried Miss Jenny, putting her face close to the old man's. "I can see your features, godmother, behind the beard."

"Does the fancy go to my changing other objects too, Jenny?"

"Ah! That it does! If you'd only borrow my stick and tap this piece of pavement—this dirty stone that my foot taps—it would start up a coach and six. I say! Let's believe so!"

"With all my heart," replied the good old man.

"And I'll tell you what I must ask you to do, godmother. I must ask you to be so kind as give my child a tap, and change him altogether. O my child has been such a bad, bad child of late! It worries me nearly out of my wits. Not done a stroke of work these ten days. Has had the horrors, too, and fancied that four copper-colored men in red wanted to throw him into a fiery furnace."

"But that's dangerous, Jenny."

"Dangerous, godmother?" My bad child is always dangerous, more or less. He might"—here the little creature glanced back over her shoulder at the sky—"be setting the house on fire at this present moment. I don't know who would have a child, for my part! It's no use shaking him. I have shaken him till I have made myself giddy. 'Why don't you mind your Commandments and honor your parent, you naughty old boy?' I said to him all the time. But he only whimpered and stared at me."

"What shall be changed, after him?" asked Riah, in a compassionately playful voice.

"Upon my word, godmother, I am afraid I must be selfish next, and get you to set me right in the back and the legs. It's a little thing to you with your power, godmother, but it's a great deal to poor weak aching me."

There was no querulous complaining in the words, but they were not the less touching for that.

"And then?"

"Yes, and then — you know, godmother. 'We'll both jump up into the coach and six and go to Lizzie. This reminds me, godmother, to ask you a serious question. You are as wise as wise can be (having been brought up by the fairies), and you can tell me this: Is it better to have had a good thing and lost it, or never to have had it?"

"Explain, god-daughter."

"I feel so much more solitary and helpless without Lizzie now, than I used to feel before I knew her." (Tears were in her eyes as she said so.)

"Some beloved companionship fades out of most lives, my dear," said the Jew—"that of a wife, and a fair daughter, and a son of promise, has faded out of my own life—but the happiness was."

"Ah!" said Miss Wren thoughtfully, by no means convinced, and chopping the exclamation with that sharp little hatchet of hers; "then I tell you what change I think you had better begin with, godmother. You had better change Is into Was and Was into Is, and keep them so."

"Would that suit your case? Would you not be always in pain then?" asked the old man, tenderly.

"Right!" exclaimed Miss Wren with another chop. "You have changed me wiser, godmother.—Not," she added with the quaint hitch of her chin and eyes, "that you need be a very wonderful godmother to do that deed."

Thus conversing, and having crossed Westminster Bridge, they traversed the ground that Riah had lately traversed, and new ground likewise; for, when they had recrossed the Thames by way of London Bridge, they struck down by the river and held their still foggier course that way.

But previously, as they were going along, Jenny twisted her venerable friend aside to a brilliantly-lighted toy-shop window, and said: "Now look at 'em! All my work!"

This referred to a dazzling semicircle of dolls in all the colors of the rainbow, who were dressed for presentation at court, for going to balls, for going out driving, for going out on horseback, for going out walking, for going to get married, for going to help other dolls to get married, for all the gay events of life.

"Pretty, pretty, pretty!" said the old man with a clap of his hands. "Most elegant taste!"

"Glad you like 'em," returned Miss Wren, loftily. "But the fun is, godmother, how I make the great ladies try my dresses on. Though it's the hardest part of my business, and would be, even if my back were not bad and my legs queer."

He looked at her as not understanding what she said.

"Bless you, godmother," said Miss Wren, "I have to scud about town at all hours. If it was only sitting at my bench, cutting out and sewing, it would be comparatively easy work; but it's the trying-on by the great ladies that takes it out of me."

"How, the trying-on?" asked Riah.

"What a mooney godmother you are, after all!" returned Miss Wren. "Look here. There's a Drawing-Room, or a grand day in the Park, or a Show, or a Fête, or what you like. Very well. I squeeze among the crowd, and I look about me. When I see a great lady very suitable for my business, I say, 'You'll do, my dear!' and I take particular notice of her, and run home and cut her out and baste her. Then another day I come scudding back again and try on, and then I take particular notice of her again. Sometimes she plainly seems to say, 'How that little creature is staring!' and sometimes likes it and sometimes don't, but much more often yes than no. All the time I am only saying to myself, 'I must hollow out a bit here; I must slope away there;' and I am making a perfect slave of her, with making her try on my doll's dress. Evening parties are severer work for me, because there's only a doorway for a full view, and what with hobbling among the wheels of the carriages and the legs of the horses, I fully expect to be run over some night. However, there I have 'em, just the same. When they go bobbing into the hall from the carriage, and catch a glimpse of my little physiognomy poked out from behind a policeman's cape in the rain, I dare say they think I am wondering and admiring with all my eyes and heart, but they little think they're only working for my dolls! There was Lady Belinda Whitrose. I made her do double duty in one night. I said when she came out of the carriage, 'You'll do, my dear!' and I ran straight home and cut her out and basted her. Back I came again, and waited behind the men that called the carriages. Very bad night too. At last, 'Lady Belinda Whitrose's carriage! Lady Belinda Whitrose coming down!' And I made her try on—oh! and take pains about it too—before she got seated. That's Lady Belinda hanging up by the waist, much too near the gaslight for a wax one, with her toes turned in."

When they had plodded on for some time nigh the river, Riah asked the way to a certain tavern called the Six Jolly Fellowship Porters. Following the directions he received, they arrived, after two or three puzzled stoppages for consideration, and some uncertain looking about them, at the door of Miss Abbey Potterson's dominions. A peep through the glass portion of the door revealed to them the glories of the bar, and Miss Abbey herself seated in state on her snug throne, reading the newspaper. To whom, with deference, they presented themselves.

Taking her eyes off her newspaper, and pausing with a suspended expression of countenance, as if she must finish the paragraph in hand before undertaking any other business whatever, Miss Abbey demanded, with some slight asperity: "Now then, what's for you?"

"Could we see Miss Potterson?" asked the old man, uncovering his head.

"You not only could, but you can and you do," replied the hostess.

"Might we speak with you, madam?"

By this time Miss Abbey's eyes had possessed themselves of the small figure of Miss Jenny Wren. For the closer observation of which, Miss Abbey laid aside her newspaper, rose, and looked over the half-door of the bar. The crutch-stick seemed to entreat for its owner leave to come in and rest by the fire; so Miss Abbey opened the half-door, and said, as though replying to the crutch-stick: "Yes, come in and rest by the fire."

"My name is Riah," said the old man, with courteous action, "and my avocation is in London city. This, my young companion—"

"Stop a bit," interposed Miss Wren. "I'll give the lady my card." She produced it from her pocket with an air, after struggling with the gigantic door-key which had got upon the top of it and kept it down. Miss Abbey, with manifest tokens of astonishment, took the diminutive document, and found it to run concisely thus:

MISS JENNY WREN,

DOLLS' DRESS-MAKER.

"Lud!" exclaimed Miss Potterson, staring. And dropped the card.

"We take the liberty of coming, my young companion and I, madam," said Riah, "on behalf of Lizzie Hexam."

Miss Potterson was stooping to loosen the bonnet-strings of the dolls' dress-maker. She looked round rather angrily, and said: "Lizzie Hexam is a very proud young woman."

"She would be so proud," returned Riah, dextrously, "to stand well in your good opinion, that before she quitted London for—"

"For where, in the name of the Cape of Good Hope?" asked Miss Potterson, as though supposing her to have emigrated.

"For the country," was the cautious answer—"she made us promise to come and show you a paper, which she left in our hands for that special purpose. I am an unserviceable friend of hers, who began to know her after her departure from this neighborhood. She has been for some time living with my young companion, and has been a helpful and a comfortable friend to her. Much needed, madam," he added, in a lower voice. "Believe me; if you knew all, much needed."

"I can believe that," said Miss Abbey, with a softening glance at the little creature.

"And if it's proud to have a heart that never hardens, and a temper that never tires, and a touch that never hurts," Miss Jenny struck in, flushed, "she is proud. And if it's not, she is not."

Her set purpose of contradicting Miss Abbey point-blank, was so far from offending that dread authority as to elicit a gracious smile. "You do right, child," said Miss Abbey, "to speak well of those who deserve well of you."

"Right or wrong," muttered Miss Wren, inaudibly, with a visible hitch of her chin, "I mean to do it, and you may make up your mind to that, old lady."

"Here is the paper, madam," said the Jew, delivering into Miss Potterson's hands the original document drawn up by Rokesmith, and signed by Riderhood. "Will you please to read it?"

"But first of all," said Miss Abbey, "—did you ever taste shrub, child?"

Miss Wren shook her head.

"Should you like to?"

"Should if it's good," returned Miss Wren.

"You shall try. And, if you find it good, I'll mix some for you with hot water. Put your poor little feet on the fender. It's a cold, cold night, and the fog clings so." As Miss Abbey helped her to turn her chair her loosened bonnet dropped on the floor. "Why, what lovely hair!" cried Miss Abbey. "And enough to make wigs for all the dolls in the world. What a quantity!"

"Call that a quantity?" returned Miss Wren. "Poof! What do you say to the rest of it?" As she spoke, she untied a band, and the golden stream fell over herself and over the chair, and flowed down to the ground. Miss Abbey's admiration seemed to increase her perplexity. She beckoned the Jew toward her, as she reached down the shrub-bottle from its niche, and whispered:

"Child, or woman?"

"Child in years," was the answer; "woman in self-reliance and trial."

"You are talking about Me, good people," thought Miss Jenny, sitting in her golden bower, warming her feet. "I can't hear what you say, but I know your tricks and your manners!"

The shrub, when tasted from a spoon, perfectly harmonizing with Miss Jenny's palate, a judicious amount was mixed by Miss Potterson's skillful hands, whereof Riah too partook. After this preliminary Miss Abbey read the document; and, as often as she raised her eyebrows in so doing, the watchful Miss Jenny accompanied the action with an expressive and emphatic sip of the shrub and water.

"As far as this goes," said Miss Abbey Potterson, when she had read it several times, and thought about it, "it proves (what didn't much need proving) that Rogue Riderhood is a villain. I have my doubts whether he is not the villain who solely did the deed; but I have no expectation of those doubts ever being cleared up now. I believe I did Lizzie's father wrong, but never Lizzie's self; because when things were at the worst I trusted her, had perfect confidence in her, and tried to persuade her to come to me for a refuge. I am very sorry to have done a man wrong, particularly when it can't be undone. Be kind enough to let Lizzie know what I say; not forgetting that if she will come to the Porters, after all, by-gones being by-gones, she will find a home at the Porters, and a friend at the Porters. She knows Miss Abbey of old, remind her, and she knows what-like the home, and what-like the friend, is likely to turn out. I am generally short and sweet—or short and sour, according as it may be and as opinions vary—” remarked Miss Abbey, “and that’s about all I have got to say, and enough too.”

But before the shrub and water was sipped out, Miss Abbey bethought herself that she would like to keep a copy of the paper by her. “It’s not long, Sir,” said she to Riah, “and perhaps you wouldn’t mind just jotting it down.” The old man willingly put on his spectacles, and, standing at the little desk in the corner where Miss Abbey filed her receipts and kept her sample vials (customers’ scores were interdicted by the strict administration of the Porters), wrote out the copy in a fair round character. As he stood there, doing his methodical penmanship, his ancient scribe-like figure intent upon the work, and the little dolls’ dress-maker sitting in her golden bower before the fire, Miss Abbey had her doubts whether she had not dreamed those two rare figures into the bar of the Six Jolly Fellowships, and might not wake with a nod next moment and find them gone.

Miss Abbey had twice made the experiment of shutting her eyes and opening them again, still finding the figures there, when, dream-like, a confused hubbub arose in the public room. As she started up, and they all three looked at one another, it became a noise of clamoring voices and of the stir of feet; then all the windows were heard to be hastily thrown up, and shouts and cries came floating into the house from the river. A moment more, and Bob Glidery came clattering along the passage, with the noise of all the nails in his boots condensed into every separate nail.

“What is it?” asked Miss Abbey.

“It’s summut run down in the fog, ma’am,” answered Bob. “There’s ever so many people in the river.”

“Tell ’em to put on all the kettles!” cried Miss Abbey. “See that the boiler’s full. Get a bath out. Hang some blankets to the fire. Heat some stone bottles. Have your senses about you, you girls down stairs, and use ’em.”

While Miss Abbey partly delivered these directions to Bob—whom she seized by the hair, and whose head she knocked against the wall, as a general injunction to vigilance and presence of mind—and partly hailed the kitchen with them—the company in the public room, jostling one another, rushed out to the causeway, and the outer noise increased.

“Come and look,” said Miss Abbey to her visitors. They all three hurried to the vacated public room, and passed by one of the windows into the wooden veranda overhanging the river.

“Does any body down there know what has happened?” demanded Miss Abbey, in her voice of authority.

“It always is a steamer, Miss Abbey,” cried another.

“Them’s her lights, Miss Abbey, wot you see a-blinking yonder,” cried another.

“She’s a-blowing off her steam, Miss Abbey, and that’s what makes the fog and the noise worse, don’t you see?” explained another.

Boats were putting off, torches were lighting up, people were rushing tumultuously to the water’s edge. Some man fell in with a splash, and was pulled out again with a roar of laughter. The drags were called for. A cry for the life-buoy passed from mouth to mouth. It was impossible to make out what was going on upon the river, for every boat that put off sculled into the fog and was lost to view at a boat’s-length. Nothing was clear but that the unpopular steamer was assailed with reproaches on all sides. She was the Murderer, bound for Gallows Bay; she was the Manslaughterer, bound for Penal Settlement; her captain ought to be tried for his life; her crew ran down men in row-boats with a relish; she mashed up Thames lightermen with her paddles; she fired property with her funnels; she always was, and she always would be, wreaking destruction upon somebody or something, after the manner of all her kind. The whole bulk of the fog teemed with such taunts, uttered in tones of universal hoarseness. All the while the steamer’s lights moved spectrally a very little, as she lay-to, waiting the upshot of whatever accident had happened. Now she began burning blue-lights. These made a luminous patch about her, as if she had set the fog on fire, and in the patch—the cries changing their note, and becoming more fitful and more excited—shadows of men and boats could be seen moving, while voices shouted: “There!” “There again!” “A couple more strokes ahead!” “Hurrah!” “Look out!” “Hold on!” “Haul in!” and the like. Lastly, with a few tumbling clots of blue fire, the night closed in dark again, the wheels of the steamer were heard revolving, and her lights glided smoothly away in the direction of the sea.

It appeared to Miss Abbey and her two companions that a considerable time had been thus occupied. There was now as eager a set toward the shore beneath the house as there had been from it; and it was only on the first boat of the rush coming in that it was known what had occurred.

“If that’s Tom Tootle,” Miss Abbey made proclamation, in her most commanding tones, “let him instantly come underneath here.”

The submissive Tom complied, attended by a crowd.

"What is it, Tootle?" demanded Miss Abbey.

"It's a foreign steamer, Miss, run down a wherry."

"How many in the wherry?"

"One man, Miss Abbey."

"Found?"

"Yes. He's been under water a long time, Miss; but they've grappled up the body."

"Let 'em bring it here. You, Bob Gliddery, shut the house-door, and stand by it on the inside, and don't you open till I tell you. Any police down there?"

"Here, Miss Abbey," was official rejoinder.

"After they have brought the body in, keep the crowd out, will you? And help Bob Gliddery to shut 'em out."

"All right, Miss Abbey."

The autocratic landlady withdrew into the house with Riah and Miss Jenny, and disposed those forces, one on either side of her, within the half-door of the bar, as behind a breast-work.

"You two stand close here," said Miss Abbey, "and you'll come to no hurt, and see it brought in. Bob, you stand by the door."

That sentinel, smartly giving his rolled shirt-sleeves an extra and a final tuck on his shoulders, obeyed.

Sound of advancing voices, sound of advancing steps. Shuffle and talk without. Momentary pause. Two peculiarly blunt knocks or pokes at the door, as if the dead man arriving on his back were striking at it with the soles of his motionless feet.

"That's the stretcher, or the shutter, whichever of the two they are carrying," said Miss Abbey, with experienced ear. "Open, you Bob!"

Door opened. Heavy tread of laden men. A halt. A rush. Stoppage of rush. Door shut. Baffled hoots from the vexed souls of disappointed outsiders.

"Come on, men!" said Miss Abbey; for so potent was she with her subjects that even then the bearers awaited her permission. "First-floor."

The entry being low, and the staircase being low, they so took up the burden they had set down as to carry that low. The recumbent figure, in passing, lay hardly as high as the half door.

Miss Abbey started back at sight of it. "Why, good God!" said she, turning to her two companions, "that's the very man who made the declaration we have just had in our hands. That's Riderhood!"

CHAPTER III.

THE SAME RESPECTED FRIEND IN MORE ASPECTS THAN ONE.

IN sooth, it is Riderhood and no other, or it is the outer husk and shell of Riderhood and no other, that is borne into Miss Abbey's first-floor bedroom. Supple to twist and turn as the Rogue has ever been, he is sufficiently rigid now; and not without much shuffling of attendant feet, and tilting of his bier this way and that way, and peril even of his sliding off it and being tumbled in a heap over the balustrades, can he be got up stairs.

"Fetch a doctor," quoth Miss Abbey. And then, "Fetch his daughter." On both of which errands quick messengers depart.

The doctor-seeking messenger meets the doctor half-way, coming under convoy of police. Doctor examines the dank carcass, and pronounces, not hopefully, that it is worth while trying to reanimate the same. All the best means are at once in action, and every body present lends a hand, and a heart and soul. No one has the least regard for the man; with them all he has been an object of avoidance, suspicion, and aversion; but the spark of life within him is curiously separable from himself now, and they have a deep interest in it, probably because it is life, and they are living and must die.

In answer to the doctor's inquiry how did it happen, and was any one to blame, Tom Tootle gives in his verdict, unavoidable accident and no one to blame but the sufferer. "He was slinking about in his boat," says Tom, "which slinking were, not to speak ill of the dead, the manner of the man, when he come right athwart the steamer's bows and she cut him in two." Mr. Tootle is so far figurative, touching the dismemberment, as that he means the boat, and not the man. For the man lies whole before them.

Captain Joey, the bottle-nosed regular customer in the glazed hat, is a pupil of the much-respected old school, and (having insinuated himself into the chamber, in the execution of the important service of carrying the drowned man's neckerchief) favors the doctor with a sagacious old-scholastic suggestion that the body should be hung up by the heels, "sim'lar," says Captain Joey, "to mutton in a butcher's shop," and should then, as a particularly choice manoeuvre for promoting easy respiration, be rolled upon casks. These scraps of the wisdom of the captain's ancestors are received with such speechless indignation by Miss Abbey, that she instantly seizes the captain by the collar, and without a single word ejects him, not presuming to remonstrate, from the scene.

There then remain, to assist the doctor and Tom, only those three other regular customers, Bob Glamour, William Williams, and Jonathan (family name of the latter, if any, unknown to mankind), who are quite enough. Miss Abbey having looked in to make sure that nothing is wanted, descends to the bar, and there awaits the result, with the gentle Jew and Miss Jenny Wren.

If you are not gone for good, Mr. Riderhood, it would be something to know where you are hiding at present. This flabby lump of mortality that we work so hard at with such patient perseverance, yields no sign of you. If you are gone for good, Rogue, it is very solemn, and if you are coming back, it is hardly less so. Nay, in the suspense and mystery of the latter question, involving that of where you may be now, there is a solemnity even added to that of death, making us who are in attendance alike afraid to look on you and to look off you, and making those below start at the least sound of a creaking plank in the floor.

Stay! Did that eyelid tremble? So the doctor, breathing low, and closely watching, asks himself.

No.

Did that nostril twitch?

No.

This artificial respiration ceasing, do I feel any faint flutter under my hand upon the chest?

No.

Over and over again No. No. But try over and over again, nevertheless.

See! A token of life! An indubitable token of life! The spark may smoulder and go out, or it may glow and expand, but see! The four rough fellows, seeing, shed tears. Neither Riderhood in this world, nor Riderhood in the other, could draw tears from them; but a striving human soul between the two can do it easily.

He is struggling to come back. Now, he is almost here, now he is far away again. Now he is struggling harder to get back. And yet—like us all, when we swoon—like us all, every day of our lives when we wake—he is instinctively unwilling to be restored to the consciousness of this existence, and would be left dormant, if he could.

Bob Gliddery returns with Pleasant Riderhood, who was out when sought for, and hard to find. She has a shawl over her head, and her first action, when she takes it off weeping, and courtesies to Miss Abbey, is to wind her hair up.

“Thank you, Miss Abbey, for having father here.”

“I am bound to say, girl, I didn’t know who it was,” returns Miss Abbey; “but I hope it would have been pretty much the same if I had known.”

Poor Pleasant, fortified with a sip of brandy, is ushered into the first-floor chamber. She could not express much sentiment about her father if she were called upon to pronounce his funeral oration, but she has a greater tenderness for him than he ever had for her, and crying bitterly when she sees him stretched unconscious, asks the doctor, with clasped hands: “Is there no hope, Sir? O poor father! Is poor father dead?”

To which the doctor, on one knee beside the body, busy and watchful, only rejoins without looking round: “Now, my girl, unless you have the self-command to be perfectly quiet, I can not allow you to remain in the room.”

Pleasant, consequently, wipes her eyes with her back-hair, which is in fresh need of being wound up, and having got it out of the way, watches with terrified interest all that goes on.

Her natural woman’s aptitude soon renders her able to give a little help. Anticipating the doctor’s want of this or that, she quietly has it ready for him, and so by degrees is intrusted with the charge of supporting her father’s head upon her arm.

It is something so new to Pleasant to see her father an object of sympathy and interest, to find any one very willing to tolerate his society in this world, not to say pressingly and soothingly entreating him to belong to it, that it gives her a sensation she never experienced before. Some hazy idea that if affairs could remain thus for a long time it would be a respectable change, floats in her mind. Also some vague idea that the old evil is drowned out of him, and that if he should happily come back to resume his occupation of the empty form that lies upon the bed, his spirit will be altered. In which state of mind she kisses the stony lips, and quite believes that the impassive hand she chafes will revive a tender hand, if it revive ever.

Sweet delusion for Pleasant Riderhood. But they minister to him with such extraordinary interest, their anxiety is so keen, their vigilance is so great, their excited joy grows so intense as the signs of life strengthen, that how can she resist it, poor thing! And now he begins to breathe naturally, and he stirs, and the doctor declares him to have come back from that inexplicable journey where he stopped on the dark road, and to be here.

Tom Tootle, who is nearest to the doctor when he says this, grasps the doctor fervently by the hand. Bob Glamour, William Williams, and Jonathan of the no surname, all shake hands with one another round, and with the doctor too. Bob Glamour blows his nose, and Jonathan of the no surname is moved to do likewise, but lacking a pocket-handkerchief abandons that outlet for his emotion. Pleasant sheds tears deserving her own name, and her sweet delusion is at its height.

There is intelligence in his eyes. He wants to ask a question. He wonders where he is. Tell him.

“Father, you were run down on the river, and are at Miss Abbey Potterson’s.”

He stares at his daughter, stares all around him, closes his eyes, and lies slumbering on her arm.

The short-lived delusion begins to fade. The low, bad, unimpressible face is coming up from the depths of the river, or what other depths, to the surface again. As he grows warm, the doctor and the four men cool. As his lineaments soften with life, their faces and their hearts harden to him.

“He will do now,” says the doctor, washing his hands, and looking at the patient with growing disfavor.

“Many a better man,” moralizes Tom Tootle with a gloomy shake of the head, “ain’t had his luck.”

"It's to be hoped he'll make a better use of his life," says Bob Glamour, "than I expect he will."

"Or than he done afore," adds William Williams.

"But no, not he!" says Jonathan of the no surname, clenching the quartette.

They speak in a low tone because of his daughter, but she sees that they have all drawn off, and that they stand in a group at the other end of the room, shunning him. It would be too much to suspect them of being sorry that he didn't die when he had done so much toward it, but they clearly wish that they had had a better subject to bestow their pains on. Intelligence is conveyed to Miss Abbey in the bar, who reappears on the scene, and contemplates from a distance, holding whispered discourse with the doctor. The spark of life was deeply interesting while it was in abeyance, but now that it has got established in Mr. Riderhood, there appears to be a general desire that circumstances had admitted of its being developed in any body else rather than that gentleman.

"However," says Miss Abbey, cheering them up, "you have done your duty like good and true men, and you had better come down and take something at the expense of the Porters."

This they all do, leaving the daughter watching the father. To whom, in their absence, Bob Gliddery presents himself.

"His gills looks rum; don't they?" says Bob, after inspecting the patient.

Pleasant faintly nods.

"His gills 'll look rummer when he wakes; won't they?" says Bob.

Pleasant hopes not. Why?

"When he finds himself here, you know," Bob explains. "Cause Miss Abbey forbid him the house and ordered him out of it. But what you may call the Fates ordered him into it again. Which is rumness; ain't it?"

"He wouldn't have come here of his own accord," returns poor Pleasant, with an effort at a little pride.

"No," retorts Bob. "Nor he wouldn't have been let in, if he had."

The short delusion is quite dispelled now. As plainly as she sees on her arm the old father, unimproved, Pleasant sees that every body there will cut him when he recovers consciousness. "I'll take him away ever so soon as I can," thinks Pleasant with a sigh; "he's best at home."

Presently they all return, and wait for him to become conscious that they will all be glad to get rid of him. Some clothes are got together for him to wear, his own being saturated with water, and his present dress being composed of blankets.

Becoming more and more uncomfortable, as though the prevalent dislike were finding him out somewhere in his sleep and expressing itself to him, the patient at last opens his eyes wide, and is assisted by his daughter to sit up in bed.

"Well, Riderhood," says the doctor, "how do you feel?"

He replies gruffly, "Nothing to boast on." Having, in fact, returned to life in an uncommonly sulky state.

"I don't mean to preach; but I hope," says the doctor, gravely shaking his head, "that this escape may have a good effect upon you, Riderhood."

The patient's discontented growl of a reply is not intelligible; his daughter, however, could interpret, if she would, that what he says is, he "don't want no Poll-Parroting."

Mr. Riderhood next demands his shirt, and draws it on over his head (with his daughter's help) exactly as if he had just had a Fight.

"Warn't it a steamer?" he pauses to ask her.

"Yes, father."

"I'll have the law on her, bust her! and make her pay for it."

He then buttons his linen very moodily, twice or thrice stopping to examine his arms and hands, as if to see what punishment he has received in the Fight. He then doggedly demands his other garments, and slowly gets them on, with an appearance of great malevolence toward his late opponent and all the spectators. He has an impression that his nose is bleeding, and several times draws the back of his hand across it, and looks for the result, in a pugilistic manner, greatly strengthening that incongruous resemblance.

"Where's my fur cap?" he asks in a surly voice, when he has shuffled his clothes on.

"In the river," somebody rejoins.

"And warn't there no honest man to pick it up? O' course there was though, and to cut off with it arterwards. You are a rare lot, all on you!"

Thus, Mr. Riderhood: taking from the hands of his daughter, with special ill-will, a lent cap, and grumbling as he pulls it down over his ears. Then, getting on his unsteady legs, leaning heavily upon her, and growling "Hold still, can't you? What! You must be a staggering next, must you?" he takes his departure out of the ring in which he has had that little turn-up with Death.

CHAPTER IV.

A HAPPY RETURN OF THE DAY.

MR. and Mrs. Wilfer had seen a full quarter of a hundred more anniversaries of their wedding-day than Mr. and Mrs. Lammle had seen of theirs, but they still celebrated the occasion in the bosom of their family. Not that these celebrations ever resulted in any thing particularly agreeable, or that the family was ever disappointed by that circumstance on account of having looked forward to the return of the auspicious day with sanguine anticipations of enjoyment. It was kept morally, rather as a Fast than a Feast, enabling Mrs. Wilfer to hold a sombre darkling state, which exhibited that impressive woman in her choicest colors.

The noble lady's condition on these delightful occasions was one compounded of heroic endurance and heroic forgiveness. Lurid indications of the better marriages she might have made, shone athwart the awful gloom of her composure, and fitfully revealed the cherub as a little monster unaccountably favored by Heaven, who had possessed himself of a blessing for which many of his superiors had sued and contended in vain. So firmly had this his position toward his treasure become established, that when the anniversary arrived, it always found him in an apologetic state. It is not impossible that his modest penitence may have even gone the length of sometimes severely reproving him for that he ever took the liberty of making so exalted a character his wife.

As for the children of the union, their experience of these festivals had been sufficiently uncomfortable to lead them annually to wish, when out of their tenderest years, either that Ma had married somebody else instead of much-teased Pa, or that Pa had married somebody else instead of Ma. When there came to be but two sisters left at home, the daring mind of Bella on the next of these occasions scaled the height of wondering with droll vexation "what on earth Pa ever could have seen in Ma, to induce him to make such a little fool of himself as to ask her to have him."

The revolving year now bringing the day round in its orderly sequence, Bella arrived in the Boffin chariot to assist at the celebration. It was the family custom when the day recurred, to sacrifice a pair of fowls on the altar of Hymen; and Bella had sent a note beforehand to intimate that she would bring the votive offering with her. So Bella and the fowls, by the united energies of two horses, two men, four wheels, and a plum-pudding carriage dog with as uncomfortable a collar on as if he had been George the Fourth, were deposited at the door of the parental dwelling. They were there received by Mrs. Wilfer in person, whose dignity on this, as on most special occasions, was heightened by a mysterious toothache.

"I shall not require the carriage at night," said Bella. "I shall walk back."

The male domestic of Mrs. Boffin touched his hat, and in the act of departure had an awful glare bestowed upon him by Mrs. Wilfer, intended to carry deep into his audacious soul the assurance that, whatever his private suspicions might be, male domestics in livery were no rarity there.

"Well, dear Ma," said Bella, "and how do you do?"

"I am as well, Bella," replied Mrs. Wilfer, "as can be expected."

"Dear me, Ma," said Bella; "you talk as if one was just born!"

"That's exactly what Ma has been doing," interposed Lavvy, over the maternal shoulder,

"ever since we got up this morning. It's all very well to laugh, Bella, but any thing more exasperating it is impossible to conceive."

Mrs. Wilfer, with a look too full of majesty to be accompanied by any words, attended both her daughters to the kitchen, where the sacrifice was to be prepared.

"Mr. Rokesmith," said she, resignedly, "has been so polite as to place his sitting-room at our disposal to-day. You will therefore, Bella, be entertained in the humble abode of your parents, so far in accordance with your present style of living, that there will be a drawing-room for your reception as well as a dining-room. Your papa invited Mr. Rokesmith to partake of our lowly fare. In excusing himself on account of a particular engagement he offered the use of his apartment."

Bella happened to know that he had no engagement out of his own room at Mr. Boffin's, but she approved of his staying away. "We should only have put one another out of countenance," she thought, "and we do that quite often enough as it is."

Yet she had sufficient curiosity about his room to run up to it with the least possible delay, and make a close inspection of its contents. It was tastefully though economically furnished, and very neatly arranged. There were shelves and stands of books, English, French, and Italian; and in a port-folio on the writing-table there were sheets upon sheets of memoranda and calculations in figures, evidently referring to the Boffin property. On that table also, carefully backed with canvas, varnished, mounted, and rolled like a map, was the placard descriptive of the murdered man who had come from afar to be her husband. She shrank from this ghostly surprise, and felt quite frightened as she rolled and tied it up again. Peeping about here and there she came upon a print, a graceful head of a pretty woman, elegantly framed, hanging in the corner by the easy-chair. "Oh, indeed, Sir!" said Bella, after stopping to ruminate before it. "Oh, indeed, Sir! I fancy I can guess whom you think that's like. But I'll tell you what it's much more like—your impudence!" Having said which she decamped: not solely because she was offended, but because there was nothing else to look at.

"Now, Ma," said Bella, reappearing in the kitchen with some remains of a blush, "you and Lavvy think magnificent me fit for nothing, but I intend to prove the contrary. I mean to be Cook to-day."

"Hold!" rejoined her majestic mother. "I can not permit it. Cook, in that dress!"

"As for my dress, Ma," returned Bella, merrily searching in a dresser-drawer, "I mean to apron it and towel it all over the front; and as to permission, I mean to do without."

"You cook?" said Mrs. Wilfer. "You, who never cooked when you were at home?"

"Yes, Ma," returned Bella; "that is precisely the state of the case."

She girded herself with a white apron, and busily with knots and pins contrived a bib to it, coming close and tight under her chin, as if it had caught her round the neck to kiss her. Over this bib her dimples looked delightful, and under it her pretty figure not less so. "Now, Ma," said Bella, pushing back her hair from her temples with both hands, "what's first?"

"First," returned Mrs. Wilfer, solemnly, "if you persist in what I can not but regard as conduct utterly incompatible with the equipage in which you arrived—"

("Which I do, Ma.")

"First, then, you put the fowls down to the fire."

"To—be—sure!" cried Bella; "and flour them, and twirl them round, and there they go!" sending them spinning at a great rate. "What's next, Ma?"

"Next," said Mrs. Wilfer with a wave of her gloves, expressive of abdication under protest from the culinary throne, "I would recommend examination of the bacon in the sauce-pan on the fire, and also of the potatoes by the application of a fork. Preparation of the greens will further become necessary if you persist in this unseemly demeanor."

"As of course I do, Ma."

Persisting, Bella gave her attention to one thing and forgot the other, and gave her attention to the other and forgot the third, and remembering the third was distracted by the fourth, and made amends whenever she went wrong by giving the unfortunate fowls an extra spin, which made their chance of ever getting cooked exceedingly doubtful. But it was pleasant cookery too. Meantime Miss Lavinia, oscillating between the kitchen and the opposite room, prepared the dining-table in the latter chamber. This office she (always doing her household spiriting with unwillingness) performed in a startling series of whisks and bumps; laying the table-cloth as if she were raising the wind, putting down the glasses and salt-cellars as if she were knocking at the door, and clashing the knives and forks in a skirmishing manner suggestive of hand-to-hand conflict.

"Look at Ma," whispered Lavinia to Bella when this was done, and they stood over the roasting fowls. "If one was the most dutiful child in existence (of course on the whole one hopes one is), isn't she enough to make one want to poke her with something wooden, sitting there bolt upright in a corner?"

"Only suppose," returned Bella, "that poor Pa was to sit bolt upright in another corner."

"My dear, he couldn't do it," said Lavvy. "Pa would loll directly. But indeed I do not believe there ever was any human creature who could keep so bolt upright as Ma, or put such an amount of aggravation into one back! What's the matter, Ma? Ain't you well, Ma?"

"Doubtless I am very well," returned Mrs. Wilfer, turning her eyes upon her youngest born with scornful fortitude. "What should be the matter with Me?"

"You don't seem very brisk, Ma," retorted Lavvy the bold.

"Brisk?" repeated her parent, "Brisk? Whence the low expression, Lavinia? If I am uncomplaining, if I am silently contented with my lot, let that suffice for my family."

"Well, Ma," returned Lavvy, "since you will force it out of me, I must respectfully take leave to say that your family are no doubt under the greatest obligations to you for having an annual toothache on your wedding-day, and that it's very disinterested in you, and an immense blessing to them. Still, on the whole, it is possible to be too boastful even of that boon."

"You incarnation of sauciness," said Mrs. Wilfer, "do you speak like that to me? On this day, of all days in the year? Pray do you know what would have become of you if I had not bestowed my hand upon R. W., your father, on this day?"

"No, Ma," replied Lavvy, "I really do not; and, with the greatest respect for your abilities and information, I very much doubt if you do either."

Whether or no the sharp vigor of this sally on a weak point of Mrs. Wilfer's intrenchments might have routed that heroine for the time, is rendered uncertain by the arrival of a flag of truce in the person of Mr. George Sampson: bidden to the feast as a friend of the family, whose affections were now understood to be in course of transference from Bella to Lavinia, and whom Lavinia kept—possibly in remembrance of his bad taste in having overlooked her in the first instance—under a course of stinging discipline.

"I congratulate you, Mrs. Wilfer," said Mr. George Sampson, who had meditated this neat address while coming along, "on the day." Mrs. Wilfer thanked him with a magnanimous sigh, and again became an unresisting prey to that inscrutable toothache.

"I am surprised," said Mr. Sampson, feebly, "that Miss Bella condescends to cook."

Here Miss Lavinia descended on the ill-starred young gentleman with a crushing supposition that at all events it was no business of his. This disposed of Mr. Sampson in a melancholy retirement of spirit, until the cherub arrived, whose amazement at the lovely woman's occupation was great.

However, she persisted in dishing the dinner as well as cooking it, and then sat down, bibless and apronless, to partake of it as an illustrious guest: Mrs. Wilfer first responding to her husband's cheerful "For what we are about to receive—" with a sepulchral Amen, calculated to cast a damp upon the stoutest appetite.

"But what," said Bella, as she watched the carving of the fowls, "makes them pink inside, I wonder, Pa! Is it the breed?"

"No, I don't think it's the breed, my dear," returned Pa. "I rather think it is because they are not done."

"They ought to be," said Bella.

"Yes, I am aware they ought to be, my dear," rejoined her father, "but they—ain't."

So the gridiron was put in requisition, and the good-tempered cherub, who was often as uncherubically employed in his own family as if he had been in the employment of some of the Old Masters, undertook to grill the fowls. Indeed, except in respect of staring about him (a branch of the public service to which the pictorial cherub is much addicted), this domestic cherub discharged as many odd functions as his prototype; with the difference, say, that he performed with a blacking-brush on the family's boots, instead of performing on enormous wind instruments and double-basses, and that he conducted himself with cheerful alacrity to much useful purpose, instead of foreshortening himself in the air with the vaguest intentions.

Bella helped him with his supplemental cookery, and made him very happy, but put him in mortal terror too by asking him, when they sat down at table again, how he supposed they cooked fowls at the Greenwich dinners, and whether he believed they really were such pleasant dinners as people said? His secret winks and nods of remonstrance, in reply, made the mischievous Bella laugh until she choked, and then Lavinia was obliged to slap her on the back, and then she laughed the more.

But her mother was a fine corrective at the other end of the table; to whom her father, in the innocence of his good-fellowship, at intervals appealed with: "My dear, I am afraid you are not enjoying yourself?"

"Why so, R. W.?" she would sonorously reply.

"Because, my dear, you seem a little out of sorts."

"Not at all," would be the rejoinder, in exactly the same tone.

"Would you take a merry-thought, my dear?"

"Thank you. I will take whatever you please, R. W."

"Well, but my dear, do you like it?"

"I like it as well as I like any thing, R. W." The stately woman would then, with a meritorious appearance of devoting herself to the general good, pursue her dinner as if she were feeding somebody else on high public grounds.

Bella had brought dessert and two bottles of wine, thus shedding unprecedented splendor on the occasion. Mrs. Wilfer did the honors of the first glass by proclaiming: "R. W., I drink to you."

"Thank you, my dear. And I to you."

"Pa and Ma!" said Bella.

"Permit me," Mrs. Wilfer interposed, with outstretched glove. "No. I think not. I drank to your papa. If, however, you insist on including me, I can in gratitude offer no objection."

"Why, Lor, Ma," interposed Lavvy the bold,

"isn't it the day that made you and Pa one and the same? I have no patience!"

"By whatever other circumstance the day may be marked, it is not the day, Lavinia, on which I will allow a child of mine to pounce upon me. I beg—nay, command!—that you will not pounce. R. W., it is appropriate to recall that it is for you to command and for me to obey. It is your house, and you are master at your own table. Both our healths!" Drinking the toast with tremendous stiffness.

"I really am a little afraid, my dear," hinted the cherub meekly, "that you are not enjoying yourself?"

"On the contrary," returned Mrs. Wilfer, "quite so. Why should I not?"

"I thought, my dear, that perhaps your face might—"

"My face might be a martyrdom, but what would that import, or who should know it, if I smiled?"

And she did smile; manifestly freezing the blood of Mr. George Sampson by so doing. For that young gentleman, catching her smiling eye, was so very much appalled by its expression as to cast about in his thoughts concerning what he had done to bring it down upon himself.

"The mind naturally falls," said Mrs. Wilfer, "shall I say into a reverie, or shall I say into a retrospect? on a day like this."

Lavvy, sitting with defiantly folded arms, replied (but not audibly), "For goodness' sake say whichever of the two you like best, Ma, and get it over."

"The mind," pursued Mrs. Wilfer in an oratorical manner, "naturally reverts to Papa and Mamma—I here allude to my parents—at a period before the earliest dawn of this day. I was considered tall; perhaps I was. Papa and Mamma were unquestionably tall. I have rarely seen a finer woman than my mother; never than my father."

The irrepressible Lavvy remarked aloud, "Whatever grandpapa was, he wasn't a female."

"Your grandpapa," retorted Mrs. Wilfer, with an awful look, and in an awful tone, "was what I describe him to have been, and would have struck any of his grandchildren to the earth who presumed to question it. It was one of mamma's cherished hopes that I should become united to a tall member of society. It may have been a weakness, but if so, it was equally the weakness, I believe, of King Frederick of Prussia." These remarks being offered to Mr. George Sampson, who had not the courage to come out for single combat, but lurked with his chest under the table and his eyes cast down, Mrs. Wilfer proceeded, in a voice of increasing sternness and impressiveness, until she should force that skulker to give himself up. "Mamma would appear to have had an indefinable foreboding of what afterward happened, for she would frequently urge upon me, 'Not a little man. Promise me, my child, not a little man. Never, never, never marry a little man!" Papa also would remark to me (he possessed extraordinary humor), "that a family of whales must not ally themselves with sprats." His company was eagerly sought, as may be supposed, by the wits of the day, and our house was their continual resort. I have known as many as three copper-plate engravers exchanging the most exquisite sallies and retorts there at one time." (Here Mr. Sampson delivered himself captive, and said, with an uneasy movement on his chair, that three was a large number, and it must have been highly entertaining.) "Among the most prominent members of that distinguished circle was a gentleman measuring six feet four in height. He was not an engraver." (Here Mr. Sampson said, with no reason whatever, Of course not.) "This gentleman was so obliging as to honor me with attentions which I could not fail to understand." (Here Mr. Sampson murmured that when it came to that you could always tell.) "I immediately announced to both my parents that those attentions were misplaced, and that I could not favor his suit. They inquired was he too tall? I replied it was not the stature, but the intellect was too lofty. At our house, I said, the tone was too brilliant, the pressure was too high, to be maintained by me, a mere woman, in everyday domestic life. I well remember mamma's clasping her hands, and exclaiming, 'This will end in a little man!'" (Here Mr. Sampson glanced at his host and shook his head with despondency.) "She afterward went so far as to predict that it would end in a little man whose mind would be below the average, but that was in what I may denominate a paroxysm of maternal disappointment. Within a month," said Mrs. Wilfer, deepening her voice, as if she were relating a terrible ghost story, "within a month I first saw R. W., my husband. Within a year I married him. It is natural for the mind to recall these dark coincidences on the present day."

Mr. Sampson at length released from the custody of Mrs. Wilfer's eye, now drew a long breath, and made the original and striking remark that there was no accounting for these sort of presentiments. R. W. scratched his head and looked apologetically all round the table until he came to his wife, when, observing her, as it were, shrouded in a more sombre weight than before, he once more hinted, "My dear, I am really afraid you are not altogether enjoying yourself?" To which she once more replied, "On the contrary, R. W. Quite so."

The wretched Mr. Sampson's position at this agreeable entertainment was truly pitiable. For not only was he exposed defenseless to the harangues of Mrs. Wilfer, but he received the utmost contumely at the hands of Lavinia; who, partly to show Bella that she (Lavinia) could do what she liked with him, and partly to pay him off for still obviously admiring Bella's beauty, led him the life of a dog. Illuminated on the one hand by the stately graces of Mrs. Wilfer's oratory, and shadowed on the other by the checks and frowns of the young lady to whom he had devoted himself in his destitution, the sufferings of this young gentleman were distressing to witness. If his mind for the moment reeled under them, it may be urged, in extenuation of its weakness, that it was constitutionally a knock-knee'd mind, and never very strong upon its legs.

The rosy hours were thus beguiled until it was time for Bella to have Pa's escort back. The dimples duly tied up in the bonnet-strings, and the leave-taking done, they got out into the air, and the cherub drew a long breath as if he found it refreshing.

"Well, dear Pa," said Bella, "the anniversary may be considered over."

"Yes, my dear," returned the cherub, "there's another of 'em gone."

Bella drew his arm closer through hers as they walked along, and gave it a number of consolatory pats. "Thank you, my dear," he said, as if she had spoken; "I am all right, my dear. Well, and how do you get on, Bella?"

"I am not at all improved, Pa."

"Ain't you really, though?"

"No, Pa. On the contrary, I am worse."

"Lor!" said the cherub.

"I am worse, Pa. I make so many calculations how much a year I must have when I marry, and what is the least I can manage to do with, that I am beginning to get wrinkles over my nose. Did you notice any wrinkles over my nose this evening, Pa?"

Pa laughing at this, Bella gave him two or three shakes.

"You won't laugh, Sir, when you see your lovely woman turning haggard. You had better be prepared in time, I can tell you. I shall not be able to keep my greediness for money out of my eyes long, and when you see it there you'll be sorry, and serve you right for not being warned in time. Now, Sir, we entered into a bond of confidence. Have you any thing to impart?"

"I thought it was you who was to impart, my love."

"Oh! did you indeed, Sir? Then why didn't you ask me the moment we came out? The confidences of lovely women are not to be slighted. However, I forgive you this once; and look here, Pa, that's"—Bella laid the little forefinger of her right glove on her lip, and then laid it on her father's lip—"that's a kiss for you. And now I am going seriously to tell you—let me see how many—four secrets. Mind! Serious, grave, weighty secrets. Strictly between ourselves."

"Number one, my dear?" said her father, settling her arm comfortably and confidentially.

"Number one," said Bella, "will electrify you, Pa. Who do you think has"—she was confused here in spite of her merry way of beginning—"has made an offer to me?"

Pa looked in her face, and looked at the ground, and looked in her face again, and declared he could never guess.

"Mr. Rokesmith."

"You don't tell me so, my dear!"

"Mis—ter Roke—smith, Pa," said Bella, separating the syllables for emphasis. "What do you say to that?"

Pa answered quietly with the counter-question, "What did you say to that, my love?"

"I said No," returned Bella, sharply. "Of course."

"Yes. Of course," said her father, meditating.

"And I told him why I thought it a betrayal of trust on his part, and an affront to me," said Bella.

"Yes. To be sure. I am astonished indeed. I wonder he committed himself without seeing more of his way first. Now I think of it, I suspect he always has admired you though, my dear."

"A hackney coachman may admire me," remarked Bella, with a touch of her mother's loftiness.

"It's highly probable, my love. Number two, my dear?"

"Number two, Pa, is much to the same purpose, though not so preposterous. Mr. Lightwood would propose to me, if I would let him."

"Then I understand, my dear, that you don't intend to let him?"

Bella again saying, with her former emphasis, "Why, of course not!" her father felt himself bound to echo, "Of course not."

"I don't care for him," said Bella.

"That's enough," her father interposed.

"No, Pa, it's not enough," rejoined Bella, giving him another shake or two. "Haven't I told you what a mercenary little wretch I am? It only becomes enough when he has no money, and no clients, and no expectations, and no any thing but debts."

"Hah!" said the cherub, a little depressed. "Number three, my dear?"

"Number three, Pa, is a better thing. A generous thing, a noble thing, a delightful thing. Mrs. Boffin has herself told me, as a secret, with her own kind lips—and truer lips never opened or closed in this life, I am sure—that they wish to see me well married; and that when I marry with their consent they will portion me most handsomely." Here the grateful girl burst out crying very heartily.

"Don't cry, my darling," said her father, with his hand to his eyes; "it's excusable in me to be a little overcome when I find that my dear favorite child is, after all disappointments, to be so provided for and so raised in the world; but don't you cry, don't you cry. I am very thankful. I congratulate you with all my heart, my dear." The good soft little fellow, drying his eyes here, Bella put her arms round his neck and tenderly kissed him on the high road, passionately telling him he was the best of fathers and the best of friends, and that on her wedding-morning she would go down on her knees to him and beg his pardon for having ever teased him or seemed insensible to the worth of such a patient, sympathetic, genial, fresh young heart. At every one of her adjectives she redoubled her kisses, and finally kissed his hat off, and then laughed immoderately when the wind took it and he ran after it.

When he had recovered his hat and his breath, and they were going on again once more, said her father then: "Number four, my dear?"

Bella's countenance fell in the midst of her mirth. "After all, perhaps I had better put off number four, Pa. Let me try once more, if for never so short a time, to hope that it may not really be so."

The change in her strengthened the cherub's interest in number four, and he said, quietly: "May not be so, my dear? May not be how, my dear?"

Bella looked at him pensively, and shook her head.

"And yet I know right well it is so, Pa. I know it only too well."

"My love," returned her father, "you make me quite uncomfortable. Have you said No to any body else, my dear?"

"No, Pa."

"Yes to any body?" he suggested, lifting up his eyebrows.

"No, Pa."

"Is there any body else who would take his chance between Yes and No, if you would let him, my dear?"

"Not that I know of, Pa."

"There can't be somebody who won't take his chance when you want him to?" said the cherub, as a last resource.

"Why, of course not, Pa," said Bella, giving him another shake or two.

"No, of course not," he assented. "Bella, my dear, I am afraid I must either have no sleep to-night, or I must press for number four."

"Oh, Pa, there is no good in number four! I am so sorry for it, I am so unwilling to believe it, I have tried so earnestly not to see it, that it is very hard to tell, even to you. But Mr. Boffin is being spoiled by prosperity, and is changing every day."

"My dear Bella, I hope and trust not."

"I have hoped and trusted not too, Pa; but every day he changes for the worse, and for the worse. Not to me—he is always much the same to me—but to others about him. Before my eyes he grows suspicious, capricious, hard, tyrannical, unjust. If ever a good man were ruined by good fortune, it is my benefactor. And yet, Pa, think how terrible the fascination of money is! I see this, and hate this, and dread this, and don't know but that money might make a much worse change in me. And yet I have money always in my thoughts and my desires; and the whole life I place before myself is money, money, money, and what money can make of life!"

A SERMON TO SERVANTS.

WHILE traveling through Tennessee, some years ago, I happened to hear a sermon which I think worth reporting. The preacher was a clergyman who had just purchased a plantation with the slaves upon it. This was the first Sunday of his occupancy, and I was informed that he proposed to inaugurate his new "settlement" by instructing his people as to their duties and obligations. The meeting was held in the wheel-shed. The audience, an unwashed, uncombed group of negro men, women, and children, stood before the preacher, who was seated upon the tongue of the cart. After a hymn had been sung the preacher proceeded to hold forth from the text, "Servants, obey your masters according to the flesh."

"My colored friends," he began, reading from a paper which he skillfully concealed from his hearers between the leaves of the Hymn-Book, "we have but a very short time sustained to each other the relation of master and servant. I do not know how well you may have been instructed as to the duties of this relation; but I consider that I am called upon this occasion, the first upon which we have assembled ourselves together for the worship of God, to speak to you on the subject of your duties to me your master. And, first, I will consider what your duties are."

Here the reverend gentleman closed his book, and entered upon an extemporaneous address.

"In the first place, it is your duty to rise promptly in the morning at the blowing of the horn. Too much sleep is not good for either body or mind. All through this blessed Book," he continued, holding up by mistake the Hymn-Book, "if you could read you would find exhortations on the subject of oversleeping, and warnings against it. There is no greater temptation to which you are exposed than that of yielding to an inclination to sleep. It is the besetting sin of your race. 'A little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands together,' is the language of your hearts. Now, this is nothing more nor less than a temptation of that old wicked serpent, the Devil, who first deceived our parents in the garden of Paradise, and who goes about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour. Now, if you yield to this temptation, you will surely be devoured by the Devil. Your souls will surely be lost; everlasting destruction and eternal woe will be your portion forever among the fiends of hell. I know it seems a little hard, especially if the morning is a little cold, to resist the temptation to sleep; but you must, or burn forever in a fire of brimstone and sulphur ten thousand million times hotter than the hottest fire you ever felt in your lives, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And there you will have to burn for ever and ever. When you have suffered there millions and billions and trillions of years, your suffering will just be begun. You will have to stay there as long after that lapse of time as though you had not been there a second.

"Just think for a moment of the greatness of your sin! Your kind, trusting master, who has the bronchitis, and knows not what it is to have a well day, gets up early in the cold morning, and stands undressed at the open door or window, with the cold blast blowing upon him, liable to take his death by cold, and blows his horn. With a trusting heart he returns to his bed, believing that his servants think enough of him to obey the summons to rise. Now think of his disappointment and your sin when he awakes two hours after to find his confidence betrayed and you in bed; to find that, instead of being up and about your work like faithful servants, you are wasting in slumber his precious time. For when you oversleep your hour, it is not your time but mine you are squandering, and it's just as wicked and hell-deserving to waste my time as to steal my money. You have no time—not a second—except what I in my kindness grant you, for you are my property. I have bought you, paid money for you earned by hard labor, riding on horseback in the blazing midsummer sun, and in the cold and rain, and snow and sleet, and preaching day and night, until I have worn myself out in the service of God and my fellow-men; so that I feel that I can not last long; that my days here are numbered. I feel that you will not long have me for a master"—[Here the preacher was almost choked by his emotion].—"If you are unkind and unfaithful to me now, you will when you see me cold and stiff in my shroud, and hear the clods rattling on my coffin."—[At this point, unable to proceed, the speaker drew from his coat-pocket a red silk handkerchief, blew his nose, and wiped his eyes. Having recovered his composure somewhat by this diversion, he added, in low, tremulous tones]—"You will be stung by the worm of remorse."

This pathetic sentence, which brought tears to the eyes of many of his impulsive, demonstrative audience, closed the first portion of the discourse of this original sermonizer. Having disposed of this point the preacher proceeded to enlarge upon the other duties of slaves, some of which duties I think are not to be found in the code as given to Moses, or in that set forth by Christ and his Apostles. Notwithstanding this, his hearers were threatened, in case of their violation, with everlasting destruction of soul and body. He then proceeded, by what law of association I leave psychologists to explain, to set forth a somewhat original theology in something like these terms:

"You owe some duties to yourselves as well as to your master. It is your duty to improve the time which I will give you wisely. I'll give you Saturday night of each week after your day's work is done, and all the little jobs, such as feeding, milking, bringing the water, and chopping the wood for Sunday, etc. I can not give you any other night of the week, for you know there are a great many things to be done at night. There is the cotton to be baled, two cribs of corn to be shucked, and a part of it to be shelled for meal and hominy; wood to be chopped for the morning; apples and peaches to bring from the orchard and cut for drying; the geese to be picked and the sheep to be sheared; the pease and beans to be thrashed out, and spinning to be done. Now all these little things must be done at night, besides many more which I have not mentioned. We can't spend daylight on such trifles, because if we did the cotton would rot in the bolls. But the nights are getting long now, and if you will make out your plans, you can accomplish a great deal in a night. Now it is your duty to employ this night I give you profitably. I have proved that it is impossible for me to give you any but Saturday night. If I should give you any other you would sit up too late at your work, and then would sleep over my work the next day.

"You will need to put you up some beds, and get some bed-clothing for the winter. And now, maybe, you would like to know how you can earn money for this purpose, and I'll tell you! You men can make bread-trays—there's plenty of fine cypress on the plantation; or you can braid foot-mats—plenty of nice white shucks at the cribs; or you can make brooms, and scrub-mops, and tables, and chests to sell. Or you can have coal-kilns; and any Saturday night, for a small share in the profits, I would let you take my wagon and horses and haul it into some blacksmith. Or you can have a patch and raise some sweet potatoes or water-melons or corn to sell. I'll go shares with any of you in this matter. I'll furnish the land, and you do the work on Saturday nights when there is a moon. Why there are a thousand ways"—exclaimed the preacher, enthusiastically—"in which you can make all the pocket-money you need. But mind, I'll have no raising of fowls and pigs for sale. They would get their living from my corn and wheat and oats; I should have to sustain them, be at all the expense of supplying them with food; and besides this, you would claim all the eggs on the plantation as laid by your hens, and would sell three times as many pigs and chickens as you raised. I've seen the thing tried too often. I know all about it. And there's to be no selling of apples and peaches; indeed, I might as well say it here as any where, you are not to go into my orchards at all. I shall need all the fruit that is not used in my family or dried for fattening my hogs. But there are always berries or nuts in the woods which you can gather and take to the village Saturday night or Sunday. I'm willing to give you a pass any time for this purpose. A little later and the persimmons will be ripe; you can dry them and make beer of them, and have it all winter to sell. Then there are partridge-eggs, you can get five cents a dozen for all you find; then you can have your traps for birds and coons and possums; I reckon partridges will bring five cents apiece this fall, and possums half a dollar; coons won't bring so much. Then any of you men or boys, by going into the village Sunday morning, can make a half dollar in no time by blacking the boots and brushing the coats for young men—the young lawyers and doctors and clerks who haven't servants; or you can make your dime or quarter by taking care of the horses of planters' sons while they are at church. Why there's no end to the ways in which you can make money. I believe if I was a nigger I could get rich;" and the preacher smiled at his facetiousness, and most of his auditors smiled with him.

"As for you women, you can make money in almost all the ways I have mentioned; and besides, you can knit socks and stockings to sell. You can sew and wash for negroes round here who haven't any body to do these things for them, or who haven't, as you have, any time given them to work for themselves. You can spin some cotton—I sha'n't charge you any thing for the cotton you use—then double and twist it and carry it to the village and sell it to some merchant for wrapping-cord. Then you can make soap and sell it. You ought every one to have an ash-hopper, for I mean to allow you half the ashes you burn in your houses, and all the grease from the tops of the pots where you boil your bacon, and all the bones from the meat you eat; for bones when boiled in lye give out a good chance of grease. Then you can wash for young men in the village—carry the clean clothes in on Sunday morning and bring out the dirty ones. Then you can have all the goose-quills the geese lose. You'll find a ready sale for these. Some people will buy them for pens, and some for tooth-picks. Why it would take me all day to mention all the different ways in which you can make money, if you'll only go about it in the right way.

"And you must go to work immediately; there is no time to be lost. Even now, not to speak of the winter, you are in great need of a great many things. You must have kettles to boil your bacon in, and you need pot-hooks, and skillets, and lids, for the purpose of baking. You can't always bake your cakes in the ashes, and broil your meat on the coals, as you have done up to this time—there's too much waste in it. You'll never save any soap-grease in that way. You'll have to have tin buckets to carry your dinners to the field in, and tin cups to drink your buttermilk from. I can't have you using my vessels much longer; you'd soon have them battered to pieces. Then you want water-buckets, and plates, and cups and saucers, and knives and forks, and spoons. You see I am ambitious for you; I want you to live genteelly. In getting these things for yourself the expense, you see, is divided among you, and so cut up that you will hardly feel it; whereas, if I should undertake to get them all, it would come very hard upon me.

"Then there are your winter stockings. I don't want you to be hobbling around here this winter with frost-bitten feet and chilblains.

Now I intend to furnish you with the cotton, and so help you along; but you must spin and knit it, or get it done. The women can do this for themselves Saturday nights—there are a good many between this and cold weather—and the men can hire it done for a trifle.

Then about your winter clothing. Now some masters wouldn't trouble themselves about the matter. Mr. Haltom, over here, never bothers his head about such things; his niggers have to shift for themselves. But I don't mean to treat you in any such inhuman way. I mean to have the stuff spun for your winter clothes by the women at nights, and on rainy days, and when they are a little ailing—not well enough to do field-work; then I mean to get it wove, so that you'll have nothing to do but to see to the making, which you can do on Saturday nights. The men can't do their own sewing, but they can change work with the women—make them tables, or put them up shelves, or carry their stuff to the village and sell it for them, while the women do their sewing. Your mistress, of course, couldn't sew and knit for you all; it would come very hard upon her if she was to undertake it, but, divided among you, it would become very little. A woman who is smart with her needle can almost make a pair of pants in a night, and you know on Saturday nights you can sit up late, and work until midnight, because you can sleep late the next morning.

"Then you'll need shoes for the winter, but these won't cost you much; leather is cheap this Fall, and one pair will last through the winter, for your big feet are tough, and you can go barefooted until late, and turn your feet out to grass early"—here the orator smiled at his own wit. "Besides these necessary articles you'll want some nice clothes for church. You see I have some pride for my servants; I want them to appear as well as other folk's negroes. I hear

Mr. Shoemaker brags a great deal about his plantation and niggers, and I want to be able to brag about mine."

At this speech of their new master's some of the motley audience smiled, but grimly enough; others displayed their great white teeth with well-pleased countenances; while others still looked sullen, as though determined not to be humbugged.

"Now you can go to your cabins," resumed the preacher. "I wish you to spend the Sabbath-day quietly and decently, for remember it is God's holy day. Think over seriously what I have said to you, and make out your plans. Lay out to-day your work for next Saturday night, and when the time comes go about it in earnest. If any of you wish to take a quiet walk into the woods, to pick a few berries or nuts, why there is no harm in it. Some of you spoke about going to the village. If you will come to me after we have sung another hymn I'll give you passes, provided you'll promise not to stand around on the streets engaged in loud talking and laughing with other negroes. You must go there and attend to your trading, and then come directly home. I can see no harm in your going there quietly, attending to your business, and quietly returning home. Every body isn't required by God to keep the Sabbath in the same way. You are simply not to do the same things on Sunday that you do during the week. The idea is relaxation from the work of the week. Besides, you are obliged to do some trading, and there's no other time but Sunday for you to do it."

With this orthodox thought the preacher closed, his sermon, a hymn was sung, and then the negroes dispersed, their heads filled, doubtless, with thoughts of the money they were to make by the sale of shed goose-quills and partridge-eggs.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 2d of March, two days before the close of the present Congress. Many important measures remain to be disposed of. We present a summary of those upon which action has been taken:

On the 8th of February the electoral vote for President and Vice-President was counted in the House, the Senate being present. The whole number of electoral votes was 233: for Abraham Lincoln for President, and Andrew Johnson for Vice-President, 212; for George B. McClellan and George H. Pendleton, 21.—The bill providing a government for States overthrown or subverted by rebellion has been laid on the table in the House; in the Senate Mr. Sumner's substitute, which would exclude all the Southern States from representation until that privilege should be accorded them by a law of Congress, has been rejected by a large majority.—The bill repealing the law which prohibits the forfeiture of the real estate of rebels beyond their natural lives was passed in the House by a majority of one.—The following bills, having passed both Houses of Congress, have become laws: The Fortification bill, appropriating two and one-half millions.—A bill recognizing as post routes the bridges to be built over the Ohio at Cincinnati and Louisville.—A bill to establish mail-steamship communication between the United States and China.—The bill freeing the wives and children of colored soldiers.—The Indian Appropriation, and the Army and Navy Appropriation bills.—A joint resolution of inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes.—A bill appropriating $25,000 to purchase a painting of Mr. Powell which shall commemorate some national victory.—The Six Hundred Million Loan bill, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow $600,000,000, and to issue therefor bonds or Treasury notes, the bonds to be payable at any period within forty years from date, the interest to be paid semi-annually, annually, or at maturity, "and the principal, or interest, or both, shall be made payable in coin, or other lawful money, provided that the rate of interest on such bonds or Treasury notes shall not exceed six per cent. per annum, and when not payable in coin, shall not exceed seven and three-tenths per cent. per annum."

—In the Senate, the following bills have passed: A bill to exclude from representation in the Electoral College the States which were in rebellion November 8, 1864.—A Postal bill, providing that letters unpaid, or lacking more than a single rate of payment, should be returned to their writers with notification.—A bill to take one degree of latitude from the Territory of Utah, and to add the same to the State of Nevada.—A bill to reimburse Missouri for expenses incurred in calling out militia, which bill the House tabled.—A bill to amend the Copyright Law so as to authorize the copyrighting of photographs; also to require that a copy of every book copyrighted in the United States shall be forwarded to the library of Congress, a failure to do which forfeiting the copyright.—A bill making an appropriation to increase the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries of Departments to $3500 per annum, and of $60,000 for the extension of the Congressional Library.—The House resolution to reduce the duty on imported printing paper was so amended as to reduce the duty to 15 per cent.—A resolution calling for the report of the Committee of Inquiry on the explosion of the Petersburg mine, with which request the President complied; the failure in the assault on the occasion of the explosion was ascribed to disobedience of orders on the part of General Burnside, and to a lack of promptness and courage in his subordinate officers.—The following are the principal measures which have been adopted in the House: Bills for the construction of a ship canal around Niagara Falls, and of a canal to connect Lake Michigan with the Mississippi River; which bills have been reported in the Senate, with a joint resolution as a substitute for both, authorizing surveys to be made with a view to the construction of these works.—A resolution instructing the Committee on the Conduct of the War to investigate the military operations of General Rosecrans, from his campaign in West Virginia down to the close of the recent campaign in Missouri.—A joint resolution appropriating $1000 for a bust of the late Chief Justice Taney.—A resolution of inquiry into the number of rebel prisoners which have been enlisted in the Federal service; to which the Secretary of War replied that the total number of such enlistments has been 3800; that they ceased in September last by order of the War Department; and that no United States bounty had ever been paid to such recruits.

An unavailing "Peace Conference" was held on the 3d of February, on board a United States steamer in Hampton Roads. On the 28th of December Mr. Francis P. Blair had been authorized by our Government to pass the lines of the army and proceed to Richmond; he was charged with no public mission. During this visit he had an interview with Jefferson Davis, from whom he received a letter, dated January 12, to the effect that he was ready to appoint a Commission, provided it would be received by the Government of the United States, in order to "renew the effort to enter into a conference with a view to secure peace between the two countries." To this President Lincoln replied that he was ready to receive an informal agent representing those "now resisting the national authority, with a view of securing peace to the people of our common country." Mr. Davis thereupon appointed Alexander H. Stephens, Vice-President of the Confederacy, R. M. T. Hunter, and John A. Campbell, as commissioners. After some delay these persons were permitted to proceed to Fortress Monroe, where they were met by Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State. The Secretary was instructed to insist that the indispensable conditions to negotiation were that the National authority should be restored throughout all the States; that the position of the Executive on the slavery question would be maintained; that there would be no cessation of hostilities short of an end of the war and the disbanding of all the forces hostile to the Government; and that any proposition not inconsistent with these stipulations would be liberally considered. Before any interview took place the President decided to be present at the conference; he accordingly proceeded to Fortress Monroe. The meeting between the President and Secretary of State on one side, and the three Commissioners on the other, lasted several hours. The result, as officially stated by the Southern Commissioners, was that they were informed that the Message of President Lincoln of last December explains his sentiments upon the terms and conditions of peace, and they were not informed that these would be modified; that no treaty would be made looking to the independence of the Southern States; nor would any truce be entered upon without an assurance in advance of the restoration of the authority and laws of the United States over the whole Confederacy; but that individuals liable to pains and penalties would be liberally dealt with. Mr. Seward, in a dispatch to our Minister to England, gives the same general account, but adds: "What the insurgent party seemed chiefly to favor was a postponement of the question of separation upon which the war is waged, and a mutual direction of the efforts of the Government as well as those of the insurgents to some extrinsic policy or scheme for a season, during which passions might be expected to subside, and the armies be reduced, and trade and intercourse between the people of both sections be renewed." The President also says: "It was not said by the other party that in any event, or on any condition, they would not consent to reunion; and yet they equally omitted to declare that they would so consent. They seemed to desire a postponement of that question, and the adoption of some other course first, which might or might not lead to reunion, but which we thought would amount to an indefinite postponement. The conference ended without result."

The dead-lock between the two armies near Richmond still continues. During the month of February the only important operation which took place was on the 5th, when Grant made a movement to extend his left toward Hatcher's Run. Two corps, the Second and the Fifth, were engaged in this movement. The general result was that we advanced until we came near the intrenched lines of the enemy, then halted, and threw up intrenchments. The Confederates attacked these intrenchments and were repulsed, and the Union forces gained some three or four miles of ground.—In the Southwest no important military operations have taken place. It is presumed that a considerable part of both armies have been transferred from Tennessee to Virginia and the Carolinas, where the great interest of the time is now centred.

The capture of Fort Fisher, January 15, was followed immediately by the abandonment by the Confederates of Fort Caswell and the other fortifications guarding the mouth of the Cape Fear River. The Confederates fell back gradually up the peninsula toward Wilmington, when they found themselves hardly pressed. The navy co-operated with the army by advancing both by the ocean and the river. They were obliged to move cautiously up the river, on account of the torpedoes which had been placed in the stream. The first movement in force toward Wilmington was made on the 11th of February. It resulted in advancing our position some miles, with a loss in killed and wounded of about 60 men. On the 17th, Fort Anderson, the last strong point on the river, just below Wilmington, was attacked by the fleet, while General Schofield, who now commands in this district, advanced by land, hoping to prevent the escape of the enemy. The fort was evacuated during the night of the 18th, but the enemy in and about it escaped capture. Ten heavy guns and a quantity of ammunition were left behind. A slight stand was made on the 20th, but this was easily overcome. On the 21st the Confederates began to evacuate Wilmington, and possession was taken of the place by the Union forces on the 22d of February, the anniversary of Washington's birthday. Including those captured at Fort Anderson, we took 700 prisoners and 30 guns.

The accounts of Sherman's march into Carolina are as yet derived almost wholly from Confederate sources, and for some time the Southern papers have been prohibited from publishing definite war news. On the night of the 27th of January an extensive conflagration took place in Savannah. It broke out in a stable, whether by accident or design is uncertain. Owing to the inactivity of the fire department the flames spread rapidly, and finally reached the arsenal, where a large quantity of shells, left by the Confederates on their retreat, still remained. These exploded, causing a great destruction of property and some loss of life.—Sherman, meanwhile, had set his troops in motion from Savannah toward South Carolina. They advanced in separate columns, in such a manner as to leave the enemy in utter uncertainty as to their real destination. As the event showed, the principal immediate object was Branchville, a little village sixty-two miles northwest of Charleston, important only as being at the junction of several railroads, by one of which Charleston derived its chief supplies from Central Georgia. This place fell into Sherman's hands on the 11th of February, the Confederates, under Beauregard, retreating northward toward Columbia, the capital of South Carolina. Sherman followed, leaving behind a force which effectually destroyed the railroad for miles. On the 17th he approached Columbia, which was evacuated by Beauregard, and occupied by Sherman. A disastrous conflagration took place in the capital of South Carolina a few days later. One account says that the Confederates themselves set fire to the place; another that it was burned by order of Sherman, in retaliation for his troops having been fired upon by citizens from their houses, after the place had been abandoned by the military forces of the Confederacy.—The occupation of Columbia is the last positive information which has been received from Sherman's army. The Southern papers merely give vague intimations of skirmishes, and of measures taken to concentrate forces to prevent his further advance.

In the mean while General Gillmore, who had replaced Foster in the command of the forces before

Charleston, had landed a considerable force on James Island, who, after some fighting, succeeded in establishing themselves within two miles of the city. Charleston, which had for many months withstood all attempts made upon it in front, was rendered untenable by this attack upon the rear, at a distance of more than sixty miles. The most that Hardee, who commanded there, could hope to do was to save the garrison. The evacuation was commenced on the night of February 15, and was quietly carried on for two days. At daylight on the 18th it was discovered that there were no troops in Forts Sumter and Moultrie, or in the works on James Island. The flag of the Union was raised on Sumter on the morning of the 18th by a detachment from the Twenty-first United States colored troops. The brick walls of the fort had been knocked down, and to the eye it appeared a shapeless mass of ruins. It had really been converted into an earth-work far stronger than the fort had ever before been. The other works in and about the harbor were found deserted, and possession was taken of them by Colonel Bennett, of the colored regiment, belonging to General Schimmelpfennig's corps. He then, with hardly half a score of men, pulled in a boat for the city, dispatching to the Mayor a demand for its surrender. That functionary had anticipated the demand by sending a note saying that the military authorities of the Confederate States had evacuated the city, and that he had remained to preserve order until the Federal commander should take such steps as he thought proper. The surrender was made in a dignified manner, strongly contrasting with the foolish bravado shown at New Orleans. The Confederate army, in retiring, had set fire to every building in which cotton was stored. Conflagrations were seen in every direction; the firemen tried to keep themselves hidden, for the moment one was seen he was swept off by the retreating Confederate soldiers. At length, by the aid of the Federal troops, the fires were extinguished, but not until serious damage had been done to portions of the city which had escaped the great fire of December, 1861, and the subsequent bombardment. One terrible catastrophe occurred. An immense quantity of cartridges had been stored in the dépôt of the Wilmington Railroad. Close by, in the yard, was a heap of cotton bales, which had been set on fire. The yard and dépôt were filled with men, women, and children. Some of them amused themselves by bringing out cartridges and throwing them into the burning pile. Gradually a train of loose powder had been formed from the yard to the dépôt. A spark set this on fire, and in an instant it was communicated to the magazine in the dépôt. The building was blown up with a tremendous explosion, the fragments being scattered in every direction. It is said that 150 persons were killed outright or burned to death in the dépôt, besides as many more wounded by the explosion. The lower part of the city, formerly the finest portion, was found to be a mass of ruins, occasioned partly by the great fire, and partly by the long bombardment. Almost every citizen who was able to leave had abandoned the city; but there still remained 10,000 or 15,000 persons who had no means of making their escape. These were almost destitute of the means of support. But a considerable quantity of rice had escaped destruction. The military authorities of the Union took possession of this, and ordered it to be distributed to the poor under the direction of a committee of the citizens. The surrender of Charleston took place on the 18th of February. Just four years before, Jefferson Davis had been inaugurated as President of the Southern Confederacy; and four days after that the Collector of Charleston gave notice that Charleston was a port of the Confederacy. The actual siege of the city, commencing from the lodgment made by Gillmore on Morris Island, July 10, 1863, lasted 585 days. Fire was first opened upon Charleston itself on the 22d of August, and had been kept up with more or less constancy ever since. The city had thus been actually under bombardment for 542 days. The Confederates burned all their iron-clad vessels in the harbor; they left behind 450 cannon of all sizes, which fell into our hands, the most of them in a useful condition.

The question of arming the slaves has been warmly discussed in the Confederate Congress, where, as well as in the Executive department, there is a great difference of opinion on the subject. General Lee, in a public letter, strongly advocates the measure. He writes, under date of Feb. 18: "I think the employment of negroes as soldiers not only expedient but necessary. The enemy will certainly use them against us if he can get possession of them, and as his present numerical superiority will enable him to penetrate many parts of the country, I can not see the wisdom or policy of holding them to await his arrival. . . . I do not think that our white population can supply the necessities of a long war without overtaxing its capacity and imposing great sufferings upon our people. . . . In my opinion the negroes, under proper circumstances, will make good soldiers. . . . I think that those who are employed should be freed. It would, in my opinion, be neither just nor wise to require them to serve as slaves. The best course would be to call for those who are willing to come with the consent of their owners. . . . I have no doubt that if Congress would authorize their reception into service, and authorize the President to call upon individuals or States for such as they are willing to contribute, with the condition of emancipation to all enrolled, a sufficient number would be forthcoming to enable us to try the experiment. If it prove successful most of the objections to the measure would disappear, and if individuals still remained unwilling to send their negroes to the army, the force of public opinion in the States would soon bring about such legislation as would remove all obstacles."—Bills to this purpose have been introduced into both Houses of Congress. That in the House of Representatives passed on the 20th of February, by a vote of 40 to 37. It empowered the President to ask and accept the services of as many negroes as he deemed expedient, to be employed during the war on any military service which he should direct; that these troops should receive the same pay and rations as white troops; that if a sufficient number of colored recruits was not obtained, the President might call upon each State for its proportion of 300,000 men, to be raised irrespective of color, from persons not subject to military duty under existing laws; and that nothing in this act should work any change in the relation of master and slave, except by the consent of the owners, and of the States in which they reside. But, in the mean while, the bill originating in the Senate was lost, on the 21st of February, by a vote of 11 to 10, both of the Virginia Senators voting against it. Thereupon both branches of the Virginia Legislature passed resolutions directing their Senators to vote for the arming of slaves. The Southern theory being that Senators in Congress are bound to obey the instructions of their State Legislatures, it is probable that the Virginia Senators will reverse their votes, which would make a majority of one in favor of the measure. The Senate of Virginia also, on the 25th of February, passed a bill, by a vote of 27 to 3, which was sent to the House of Delegates, authorizing the Governor to call for volunteers for one year from the free negroes and slaves, to "aid in the defense of the capital and such other points as are or may be threatened by the public enemy;" these volunteers to be commanded by white officers. The bill suspends, in the case of these volunteers, the operation of the laws prohibiting the carrying of arms by slaves and free negroes.

In accordance with a resolution of the Confederate Congress, the President of the Confederacy appointed General Lee to the chief command of the entire military force. General Lee's order announcing that he assumed this post is dated February 9. General Joseph E. Johnston, between whom and Jefferson Davis there is a deep animosity, had been virtually retired from the army after the fall of Atlanta. Public opinion so strongly demanded his restoration that the President was forced to yield, and he was reinstated, and placed in immediate command of the forces opposed to Sherman, in the place of Beauregard, who wrote to the President that the general sentiment of the public, and particularly that of the Army of the Tennessee, was so urgent for Johnston's restoration to command that he was induced to join his wish to theirs; but he did not wish to be removed from his present field of operations, but preferred to serve under his old comrade. Johnston's order assuming the command of the "Army of the Tennessee, and all the troops in the Departments of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida," is dated at Charlotte, North Carolina, February 25.

Governor Magrath, of South Carolina, issued a proclamation announcing that the invasion of the State had been commenced, and calling upon the people to rise in arms. We extract a few sentences: "Let all who falter now or hesitate," he said, "be henceforth marked. If any seek escape from duty and danger at this time, let them depart. There is no room in the State but for one class of men: they are the men who are willing to fight in her cause. The period is near when private business must be for a season suspended. When the State calls, as it now does, to arms, all must obey that summons. Remove all your property from the reach of the enemy; carry what you can to a place of safety; then quickly return to the field. What you can not carry, destroy. You led the way in those acts which united the people of your sister States in this Confederation of States, and their secession from the Government of the United States. You fired the first gun at the flag of the United States, and caused that flag to be lowered at your command. As yet you have suffered less than any other people. You have spoken words of defiance: let your acts be equally significant." There are some, says the Governor, who think they are not bound to fight with us on account of their allegiance to some foreign power. Such people are warned to depart. "If they remain, they will do so with the full knowledge that the State expects and demands that every man shall do his duty."

Governor Vance, of North Carolina, issued a proclamation on the 14th of February, urging the people to continued resistance. "Some," he says, "will tell you that we are already subdued; that the enemy outnumbers us; that our fighting men are all slain; our resources all exhausted; and that we might as well submit now. But great as our calamities have been, straitened as we are for all supplies, both of men and material, I see no danger which threatens our cause except the depression of spirit among the people, and the still more dreadful risk of internal dissension.... Over four hundred thousand names yet stand on the muster-rolls of the Confederacy, to say nothing of the hundreds of thousands who shirk. Where are they? Thousands upon thousands, absent without leave, are lurking in the woods and swamps of the South. Are our provisions all gone? Hundreds of thousands of bushels of grain now rot at the various dépôts of the South for the want of transportation, and this transportation can not be protected because these absent soldiers are not at the post of duty." He then goes on to affirm that of all the region overrun by the Federal forces, they only hold the spots trodden by their armies or covered by their guns. He concludes by urging the people to lay down party bitterness; to use every exertion to restore absentees to the army; to divide their substance with the poor and suffering; to sustain their rulers and generals; and, in a word, to do every thing "to prevent the degradation of the country and the ruin of its people."

Governor Brown, of Georgia, between whom and President Davis there is a bitter feud of long standing, on the 24th of February sent a message to the Georgia Legislature, in which he makes a bitter attack upon the policy and measures of the Confederate Government at Richmond. We quote a considerable portion of the telegraphic abstract of this message, as published in the Richmond papers of February 28:

"The message commences with a defense of the State against the attacks of the press for permitting Sherman to march unmolested through the State. He says she was abandoned to her fate and neglected by the Confederate authorities, and while her army of able-bodied sons were held for the defense of other States, Georgia was compelled to rely only upon a few old men and boys. He claims that the golden opportunity was thus lost for overthrowing Sherman. Had he been resisted from the start, and forced to fight and exhaust his ammunition, his surrender would have been certain. He recommends the establishment of a militia system, to be in no case turned over to the Confederate Government, but retained for home defense. He says there are only fourteen hundred exempts in the State, and most of these are over age. He recommends the passage of a law authorizing the impressment of provisions in the hands of persons who refuse to sell their surplus to the indigent families of soldiers. Referring to the penitentiary, he says that more than half the convicts released to fight have since deserted. He opposes the arming of the slaves, believing them to be more valuable as agricultural laborers than they could be as soldiers. They do not wish to go into the army, and the principal restraint now upon them is the fear that if they leave, the enemy will make them fight and compel them to take up arms, and they will desert by thousands. We can not expect them to perform deeds of heroism when fighting to continue the enslavement of their wives and children, and it is not reasonable to demand it of them. Whenever we establish the fact that they are a military people we destroy our theory that they are unfit to be free. When we arm the slaves we abandon slavery. He takes the Government to task for a great variety of abuses, such as illegal impressments, arrests of citizens without authority by provost guards, the passport system, and the partiality of the Government to men of wealth, who are given nominal positions which keep them out of the army, while poor men and boys are forced into the ranks. He animadvertes severely on the generalship of the President, and traces his military career during the war. He says—Our Government is now a military despotism drifting into anarchy, and if the present policy is persisted in it must terminate in reconstruction, with or without subjugation. The Governor is opposed to both; but if he favored either he would give his earnest support to the policy of the President, as the surest mode of diminishing our armies, exhausting our resources, breaking the spirit of our people, and driving them in despair to seek refuge from worse tyranny by placing themselves under a government they loathe and detest. For the cure of existing evils he recommends the repeal of the Conscription act, the observance of good faith with the soldiers by paying them promptly, the abandonment of impressments and secret sessions of Congress, and taking from the President his power as commander-in-chief. He calls for a convention of the States to amend the Constitution, and closes in the following language: 'My destiny is linked with my country. If we succeed, I am a free man. If, by the obstinacy and weakness of our rulers, we fall, a common ruin awaits us all. The night is dark, the tempest howls, the ship is lashed with turbulent waves, the helmsman is steering to the whirlpool, yet our remonstrances are unheeded. We must restrain him, or the crew must sink together and all be buried in irrecoverable ruin.'"

The crew of the Florida, 30 in number, captured in the Brazilian harbor of Bahia, have been set at liberty, in accordance with the decision of the Government in this case. They were embarked at Boston on board the British steamer Canada, bound for Liverpool by way of Halifax.

John Y. Beall, a wealthy and educated Virginian, was executed at Governor's Island, in New York harbor, as a spy and guerrilla. It was proved that, in last September, he was acting as a spy in Ohio; that he seized two steamers, the Philo Parsons and Island Queen, on Lake Erie; that, in December, he was found acting as a spy near Niagara Falls, in the State of New York; and that he had attempted to destroy a train of cars, on the railroad between Buffalo and Dunkirk, by throwing obstructions on the track. He defended himself by claiming that all his acts were done by the authority of the Confederate Government, which had assumed the responsibility in the case, and died protesting that his execution was an act of murder.

The Legislatures of the following eighteen States have ratified the proposed amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting slavery: Illinois, Feb. 1; Rhode Island, Feb. 2; Michigan, Feb. 2; New York, Feb. 3; Pennsylvania, Feb. 3; Maryland, Feb. 3; Massachusetts, Feb. 4; West Virginia, Feb. 3; Maine, Feb. 7; Missouri, Feb. 7; Ohio, Feb. 8; Minnesota, Feb. 8; Kansas, Feb. 8; Virginia, Feb. 9; Indiana, Feb. 13; Nevada, Feb. 16; Louisiana, Feb. 17; Wisconsin, Feb. 24. This list includes Virginia and Louisiana, which did not vote in the Presidential election, the validity of whose present loyal State Governments is not settled. The following States, whose Legislatures are yet to meet, will undoubtedly ratify the amendment: Connecticut, California, Iowa, New Hampshire, Oregon, Vermont, to which will be added Arkansas and Tennessee, if the present loyal Governments shall be recognized as valid—eight in all.—The following three States have rejected the amendment: Delaware, Feb. 3; Kentucky, Feb. 23; New Jersey, March 1; in New Jersey the vote in the Assembly was equally divided, and the question was decided in the negative by the casting vote of the Speaker. Including the States in which there is no even nominal loyal State Governments, the whole number of States is 36; three-fourths of the States, that is 27, are required to make the proposition valid. If the votes of Virginia, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee shall be allowed, there will be a majority of all the States of two in favor of the ratification. If these are rejected, and if the seven States in which there is no loyal government be not reckoned, there will still be a majority for the ratification. But if the vote of these somewhat irregular States be not counted, and if it is decided that the assent of three-fourths of all the States is held to be required, there will be but 22 valid votes in its favor, being 5 less than the required number.

Editor's Easy Chair.

NOW that the crocuses have bloomed and the tender willow twigs are sheathed in delicate green, it is pleasant to remember the snow and to tell the Winter's tale.

It has been a season of peculiar severity. The lasting and early sleighing will be long remembered. The cold season of '64 and '65 will become a proverb. The year of railroad disasters will be sadly marked in our annals. Of course a peripatetic Easy Chair has had fair opportunities of seeing it and feeling it, and of hurling foul scorn at the chief railroads in the country.

There was one memorable snow-storm which was especially severe upon the line of that modest public servant, the Central Railroad. Between Utica and Syracuse the force of the storm was greatest; and the snow had fallen to the depth of nearly three feet. It was a still, heavy, moist fall in February. The whole season had been unusually snowy, so that the best preparation which that excellent Company chooses to make to guard against the delays of storms had been made. All Tuesday night the snow fell. All night long there was the whispering rustle, swelling into soft gusts that drove gently against the window, but not blowing so sternly as to shake the snow from the twigs and boughs and railings and window caps and wherever else it could cling, transforming the old familiar world into a new beauty. The next morning the scene was that which is so exquisitely described in Judd's "Margaret," but which has never yet been so perfectly represented upon canvas.

Stirring early, but in that snow-muffled dawn with no sense of the hard cold shock of common winter mornings, and parting from the most friendly hearth, the Easy Chair came rolling down to Schenectady to join the train upon the Central Road going West, which leaves Albany at seven o'clock in the morning. Schenectady is about forty minutes' journey from Albany. He there found at half past seven the train which had left Albany the previous evening at eleven, and which had remained at Schenectady during the whole night. Just before eight o'clock it moved off upon its way, and the seven o'clock train from Albany arrived.

In that our traveler seated himself, and was locked in by a newsboy under instructions from a conductor that that car was to be reserved for way passengers. To the Easy Chair's remonstrance at being imprisoned, the newsboy informed him "I dunno nuthin' about it, only I'm to keep the door locked;" which he did until a few other passengers were admitted and advised the youth not to lock the door, and he accepted the advice.

After a delay of an hour or more the train rolled on, and pushed steadily forward until near Little Falls, where it overtook the eleven o'clock train of the previous evening. The two trains struggled with the snow, the only snow-plow being a small iron cow-catcher, and at about half past five o'clock in the afternoon reached Utica, where the morning train should have arrived at noon.

Utica is one of the chief stations of the Central Road. The storm was on Tuesday night. The telegraph had of course informed the managers of the delay of trains and the condition of the roads. One of the eastern trains was already twelve hours behind. Of course, therefore, this great road had made adequate and extraordinary exertions to clear the track. Let us see.

After due delays one train, an express, moved off toward the West with three locomotives, each provided with a cow-catcher. Then followed a mail-train soon after six. It toiled four miles to Whitesborough, where it overtook the express train. The two contrived to worry through to Oriskany, about four miles further, and there stopped. It was stated that another train came afterward from Utica. It would be incredible, except upon this road. But there at Oriskany, eight miles from Utica, all the trains were stopped. There were six or seven locomotives in attendance, each with a cow-catcher. A snow-plow was not seen; nor could the most careful inquiry discover that such an engine had been ever seen or heard of in that region.

The trains rolled feebly forward for a mile or two, then rolled feebly back again. The six or seven locomotives, with a small cow-catcher each, as useful as a lady's embroidered apron to a cook managing a sirloin, hooted like a chorus of owls. Two or three of them broke away from the trains, charged the snow-drifts with the front cow-catcher, hooted fearfully for assistance—and a dozen laborers, some with snow-spades, some with coal-shovels, trotted leisurely to the rescue and dug the cow-catchers out again.

This ludicrous and imbecile prodding of the difficulty continued until midnight. Then the trains were rolled back to Oriskany station; and the six or seven locomotives, after a prolonged and energetic hooting, quietly betook themselves to Utica, carrying some of the passengers who were in the secret, and deliberately abandoning the trains for the night. There were probably more than a thousand passengers. They could have been taken back to Utica in an hour with the locomotives. If it were thought best to leave them, more power might have been sent to them. Provisions might have been sent to them. They could have been told what their fate was to be. Something might have been done. Nothing was done. They were left upon the track. One of the passengers who returned with the locomotives offered to buy food if it could be sent to the passengers. He was told that they should be attended to, and that was the end of it. They were left upon the track.

In a house near by an active and humane woman baked biscuit and cakes and pies, and made tea and coffee all night long. The famished passengers came and went to and from the hospitable door. Some of the more adventurous pushed off to the little village of Oriskany, and found a tavern and a small grog-shop with such refreshment as they could afford. The air was still; the moon shone, and gradually the night wore away without suffering. The children slept and made little noise, and the women as usual were patient and cheerful. But there was one man who could not forgive himself for being there. "You who came regularly out from Albany and were caught in it," said he, "could not help yourselves; you are not responsible. But I—why I was such a darned fool as to walk into the scrape with my eyes open! It's all my own fault, and I'm served exactly right for being such a darned fool." This penitent passenger returned incessantly to the same strain, until at length all the company began to feel a malevolent suspicion that he was the cause of the whole obstruction. He was evidently regarded as the Jonah; but so long as the cars were warm he was not cast overboard into the snow.

About seven o'clock in the morning the Easy Chair, who had no further reason for traveling westward, was awakened by a punch in the shoulders from a neighbor, who kindly said: "I'm very much afraid you will be carried off!" Our traveler laughed, and rejoined that he saw no immediate danger of such a result. Then taking his traveling-bag he made his way to the grog-shop in the village, and bargained for a cutter to take him back to Utica. While he waited for the horse to be "hitched to," he heard a philosopher who was drinking ale and smoking a native cigar, remark, "No, Sir. I never permit my stomach to get empty. I came up here and ate some pie at twelve o'clock. Then I came at three and had some oysters and ale. Now I've just had some coffee and cakes; and I am smoking, you see. I have to smoke, you know, for the asthma. But I never let my stomach get empty. Nothing gives fits like an empty stomach."

These remarks were delivered with oracular emphasis, and nobody seemed to think them droll, which was the perfection of comedy.

Any thing more dreary than that grog-shop at early morning thronged by disgusted travelers, it is not easy to imagine. The mingled fumes of bad tobacco, bad coffee, and bad whisky pervaded the little room. There was an incessant arrival of people, who knocked their boots upon the floor as they entered; and one or two, with an air of satisfied virtue, poured a little water into a pewter basin, wet their hands and faces with it, and seemed to suppose they had washed themselves. The Easy Chair soon made a bargain for the cutter, and abandoning himself to the direful chance of "fits," seated himself by the side of a bright boy and slid off silently through the snow for Utica. The road was not broken. It was a world of snow. Herman Melville could have found a fresh hint for his wonderful chapter upon whiteness in "The Whale."

The inspiring brilliancy of such a day and scene can never be forgotten. The wind blew straight out of the northwest, and was chilled by the broad basin of the Mohawk Valley before it struck its keen edge against our faces. The Chair and the boy chatted a little, but gradually they became silent, until there was a general and disagreeable unmuffling to pay toll at a gate; although it was not easy to see by what right the turnpike company collected rent for the use of snow. Do the directors keep the sleighing in repair?

It was now toward nine o'clock, and the Easy Chair was expecting to see every moment a train of locomotives whistling and shrieking and puffing out from Utica to the relief of the passengers whom the beneficent Central Railroad management had left all night in a snow-drift. But the locomotives evidently knew where comfort was to be found, and nothing was to be seen or heard. Claverhouse feasted while the Cameronians were tortured. But if the theory of the grog-shop philosopher were true what an issue was to be apprehended!

Presently the Easy Chair reached the stately Lunatic Asylum on the edge of the city of Utica, and in a few minutes was safe and comfortable in Boggs's Hotel. It was about half past nine, and he instantly stepped into the railroad waiting-room, which is connected with the hotel, to ask at what hour a train would leave for Albany or Troy. It was an amiable intention; but there is probably no greater delusion in the world than the supposition that any information of any kind whatever is to be obtained at the offices of this excellent Company. The room was crowded with people whom the disordered trains had assembled. But nobody knew any thing but his own adventures. Where any train was, except the one in which he had been caught, nobody could tell. When any train would depart was beyond every body's knowledge. The ticket-office was closed. All other official rooms were locked. There was no one to answer questions. There was not even a bulletin-board to tell every body what every body wanted to know, or even to say that the management themselves did not know. A little accommodation of that kind is so easy, so satisfactory, so economical of time and patience! But it can not be allowed. There even seems to be some natural hostility between the traveler who has the audacity to buy a ticket and the agent who has the Christian forbearance to sell it. Beyond that transaction, in which, upon the part of the agent, charity has her perfect work, nothing is possible. A question is an impertinence of which this Easy Chair hopes no fellow-traveler will be guilty.

It would have been easy to score in white chalk upon the side of the room, if a bulletin-board were beyond the pecuniary resources of the Company, these words: "The train from the West is stuck at Rome. The train from the East is at St. Johnsville. A train will leave for Syracuse at twelve, for Albany at one;" or, "There is no news from any train."

At length, as it was important to the Easy Chair as to many others, to know what their fate would probably be, and how long they must stand about in the station, an intrepid and adventurous explorer, accustomed to deal with the craftiest of men, gallantly undertook to effect an entrance into the offices of the Company and extort some news. This sublime resolution, of which only the most heroic could be capable, was saluted with admiration, and the brave man departed with the sincerest benedictions of the travelers. After some time he returned. His courage had been rewarded. He had ascertained that there was a train somewhere near Rome, and that some time during the day a train would leave for the East. When it would go, was beyond the power of man to discover.

"Then I will go to my room and do my work, and ask the host to summon me at the right moment," said the Easy Chair.

"I tried that yesterday and was left," said a fellow-pilgrim.

That, of course, ended that plan. The wretched passengers stared vacantly at each other, and dozed about the stove. Some locomotive moving cars and "putting things to rights" upon the track suddenly hooted, and dozers and starers sprang up and thronged to the door only to perceive their disappointment and settle dully back again.

The Easy Chair and a friend repaired to the office of the hotel, and chatted the morning away. At one o'clock a benign personage entered and said:

"Train for the East in fifteen minutes."

At the same moment the dinner-bell rang.

"What a pity! No time for dinner," said the pair by the office stove.

"Do you suppose Benignity knows any thing about it?" asked one.

"Oh yes; he is the very man to know," replied the other.

They rose to settle their bills.

"Won't you go in to dinner, gentlemen?"

"No, thank you. Time doesn't permit, train goes now in ten minutes."

Out they went to the cars. They appeared in a few minutes, and the travelers seated themselves in high good-humor.

"Leaving Utica at a quarter past one we may hope to reach Albany by six."

It was a cheerful prospect, and the pleased passengers tucked their shawls about their feet and forgave every body his trespasses. A little difference of time explained, of course, the failure to depart at fifteen minutes past one. But when a quarter of two came there was the nudge of the locomotive grasping the train, and it rolled smoothly along. Smoothly along for an eighth of a mile to a position finely intrenched by freight-cars and store-houses, and there stopped. Two o'clock. Half past. Three o'clock. The passengers had lost their dinner and they had not started. Forgiveness of sinners had become at that moment almost an impossible virtue.

"I say," cried one, "let's go and hunt up some dinner, I'm starving."

"And be left behind, after all?"

It would probably puzzle even Mr. Herbert Spencer to say why in any case of extremity upon a railroad train the conductor becomes invisible. At the very moment when you wish to have the shock passed gently off, the conductor is gone. It was useless, therefore, to suppose that any information could be obtained of the probable moment of departure. But surely all good Christian souls will extenuate a little wrath with that benign personage who said so sweetly, "Train for the East in fifteen minutes."

At a little past five the cars moved. The track was quite clear. There was evidently no reason whatever that a train should not have left hours and hours before. There was no delay, and in the bright frosty moonlight the locomotive ran yelping into Albany at ten o'clock. "Here's richness!" quoth Mr. Squeers, at a famous breakfast he once ate with some "young friends" in London. And here's railroad management!

But what can a great Company do? It must increase its wealth. At that very moment it was a suitor to the Legislature for the power of compelling passengers to pay fifty or seventy-five per cent. more for such privileges as have been described. What can a great Company do? It would doubtless be willing enough to clear its tracks with snow-plows instead of cow-catchers—to stay by its passengers through nights in the snow, to feed them, or to carry them back eight miles. It would not seriously object to starting within five or six hours of the proper time, nor to arriving within a day or two of the hour indicated. It might have bulletin-boards and communicate information to the public, and inasmuch as it was created to serve the public, really be of service to it. But what would you have? Warren Hastings said to his subordinate Hindoo chiefs: "I hope you will not grind any body, but I must have the money." The Central Railroad Company would be very glad to serve the public, if it could. But, good lack! charity begins at home.

"Into paint will I grind thee, my bride," was the painter's wedding song. Into money the Central Railroad grinds the public. Surely it is a very droll public that complains. The Central Railroad seats a drunken and disgusting fellow by your side, and you can not help yourself. The Central Railroad crams its cars with passengers, so that those who have paid for seats must go standing—and they can not help themselves. Such details are endless. The Central Railroad Company receives eleven per cent. net on its actual capital, as we read in the newspapers, and sighs for sixteen. Is any body so lost to the ordinary feelings of man as to grudge it that pittance? Is any body so mad as to suppose that the public convenience is to be consulted by a Company existing by the favor and for the service of the public? No, no; the public was made for railroad corporations. Ask the Camden and Amboy.

There are parents who read Jack the Giant Killer to their dear children, and gravely say that there are no giants now who dine and grow fat upon hapless men and women.

WHEN a rustic Easy Chair like this goes to town and finds his way to the theatre, he is so dazzled as he enters and looks round at the lovely ladies and the gay men, that he says to himself, "Why don't I come every evening?" But when the fiddles have played, and the mysterious curtain rises, and he beholds the wooings and wanderings and perils and heroisms of Don Alfonso and Imogen, and hears the wondrous sounds into which his native language is changed in the play, and yields to the melting pathos of the adjuration, "Have you a strawberry leaf on your left arm! Ah! oh! It is—it is—my loved, my long-lost brother!" then the same Easy Chair says gently in his own ear: "Why, please, did you come to such a place as this?"

There is always a fine theoretical answer to such a question. It is the intrinsic charm of the drama, the skeptic is told, which brings him to the theatre. But the difficulty always is that the drama and the actor are at such terrible odds. Theoretically the stage is the mirror of nature. But except in Paris, where indeed the spectator does see at the theatre what he sees outside of it, the life of the stage is as absolutely different from that of the actual world as rouge is from the red of a rose.

There is, however, a real world, which is not actual. That of Shakespeare is such; and the satisfaction a well-acted play of Shakespeare gives us is not that of seeing men and women like those we daily meet, talking as our friends talk; but it is in the appeal to the imagination which contemplates the same human nature under a hundred aspects of time and condition. But the world of the stage is neither the real nor the actual. The best of it is to nature probably what Sir William Jones's translations are to the Persian originals. The voice, the gesture, the step, with which every thing is delivered upon the boards fairly illustrate what we say. They are harmonious with the "nature" of the stage; a nature which is never to be found away from it. Yet there is always a great relish in the public for whatever is artificial, and there is no question more truly in the key of what is called "society" than "Are you fond of nature?"

A really fine actor is as uncommon as a really great dramatic poet. Yet what Garrick was in Richard III. or Edmund Kean in Shylock, we are sure Edwin Booth is in Hamlet. He used to play this and other parts in Boston, and New York did not know him. It is not many years since he played here without observation except of a few, and without any prestige whatever. Suddenly he was the fashion; he was more, he was the passion; and it was agreed that he had no rival upon the stage. From that time he has held his position. Every year he plays many weeks in the city of New York, and during this last season he has played Hamlet for three months consecutively, six nights in the week—an incident in Shakespearian history quite unprecedented.

Mr. Booth plays at the Winter Garden theatre, opposite Bond Street, in Broadway, the site which is associated with Rachel. It is a small, convenient house, well built for hearing and seeing—or is it only that nobody wishes to speak or buzz when Mr. Booth is acting? The manager of the house, Mr. Stuart, is understood to be a particular personal friend of the actor's, and the theatre was arranged with peculiar care for the representation. The scene was thoughtfully studied, and the effect was entirely harmonious. That is, the parts agreed with each other. It may be doubted, of course, whether the Queen, Hamlet's mother, was dressed like the Queen we saw. But such details are forgiven to the general symmetry of impression.

Mr. Booth looks the ideal Hamlet. For the Hamlet of our imaginations, which is the Hamlet of Shakespeare, is not the "scant of breath" gentleman whom the severer critics insist that he should be. He is a sad, slight Prince. It is indeed a fair question how much John Kemble and Sir Thomas Lawrence are responsible for the ideal Hamlet. The tall figure, preternaturally tall in the picture, clad in the long black cloak, with one foot resting upon the earth from the grave, the skull in the hand, and the fine eyes uplifted to the chandelier—this is the imperious tradition of Hamlet. We see it in youth, and it remains forever.

But Mr. Booth disturbs this tradition a little. When he appears, we perceive at once that a certain melancholy youthfulness is wanting in the stately Kemble. He represents the Prince; but he is not identified with him. But Mr. Booth is altogether princely. His costume is still the solemn suit of sables, varied according to his fancy of greater fitness, and his small lithe form with the mobility and intellectual sadness of his face, and his large melancholy eyes, satisfy the most fastidious imagination that this is Hamlet as he lived in Shakespeare's world.

His playing throughout has an exquisite tone, like an old picture. The charm of the finest portraits, of Raphael's Julius or Leo, of Titian's Francis I. or Ippolito di Medici, of Vandyck's Charles I., is not the drawing nor even the coloring, so much as the nameless, subtle harmony which is called tone. So in Mr. Booth's Hamlet it is not any particular scene, or passage, or look, or movement that conveys the impression; it is the consistency of every part with every other, the pervasive sense of the mind of a true gentleman sadly strained and jarred. Through the whole play the mind is borne on in mournful reverie. It is not so much what he says or does that we observe; for under all, beneath every scene and word and act, we hear what is not audible, the melancholy music of the sweet bells jangled, out of tune, and harsh.

This gives a curious reality to the whole. Most acting is as superficial as the costume of the actor.

It may be carefully and even exquisitely studied, but you touch bottom all the time. "I can see how A's, and B's, and C's poetry is made," said a famous critic, "but I lose my breath when I read D's, for I can not see how it is done." If the acting is merely in the mouth or on the back, it is like the Western wines, which have so delicious a bouquet, but are thin and sharp to the taste. So with singing. If it is only in the throat of the singer, it can not get to the heart of the hearer. If it is in the soul of the singer, the hearer is not so much conscious of the beautiful voice as of the sense of it, so to speak. If you heard Cinti Damoreau or Persiani, you listened with smiling wonder and delight as to a musical box or a canary. If you heard Jenny Lind, there was an expansion and satisfaction of soul. Afterward it was remembered not merely as a pleasure you had enjoyed; it was a revelation you had received. It was genius.

Mr. Booth's conception of Hamlet is that of a morbid mind, conscious of its power to master the mystery of life, which in its details baffles and overwhelms him. There is, therefore, a serene consciousness of superiority in his behavior even in the most perplexed moments. In the chamber scene with his mother, when the ghost passes and Hamlet falls for a moment prostrate with emotion at his disappearance, the Queen insinuates that he is mad. There is a kind of calm, pitying disdain, mingled with the sense that her feeling is natural, with which Hamlet steps toward her, his finger on his pulse. The tragedy in Hamlet is not only the vital curiosity about existence, the mastering love of life which almost subdues his soul with fear and doubt, and keeps it tense with eager questioning; but it is the conviction of a mind morbid with this continual strain that it is a most sacred duty to end another life, to plunge a guilty soul into the abyss of doubt, and that soul the one dearest to his mother. This explains the fascination which the idea of his uncle's death always exercises upon his mind, and also his inability to do more than dream and doubt over the action.

It is this complication which produces one of Mr. Booth's finest scenes. In the interview with his mother he stabs Polonius through the arras. For an instant the possibility of what he has done sweeps over his mind. Always the victim of complex emotions, the instinctive satisfaction of knowing the act done is mingled with the old familiar horror of the doom to which he may have consigned his uncle. With sword uplifted, and a vague terror both of hope and fear in his face and tone, Hamlet does not slide rapidly back and hurriedly exclaim, "Is it the king?" but tottering with emotion he asks slowly, in an appalling staccato, "Is—it—the—king?"

We are hardly familiar enough with various actors of this part to decide whether Mr. Booth introduces many new readings, as they are called, or not. Some he certainly does, and utterly destroys the old traditions. Thus after the interview with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, during which his princely courtesy is very beautiful, he walks restlessly about as if the disgust were almost intolerable, then seats himself upon a couch fronting a bay-window and sinks into reverie. Polonius enters with the message from the Queen. The Prince raises his eyes languidly toward him for a moment, then turns them to the window. When he has finished, Hamlet, still sitting and looking out at the window, raises his finger, points to the cloud, and so plays upon the poor old Gold Stick. Poor old Gold Stick! what a sorry death he dies! My Lord, my Lord! was he not Ophelia's father?

The cumulative sadness of the play was never so palpable as in Mr. Booth's acting. It is a spell from which you can not escape, and we never felt more deeply how the gloom of the drama is enhanced by the humor of the grave-digger than at the Winter Garden. Mr. Davidge, we think, played the grave-digger, and played it finely. His broad, loud jesting, the indifference with which a clown laughs and sings as he digs Ophelia's grave, is a ghastly lurid gleam that makes the darkness even more unutterable. From that it goes swiftly to the end, to those most mournful words, "The rest is silence." The curtain falls. The audience rises and departs. We move out with the chatting crowd. The street sparkles and roars. The old life receives us at the portal. But in the old life a new thread is woven; the golden thread of a fresh vision of beauty.

JUDGE JEFFREYS went down into the West and held the bloody assizes. The good and beautiful and young fell before the infamous tool of an infamous king. His name is hateful in history, and it is well that the public mind should be occasionally called to remember his atrocious cruelty.

The Easy Chair, as he prepares for a general drawer delivery, has little doubt that he is about to perform the public service which he commends.

He takes this method of informing certain correspondents that their favors are "respectfully declined," as follows: E. J. H., Minnesota. M. R., Cleveland, Ohio. "In pleasant fields I wandered far." E. E. D., Ann Arbor, Michigan. G. M. "To my wife." E. M. R. G. H. N., New York.

Many of these contain very pleasant and friendly words for the Easy Chair, which are most sincerely reciprocated. If he does not reply privately and individually to all the personal communications of his correspondents, it is merely the shortness of life that is to blame, and the consequent necessity of choosing among a press of luxuries.

"Will you please note upon the margin," writes one poet, "why this poem does not seem to you up to the mark?"

"Will you please read the accompanying cantos and write your opinion of them?" writes another.

"My mother is disabled by rheumatism and the support of the family falls upon me. I hope you will like my verses," writes a third.

"What is poetry?" writes a fourth.

"It seems to me that my things, which you invariably reject, are better than those which you invariably publish," writes a fifth.

Mercy! mercy! good Sirs, good Mesdames. This is a judge who does not decide. This is a jury that does not convict. This is an attorney who never prosecutes. This is an Easy Chair who is not the editor, and who simply says of all the manuscripts intrusted to him which he does not print, "This is not exactly suitable." Purple is an excellent color, but it does not go well with blue—that is, all. We do not eat cheese with turnips, nor sweeten coffee with currant jelly—that is all. Look at those victims of the Easy Chair's verdict! How innocent they look! How comely they are! Nay, how virtuous and meritorious they are! Very well; Jeffreys savagely sentenced Alice Lisle to a death of torture. How many more did the monster slaughter? And such was his posthumous infamy that his grand-daughter, the Countess of Pomfret, was insulted and almost mobbed when she traveled through the district which he had devastated.

Even so will this savage Chair be remembered, and children will shudder as they read written upon his ruins, "This Easy Chair declined poetry, and deliberately asked to be excused from reading cantos and expressing an opinion of their merit."

At last the Harpers have issued Thackeray's "Vanity Fair" in the most exquisite and convenient form. It is a beautiful book, which Thackeray himself would have smiled to see, and which every lover of Thackeray will be glad to own. The refined and legible text, and all the original illustrations carefully reproduced, are fitly preceded by the head engraved from Lawrence's portrait and by the fac-simile of the author's clear autograph upon the cover. There has hitherto been no accessible satisfactory edition of this most famous and characteristic of modern novels for permanent preservation in the library; but this satisfies all the conditions.

Of the work itself, as of the genius of its author, Miss Brontë spoke so truly that little is left to add. The popular judgment of cynicism was instantly reversed over his grave. Since Scott died, the death of no author seems to have occasioned so sincere a sorrow as Thackeray's; and the talk of his misanthropy arose chiefly from the indignation of "society" with this unsparing observer and critic, who dared to draw without distorting and color without flattery.

"I have no head above my eyes," he once said in conversation, meaning that he was merely an observer. But what eyes they were! Look at the picture of "Our Contributors," published in Fraser's Magazine some thirty years ago, of which we were lately speaking, and at this fine portrait in the book before us, or at the last rough wood-cuts published when he died. In all there are those same large, firm, penetrating eyes, kindly but terrible; boring through all the artificial flowers, and the spangles, and the rouge, and the fine linen, to the awful hollowness and disease beneath. Through all this wonderful story of "Vanity Fair" his moral and intellectual fidelity are constantly conspicuous. Upon every page, those who knew the great heart of the author, and those who did not must take the truth upon their word, can hear him saying: "There goes Mrs. Rawdon Crawley, late Miss Becky Sharpe. Poor thing! I pity her with all my heart, and I denounce her to all mankind!"

As the most faithful pictures of the society of his time; as the most exquisitely unexaggerated delineations of individual character; as masterly monuments of a noble English style, simple, sinewy, and racy; and for their infinitely tender humanity, geniality, wisdom, and wit, the novels of Thackeray have already become part of our enduring literature; and whoever heard that rich, manly voice, or saw that towering burly figure, or looked upon that honest face, has seen and heard one of the great masters of English fiction.

Editor's Drawer.

A CORRESPONDENT in New Orleans writes to the Drawer:

By-the-way, the Signal Corps has never been in the Drawer, and as there does sometimes good things happen in this branch of the service, it is but just they should be made famous by being Drawer-ized.

D—— became possessed of a compound-interest-bearing ten-dollar note, dated August 15, which, at the time he held it, was worth ten dollars and thirty cents. D—— took it down to a cigar man, who was not quite up to "all manner of dodges," and proceeded to buy thirty cents' worth of cigars. Having pocketed his cigars, he showed the figures on the back of the note, and demonstrated conclusively to the cigar man that the note was ten dollars and thirty cents. "Y-e-s," says the cigar man. "Well," says D——, rapidly, "I've thirty cents' worth of cigars; there's thirty cents due on this bill; it's a ten-dollar bill, d'ye see?" "Y-e-s." "Well, then," pocketing the note, "we're square; good-day!" and was off before the cigar man could straighten the matter in his head—though, for that matter, I presume he is in a wonder yet as to how that matter is.

ATTACHED to the corps while at Vicksburg were two small darkeys, about ten years old each, both of whom were famous dancers. Dan was a newcomer, and at first was loth to dance with Joe, who was an established favorite; but one day they were brought together, and the match began. For a while both danced furiously and well, but the superior "powers of duration" of Dan began to tell upon Joe, and after a lengthy trial he was obliged to give up the match. Whereupon Dan turned a double somersault, cut a pigeon wing, and exclaimed, "Hi! you g'way from yhar! you can't dance 'long o' me; I's danced 'fore General Logan—I is!" and from that time he was champion of the dance.

While I to talk with him was lingering;
When he had gone I found that I'd Lost, by his fingering, my finger-ring.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Drawer is involved in domestic perplexities. He writes:

I got acquainted with a young widow, who lived with her step-daughter in the same house. I married the widow; my father fell, shortly after it, in love with the step-daughter of my wife, and married her. My wife became the mother-in-law and also the daughter-in-law of my own father; my wife's step-daughter is my step-mother, and I am the step-father of my mother-in-law. My step-mother, who is the step-daughter of my wife, has a boy: he is naturally my step-brother, because he is the son of my father and of my step-mother; but because he is the son of my wife's step-daughter so is my wife the grandmother of the little boy, and I am the grandfather of my step-brother. My wife has also a boy: my step-mother is consequently the step-sister of my boy, and is also his grandmother, because he is the child of her step-son; and my father is the brother-in-law of my son, because he has got his step-sister for a wife. I am the brother of my own son, who is the son of my step-mother; I am the brother-in-law of my mother, my wife is the aunt of her own son, my son is the grandson of my father, and I am my own grandfather.

HERE, in Cairo, Illinois, we have a great many contrabands working for Uncle Samuel. A few days ago one of them had occasion to ride a horse, and coming to a very muddy place in the road he naturally took to the plank sidewalk near a house. An eye-witness happening to be in the house at the time, ran out and ordered the "shade" to "get off the walk or he would have him fined." Contraband gruffly replied, "I guess dis Gov'ment rides where it pleases!" and rode on, leaving the eye-witness slightly nonplused.

At a station on the overland route the keeper got rather short of provisions—in fact, had nothing left but a bottle of mustard and some bacon. As the stage stopped there one day to change horses the passengers seated themselves at the table, and the host said:

"Shall I help you to a piece of bacon?"

"No, thank you; I never eat bacon," said one traveler.

"Well, then," said the station-keeper, "help yourself to the mustard!"

THE two juveniles that follow are, of course, of Boston parentage:

Our four-year-old, Charley, "comes out" with such sensible sayings sometimes as to make us fear his mental faculties are developing too fast for his bodily strength. A while since his father had placed a very fine pear upon the mantle-shelf, intending to take it to the Horticultural Rooms for a name. Shortly after it was missing. Upon asking Charley about it, he said, "I fought you put it there for me." "You thought!" replied Pater; "and pray who gave you right to think?" Charley evidently saw the dilemma, and for a few seconds was at fault, but quickly recovering himself, said, "Well, what's the use of me having a finker if I can't fink?"

His sister Fanny, a year older, is another of the sharp ones. For some time we had been annoyed with the nocturnal visits of a troop of vagabond dogs, to the great derangement of flower-beds and Pater's temper. One morning, while comfortably seated at breakfast, the said Fanny came running into the room and exclaimed, "Father, there's a strange dog in the entry!" Pater seizes the poker, rushes out frantically, but all he finds is Miss Fanny, brimful of fun, pointing to the handle of a new umbrella he had brought home the previous evening, on which was carved the rude representation of a canine of the bull species. "Isn't that a strange dog?" says Miss Impudence. Pater was sold, and hasn't yet heard the last of it, and so sends it to the Drawer for relief.

MANY years since a St. Louis newspaper contained an advertisement of one cent reward for a runaway apprentice to the doctor's trade, copies of which are yet preserved by antiquarians. The boy for whom that reward was offered has been for many years a prominent banker in the Mississippi Valley, and a millionaire.

I HAD the honor, while at Huntsville, Alabama, last winter, of furnishing you with some sketches of "Old Dutch," alias General Matthies. I propose to quarry another block for your monument to the brave but eccentric General. In the autumn of 1863, while marching from Memphis to Chattanooga, we got very short of rations, and were allowed to seize hogs, cattle, etc., to supply the deficit. "Old Dutch" gave orders that all foraging should be by proper details ordered for the purpose; but the details, after supplying their own wants, seldom had much to turn over. Our Colonel told us to save any loose swine we saw. This permission was largely acted on, and as soon as the brigade would halt for the night, the music of tortured swine could be heard in every direction. General Matthies swore in Dutch and English, and used his best endeavors to stop the illegal foraging, but he seldom caught any of the "hog-stealers." One evening we camped near Elk River, and the hog-hunting began as usual. The General was at the rear, and came up when the slaughter was at its highest, cursing awfully. He caught sight of an Irish sergeant in vigorous pursuit of a porker, and gave chase, drawing his sword and swearing he would chop the head off him if he didn't stop. The sergeant bayoneted his hog and stopped. The General came down on him with his sword aloft. The sergeant coolly cocked his gun and ordered halt. The General looked at him a moment, dropped the point of his sword, and said, "Ah! ah! mine good man, you bees not afraid! You bees a bully man! I like you!" And the sergeant marched off with his stuck pig.

MANY years ago Judge H——, of Lower Egypt, a defeated candidate for the Illinois Legislature, after an exciting contest, had been appointed by his party friends presiding Judge in one of the newly-settled districts. His first court was held in an unfinished log-building, with holes cut in the log walls for a door and windows.

While sitting in solitary dignity on a raised platform near the rear "opening," waiting for his associates, something punched him in the back, and turning round he saw below the anxious, up-turned face of one of his former political supporters, who was trying to attract his notice with a long pole taken from the fence just outside the building.

"Don't you know me, Judge? Tom Barnes, of Little Smoky?"

"Ah! Mr. Barnes, you seem excited. What can I do for you?"

"That's the talk! I knowed you would do to tie to! Well, you kin do for me jist what we on the Smoky Fork did for you last fall. You know what tales them Bartons told to your discredit then—swore to them too—but we wouldn't believe nary a word they swore to, and went for you through thick and thin. Don't you know we did, Judge?"

"Oh yes; certainly."

"Well, I'm glad of that; for I have a little case here, concerning of a hog, with them same witnesses agin me. I wish I had a few sich witnesses, and I could prove any thing I pleased. But, Judge, ef you don't keep your eyes skinned they'll make you believe I stole that ar hog. It warn't none of their hog, nohow. Don't you believe a word they swear agin me, no more than we in the Smoky settlement believed what the same fellers swore agin you, and it'll all come right. Good-by, Judge, and remember Little Smoky!"

THIS is furnished by the officer who knows it to be true, as he had part in it. It comes from Missouri:

Some few months since a noted guerrilla named Griffith, a lieutenant in one of the worst bands that infest this portion of the State, was captured and brought to trial, and was convicted and sentenced to be hanged. The sentence was confirmed at the proper military head-quarters, and ordered to be carried into effect immediately.

The prisoner was brought before the Provost Marshal, who informed him that he had been sentenced to death, and would be hanged on the following Friday (this was Wednesday), and told him that he had a few dollars of his money, taken from him at the time of his capture, and asked him if there was any thing he desired to get with it. The culprit replied, "No;" and then, after a brief pause, continued, "Well, I'm out of tobacker, but I s'pose I might as well quit chawin' now."

On the morning of his execution he sent a note to the Provost Marshal, in his own handwriting, in the following words, to wit:

"MIL. PRISON, ST. J——, Mo., Sept. 23, 1864.

"Mister Proverse Martial:

"DERE SIR,—Plese send me that fore Dollers ov my mony to by a clean shert to be hung in.

"Respectfully yours till deth,

"HENRY A. GRIFFITH."

The request was complied with, and he accordingly appeared at the gallows in a new shirt.

ON New-Year's Day, calling at the residence of a friend, I found that she was spending the day at a dwelling to which my informant could only direct me by saying that it was next door to "St. Luke's Home." After going the distance I supposed should take me to it, and seeing nothing to answer to the description, I inquired of one of a number of dirty-faced urchins playing on the sidewalk if he could tell me where "St. Luke's Home" was. Pointing to a church on the opposite side of the street, he said, "There's St. Luke's Church, Mister—dunno where his house is!"

WHEN, through the wilderness by Moses led,

Food for the faithful fell from Heaven each morn,

They wondered much to be so strangely fed,

Because they were not "to the Manna born."

It was a little Misshygander who did this:

I attended a missionary meeting lately where came off a note worthy of the Drawer. After the returned missionary from India had held the immense audience of little ones who were gathered on the occasion in great delight and interest for an hour the brother from Eastern Turkey took the stand, and began his lecture by inquiring who could tell him where Abraham was born. A little fellow immediately shoved up his hand, whereupon the missionary demanded "Where?" The little fellow shouted, "In Kentucky!" and then followed a general roar from the entire audience.

OUR little five-year-old Hattie, who is very well aware that she forms an important part of our household, while at dinner recently had twice asked her mother for something without being heard (her mother having become partially deaf). Raising her voice to a pitch that would warrant a hearing she exclaimed, "Mother, I am sorry we married you, you are getting so deaf."

THE late Mr. Augur, the sculptor—one of New Haven's celebrities—was very modest in regard to his accomplishments, and while engaged upon the work of Jephthah and his Daughter (which now forms a portion of the art-collection in Trumbull Gallery, Yale College) he kept himself closeted in his room, and his labor a secret. Persons calling upon him received no information, for he always stepped out of his room, conversing with them in the hallway; thus the inquisitive went away no wiser than they came. Among those who were particularly "exercised" in regard to Mr. Augur's mysterious conduct was Deacon — (there's no need of calling names), who, upon the sculptor's coming into his store one day, interrogated him something after the following manner:

"I say, Augur, what are you doing cooped up in your room there? Looks rather suspicious. Ain't making counterfeit money, are you?"

Mr. Augur, upon thus being called so pointedly to account, replied,

"Well, as I have almost finished my work, and don't know as it need be a secret any longer, I suppose that I may as well tell you. I have been making a piece of statuary, which I call Jephthah and his Daughter, an undertaking which would have subjected me to ridicule at the outset."

"Ah ha! a sculptor, eh?" exclaimed the Deacon. "Let me congratulate you. Indeed I am surprised. But what is the subject taken from? Who was Jephthah and—"

"What!" burst forth the sculptor in astonishment, "a deacon in the church and don't know who Jephthah and his Daughter were?"

"Oh yes!" ejaculated the Deacon, as if it had suddenly occurred to him. "I recollect—Shem, Ham, and Jephthah; certainly, Jephthah was one of Noah's sons."

Mr. Augur laughed heartily, and enjoyed the Deacon's discomfiture exceedingly.

"Hold on!" broke forth the Deacon, "I'll bet that Deacon —" (naming a near neighbor), "don't know a thing more about it than I did."

And out of the door he sallied to test the truth of his statement, followed by Mr. Augur. Without stopping for breath he inquired,

"Deacon, who was Jephthah?"

"Jephthah? Jephthah? Let me see."

"Don't know who Jephthah was?" interrupted Deacon No. 1, with a touch of sarcasm in his voice.

"Yes; Jephthah was one of Napoleon's generals."

If in love for our country you share,

And the "Star-spangled Banner" are versed in,

You must think, when the "bombs burst in air,"

'Twas a "National Air" that they burst in!

MANY years ago, when new sects in New England began to break the good old Congregational barriers, and make incursions into the sheepfolds of the regular clergy, a reverend divine, whom I well knew—a man at once of infinite good sense and good humor—encountered one of these irregular practitioners at the house of one of his flock. They had a pretty hot discussion on their points of difference, and at length the interloper, finding more than his match at polemics, wound up by saying,

"Well, Doctor, you'll at least allow that it was commanded to preach the Gospel to every critter."

"True," rejoined the Doctor; "true enough. But then I never did hear it was commanded to every 'critter' to preach the Gospel."

I SEE in a late number of your Magazine that somebody has been complaining that he can't see the point of the stories in the Drawer. Well, suppose he can't. The Drawer is not for every body; it is only for the bright, smart people, who can see through a millstone with a hole in it, and who know a thing or two. Milton wrote for "a fit audience, though few." He knew that every body couldn't see the point of Paradise Lost. A wise ass read it and asked, "What does it prove?" And so the poor fellows that do not see any fun in the Drawer would not find it in the first edition of Josephus the Miller. It is their fault, not the Drawer's. Long may it wave, o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

WHILE the Sixth New Hampshire Volunteers was stationed at Russellville, in Southwestern Kentucky, the inhabitants of the surrounding counties were frequently annoyed by the incursions of guerrilla bands from Tennessee. News coming in one morning that a band of these outlaws had plundered one of the neighboring villages, Lieutenant-Colonel P——, our active and efficient commander, immediately dispatched a small detachment of the regiment, commanded by Major Q——, in pursuit of them. On arriving at the village of Middleton it was discovered that we were too late to intercept the marauders, and the Major ordered the horses unsaddled and fed. Now the Major's hostler was a son of Emerald, entirely ignorant of every thing pertaining to the equestrian art, and coming in from half an hour's scout through the village in a state closely bordering on intoxication, he put the Major's saddle on facing to the rear. When the horses were brought up for a fresh start, the Major, instantly discovering the mistake, demanded with a scowl why the saddle was put on in that manner. "An' sure," said Pat, a little terrified, "an' sure, Major, an' I didn't know which way you was going!" An explosion followed, and Pat escaped without further rebuke.

THE Legislative Assembly of this Territory, writes a Western friend, has just adjourned its session. Mr. B—— introduced in the Lower House "A Memorial to Congress praying for a Geological Survey of the Territory," which was read the first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Federal Relations, Mr. K——, of — County, being Chairman, who after several days submitted the following report: "Mr. Speaker, your Committee on Federal Relations have considered H. F. No. 11, 'A Memorial to Congress for a Geological Survey of the Territory,' and report that there is land enough surveyed now; that what is surveyed won't be settled up in four years, and the memorial better be postponed indefinitely.—K——, Chairman."

The Hon. Mr. S—— "begged to inform his colleague that he entirely misunderstood the meaning of a Geological Survey; he would inform him that a Geologic Survey would be the use of an article attached to a wagon-wheel to measure roads with!"

The bill was immediately referred to a Special Committee.

THE trials of the soldiers are many and strange. They can't let well alone. One of them writes from Eastport, Mississippi:

After the battle of Nashville our corps was ordered to this point, via Pulaski, Tennessee. On reaching here, the localities being new to most of the officers except ours, one Captain T——, the Division Ordnance officer, started out in search of a "location" for his habitation—i. e., shelter-tent. Among the few features of this somewhat muddy place are many wells that are hid from sight by high bushes. After a lengthy search for the desirable spot whereon to build his house, the valiant Captain suddenly found himself going down—down—down, until finally he “struck,” somewhat bruised but alive, upon a sandy bottom, some forty or fifty feet below the said bushes. Gathering himself up, and endeavoring to gain breath and strength to call for help, imagine his surprise at finding himself saluted with,

“Hallo! stranger, what brought you here?”

Turning his head in the darkness to ascertain if he was really in his senses, he again heard the voice exclaim:

“I say, yeou there, when you fall down an old well next time, let a feller know you’re coming!”

T—— gradually came to himself, and found out that he really had a companion in his misfortune, a soldier of the —th. After a couple of hours’ hard work they managed to make themselves heard, and T—— being drawn out first, told the men to “fish away, there’s lots of shad in that well!” but the men were too frightened at T——’s white hair and black eyes to heed him. The first-comer was left to get out as he could.

HERE is one for the legal fraternity and expounders of law: Mr. — was arrested for appropriating oats from R——’s wagon, for which he could show no receipt of payment, and taken before Dr. W——, a Justice of the Peace. When the accused came into court he demanded a jury trial, which was granted. The jurors came in and took their seats, when R——’s counsel commenced challenging the jurors for cause. One of the best citizens of the county was objected to. The counsel was asked to state his objections. “I object to this man’s acting as a juror because he is morally incompetent. Over one year ago he had his collarbone broken firing a Prussian musket at a wild goose; and any man that is such a fool as to use one of those guns is morally incompetent to sit on a jury!” The Judge decided the objections well taken, and the juror was dismissed. The Prussian musket is the arm furnished to the militia of Dakota by the General Government.

THE District Court in — was presided over by Judge B——, formerly of Indiana, a very just man on the bench, and a very heavy one at poker. The United States Marshal was Colby, now of the “Secesh” army—both exceedingly fond of a game of “draw.” At the opening of court on Monday morning Colby was remiss in some of his duties; the Judge was very angry, and hastily remarked, “Mr. C., I fine you fifty dollars.” “All right, Judge,” replied the Marshal; “it just makes us even. You owed me fifty dollars when the game closed last night!”

TAMMANY HALL comes into the Drawer:

Some years ago, before the present State Constitution was adopted, the Tammany members presented themselves in the halls of the Legislature with all kinds of notions, in the shape of pledges given to their constituents to secure their election. Among the pledges vauntingly displayed in the early days of the session was one by which the Tammany members had agreed to do their utmost, to tack to every act of incorporation a personal liability clause. And among these Tammany members was one who always in his seat moved to attach the obnoxious clause to every corporation bill as it came up, and being, as might have been expected, unsuccessful in his movement, steadily voted against all such bills. Such course of procedure, of course, rendered the member, whom we will call Mr. B. very obnoxious to the Assembly.

Whether it was Mr. B. thought his ill success was owing to the fact that the House had lost sight of the great principles involved in the question, is not known; but on a certain day he undertook to reillumine the House, and having a strong cockney dialect, his indiscriminate mixing his v’s and w’s had a very comical effect.

A short-hand writer, who had closely followed the honorable member, produced a verbatim report of this speech, which appeared in the editorial columns of one of the Albany papers the morning ensuing, with the simple caption, “Views of Tammany on Personal Liability.”

The Honorable Member felt highly indignant with the report of the speech, and seizing his opportunity jumped to his feet, with the offending paper in his hand, and, looking daggers at the reporter representing the paper on the floor of the House, sent the paper to the Clerk, and called for the reading of the article producing the speech, which he declared a breach of the privileges of the House.

The Clerk commenced to read, and had not got more than three or four lines among the “v’s and w’s” of the speech before the House was in a roar of laughter, amidst shouts of “That is capital!” etc.

When the reading was got through with, and the House had somewhat steadied itself, the Honorable Member rose and appealed to the House “whether he had ever made such a speech?”

“Of course you did,” was the almost universal response; “and capitally are you reported!”

The Member sunk to his seat with the comforting assurance of the Speaker that, as the article complained of was an editorial, it could not be construed into a breach of privilege.

After this the reporters and the Honorable Member got on the best of footing, and in their daily visits about luncheon time to Congress Hall the Honorable Member was frequently of the party.

As the session drew to a close a gentleman from New York presented himself to the reporters, with a letter of introduction, stating that if a certain bill became a law it would bring into existence a corporation which would crush out his business prospects. Could it not be defeated?

The session, he was told, was about over. The bill had passed the Senate unanimously; and if it reached a vote in the House it would pass, most assuredly.

What was to be done? The reporters talked the matter over, and, without consulting their New York visitor, came to the conclusion that if the Hon. Mr. B. could be persuaded into making a speech in favor of the bill it might be killed. But how to effect that?

The next day the Hon. Mr. B. fell into the trap. As he was coming from Congress Hall with the reporters, he said, “Well, boys, we have had considerable fun this session. You have done me some favors; is there any thing I can do for you?”

“Why, yes,” said one of the reporters, “there is a bill waiting for a third reading, in which we feel an interest, and if you could say a few words in its favor, when it comes up on its final passage, why—that's all we want."

"But the bill proposes to charter a company," remarked Mr. B. "I can not support any such bill."

"Well, your pledge is against voting for any such bills; explain this bill to the House, and you may vote against it if you like," replied the reporter—and so it was arranged.

Shortly after, up came the bill; it was read through, and requiring, under the old Constitution, the assent of two-thirds of the members elected, the Speaker directed the messengers to call in the members. While out on this duty, up jumped the Hon. Mr. B., and briefly stated the objects of the bill—much to the surprise, it is supposed, of its friends—and the members flocking, and finding the member who had during the session persistently voted against their bills, soon sealed the fate of the pending bill. The roll was called, and amidst a long and continuous peal of "No! no!" the bill in a few minutes was dead.

Astonished at such a result, the Hon. Mr. B. walked up to the reporters' desk, and, with a look of wonderment, said, "Why, the bill is killed!"

"Yes," said the reporters, "and that is just what we wanted."

Suffice it to say that the Hon. Mr. B. at last saw through the joke, and was about the best pleased man at the way the defeat had been brought about. The gentleman from New York, of course, went home highly gratified; and the friends of the bill gave up all hopes of resuscitating it.

THE tent and the field furnish many good things for the Drawer. For example:

Major Y—— and Lieutenant M——, of our regiment, were on detached service at the extreme front last summer, and gave a dinner one day to several of our officers. Lieutenant M——, although an excellent officer in his way, had strange notions of the "fitness of things," and very little taste for the poetical, sentimental, or solemn. Among the guests present at the dinner was the stately and tender-hearted Dr. B——, whom all loved and respected. The conversation at the table was interspersed with reminiscences of the early days of the regiment, and the feelings of the company became rather depressed in reflecting upon old times and associates. After dinner was about over, and while waiting for dessert, Dr. B—— arose in his dignified and impressive manner, and made an eloquent response to a toast, in which he dwelt upon the peculiar interest of the occasion, in bringing them once more alive and well together, after undergoing the perils of the summer campaign. He portrayed the heroic endurance of the regiment under all circumstances, and concluded with a solemn exordium upon the mutability of time. As he sat down amidst the profound silence and attention of the assembly, Lieutenant M—— screamed out to the invisible contraband, "Come, George, bring on the puddin' and sas!" The shock to the sensibilities of the party was so abrupt that they dispersed in disgust, leaving Lieutenant M—— to enjoy his "puddin' and sas," and wonder what in the world had gone wrong.

LIEUTENANT M——, in the fitness of his remarks, was not unlike Joe, who "played the cymbals" in our regimental band. During the period of the regiment's service Joe had made himself valuable to the other members of the band by his constant attention to their comfort—hauling wood, cooking, etc. Just after the regiment was mustered out, some one of the band proposed that Joe should receive a present, and accordingly a subscription was gotten up, and a costly ring purchased. The band assembled in the sitting-room of a Washington hotel, and one of the party, who was gifted with unusual powers of eloquence, delivered the presentation speech; paying a just tribute to the industry and disinterested kindness of the recipient; dwelling upon the many pleasant months they had passed together, and of their coming separation—perhaps for ever. Joe received the ring without emotion; inspected it closely, placed it on his finger, and then responded, "Well, boys, it's a little too big; but I guess I can trade it off!"

TEMPEST.

To quell a storm though mortal try,
He never is victorious;
Now would you know the reason why?
Because it's to lay Boreas!

If the citizens of Berks County, Pennsylvania, will persistently vote for Andrew Jackson for President, the following veritable extract from a will on record in that county, dated in 1802, shows that they know how to provide for their wives in case of their death. It is copied for the Drawer:

"It is my will and I will that my beloved wife shall have possession in the house where she now resides as long as she lives, without any molestation, yearly and every year as long as she lives. Further, it is my will that my executors, after my decease, shall give to my wife yearly and every year as long as she lives forty-five pounds in good lawful gold or silver money of Pennsylvania; but should she become sick and bedrid, and the aforesaid forty-five pounds be insufficient to maintain her, they shall take out of the estate as much as she may require. Further, it is my will that she shall have the small meadow above the house she lives in for her use as long as she lives, which the executors shall manure for her every two years, and water it every year in proper season and manner, and mow the grass growing on the same in proper time, dry it, and put it in the stable. Further, it is my will that after my decease my wife shall have the right to take as much of my household furniture as she pleases—to wit, bedding, linen, pewter-ware, tables and chairs, chests, cupboards, room-stove, tubs, buckets, iron kettles, and copper kettles, iron pots, and whatever else of household and kitchen furniture, be it named as it may—the choice of every thing. Further, one horse, her choice. Further, three cows out of the stable—her choice—and when they become too old she shall redeliver them unto the executors, and choose three others out of the stable, and the cows to be put in pasture when she desires it, and this yearly and every year as long as she lives. Further, they shall give unto her yearly and every year two fat hogs of one hundred and fifty pounds each, and one hundred and fifty pounds of beef, twenty bushels good wheat, ten bushels rye, ten bushels buckwheat, five bushels of Indian corn, and five bushels oats, and twelve bushels of potatoes. The executors shall take the grain to the mill, and bring back again, and deliver into the house the meal as she may want it. Further, the half of the kitchen-garden—which she chooses—and manure on the same yearly, as much as she desires. And fire-wood to be hauled home to the house, and split fine, as much as she yearly wants; two barrels of good cider made and delivered into the cellar. Apples as many as she wants, if there are any; and ten gallons of whisky, fifteen pounds of tallow, twenty pounds of combed flax, twenty pounds of tow, ten pounds of wool. Salt, as much as she wants; and hens and eggs, as many as she wants to have and keep. All the above-mentioned shall be kept, paid, and delivered unto her yearly and every year during her life by my executors out of my estate."

WASHOE REVISITED.

[First Paper.]

NIGHT-SCENE IN THE SIERRAS.

FOUR years ago a series of papers appeared in this Magazine descriptive of a visit to Washoe, in which the author related some personal experiences of a very remarkable character. So wonderful, indeed, were many of his adventures, that certain incredulous persons, who have no difficulty in believing any thing except the truth, boldly assumed that the entire narrative was a fiction concocted for speculative purposes.

The simple truth was that the author, an ex-Government official, found himself one fine morning in San Francisco, with only an empty purse in his pocket, and saw no remedy but to visit the newly-discovered silver regions, which were then making a prodigious stir among the gunny-bags of Front Street, and the bummers, bankers, and other men of enterprising genius on Montgomery Street. Aided by a commission to explore some mines which had no existence in this world or the next, he felt assured that he could, by means of an agency and his own speculative talent, speedily indemnify himself for the unprofitable years which he had spent in the public service. In this hopeful state of mind he set forth on his travels. Unable to procure a conveyance at Placerville short of all the money he possessed or could hope to obtain by borrowing, he sturdily shouldered his blankets, and footed it over the mountains—through mud, and snow, and rain, slush, and scathing storms—to the city of Carson, where he arrived in due time, somewhat battered and wayworn by the hardships of the trip. It is not my intention to review in detail the wonderful experiences of this adventurer in the land of silver. They will all be found in his published narrative, illustrated by authentic wood-cuts. Sufficient is it for my purpose to say that before writing his account of Washoe, and the perils and vicissitudes of life in that region, he deemed it prudent to retire to the continent of Europe. The dreary years of his exile from California he filled up, in some measure, by tours through Spain, Algeria, Germany, Poland, and the regions bordering on the Arctic Circle.

On his return to San Francisco he found, to his astonishment, that the silver mania had taken possession of the entire population, without distinction of age or sex. Washoe and the regions beyond had sprung up into a second California. Gold was nowhere now: it was all silver—above, below, every where. Speculation peered into the silvery heavens in search of new leads; nay, the genius of enterprise pointed toward the regions of everlasting woe as an appropriate sphere for the smelting interests. Tons of ore were piled in heaps along the curb-stones in the streets; every office was an emporium for the purchase and sale of feet; every desk in every store was a stall at which millionaires browsed upon paper; every window glared and dazzled the sight with gorgeous engravings of stocks; every man of the hundreds and tens of hundreds that stood at every corner, and in every saloon, and before every bar, carried feet in his pockets and dividends in his eyes; and every walking thing, save horses and dogs and rats and mice, talked stocks and feet from morning till night, and dreamed dividends from night till morning. Young ladies would hear of no proposition from any gentleman with less than a thousand feet; and no gentleman, however ardent, would compromise himself without asking, "Is she on the Wild-Cat or Legitimate? How many pay feet does she offer? and what assessments are due on her?" Passing a crowd, "Reese River" was poured into one ear, and "Humboldt" into the other. "Washoe!" "Esmeralda!" "Arizona!" "Sonora!" "Struck it rich!" "Silver bricks!" and "Pay rock!" hummed and drummed through the air till the brain was nearly addled.

No wonder our adventurer, just from the wilds of Russia and Iceland, was bewildered. Of the various tongues spoken by the various races of the earth whom he had encountered in his travels this was the most difficult to comprehend, and the most foreign to his ear and understanding. The very newspapers which he attempted to read furnished snatches of information that filled him with amazement: "Uncle Sam" was lively; "Yellow Jacket" was scarcely so firm, owing to a difficulty with the Union; "Lady Bryant" was in better repute, at advanced rates, and was still in active demand; "The Savage" was quiet but strong, at rising figures; "Buck-eye" was languishing; "Hope" had revived, and sales were made yesterday at $8; "Josephine" was firmer at the close, and much sought for; "Wide West" was drooping and heavy at $80; "Burning Moscow" was unusually brisk; and "Sierra Nevada" had a downward tendency.

How in the world was any sane man to comprehend the state of things when the meaning of terms was changed, and the order of nomenclature wholly disarranged? A few days, however, enabled our adventurer to catch some drift from the general current of conversation. It was evident that fortunes of extraordinary dimensions were to be made over the mountains—made suddenly, certainly, and without capital, which was precisely the most convenient thing in the world for a man who had just scattered his means all over the world. "Yes!" said he, enthusiastically, "I'll go to Washoe! I'll pitch in for feet this time! You bet I'll seize a few of those glittering bricks, and build my castles upon a solid foundation hereafter!"

It was quietly hinted, however, by friends solicitous of his welfare, that he had better not show himself in Washoe again, if he placed any value upon his life or the general stability of his constitution. The reasons assigned for this advice were startling and multifarious. It was alleged that the road was lined with blood-thirsty men armed with pistols, double-barreled shot-guns, clubs, pitchforks, bowie-knives, and axes, every one of whom was on the look-out for a solitary pedestrian who had passed over the mountains three years before, and damaged their reputation by various slanders in the public prints. Especial mention was made of a ferocious Irishman, by the name of "Dirty Mike," who was watching near the crossing of the American River, with a tremendous shillelah in his right hand and a copy of Harper's Magazine in his left; and it was asserted that if the said Michael ever laid eyes upon the author of the Washoe papers he would speedily show which of the two carried upon his person the greater share of his mother earth.

Further on, in Hope Valley, there was a solitary man who lived, like Diogenes in his tub, having only a ferocious bull-dog as a companion. These two—Diogenes and his dog—had been chiefly occupied during the past three years in gloating over the anticipated reappearance of "the fellow that showed them up in print." The slur upon the cabin might be forgiven; but that villainous likeness of "him and Bull" was only to be wiped out by blood. Yes—he'd offer that fellow fox-skins to eat again—he would. You bet he'd settle with him. Ef he didn't you could discount the bill at your own price!

Bad as all this was, it was nothing to compare with the hints of retribution that came floating over the Sierras from Virginia City, the Devil's Gate, and Carson. Here were some thousands of excited men, accustomed to the use of fire-arms from infancy, who had invested largely in the Love's Delight, Sorrowful Countenance, Pious Wretch, Literary Cuss, and other valuable claims of a kindred character—all awaiting, with stern resolution and ill-suppressed rage, the coming of this diabolical quill-driver, who had so basely ruined their mines and blasted all their prospects. Many thousands of people had no other idea of Washoe than what they gathered from these ridiculous caricatures, which were a monstrous fabrication from beginning to end. The tide of capital from the Atlantic States was arrested before it ever got a start from Wall Street. Capitalists in San Francisco were scared out of their boots. Stocks in the most valuable leads went down a thousand per cent. It may have been a very good joke to perpetrate upon the honest miners, but it certainly gave a back-set to Washoe of more than two years. And now it was hinted that this rattle-brained scribbler, this miserable ink-jerk-er, was about to become a candidate for Congress from the Territory of Nevada! Let him beware of the vengeance of an outraged public!

He had better give Carson, and Silver City, and the Devil's Gate, and Virginia a wide berth in his future travels!

Such were a few of the grave considerations under which I surveyed the prospect of revisiting Washoe—for you must have already discovered, dear reader, that the writer of these sketches is no other than the disreputable personage above referred to. Held accountable by divers and exasperated bodies of men for all the disasters that had occurred on the other side of the mountains during the past three years, and credited by none of the fortunes made, it was due to the great cause of justice that I should go over and set myself right, or gloriously die in the attempt.

With this much in the way of introduction, I shall proceed to give you a detailed narrative of my experiences, in the course of which it will be seen that various and magical changes have taken place in the mining regions of Washoe. Indeed when I look back at what Virginia City was at the time of my first visit—a city of sage-bushes, mud hovels, coyote-holes, gunny-bags, flour-sacks, and tattered blankets, wherein dwelt a population the most motley and incongruous ever gathered together by the force of silver and circumstances—when I think of the multifarious ledges then in the progress of development, and see what has since been done, and what promise there is in the future, I feel precisely as Lord Clive did at the bar of the British Parliament—astonished at my own moderation. The marvel of it is that I carried away so little treasure where there was so much staring me in the face. I wonder how it was I ever told half so much truth, and left so heavy a balance still to be told.

In announcing to certain experienced friends my purpose of revisiting Washoe I was somewhat startled by such questions as these: Is your neck insured by a responsible company? Are you subject to giddiness in the head? How often have your ribs been broken before? Are you accustomed to fractures of the legs and arms? And what provision have you made for the maintenance of your family in case a miscellaneous bullet should strike you through the bowels and lodge in your back-bone? Which I understood to mean, in general terms, that a certain per-centage of travelers who went over the grade did so head-foremost, with a stage or two on top of them, and that the state of society in Virginia City had not improved in a moral point of view.

I was about to hire a private vehicle, when, fortunately, I met a friend who had just come over by the Henness Pass. This gentleman traveled in a buggy for comfort and convenience. At a narrow pass on the way he had encountered a stage, and to avoid being run over had turned out of the grade, but never stopped turning till himself and his buggy, and the horses that pulled the buggy, together with all his provisions, blankets, deeds, mortgages, lists of mines, rolls of assessments, and schedules of dividends were piled in a confused heap at the bottom of a cañon some five hundred feet deep by several thousand feet wide. I say this was a fortunate occurrence, as it afforded me good ground for traveling by the ordinary modes of conveyance, which I have generally found to be about as safe as any other.

Of the trip to Sacramento it is needless to say much. Most people in San Francisco have tried that at least once or twice in their lives. If ever they derived any pleasure from it they accomplished more than I did. Two hours in a chilling wind, during which you partake of a hasty dinner and smoke a cigar, finds you at the Benicia wharf, the steamer fretting and fuming with suppressed steam, crowds pouring in and crowds moving out, and a great many people gathered about the premises, without any ostensible occupation save to be on hand in case something should turn up. When there happens to be no opposition on the line you may escape collision or explosion; but your chances are very small indeed of ever reaching your destination in the event of a rival steamer being on the route. In this country it is a common practice to fight duels with steamboats. Difficulties between captains are settled by steam. The boilers are charged to the bursting point, and the hostile parties, accustomed to the use of steamboats from infancy, manage their weapons with such skill that an effective crash, accompanied by the shrieks of maimed and scalded passengers, is the usual result.

Upon entering the Sacramento River the air becomes softer and warmer, and good-natured travelers who have been up and down a great many times point out the trees in which families of women and children lodged a few years ago when the flood swept away the houses. But many houses still remain, although the effects of the flood are visible all along the banks of the river.

About midnight the steamer, if she be well freighted, as is generally the case, runs aground on the Hog's Back, and there sticks fast till morning. Passengers who have secured rooms and berths usually avail themselves of the opportunity thus afforded to lay in a supply of sleep for the journey across the mountains; and passengers who can not procure rooms or berths enjoy the privilege of sitting up in chairs carefully secured to the floors, as a precaution against theft; or spending the night in the lower saloon at a game of sledge or poker, by which means they usually travel with heavy heads and light pockets the next day. The Hog's Back is responsible for a vast deal of trouble. I have seen many hogs in my day, but never so great a bore as this.

Arrived at length in Sacramento, a hasty breakfast of water bewitched and coffee begrudged, leathery beef-steak and saleratus slightly corrected with flour, refreshes the inner man; trunks and knapsacks are vindictively hurled into the baggage-car of the Folsom train; the whistle blows; the passengers rush frantically into the cars and bestow themselves on the seats without regard to order; and the locomotive frets and fizzes on its iron way to Folsom.

I could not perceive that much improvement had taken place on the route, unless, indeed, a few additional bar-rooms be accounted in that light. The town of Folsom itself has grown somewhat within the past four years, in consequence of the trade passing through it on the way to Washoe. New brick houses have been built on the main street in the vicinity of the dépôt, and some pleasant little cottages, embowered in flowers and shrubbery, adorn the surrounding slopes. The chief marts of business, as usual in these inland towns, are the express-offices, clothing-stores, and drinking-saloons. Every other house seems to be a house of entertainment, in which the public are feasted on billiards and whisky. Teaming and staging are the grand features of enterprise in this lively little place, and teamsters and stage-drivers the most prominent public characters. The language spoken by this class of the population is a mixture of horse, mule, and ox, with a strong human infusion of blasphemy. Something perhaps in the difficulties and vexations that beset their occupation gives them rather a ferocious expression of countenance, and it is not always an easy matter to mollify the asperities of their nature.

As most passengers desire to get an outside seat, except when it rains, it is highly important that you should proceed at once to secure the favorable consideration of the superintendent, who is a gentleman of great suavity and politeness, considering his position. Should you fail in that, I warn you not to climb up on the fore-wheel with any hope of getting the seat of honor alongside the driver; for whether you be a Munster plenipotentiary or a member of the Common Council he will exercise the right pertaining to his craft—order you down, and then enjoy your discomfiture for a distance of ten miles. I have seen respectable men cling to the front railing of stages, with their feet uneasily balanced on the fore-wheels, for over half an hour—men worth probably fifty thousand dollars in stocks—and then seen them fail—utterly, miserably, and ingloriously fail—to get a seat. I have seen drivers of stages laugh and chuckle by the hour with some sympathizing chum picked up at the last moment; and I have heard these despotic men say they had a good notion to let every body ride on top, for then the stage would be pretty certain to capsize and break a few legs and arms. Why stage-drivers, who are paid a liberal stipend per month for putting passengers over the public highways, should be so vindictively hostile to the traveling community surpasses my comprehension.

The scene on the arrival of the cars is quite inspiring. Stages backed up in a long row; prancing horses in front; swearing and sweating porters, baggage-masters, drivers, and passengers all about and behind; John Chinamen, with long tails rolled up on the backs of their heads, running distractedly through the crowd in search of their lost bundles; anxious ladies, prolific in crinoline and gorgeous in silks and satins (the California traveling costume), fretting and scolding over crushed handboxes; and stern-looking men of an official cast of countenance shouting, fiercely, "This way, gents! 'Ere's the place for your baggage! Bring it along if you want it weighed; if you don't, it won't go—that's all!" And there is the machine that weighs, and there stands the inexorable gentleman that marks off the weights—ten, forty, sixty, ninety pounds per passenger—thirty pounds allowed; all extra baggage twenty-five cents per pound. "Fifteen dollars for you, Sir." "Twenty-five for you, Sir." "Forty-six for you, Madam." "Seventy-five for you, Miss—heavy trunk that, Miss." "Oh dear! oh goodness gracious! must I pay seventy-five dollars for my trunk?" "Yes, Miss—sorry for it—no getting over it." "Oh!" "Quick, if you please, ladies and gents! Stages behind time—won't get to Placerville before dark!" "Your names, gents." "Smith, Jones, Brown, Johnson." "All aboard!" and off goes stage No. 1. "Pile in, gents. Get down from the front seat, you, Sir—place engaged. All aboard!"

DEPARTURE FROM FOLSOM.

and off goes stage No. 2. "Hennes? Placerville? Dammit, why didn't you say so?" "Johnson, Brown, Jones, Smith." "Pitch in, Cap—all set!" and stage No. 3 follows through the dusty clouds that cover the road and the hillsides. And so on till we are all fairly in and off, and looking back, with fervent thanks to Providence that we are clear of the smoke and trouble and turmoil of the railroad dépôt at Folsom.

It is always pleasant to make a start; yet if any body can say the road from Folsom to Placerville is an agreeable road to travel in the early part of October, before the autumn showers have commenced, he must be fond of dust, and ruts, and hills, and plenty of warm sunshine. As for the dust—whew!

With a gentle breeze behind; the horses' ears dimly perceptible in front; curling clouds rising up at every step and imbedding the stage with its sneezing, gasping, suffocating human freight as in a chaotic bank of pulverized earth without top, bottom, or sides; your face smeared with red, yellow, and black stripes of sweat and mud; your nostrils stuffed with a pasty conglomerate; your hair turned prematurely gray; your eyelashes blinking with a feathery fringe-work of native soil; your lungs surcharged with gold, porphyry, sulphurets, and all the indications that predominate in a mineral region—I say, if you can enjoy this sort of thing, you are fit to travel to Washoe or any other country. You are part and parcel of California, with very nearly your weight in gold. Put through the hydraulic process after your arrival at Placerville, and your washings are worth $14 per ounce. Pan you out, and two dollars a pan would be a low estimate of your intrinsic value. In fact I am told the hotel-keepers are growing rich on this single source of profit. Each hotel keeps a kind of sluice or washing arrangement in the back-room, through which the travelers by stage are immediately put on their arrival; and judging by the accumulations in the bottoms of the basins, I should say every man leaves behind him pay dirt of a very rich quality. For my part, I paid my fare, and positively refused to wash. Why should a man impoverish himself in this way for the benefit of tavern-keepers? His dust is worth as much to himself as it is to any other man, and he certainly has the best claim to it.

RATHER DUSTY.

As we heard the cry of Washoe in early times, so we now heard the cry of Reese River. Every body and his uncle, cousin, brother, and son-in-law was gone or going to Reese. The streets and shops of Placerville were crowded with Reese River goods, Reese River wagons, Reese River croppings, and Reese River notices of various kinds. Nothing was dreamed of in the philosophy of the busy multitude but Reese River.

It was 5 o'clock P.M., just three hours after the usual time, thanks to the Hog's Back, when we took our places on the stages, and girded up our loins for the trip across the mountains. I was the lucky recipient of an outside seat. The seat of honor, by the side of that exalted dignitary the driver, was accorded me by the "polite and gentlemanly agent."

The driver was Charlie. Of course every body knows Charlie—that same Old Charlie who has driven all over the roads in California, and never capsized any body but himself. On that occasion he broke several of his ribs, or as he expressed it to me, "Bust his sides in." I was proud and happy to sit by the side of Charlie—especially as the road was supposed to be a little undulating even by its best friends. Possibly I may have traveled over worse roads than the first ten miles out of Placerville. If so, they must have been in Iceland; for there are not many quite so bad on the continent of North America. I speak of what the road was at the close of summer, cut up by heavy teams, a foot deep with dust, and abounding in holes and pit-falls big enough to swallow a thousand stages and six thousand horses without inconvenience to itself. There are places, over which we passed after dark, where I am sure the road is three miles wide, and every acre of it a model stage-trap; where it branches off over hills, and along the sides of hills, and into deep cañons, and up hills again; dark, dismal places in the midst of great forests of pine, where the horses seem to be eternally plunging over precipices and the stage following them with a crashing noise, horribly suggestive of cracked skulls and broken bones. But I had implicit confidence in Old Charlie. The way he handled the reins and peered through the clouds of dust and volumes of darkness, and saw trees and stumps and boulders of rock and horses' ears, when I could scarcely see my own hand before me, was a miracle of stage-driving. "Git aeoup!" was the warning cry of this old stager. "Git along, my beauties!" was the natural outpouring of the poetry that filled his capacious soul.

"Do many people get killed on this route?" said I to Charlie, as we made a sudden lurch in the dark and bowled along the edge of a fearful precipice.

"Nary kill that I know of. Some of the drivers mashes 'em once in a while, but that's whisky or bad drivin'. Last summer a few stages went over the grade, but nobody was hurt bad—only a few legs'n arms broken. Them was opposition stages. Pioneer stages, as a gen'l thing, travels on the road. Git aeoup!"

A GENERAL SMASH

OLD CHARLIE.

"Is it possible? Why, I have read horrible stories of the people crushed to death going over these mountains!"

"Very likely—they kill 'em quite lively on the Henness route. Git along, my beauties! Drivers only break their legs a little on this route; that is, some of the opposition boys did it last summer; but our company's very strict; they won't keep drivers, as a gen'l thing, that gets drunk and mashes up stages. Git aeoup, Jake! Git along, Mack! 'Twon't pay; 'tain't a good investment for man nor beast. A stage is worth more'n two thousand dollars, and legs costs heavy besides. You Jake, git!"

"How in the world can you see your way through this dust?"

"Smell it. Fact is, I've traveled over these mountains so often I can tell where the road is by the sound of the wheels. When they rattle I'm on hard ground; when they don't rattle I gen'r'lly look over the side to see where she's agoing."

"Have you any other signs?"

"Backer's another sign; when I'm a little skeer'd I chaw more'n ordinary. Then I know the road's bad."

"Don't you get tired driving over the same road so often?"

"Well, I do—kalklate to quit the business next trip. I'm getting well on in years, you see, and don't like it so well as I used to, afore I was busted in!"

"How long have you driven stage?"

"Nigh on to thirty years, an' I'm no better off now than when I commenced. Pay's small; work heavy; gettin' old; rheumatism in the bones; nobody to look out for used-up stage-drivers; kick the bucket one of these days, and that's the last of Old Charlie."

"Why, you must have made plenty of friends during so long a career of staging?"

"Oh yes, plenty of 'em; see 'em to-day, gone to-morrow! Git along!"

And so passed the long hours of the night, Charlie and I gossiping pleasantly about the risks and hardships, mysteries and charms of the stage-driving profession.

All hail to thee, Old Charlie! Never shall it be said that ingratitude is one of my vices. Here, in the pages of this magazine, your name shall be rescued from oblivion. Sweet and gentle ladies shall pay the tribute of admiration to your manly features; and honest men shall award you honor, to whom honor is due. For in the vicissitudes of my career have I not found brave and sterling qualities in all classes of men; heroes whose names are never known; hearts and souls, human affections, and the fear of God in the bodies of stage-drivers?

Thus I think and moralize as we approach the grade. The bad road is at an end. We strike in upon the smooth broad highway, and dash onward with a feeling of absolute relief. The horses' hoofs clatter merrily on the hard, gravelly earth. The tall pines form a magnificent avenue through which the moon begins to glimmer, making a fretwork of silvery light on the backs of our noble animals.

The approach to the crossing of the American River is indescribably grand. Here the grade takes a downward plunge, and here the scenery becomes truly Alpine. Formerly the descent was made on the right side of the ridge. Wonderful improvements, however, have taken place in the grades of this road during the past few years, chiefly owing to the enterprise of Mr. Louis McLean, President of the Pioneer Stage Company. In 1860, as already stated, I traveled over this part of the country on foot, in common with some thousands of adventurers, equally independent of horse-flesh. I then enjoyed the scenery of the American River, for I saw it by the early morning, when the mountains were decked in all the glories of spring; when torrents of snow-water burst from every ravine, and fell thundering into the depths below, and limpid springs made a pleasant music over the moss-covered rocks by the way-side; when the sun's rays glimmered through the dripping trees, and the air was fragrant with the odor of wild flowers. But I had never till now been impressed with an adequate sense of its beauties. How calm and still the night was! how exquisitely balmy the air! how sublime the repose of these grand old mountains! I thought of all the scenes I had witnessed in other countries, yet could not recall any thing to surpass this. There is something in the mystic lights and shades, and the profound solemnity of the night, which lends an awful sublimity to these wild regions. The gigantic forest trees standing in bold outline on the opposite sides of the mountains, seem to pierce the sky; and the moonbeams pouring down into the mysterious abyss through which the river dashes, fringe the tops of the pines, as far down as the eye can reach, with a frost-like drapery. Nothing can be more thrilling than the descent of the grade by moonlight. The road is a magnificent piece of engineering—smooth, broad, and beautifully regular.

Imagine yourself seated in front of the stage, by the side of that genial old whipster, Charlie, who knows every foot of the way, and upon whom you can implicitly rely for the safety of your life and limbs. Holding the reins with a firm hand, and casting a penetrating eye ahead, he cracks his whip, and away go the horses with inspiring velocity—six magnificent chestnuts, superbly adorned with flowing manes and tails. The stillness of the night is pleasantly broken by their measured tread, and the rattle of the wheels over the gravel echoes through the wild rifts and openings of the cañon like a voice from the civilized world telling of human enterprise. Down, and still down, we plunge into the gloomy depths of the abyss; the ghostly forms of trees looming up on our left; to the right, rising far beyond the range of vision, the towering heights of the Sierras; and ever and anon yawning gulfs in front and bottomless pits of darkness still threatening to devour. The road turns and winds like a serpent, sometimes apparently running into a huge bank of granite boulders, then whirling suddenly, and plunging into a shimmering wilderness of rocks and trees, where destruction seems inevitable. Yet onward dash the horses, with an instinct so admirable in its precision that it seems for the time superior to human intelligence. They never swerve from the track; through the fretwork of light and darkness they pursue their way with unrivaled ease and grace; sweeping around the narrow turns; now coursing along on the extreme edge of the precipice, or closely hugging the upper bank as the road winds to the right or the left; now plunging down and whirling with marvelous sagacity over the narrow bridges that span the ravines, often where there is neither rail nor post to mark the way, ever true to the slightest touch of the reins, and ever obedient to the voice of their driver. Is it a wonder that Old Charlie loves his horses and talks of his teams with a kind of paternal affection—that he knows them by heart, and holds converse with them through the long watches of the night as with human friends?

I have attempted to give some idea of the romantic beauties of these mountain regions and the peculiar wildness of the scenery; but it must be conceded that nature has not been permitted to lie wholly undisturbed in the immediate vicinity of the road. There is probably not an acre of ground, possessing a water privilege, on the entire route between Placerville and Virginia City, which has not been taken up and settled upon by some enterprising squatter or speculator, whose views of the present necessities of trade and the future prosperity of Nevada invest this region of country with an extraordinary value. When I traveled over the road in the spring of '60 there were symptoms of rapid progress. Tents and shanties were springing up all along the way-side; and if the weary pedestrian could get nothing else, he could at least always be sure of whisky, even where the houses had neither walls nor roofs. If lodgings were scarce bedfellows were plenty; if there was trouble in keeping the outer man warm there was abundance of fuel for the inner man. For this reason, perhaps, it was not an uncommon thing to see the sturdy adventurers who were on their way to the silver regions quite elevated by the time they reached the summit; and if ever they got sober again, it must have been after they had invested their last dollar in some of those flourishing leads which prevailed around Carson and the Devil's Gate.

The state of things is now very different. Good and substantial taverns, well supplied with provisions, beds, fleas, bugs, etc., to say nothing of the essential article of whisky, are to be met with at intervals of every two or three miles all along the route. Here the stages stop, and here the horses are watered and changed; and here the drivers and passengers get down and stretch their legs, but as a general thing they don't indulge so much in water as the horses.

As we approached Strawberry, I am free to admit that I became somewhat nervous. A lurking suspicion took possession of me that I was recognized by the driver, Old Charlie; though I took particular pains to join with him in abusing that vile slanderer Ross Browne, whose Peep at Washoe had aroused the indignation of every publican on the route. Charlie admitted that he had never read any of this fellow's productions, but he believed him to be the Prince of Liars on general principles; an assertion in which I heartily coincided, with an internal reservation that it was strange how angry it made people to have the truth told about them. "Lord, Lord, Charlie," said I, handing him a cigar, "how this world is given to lying!" By this time we were at Strawberry, and I saw that I had to face the music.

The story goes that there was once upon a time a man named Berry, who located a claim in a pleasant little flat about eight miles from the summit of the mountain. Here he set up his shanty, seeing with a prophetic eye that it would soon become an important point for the accommodation of travelers on the way over to Carson. When the people of California were seized with the silver mania, and began to crowd up the slopes of the Sierras with their teams and pack-trains, their picks, shovels, and blankets, Berry's became a great stopping-place, and his house, which he speedily enlarged, a famous resort for travelers; and this Berry soon became a very rich Berry. His dinners were excellent; his suppers without reproach; his beds as good as any on the road; his whisky as sure to kill at any given range as the best Port Townsend; and altogether he was a popular and a flourishing Berry. But as teams crowded around his premises and supplies of hay were cut off by storms and bad roads, he was forced to offer straw to his customers as a substitute for the regular horse and mule feed. Of course he charged hay prices, for even straw has a hay value under certain circumstances. Now the teamsters when they got straw in place of hay waxed unreasonably wroth, and called this excellent old Berry STRAW-BERRY—a name to which let all homage be rendered. By this honored name goes to this day that famous stopping-place known to the traveling public as Strawberry.

I deemed it prudent, however, not to avow my name on the occasion of my present visit. It was 10 o'clock when we arrived. Covered with dust; beard, eyebrows, and hair a motley gray; hat, coat, shirt, trowsers, and boots the same color; face all striped and piebald, I was effectually disguised. If any body was there who had ever seen me before he could not have recognized me now with a microscope. I walked all about the old room with the fire-place—familiar, yet changed—looked calmly at every body about the premises, and stood with my back to the fire while the horses were being changed, with a delightful consciousness of security. In the darkness of night I had escaped Dirty Mike, and now, amidst the curious and penetrating crowd at Strawberry, not a soul knew me!

The improvements at Strawberry are not to be slighted. A fine hotel now adjoins the old building; a telegraph office affords conveniences for stock-jobbing and catching thieves; handsome rooms are to be had merely for the asking; spring beds invite the wayfarer to repose; the dining-room, billiard saloon, and bar would do credit to Virginia City, or any other civilized community, where men eat, gamble, and drink spirituous liquors; the out-buildings are numerous and capacious; the stables fit for the most aristocratic horses; the hay no longer a subject of reproach to man nor beast, the straw as good as ever bore grain—Oh, Straw-Berry!

"All aboard!"—a new voice, a new face, and a new driver. I bade good-by to Charlie, and hoped we might meet again in the next world, if not in this. Once more we are on our way. The road over the mountain from Strawberry has been greatly improved. It is now a magnificent highway. Formerly the ascent to the summit was difficult and dangerous. The rise is now so beautifully graded as to be scarcely appreciable. Our horses trotted along briskly nearly the whole way. The scenery becomes weird and stern as we approach the highest altitude of the Sierras. The trees are scraggy; the earth is barren and of a whitish cast; great boulders of rock rear their hoary crests high over the way-side, threatening to topple over and crush all beneath them. Sometimes huge masses of rock seem detached from the main body of the slope or cliff around which the road winds, and balanced on a mere point—thousands of tons of solid stone, ready apparently at the slightest vibration of the earth or puff of wind to come crashing down upon the stage. At some of these points I deeply sympathized with a gentleman from San Francisco, of whom the driver spoke in terms of ridicule.

"He was so 'fraid them rocks 'ud be shook loose and fall on his head, he kept a dodgin' 'em all the time. His hair stood right up like a hog's brussels. Every now and then he was peerin' around for a soft spot of road to jump out on; an' when he seed he couldn't find it, he held on to the railin' with both hands till his fingers was all blistered. 'D-d-driver,' sez he, 'd'ye think there's any danger?' 'Danger!' sez I—'ov course there's danger! Supposing that 'ere rock was shook loose by the rattlin' ov this 'ere stage—what d'ye think 'ud be the consequences?' 'I r-r-really can't say,' sez he; 'p-p-possibly it would crush the stage!' 'No,' sez I, 'it wouldn't crush it; but it 'ud make sich a d-d squash of it that bones wouldn't count. Your bones an' my bones, an' the bones ov three passengers above an' four behind an' nine down below, 'ud be all squashed, an' the verdict of Corners Inquest 'ud be—'Eighteen men, six horses, an' a Pioneer Stage squashed by the abovestone!' 'D-d-driver,' sez he—his teeth a-chatterin' like a box o' dice—'is that so?' 'You bet,' sez I, 'the last time I see it done, three ladies an' ten gents from Frisco was squashed.' 'Good gracious!' sez he, turnin' as white as a sheet, 'let me down at the next station!' And sure 'nuff he got down at the next station and made tracks for Frisco. He changed his base—he did. Git aeoup!"

"Is that true, driver?"

"True?"—and the indignant look with which my friend of the whip resented the question satisfied me that it would not be prudent to push my doubts too far—so I qualified the inquiry—"Is it on the square, I mean?"

"Stranger," said he, solemnly, "I don't make a habit o' lyin'; when I lie I kin lie as good as any body; but gen'rally speakin' I'm on the square."

"Of course—that's all right; that's just what I mean; you don't usually steer clear of facts when the 'truth is strange—stranger than fiction.' Won't you take a cigar, driver?"

"Don't care if I do."

And thus the dawning difficulty was amicably adjusted.

Owing to our late start we did not reach the summit before two o'clock. The air at this elevation was sharp, though not unpleasantly so. The altitude is estimated at eight thousand feet above the level of the sea. Frost was on the ground, and there was promise of colder nights soon to come. The moon, which had so kindly befriended us during the greater part of our journey to this point, was still shining brightly, shedding its silvery rays over the wilderness of mountains that loomed up around us. The view over Lake Valley was superb. I have seen nothing to surpass it in Switzerland or Norway. Perhaps the finest feature of the whole journey is the descent of the new grade.

DANGEROUS BOULDERS.

For a distance of five or six miles the road winds around the sides of the mountains, crossing ravines and doubling up occasionally in turns so rapid that the stage seems to run one way and the horses another. Some of these whirling turns reminded me of the flight of an Australian boomerang. As we strike the straight road again the driver gives rein to our spirited animals; crack goes the whip, and down we plunge over narrow bridges, along the edges of terrific precipices a thousand feet deep, through dark forests of pine and along frowning banks of granite, hewn from the solid bed of the mountain. Despite the ridiculous stories we had heard of accidents and alarms, every passenger with a nervous system clings tenaciously to the stage-fixtures, as if determined to follow the stage wherever it might go, and there were moments when we even held our breath to keep up a balance. I flatter myself I saved the lives of the whole party several times by hoisting at the lee rail, and holding my breath hard, while I leaned over on the weather side. It is not comfortable to look down when you are flying along at the rate of ten miles an hour and see no bottom short of a thousand or fifteen hundred feet. Yet there is a charm in this dashing, reckless journey by moonlight. The danger is just sufficient to give it a relish. The excitement keeps the blood warm; the fresh mountain air invigorates and inspires every faculty; the spirit rises with the rapidity of the motion, and before you get half-way to the valley you find yourself in a condition to sing, shout, or dance. The driver, by whose side I had the honor to sit, had evidently cultivated his voice for singing; but unfortunately he knew but one song—and of that he remembered but one line—

“When this cruel war is over!”

which he sang straight ahead for three hours, commencing at the top of the grade and ending only when relieved by a new driver. Indeed, I am not sure that he ended then, for the last I heard of him he was leaning against a post at the station-house, humming over to himself—and it is not impossible he may be at it yet. The only variety I noticed during the journey was in the form of an interlude as he spoke to the horses, “Git aeoup, Bummars! Git alang, Rebs!”

“When this cruel war is over!”

“When this—and so forth; now git!”

The song is not bad when you get the whole of it, with a strong chorus; but a single line of it repeated for a distance of twenty-five miles without a chorus becomes monotonous.

Whether the monotony of the poetry had a soporific tendency, or loss of rest produced a heaviness in the head, I don't know; but after the novelty of our flight down the grade had worn away somewhat, I now and then detected myself in the act of plunging overboard on the backs of the horses, or bobbing into some frightful abyss. Once I actually thought I was gone, and received such a shock when I discovered that I had only been asleep, and was still on hand, as to keep me wide awake during the rest of the way to Lake Tahoe.

This beautiful lake was originally named Bigler, after a distinguished politician, who held the position of Governor of California—John Bigler. It was so named by a gentleman who had a high admiration for the name of Bigler. The beauty of the scenery, the crystal clearness of the water, the inspiring purity of the atmosphere filled the soul of Bigler's friend with poetry, and he called this lovely spot Bigler. It was a just tribute to the popularity of the Governor among his friends; but no governor on earth can enjoy every man's friendship. Bigler had enemies like other governors—some because they wanted office and couldn't get it; others because they wanted a contract and couldn't get it; and many because they wanted to be governor themselves. When this distinguished gentleman ceased to be Governor of California he was made a Minister to South America. It was then discovered by both friends and enemies that the name was inappropriate and lacked euphony; friends had nothing more to hope; enemies nothing more to fear. Who the deuce is John Bigler, said they, that the finest lake in California should be called after him? Let us blot his ugly name off the map and call this beautiful sheet of water Lake Latham or Lake Downey. But here commenced a squabble between the friends of these eminent gentlemen relative to their respective claims. Latham, it was true, had served with honor in the Custom-house—had held the Gubernatorial chair for a few weeks, and subsequently had become United States Senator. But then Downey had vetoed the Bulkhead bill. Pending this difficulty, a hint from some obscure source came very near resulting in the selection of a name that would doubtless have afforded general satisfaction, since it could be claimed by a great many people throughout the State—the name of Brown. It was brief, pointed, and popular—Lake Brown! But what Brown? There were thirty-six Browns in the Penitentiary, besides several more who ought to be there; and at least forty-four Browns were candidates for the Legislature or inmates of the Lunatic Asylum; so that it was difficult to see what Brown would be specially benefited by the compliment. The name itself scarcely presented sufficient claims over all other names to be selected merely on account of its euphony. So Brown was dropped; and between Latham and Downey it was impossible to come to an equitable decision. The name of Bigler remained unmolested for several years longer. In due time, when Latham and Downey were both thrown overboard, the discussion of the question was renewed—every prominent man in the State claiming that the lake should be named after himself. Finally, as popular sentiment could not fix upon the name of any white man, it gradually settled down in favor of the supposed Indian name—Tahoe—which was the first word spoken to the discoverer by a solitary digger, whom he encountered upon its shores. “Tahoe!” cried the digger; and it was at once assumed that “Tahoe” meant “Big Water,” but I am assured by an old settler that “Tahoe” means “Strong Water”—in other words, “Whisky”—so that this magnificent lake, formerly called Bigler, is now literally “Lake Whisky!”

Within the past two years the people of California and Washoe have begun to discover the beauties of this charming region, and its rare advantages as a place of summer resort. Situated in the bosom of the Sierra Nevada mountains, 6000 feet above the level of the sea, with an atmosphere of wonderful purity; abounding in game; convenient of access, and possessing all the attractions of retirement from the busy world, amidst scenery unrivaled for its romantic beauties, there can be no doubt it will soon become the grand central point of pleasure and recreation for the people of the Pacific Coast. The water of the lake is singularly clear and blue, and during the warmest months is so cool as to render bathing rather a lively and stimulating exercise. It abounds in the finest trout, which supply the markets of Carson and Virginia City, and occasionally furnish a rich treat to the epicures of San Francisco. Fishermen are busily occupied with their nets at intervals along its shores, greatly to the detriment of gentlemen who follow in the footsteps of Izaak Walton. An excellent hotel, called the Lake House, has been established at a beautiful and picturesque point on the right shore (going toward Virginia), where good accommodations and “all the luxuries of the season” can now be had. Two enterprising Americans, Messrs. Dean and Martin, have recently purchased the premises, with a view of getting up a splendid watering-place in the Atlantic style. Already they have bath-houses, pleasure-boats, riding horses, billiard tables, bowling-alleys, and all the conveniences for health and recreation. At the time of my visit the house was in process of enlargement. Martin was one of my fellow-pedestrians on my first trip across the mountains to Washoe, and I can safely say it would give me great pleasure to hear of his success in this enterprise. He is a clever, genial fellow, a first-rate traveling companion, and an upright, honest man. To dyspeptics, consumptives, and broken-down stock-brokers I have a word of advice to offer: If you want your digestive apparatus put in complete order, so that brickbats will stick to your ribs without inconvenience, spend a month with my friend Martin; if your bronchial tubes distress you, swallow a few thousand gallons of Lake Tahoe air, and you can blow bellows blasts from your lungs forever after; if your nervous system is deranged by bad speculations in stocks, bowl nine-pins and row one of Martin’s boats for six weeks, and I venture to affirm stocks will rise a thousand per cent. It is all a matter of health in the long-run; with good digestion and a sound nervous system, there is no trouble in life; and for these ends there is no place like Tahoe.

From the first hour after leaving Placerville we passed along the road-side numerous teams and trains of wagons, most of which were grouped together under the trees, or in front of the station-houses, in the old-fashioned camp style. I commenced a rough calculation of the number of wagons, but soon gave it up as a hopeless task. It seemed to me that there were enough of them, big and little, to reach all the way over the mountain. At the least calculation we must have passed two or three hundred. Every wagon was heavily freighted—some with merchandise, others with iron castings for the mills, and quite a goodly number with families, fruit, whisky, and furniture. There were horse-teams, and mule-teams, and ox-teams. I never before saw so many teams on one road. No wonder the dust was pretty deep!

JOB.

"Are you going back to the States?" said I, to a Pike County man, with a wagon-load of wife and children, beds, chairs, and cooking utensils. "No, Sir," said he, turning the quid in his leathery jaw, "you bet I ain't! I'm bound for Reese! After I make my pile-thar, a keeping of a tavern, I'll steer for Californy agin—it's good enough a country for me." "Why did you leave it?" I asked. "Wa'al," said the poor fellow, wiping the dust from his face with the back of his hand, "that's more'n I know. 'Twarn't my fault. The old 'oman was high for feet. She said we were fools for a tinkerin' on our little farm down thar, when every body was makin' fortunes in Reese. She's tolerable peert—the old 'oman is. Oh, she's on it, you bet!" "Well, I wish you luck!" "Thank yer," drawled Pike; "what mout yer name be, stranger?" "My name?—ahem—is—John." The man looked hard at me; turned the quid once more in his leathery jaw; squirted out a copious stream of juice, and, without changing in the slightest degree the gravity of his countenance, said, "Mine's Job;" and then went to work unhitching his horses. This was the last I saw of Job.

bonds? Their faces, despite the dust and grime that besmear them, absolutely shine in the cheery light of the big log fire; they sniff the steaming stew that simmers in the pot with sympathetic unction; they sit and loll upon their mother-earth in exquisite unconscionness of dirt; they spin their yarns of the day's adventures with many a merry burst of laughter; and now, as they fall to work and devour the savory mess before them, what need have they for dinner-pills? Hunger is their sauce—fresh air and exercise their medicine. Oh, the jolly rascals! How I envy them their camp life!

On second thoughts I don't know that they are to be envied in every particular. As to the daily part of their occupation—driving ox and mule teams over the Sierras; swallowing dust and alkali on the plains; pushing, pulling, sweating, and swearing at their stubborn animals, and navigating their heavy wagons over bad roads from one month's end to another—I can't conscientiously envy them. Sooner than follow mule or ox driving as a profession, I think I'd profess politics for a living—which I consider the last resort of a worthless man.

The camp scenes along the way-side were lively and picturesque. I enjoyed them with a peculiar zest after three years of travel through the deserts of civilization in Europe. Here was life reduced to its primary elements; here were accommodations cheap, roomy, and gorgeously furnished; here was comfort fit for poet, artist, or any other man of a naturally sound and barbarous taste; here were food and fire without stint, and fresh air to an unlimited extent; and holes enough through the tops of the trees to let the smoke out; and neither commissioners nor waiters to stand behind and admire your style of eating. Who is there so depraved as not to yearn for the heavenly joys of a camp-life in the wilderness? Just take a side-peep at that merry group of teamsters! Uncouth and unsentimental they may be; tired and hungry after their hard day's work they doubtless are; but did you ever see a happier looking set of vaga-

Yet I must confess the trip to Washoe has, to me at least, lost much of its original charm. No longer is the way variegated by long strings of pedestrians, carrying their picks, shovels, and blankets upon their backs; no longer are the stopping-places crowded every night with two or three hundred millionaires rejoicing in empty pockets and brimming heads; no longer are the wild mountain passes enlivened by grotesque scenes of saddle-trains and passengers struggling through the mud and snow; it is all now a regular and well-established line of travel—too civilized to be interesting in any great degree, and too convenient to admit of those charming discomforts which formerly afforded us so much amusement. The business man who now leaves San Francisco at 4 P.M. is deposited at Virginia City by 10 o'clock the next night—just thirty-six hours' traveling time. Fancy how the emigrants who crossed these mountains prior to 1860 would have stared at the bare suggestion of such a feat as this! If we are behind the times in railroads, it is certain there is no such country in the world for feats of horse-flesh as California. The length of our stage-routes, the rapidity with which we travel on them, and the facilities afforded by our expresses, would astonish the humdrum people of the Atlantic States, if they had the faintest idea of the difficulties to be overcome in carrying such enterprises into effect in a wild country like ours.

A new road now winds along the shores of Lake Tahoe. This part of the trip will compare favorably with a journey along the shores of Como. At the Point of Rocks the scene is equal to any thing of the kind to be found in Europe. The road is cut through the brow of the cliff, and for a distance of several hundred feet is supported by massive timbers. To the left the clear blue waters of the lake glimmer through forests of towering pine; to the right is a colossal tower of rocks, presenting a front like some grand old fortress built by an antediluvian race of giants. A rough and very hasty sketch was all I could get of this remarkable point.

Leaving the lake at the Glenbrook Station, we begin to ascend the last of the Sierra Nevada "divides," and, after a heavy pull and long descent, enjoy a fine view of the pretty little town of Carson. An hour more, and we are safely landed at the Express office of Wells, Fargo, and Co., from which point we can diverge to any number of bad hotels. By selecting the worst you will possibly not be disappointed.

Carson City has enjoyed a very wholesome kind of prosperity since my first visit, if I might be allowed to judge by a casual glance at the new buildings around the plaza and the many pleasant residences in the suburbs. The plethoric condition of the stock market in San Francisco, and the fact that capital had been pouring through the various passes of the Sierras into Washoe, had led me to expect that wonderful improvements must be the result. Nor was I disappointed. The number of drinking saloons in Carson City, and in fact all along the route, manifested in a remarkable degree the rapid progress of civilization. The splendid stone Penitentiary, situated a couple of miles from Carson, presented another striking evidence of moral advancement. But..... [Here a page or two of manuscript is wanting, which apparently related to Carson City.—EDITOR.] In my next paper I shall speak of Virginia City, and of my third and last visit there in August, 1864, together with an unvarnished account of my reception by the citizens; and furthermore, of my own most disastrous experiences as a lecturer in that region.

STATION ON THE WASHOE ROAD.

CHILDLESS.

HE is dead, and in his grave,
In yonder town, where wind and wave—
So must I—forever rave.

I saw his coffin sliding down
The yellow sand in yonder town,
Then I felt my childless crown.

One morn I kissed him in his bed;
A moment after, this was said,
"Your child is dying—he is dead!"

Some one watched the crowded way,
For him who left his boy that day,
Saying, "Love, I will not stay."

What misery to see him fall
Beside that bed, and hear him call
The darling dead his all in all!

The boy was ready for his rest,
Flowers in his hair, and on his breast
His little hands together pressed.

By night we sailed across the sea,
So floating from the world to be,
Apart from human speech, we three.

The blue sea sang, the full moon spread
Her glory with the sunset-red;
But one of us lay midships dead!

And we returned; in his old place
Not meeting with him, face to face,
I cease to love the living race.

But somewhere, just beyond my sight,
He is; between us a strange light
Trembles, and hides him day and night.

Mothers, who mourn alone to-day,
You understand me when I say
I do not weep, I do not pray.

And when about my work I go—
Your woman's work—I do not show
The occupation I bestow

On him; I live the precious days
He lived, conning his pretty ways,
And give him late, remorseful praise.

I seek my punishment again;
I love to bear the cruel pain,
Which makes me feel both loss and gain.

To stare upon that sacred store,
His books, his toys, the clothes he wore,
And mutter, "Could he come once more!"

Then take from me my simple verse,
Rambling, perhaps, as I rehearse
This grief—your and my universe.

LYMAN BEECHER, 1803, AGED 23.

LYMAN BEECHER.

FOR quite fifty years Lyman Beecher was a power in the land. During forty years he was, if not the ablest, the most noted clergyman in America. His recollections cover nearly the whole of the closing quarter of the last century; his active professional life was measured by the first half of the present century. After that came thirteen years of repose, during which he often proposed to write an account of his own Life and Times. His failing powers of memory and expression prevented the accomplishment of the work as originally intended. His children then undertook the pious task. They gathered up from his own lips his recollections, prompting him by questions, each adding his or her own reminiscences, and interposing chapters of correspondence, and more formal history. The completed work can be considered an Autobiography only in a very general way. The properly autobiographic element preponderates in the earlier portion, gradually diminishing to the close. As a whole, it presents a fair picture of a notable man, who acted an important part in notable times.*

No Beecher came over in the Mayflower. The first Americans of that name were part of a company who came to New England in 1638, eighteen years after the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. This company, finding theological controversy rife in Massachusetts, resolved to form a new colony. They pitched upon a spot called by the Indians Quin-nipiac, named Red Mount by the Dutch, but to which they gave the name of New Haven on account of its good harbor. Of this company was Hannah Beecher, who had become a widow just before they sailed. Being a midwife she was induced to go with the expedition by the assurance that she should receive her husband's share in the town plot. The first sermon preached to the company, after their arrival at their new home, was by Master John Davenport, under a great oak which stood on the widow's plot. The spot is marked by the "Old Beecher House," now standing in New Haven. Hannah Beecher lived a score of years, and died, leaving an estate valued at £55 5s. 6d. With her came her son John, who had already reached man's estate. His son Joseph, the first American-born Beecher, was mighty in hands and spine. He could lift a barrel of cider by the chimes and drink out of the bung-hole—a feat which we commend to the trial of the strong men of our day. His son Nathaniel was a blacksmith, and his anvil stood on the stump of the old oak from which Davenport preached the first sermon ever delivered in Connecticut. He, too, was a strong man, though not so strong as his father; still he could lift a barrel of cider into a cart. He stood six feet high, and was the last of the tall Beechers. None of the race since have quite come up to the standard American height.

Next came David, the father of Lyman, a short, square-built man—blue-eyed, and half Welsh by blood—strong enough to carry a barrel of cider into the cellar; a blacksmith, like his father, and also a farmer, who made famous hoes, and raised excellent rye and wheat. He kept, moreover, a boarding-house for the accommodation of Yale students and members of the Legislature. His table was a little more luxurious than was the custom of the country; consequently he was afflicted with dyspepsia and the consequent blues. Moreover, he had a sun-stroke while out soldiering toward the close of the Revolutionary war, which did not tend to improve his spirits. In his later years he always fancied himself bankrupt, and on the point of coming to want. Still he lived well; and when he died was found to have laid up four or five thousand dollars—a very fair estate for the times. He was a very well-read man, but notably careless and absent-minded—a trait which was transmitted to his more famous son.

* Autobiography, Correspondence, etc., of LYMAN BEECHER, D.D., edited by CHARLES BEECHER. With Illustrations. Two Volumes: Harper and Brothers.

THE OLD BEECHER HOUSE, NEW HAVEN.

David Beecher was five times married, and had a dozen children, of whom all but four died in infancy. Lyman Beecher was the only child of Esther Lyman, the third and best-loved of the five wives. She died of consumption two days after the birth of her son, who was a puny seven-months' child, whom it was thought useless to try to save, so he was wrapped up and laid aside as dead. After a while one of the women found that the babe breathed; so she washed and dressed it, with the words, "It is a pity he had not died." But there was good stock in him, and the weakling endured fully threescore and ten years of active and useful life; and "by reason of strength," quietly overpassed by eight years the extreme limit of fourscore.

The motherless babe was almost from birth adopted by his mother's sister, the childless wife of Lot Benton, a well-to-do farmer of Guilford, a few miles from New Haven. Worthy Uncle Lot was a true father to the child, one of whose daughters long after described him under the name of "Uncle Lot Griswold." He was a tall, bright, dark-eyed man of pleasant countenance; always scheming, and contriving, and farming on the principle of making his land yield the most with the least outlay. The first sixteen years of the life of Lyman Beecher were passed mainly with Uncle Lot.

Here and there in the autobiographical reminiscences we get glimpses of the way in which well-to-do people in Connecticut lived two generations ago. Six mahogany chairs, in a shut-up parlor, were considered magnificent. Good David Beecher never got beyond cherry. Here, excerpted from the autobiography, is a picture of life at Uncle Lot's:

We raised our own breadstuffs, he says, and fodder for stock, and cut salt hay on the marsh. Raised an acre or two of flax, though it was impossible to keep Aunt Benton in spinning for the winter. In fall and winter there was wood to be cut and hauled. In June we went to Quinnepaug Outlet to wash sheep; a day or two afterward we sheared them. Then the fleece was salted, carded, and spun, all in the house: flax in winter, wool in summer. They made all sorts of linen work, table-cloths, shirting, sheeting, and cloths. Thrifty Aunt Benton and Annis—a bright thirteen-year old girl—got up very early in the morning and made breakfast, for which there was rye bread, butter, buckwheat cakes, and pie. After the dishes were washed Annis and I helped aunt milk. We dined on salt pork, vegetables, and pies; corned-beef also; and always on Sunday a boiled Indian pudding. We made a stock of pies at Thanksgiving, froze them for winter use, and they lasted until March. Of the durability of these Connecticut pies a good story is told. It is said, on taking down the pantry of an old house, under it was found one of these pies, in perfect preservation, though the earthen dish which had contained it was entirely decayed. The main winter work was hauling, cutting, and splitting wood, to keep up the mighty fires in the great open fire-places. The amusements were hunting squirrels, quail, musk-rats, and other small game; fishing for perch, trout, and the like; eating apples, drinking cider, telling stories, playing checkers, and going to singing-school in the evenings. Sunday evenings the boys "went courting."

There were about a dozen slaves in the town. They were, in fact, masters rather than servants. Thus old Parson Fowler's Moses managed the farm, rung the church bell, sent his master's son to college, paid the bills, and was head-man in general. It was considered a settled thing that Lyman was to be a farmer, and in due time to have the nice Benton homestead.

"How did it happen that you did not become a farmer?" asked his daughter, of the old man.

"I should," was the reply, "if Uncle Benton had not cleared a fifteen-acre lot, and I driven plow over the whole three times. I wish you could see his old plow. It was a curious thing of his own making, clumsy, heavy, and patched with old hoes and pieces of iron to keep it from falling to pieces. But he thought a great deal of it. One day I drove the ox-team so near as to graze it with the wheel. 'There, there, Lyman, you've run over that plow and broke it all to pieces.' 'Why, Uncle Lot, I haven't touched the plow.' 'Well, I'd a great deal rather you had than to have gone so plaguy nigh it.' Now I am naturally quick, and that old plow was so slow—one furrow a little way, and then another—and the whole fifteen acres three times over, some of it as steep as the roof of a house. I became inexpressibly sick of it. What should I do then but build castles in the air? First I knew I would be a rod ahead, and the plow out, and Uncle Lot would say 'Whoa!' and come and give me a shake. Not long after the job was finished, Uncle Benton and I were walking over to Toket Hill, and I had got so used to driving that I fell into a brown study, and kept saying 'Whoa!' 'Haw!' 'Gee!' as if the oxen were along. 'Why, Lyman,' said Uncle Lot, 'did you think you were driving the oxen?' It was then, I believe, he gave up. Next day we were out behind the barn picking apples. 'Lyman,' said he, 'should you like to go to college?' 'I don't know, Sir,' said I. But the next day we were out picking apples again, and without his saying a word, I said, 'Yes, Sir, I should.' So he drove over to New Haven, and talked with father, and they settled it between them. Uncle Lot was to clothe me—Aunt Benton could make nearly every thing—and father was to do the rest. Uncle took his nephew Lot Benton for his heir, gave him the homestead, and moved to Old Guilford. But when he died, many years afterward, he left me his Guilford house, and land worth about $2000 besides."

Thus it happened that an indifferent farmer was lost, and a great preacher was gained.

After two years of preparation Lyman Beecher entered Yale College in 1793. He was eighteen years old, a stout and healthy farmer's boy. The college bore little resemblance to the present pride of the "City of Elms." It seems that the special objects of the early builders of New England were first to find into what ugly shapes they could pile up brick and timber, and then to see how uncomfortable they could make the interior. The Yale architects succeeded admirably in both respects. For apparatus there was a home-made orrery as big as the wheel of an ocean steamer, so rusty that it could not be made to revolve; a four-foot telescope, through which nobody could see any thing; an air-pump so out of order that a mouse under the receiver might have lived as long as Methuselah, so far as exhaustion of air was concerned. Besides these there was a prism and an elastic hoop to illustrate centrifugal force—and that was the whole list of the apparatus of Yale. For President there was at first Dr. Stiles, a trim, pompous old gentleman, wonderfully urbane out of college—just the reverse within it. He died before Beecher completed his course, and was succeeded by Timothy Dwight, a man of quite a different order. He was Beecher's spiritual father.

Twenty-five years after, when the pupil had become great, he told his teacher that to him he owed all that he had. "Then," said Dwight, "I have done a great and soul-satisfying work. I consider myself amply rewarded."

Beecher's college course, estimated by the class-books of the tutors, was not a brilliant one. Proficiency in mathematics was the recognized test of scholarship. He was deficient even in arithmetic; the higher mathematics he lost totally. So he got no appointment at Commencement; but he received an honor dearer to the college student. His class-mates found that he could talk so that people would listen, and they chose him to deliver the Valedictory Address on Presentation Day, six weeks before Commencement.

Good Father Beecher had dreadful fits of "hypo" when the college bills were to be paid. He could not stand it, he told his wife—the fifth, for he had been married, re-widowed, and again re-wedded, since the loss of his third and best-loved wife; he must take Lyman out of college. The good woman would not hear to this. She had some property in her own right, and that should go to pay her step-son's bills. Lyman knew well enough that his father was fairly well-to-do in the world, and tried to soothe him. "Don't be concerned," he said. "You have enough to live on at present; and when I get through and have a home I'll take care of you." "Pooh! poor fellow!" grumbled the dyspeptic old man, "you'll scratch a poor man's head all your lifetime." The dismal prophecy turned out to be not far from true; though the young man managed to help himself that year. Six weeks before Commencement the college butler gave up his post. By the old Yale laws, written in Latin which Cicero would need a glossary to understand, "The butler is licensed to sell in the buttery cider, metheglin, strong beer (not more than twelve casks [cados] a year), loaf-sugar, pipes, tobacco, and such like things necessary for students not on sale in the commons."* Young Beecher borrowed $300, bought out the stock of Staples, the retiring butler, and started what we may call a college grocery. The number of cadis which he might sell was strictly limited by college law; but the size of a cadus was not defined. The new butler interpreted it liberally. To replenish the stock left by his predecessor, he "sent to New York by an English parson (a judge of the article) and bought a hogshead of porter," from which we infer that a cadus, by Yale measurement, meant a hogshead. Young Beecher, having pronounced his Presentation Valedictory, went into his grocery enterprise with a will. In six weeks he made enough to pay the borrowed investment, clear Commencement expenses, buy a suit of clothes, with a surplus of a hundred dollars in hand, besides another hundred dollars in bad debts for necessaria scholaribus furnished "on tick" to students whose needs in the way of beer and cider, pipes and tobacco, were in advance of their pecuniary resources. "If I had gone into business then," said the good old man sixty years later, "I should have made money." Possibly he might, but this is the first and last instance during his long life in which he showed any aptitude in that direction.

A dozen hogsheads of beer, with cider and mead, pipes and tobacco, at discretion, seems an ample allowance for a hundred students. But Yale under Dr. Stiles's administration had fallen into a bad way. Most of the students were skeptical, called each other Voltaire, Rousseau, D'Alembert, and the like; wines and liquors were kept in many of the rooms, besides the potables which the butler furnished; rowdies were plenty; intemperance, profanity, gambling, and licentiousness were common. Clergy and people, as we shall have occasion to see, were then, and for a long time thereafter, almost universally heavy drinkers, and inveterate smokers. A great change was, however, wrought in Yale immediately upon the accession of Dwight to the Presidency.

When Beecher entered college he was undecided whether he was to be a lawyer or a clergyman. He listened to the first lawyers of his day, became disgusted with legal quirks and quibbles, and determined that he would preach. Yet at this time he did not even suppose that he was converted. "It was not before the middle of my junior year," he says, "that I was really awakened." He passed through the ordinary phases of religious experience, as laid down in the theology of the time. First came conviction, then despair, then attempts at reformation—of heart, not of life, for his life was remarkably blameless, or rather in technical phrase "moral." He could effect nothing by this attempt at "self-righteousness;" could not make a "right prayer with a wrong heart;" was tormented with the doctrines, especially that of Election; pored over Brainerd's Life—"a most undesirable thing for cases like mine; it gave me a tinge for years," and "Edwards on the Affections," which he calls "a most overwhelming thing, and to common minds the most entangling. They are," he said in his old age, "a bad generation of books on the whole. I was converted in spite of such books." To our minds the trouble was that he tried to be Edwards or Brainerd, and his nature would let him be only Beecher. The upshot was that he fell into a state of permanent hypochondria, a "dark, sullen, unfeeling state," that finally affected his health, which lasted for months, and passed away only by degrees. "I began," he says, "to see more into the doctrines of the Bible. Election and Decrees were less a stumbling-block. I came in by that door. The fact is, the law and doctrines, without any explanation, is a cruel way to get souls into the kingdom. Mine was a hopeful, promising case, and if I had the instruction I give to inquirers, I should have come out bright in a few days." As it was, he had grave doubts, which extended even into his divinity year, whether it would be right in him to preach.

His divinity year lasted really only nine months. There was no Hebrew, and apparently little Greek. It is doubtful whether Beecher could ever fairly read a chapter of the Scriptures in the original tongues. In divinity Hopkins, Edwards, Bellamy, Andrew Fuller, and, above all, Dwight's Sermons, were the chief text-books. The main study was the Evidences of Christianity—the most important topic at a time when it seemed a doubtful question whether infidelity would not oversweep New England. Twice a week he and a fellow-student walked over to West Haven, and held meetings in the society of Father Williston, a pious but very tame old preacher. Beecher had then formed that fiery, impetuous style which was ever after his marked characteristic. "The people turned out to hear us," he said, "and there were some conversions. I had much interest in my subjects; was impulsive and vehement. I wish I could hear somebody speak as I used to then."

Meanwhile, according to the wont of young men "looking forward to the ministry," he fell in love, wisely and well, as it happened. At Nutplains, a little way from the village of Old Guilford, lived General Andrew Ward, an old revolutionary officer, and for years the magnate of the town. According to tradition, which any one who chooses may believe, it was for a long time the custom when "town-meeting" was held, for the Moderator to announce to the voters, "The meeting is now open, and you will proceed to vote for General Ward and Deacon Burgess as representatives." It is certain that for years Ward was standing representative for Guilford. His son-in-law, Eli Foote, had died, leaving ten children. The grandfather took them to his home, and became a father to all. They were a family of uncommon ability, but foremost of all was one daughter, Roxana. A refugee from St. Domingo took up his residence at Guilford; from him Roxana learned to speak and write French; she played well on the guitar, and was a very creditable artist, painting flowers and miniatures. She was well-read in history, poetry, and the novels of the day. The Ward House, familiarly called "Castle Ward," was merely a rather rambling New England farm-house, of wood, built piecemeal, from time to time as more room was needed. Close by, on the bank of a pleasant stream, was a spinning-mill, where three or four spinning-wheels were turned by water. This was the favorite spot of the girls. Here, while they spun, they received their visitors, chatted, laughed, and read, Roxana fastening her French books to the distaff, studying and spinning at once.

Beecher had inwardly sworn that he would never marry a weak woman. His wife must have sense and possess strength to lean upon. Roxana possessed these qualities; but she had said that she would never marry until she found some one like the stately Sir Charles Grandison. It required some stretch of imagination to recognize him in the short young collegian; and when he asked if there was any fatal objections to his addresses, she hinted that it would be a long time before he would complete his studies. However, she permitted him to continue his visits, and in due time an engagement was made, conditioned that neither party repented. The divinity student once came very near repenting. Roxana was trained in the Episcopal communion, and Lyman, soon to be a Presbyterian preacher, became troubled about the difference in their religious views; so he rode to Nutplains to talk the matter over, prepared, if the disagreement was too great, to give up the engagement. The result was a long talk, a good cry, and the discovery that on vital points they thought very much alike. He never told her to her dying day what he had in mind when he made that visit.

In due time the four young men who constituted the Yale Divinity Class were examined and licensed. Beecher feared that it would be hard to find flocks for so many shepherds. Providence, however, had taken care of that matter. The southern extremity of Long Island had been settled from Connecticut. At East Hampton was a church considered then the most important on the Island. The pastor, good old Doctor Buell, had died a few months before, and after one or two trials of others Beecher was asked to go there as a "candidate." He owned a horse, saddle, and bridle; all the rest of his personal effects were packed in a little white hair-trunk, which he carried on the pommel of his saddle, as, on Thanksgiving-day, 1798, he rode over to New London, whence he was to take passage across the Sound.

East Hampton village was then a collection of plain farm-houses, built directly upon a portion of the main southern highway. In front of each house stood the wood-pile, close by the barn. The street, or rather road, was a stretch of green turf two or three hundred feet wide, through the centre of which ran a couple of narrow dun-colored ruts, worn by the wheels of the few passing wagons, and between them two broader ones trodden out by the feet of the horses. The green turf on either side was usually snowy with flocks of white geese. At each end of the street stood a windmill. A short row of stiff Lombardy poplars, and one great elm, a landmark for miles around, were then the only trees. The first "meeting-house" was built in 1650. In 1717 it was replaced by the one in which Lyman Beecher was to preach. It had a bell and clock, and was the largest and most splendid church on the Island. This building, its interior quite altered, still stands, and bids fair to stand for another century. It is the oldest house on the Island. Not far away were several small hamlets, mostly bearing sonorous Indian names, whence on Sundays the good people came to Hampton, riding in great two-horse wagons, each capable of carrying a whole family.

The new "candidate" preached and visited with fair acceptance, meeting with less than the usual amount of carping. Sundry faults were indeed found. On Christmas-day he took dinner with a Deist, and in the evening, at another house, heard a young lady sing songs, and asked her to sing all she knew. On another occasion he actually sung himself; and once went hunting in company with a Deist. But, on the whole, matters went on favorably, and late in March he was able to write to Roxana that he expected to receive a "call" in April, in which case he should soon, say in May or June, "naturally enough begin to think about getting a wife."

The call came and was accepted. The preacher's salary was fixed at $300, with a kind of parsonage right, afterward commuted for $400 in cash. On the 19th of September, 1799, he was married, and in a few days the pair set out for their home. Roxana had a candle-stand, bureau, table, clothing, bedding, linen, and other stuffs. Uncle Lot hired a small sloop to take them over. "He always did such things for us," said Beecher; "took as much care for me as if I had been but fifteen; made all my bargains." The parson soon bought a dilapidated old house, with five acres of land, paying $800 for the whole, and spending $300 in repairs to make the dwelling habitable. The first carpet ever known at East Hampton was in the parson's house. One day a little money came from good Uncle Lot; with it Lyman bought a bale of cotton; Roxana span it, had it woven, and painted it over in oil-colors, with a gay border around the edge, and groups of flowers in the centre. The people were astounded at the magnificence of the pastor's parlor when the new carpet was laid down. Good old Deacon Tallmadge coming one day stopped at the door, afraid to enter. "Walk in, Deacon," said the pastor. "I can't," he answered, "'thout step-pin' on't," adding, after a moment's wondering admiration, "D'ye think ye can have all that, and heaven too?" The good Deacon in a breath got off a couple of mots which have since done good service in comic papers and religious tracts.

The young pastor soon became a man of note. "The light of the golden candlestick of East Hampton began to be seen afar." There were "revivals" in his parish. In other words, under his teaching and preaching men and women actually became Christians, despite of the poor health which for months together precluded him from active work. His first marked stroke which told beyond his own congregation was his Sermon on Dueling, occasioned by the death of Alexander Hamilton. That sermon was printed, and became afterward a power in the politics of the country. Years after, when Henry Clay was a candidate for the Presidency, it was republished by his opponents as a political pamphlet, and was scattered broadcast over the land.

Beecher's ministry at East Hampton lasted for a little less than twelve years. He preached earnestly, and in every way labored zealously in his vocation. Revival after revival rewarded his efforts. For the rest, he fished some, and took good care of his five-acre plot; set out an orchard, the first known in the place, for the farmers had thought apples would not grow so near the salt-water; and played, rather dolorously we imagine, upon that unclerical instrument the fiddle. His wife planted flowers and shrubs in the front yard of the parsonage—they say that a snow-ball and a catalpa of her planting are still living—and set out shade trees before the house. Others followed the good example, and set about beautifying their homes. Trees sprung up in the place of the old wood-piles, and now one can hardly find a more beautifully shaded place than East Hampton.

Meanwhile children were born in the parsonage—almost one a year—and the pastor found his salary of $400 inadequate for the maintenance of his growing household. To supply the deficiency he set up a boarding-school for girls in his house. His wife taught the higher English branches, French, painting, and embroidery; he cared for the compositions of the pupils. The school prospered fairly enough; but in spite of it there was a growing deficit in the general income. He must either have more salary or must leave. He laid the matter fairly before his people. His demands certainly were not exorbitant. For five years he had spent $100 a year more than he had received, and was now $500 in debt. If his people would meet that $500, and thereafter pay him $500 a year and his fire-wood, he would stay with them, probably as long as he lived. The good people of East Hampton loved their pastor; but they loved their dollars quite as well, and tried to drive a close bargain.—Would Mr. Beecher promise never to ask more than $500 a year?—Mr. Beecher would not promise that. If things continued as they then were he thought he could live upon that. If his expenses should be greatly increased he could not. In any case, he must have a salary upon which he could live.—Then if they paid the $500 of debt, would Mr. Beecher refund it in case he should ever remove from them?—He would not agree to that. He had labored for them for five years for a hundred dollars a year less than it had cost him to live. The $500 dollars was, he thought, his just due for arrears.—The result was that when the whole matter came up before the Presbytery, the church said that they would make no objection to Mr. Beecher's request for a dismissal. Whereupon, in April, 1810, the Presbytery unanimously resolved that Mr. Beecher, according to his own request, should be dismissed from his pastoral relation to the church and congregation at East Hampton, and recommended to the Southern Association of Litchfield County, in the State of Connecticut, as a minister in good and regular standing:—For while these matters were pending, the church of Litchfield had given him a "call."

We have dwelt at length upon the early years of Lyman Beecher, and upon his first pastorate, because before its close his character had been fully formed. In fact, he was personally and professionally formed when, at the age of twenty-two, he entered upon his labor. The Doctor Beecher of Litchfield and Boston and Cincinnati was in all save growth the Lyman Beecher of East Hampton. In theology he was in terms thoroughly orthodox, even according to the strictest standard of Edwards. Both accepted the same formal creed even upon the questions of Divine Sovereignty and Human Responsibility. Yet when practically presented there was a wide difference. To Edwards, the recluse student, the universe moved solely by the action of God; men were, after all, but puppets in his hands; every action of them and their eternal fate was fixed by divine decree, absolutely and unchangeably, before the world began. To Beecher, endowed with an intense personality, every man acted, and was to be treated as acting from his own volition. In Edwards's view Divine Sovereignty—including in the phrase Election, Decrees, Predestination, and kindred doctrines—were the fixed point to which Human Agency must be made to conform. In Beecher's view Human Agency, and consequently Responsibility, was the fixed point, and Divine Sovereignty must be so interpreted as not to conflict with it. This is not the place, nor is the present writer the one, to decide between these two systems, or rather phases of the same system. Granting that absolute Divine Sovereignty is the golden side, and absolute Human Responsibility the silver side of the shield, it is enough to say that Beecher's eye was ever fixed on the silver side. In his farewell sermon at East Hampton he gave the outline of his theological system. This sermon was years after enlarged and preached in Boston as a "charge" at the ordination of a clergyman, and published under the title of "The Bible a Code of Laws." A single paragraph from this sermon condenses, better than we can, Beecher's view upon this point. The new pastor was admonished to "Admit no excuse for impenitence, and no plea in mitigation of guilt; no Decree of God as having any influence to constrain them to sin, or render immediate repentance impossible; no doctrine of Election or Reprobation as excluding them from heaven against their wills, and driving them reluctantly to hell; no doctrine of Total Depravity as destroying Free Agency, and rendering transgression involuntary and unavoidable; no doctrine of Regeneration by the special agency of the Holy Spirit as implying any inability in the sinner to love, and repent, and believe, which does not consist wholly in his refusal to obey the Most High."

Litchfield, whither Beecher removed in 1810—he being then in his thirty-fifth year—was a type of a New England village of the best class. It would be hard to find any where so large a proportion of men and women of education and culture as were then gathered in Litchfield. There were Oliver Wolcott, who had been a member of Washington's Cabinet, and his son Frederick, a distinguished lawyer; Tapping

Reeve, Principal of the Law School, which for forty years was the most noted institution of the kind in the country, and several judges, professors in the school; John Pierpont, poet and divine; sundry lawyers and physicians of note; Sarah Pierce, Principal of a noted Female Academy, which drew pupils and their parents from every part of the Union; and many another well worthy of note. It was "a delightful village, on a fruitful hill, richly endowed with schools both professional and scientific, with its venerable governors and judges, with its learned lawyers and senators and representatives, and a population enlightened and respectable."

Beecher sold his Hampton house for $1800—making a thousand dollars clear profit—and with the money bought a square hipped-roofed house and several acres of land, with garden and orchard, pleasantly situated. In a few years he built an addition in front to afford room for the accommodation of several boarders from the Female Academy. His salary of $800 seemed ample to meet his wants, and for five years he lived as happy as often falls to the lot of mortals. His labors were abundant and successful, and he soon became recognized as the great man of the region.

Soon after his settlement he began his warfare against intemperance. There was, and long had been, abundant occasion for this. Intemperance was the vice of the day. The clergy were no whit behind their people in the matter of hard drinking. The official meetings of the clerical bodies were far from decorous in this respect. Beecher could remember that once, when he was a boy, the Association dined at Uncle Lot's. As soon as good Aunt Benton saw her reverend guests approaching she ran down to the cellar and drew a pail of beer; then the hot irons were thrust in, and the bucket of foaming flip was ready. This soon disappeared; then came pipes, and in fifteen minutes one could not see across the room. Matters went on from bad to worse. Just after his settlement at Litchfield there was an ordination in a neighboring town. When the members of the Consociation met at the house of the new pastor they found an ample side-board set out with decanters and bottles, filled with all the liquors then in vogue, with water and sugar for those who wished to take their tippie mixed. The reverend gentlemen took a drink all round, as soon as they came in; another when they were ready to set out for the meeting-house; and another when the services were over. Then there were drinks at dinner to help digestion, and private "nips" through the afternoon and evening, as each man felt inclined. They must have had well-seasoned heads, since, notwithstanding this steady imbibition, "none of the Consociation were drunk; but," adds Beecher, "that there was not, at times, a considerable amount of exhilaration, I can not affirm. The side-board, with the spillings of water and sugar and liquor, looked and smelled like the bar of a very active grog-shop. When they had done drinking, and had taken pipes and tobacco, in less than fifteen minutes there was such a smoke that you couldn't see. And the noise I can not describe. It was the maximum of hilarity. They told their stories and were at the height of their jocosose talk." The Consociation, if not "drunk," was clearly "fuddled." The Society paid for the treat, and grumbled a little at the amount of liquor consumed. Almost on the heels of this affair came an ordination in another village, and the same Consociation enacted a similar scene, and the Society murmured still more loudly at the cost and scandal. "These two meetings," says Beecher, "were near together, and in both my alarm, shame, and indignation were intense. It was that which woke me up for the war; and I silently took an oath before God that I would never attend another ordination of that kind." Others were alarmed too. The General Association appointed a committee to consider the matter. Beecher was chairman, and drew up a stirring report, "the most important paper," he says, "that I ever wrote." Out of this grew the "Massachusetts Temperance Society," formed in 1813. This report was followed in time by the famous "Six Sermons on Intemperance," which, when published, wrought an effect greater for a time than any other discourses that have proceeded from the American pulpit.

Very pleasant are the chapters in which the daughters of Lyman Beecher, after an interval of almost half a century, narrate their reminiscences of life in Litchfield. This was divided into two great periods, the line between them marked by a great sorrow. Six years after its commencement the beloved Roxana died. No wife could have been more tenderly loved, truly honored, and deeply mourned. Strong man as he was, Beecher had come to look upon her as the better and stronger portion of himself; and his first sensation after her death was that of "a sort of terror, like that of a child suddenly shut out alone in the dark." For a whole year after it seemed to him that there was not motive enough in the world to move him. Years after he showed to one of his sons a large basket filled with manuscripts. "There," he said, "are the sermons I wrote the year after your mother died, and there is not one of them good for any thing." Yet at the close of that year, almost to a day, he married a second wife. This wife, Harriet Porter, was a worthy successor to Roxana Foote, to whose eight children she was as loving a mother as to those borne by herself. This union lasted almost twenty years. In less than a year after its dissolution he married a third wife. "I thought," he had said long before, "that it would be my duty to live in the family state."

The chapter in which Harriet Beecher Stowe describes her "Early Remembrances" of life at Litchfield reads like an idyl. We see the father taking his boys on hunting and fishing excursions; coming back at night loaded with the spoils of the trout-brook, which nobody but himself could fry as fish should be fried; of nutting expeditions, where the father climbed higher into the trees than any of his boys dared venture; of the early spring days when the great logs of the wood-pile were to be cut, split, and wheeled off in order that the spot might be turned into a cucumber patch, so that Dr. Beecher of Litchfield might raise as early esculents as Dr. Taylor of New Haven, who had warmer and dryer land; and how all the children, boys and girls, even down to little Harriet, were worked up into a fever of wood-carrying emulation by the father's well-timed declaration that he "wished Harriet was a boy, she would do more work than any of them." Then of the jovial apple season, when, to keep the apple-peelers at top of speed, father and children would emulate each other in trying to see who could tell the most stories out of Scott's novels—for those were the days when "Ivanhoe" and the "Tales of my Landlord" opened a new era in the world of fiction.

Still there was one cloud, small at first, but expanding from year to year, always lowering over this pleasant Litchfield home. It was the old East Hampton trouble: expenses were too great for income. The purchase of the old house had required all of the new pastor's means. The addition built to it was to have been paid for by money left to Roxana from her father's estate. This had been left in the hands of her brother, then a thriving merchant in New York. He failed; the money was lost, and the cost of the building, far greater than had been anticipated, became a debt. The experiment of keeping boarders—pleasant enough viewed from the children's stand-point, who only saw the bright dresses and blooming faces of the girls—looked otherwise to the parents. It did not pay. The pastor found himself in debt, and regularly behindhand. His people raised $3000 to pay off the debt, securing the sum, most likely, upon his property, and making him a present of two year's salary. Affairs went on for a while smoothly. But in time new children came, and the elder ones were to be educated. Sick-ness happened; expenses increased; debts accumulated again, slowly but surely. So in 1826, after sixteen years' labor at Litchfield, Beecher found that he was running behindhand at the rate of $200 a year. The great Mr. Micawber had not then enunciated the famous formula that "if a man had twenty pounds a year for his income, and spent nineteen pounds nineteen shillings and sixpence he would be happy; but that if he spent twenty pounds one he would be miserable." But Beecher reached the same point. "For several days and nights," he said, "I endured what I shall not attempt to describe, only by saying that a few days more of such suspense and agitation must have prostrated me entirely." The matter fairly before him, he met the case honestly. The condition of his congregation was not such as to lead him to expect that they could furnish him the money that he must have. "I will, therefore," he said, "ask for a dismissal, sell my property, pay my debts, and cast myself upon the protection and guidance of Heaven."

Twelve hours after coming to this decision he received a formal letter asking him to become the pastor of the Hanover Church in Boston. The call was accepted, and Beecher took up his abode in the New England capital. The six years during which his ministry in Boston lasted were the most brilliant of his life. He had just closed his first half century. In spite of the climate, which demanded the most watchful care in dress to meet its daily changes, he took a new lease of strength. He was more vigorous in body and mind than ever before. The sphere of his action was wide enough to call for the exercise of all his powers. The old burden of insufficient means was lifted from his shoulders. His children, whose spiritual condition had caused him constant uneasiness, had been one after another converted. One son had already entered the ministry, others were preparing to enter. No wonder that he preached and prayed and wrote, as he had never before wrote and prayed and preached. He was sustained and upheld by the fervent admiration of his church, and of the great body of his clerical associates. It was mainly by his efforts that the great Unitarian wave was turned which had threatened to sweep the old Puritan faith from New England. Beecher threw himself into this contest with intense earnestness. He could not have done otherwise. In his view the Unitarian system of doctrine and philosophy was dishonoring to God and ruinous to man. The adherents of this system had crept by stealth into orthodox churches, driven out the rightful owners, and taken wrongful possession. The old foundations established by the Pilgrim Fathers for the perpetuation of their own theology had been perverted to the support of doctrines which they repudiated. Harvard College had been seized; the fund left to maintain an annual sermon on the Trinity was expended to keep up a yearly lecture declaring that there was no Trinity; the Hollis Professorship of Divinity was employed to train up a class of ministers whose ideas were in avowed opposition to the intention of its orthodox founder; the fountain from which pure truth should have flowed was perverted at its very source. So Beecher believed; and he acted in accordance with his conviction. We who look back upon this famous controversy, whatever we may think of its grounds, must find much to condemn in the spirit and manner in which it was conducted. The odium theologicum is proverbially the bitterest of all hatreds. We must admit that Beecher said and wrote many things unwise, harsh, and unjust. He would have been more or less than himself had he not done so. His biographer indeed intimates that, in his violent personal denunciations, he must be understood as only "speaking in a highly figurative sense of the logical demolition of error." But the "written letter remains;" and we can not pronounce this controversy profitable reading. Nor do we think any man now will do well to pore over the controversies—such as those upon "Revivals" and "Taylorism," in which Beecher was engaged with some of his own clerical associates. Let the dead past bury its dead.

Let us endeavor to present a personal picture of the man Lyman Beecher as he appeared during this period of his highest power, when he was beyond all dispute the foremost clergyman of the day—the acknowledged champion and defender of the faith.

No stranger, who should have been present at weekly reunion of the Boston ministers, would at first have recognized the great orthodox leader in the short, square, toothless old man in negligent undress, who seemed the perpetual mark for jokes and sly witticisms, which he always sent back with interest. His absence of mind was proverbial. One pair of spectacles would be very apt to be on the top of his head, another on his nose, while he was fumbling in his pockets for a third. His watch was rarely wound up, and when wound up was never right. If he had occasion to make a memorandum he never had a pencil; he would borrow that of a neighbor, dash off a few hasty notes, and pocket it; the next time he wanted to write he would borrow another pencil, and so on, until those of half the company were stowed away in his pockets. Then some one would ask how many pencils he had; and recalled to recollection, he would begin distributing them among their owners. Yet before long the stranger would discover that this little absent-minded, genial man was not merely the favorite, but the master-spirit of the assembly.

The most famous of his daughters shall furnish us with a sketch of a single imaginary day in this Boston life. He was a sound sleeper, and it was the special duty of the reigning "baby" of the household to waken him in the morning. She had been instructed that to do this she must take him by the nose, kiss him a great many times before the heaviness of his head would go off so that he could lift it. Fairly awakened, there was a difficulty in the way of rising. He was afraid there was "a great lion under the bed," who would surely catch him by the foot. Little curly-head must solemnly promise that she would not let him be eaten up if he rose. All this took so long that the breakfast bell would have rung before he was in condition to be led into the room by his little monitor. It is a week day, but he is to preach in the evening. He has made no special preparations—for this is to be a discourse mainly extempore. All day long he is accessible to every body, talking with any one who would talk. Now and then he rushes out to the yard, where he has a gymnastic apparatus, swings on a pole or climbs a ladder hand-over-hand. Perhaps he takes a turn with his wood-saw; or if the wood is all cut, he has a load of sand in the cellar, which he shovels from side to side by way of exercise. An hour or two before service time he rushes up to his study, flings off his coat, takes a few swings with the dumb-bells, sits down, and begins dashing off notes on bits of paper about as big as the palm of his hand. The church-bells begin to ring, but he still writes; they begin to toll; messengers are sent to hurry him; and at last he rushes down stairs like a hurricane, papers in hand, with cravat and coat collar all awry, demanding a pin to fasten his loose notes together. Wife and daughters lay violent hands upon him, settling his attire as well as possible. The notes are thrust into the crown of his hat; wife or daughter hooked upon his arm; and they are off for church at breathless speed. He elbows his way through the crowd, and storms up the pulpit stairs. The preliminary services over, the sermon commences. Hastily prepared as it seems, it is really no hasty production. It begins with a careful statement of the subject, almost as condensed as a series of mathematical axioms. Then follows the scriptural argument; then the answering of objections. The Doctor has warmed to his work. He is conversational, acute, sometimes exciting a smile by quaintness of illustration or phrase. Last of all comes the essential point—the application. The preacher is thoroughly aroused. He warns, pleads, entreats, as though the whole audience were one person whom he must persuade, before he leaves the pulpit, to take some step of mighty import.

Service over, the Doctor goes directly home. He has been wrought up to the highest tension of mind and body, and must let himself "run down" by spending an hour or two in sport and talk with his family. He is lively, sparkling, and jocose, full of anecdote and incident. Probably the old violin which had come down from East Hampton is brought out. The Doctor gets cleverly through with "Auld Lang Syne," "Bonnie Doon," and that fine tune with the questionable title of "Go to the Devil and shake yourself," but is sure to break down in "Money Musk," and the "College Hornpipe." Now and then, when the good mother has gone to bed before him, he is wrought upon by the petitions of the young fry to go through the wonders of the double-shuffle which he used when a lad to dance on the barn-floor at corn-huskings; but these saltatory exhibitions make such ravages with the toes of his stockings that they are not in much favor with the female authorities upon whom falls the labor of the inevitable darnings. These performances were a part of his system of physical regimen. "If I were to go to bed," he said, "at the key at which I leave off preaching, I should toss and tumble all night. I must let off steam gradually, and then I can sleep like a child."

Meantime the Church had begun to comprehend the vast importance of the great valley of the Mississippi. An attempt was made to establish a theological seminary in that region. Sixty acres of land at Walnut Hills, near Cincinnati, had been given, besides a few thousand dollars in cash, toward establishing such an institution, to bear the name of Lane Seminary, in honor of the principal donor. Agents were sent East and South to collect the further funds necessary to erect buildings and endow professorships. They met with scanty success. No man of whom people at the East knew enough to have confidence in him was identified with the scheme. Its friends perceived that they must have at the head of it one of the first clergymen in the nation; and they felt assured that he must be willing to go, and that his people must give him up for that work. Beecher was fixed upon by common consent as the man. Arthur Tappan, a New York merchant, said he would give $20,000—or rather would pay the annual interest upon that sum—if Beecher would go. More money was pledged upon similar conditions. Beecher accepted the call as a mandate from his Divine Master, and, after six years of laborious, successful, and happy work in Boston, bade farewell to his people, and became President and Professor of Theology in Lane Seminary, a place which he continued to fill for eighteen years.

It is not our purpose to present details of Beecher's career at the West. Enough to say, there were untoward influences at work against Lane Seminary from the outset. Two parties had arisen in the Presbyterian Church. The clergymen of the "Old School" distrusted Beecher as a "New School" man. In 1835 the great champion of orthodoxy was arraigned before his Presbytery on charge of heresy. He was acquitted, and the prosecutors appealed to the Synod. In reading the reports of the trial before the Synod one might fancy that he was wading through the proceedings of a political convention, where the cunningest wire-pullers would win the day. Beecher indeed won it, but by the skin of his teeth and by superior dexterity. "I was naturally fitted to be a lawyer," he said of himself. The Synod gave a most Pickwickian decision. The appeal of Dr. Wilson, the prosecutor, was sustained; he had done nothing wrong in charging Dr. Beecher with slander and hypocrisy besides unsoundness in the faith; but there was nothing to show that Dr. Beecher was unsound, or even a hypocrite or slanderer; he was admonished to be very guarded in future; and as, moreover, he had promised to abide by the decision of the Synod, that body were very well satisfied, and saw nothing to impair their confidence in him "as a minister of the gospel in the Presbyterian Church," and desired him to publish a pamphlet setting forth what he believed on the subjects of Total Depravity, Original Sin, Natural and Moral Ability, etc. The decision was about equivalent to saying: "Both parties are wholly guiltless, Dr. Beecher most so, but he must not do so again." Wilson appealed to the General Assembly of 1836, but when the time of trial came withdrew his appeal, because he found that his friends would not sustain him. Beecher now had his prosecutor fairly on the hip, for, by the Book of Discipline, one who prosecuted a minister, and failed to prove his charge, was to be himself censured as a "slanderer of the Gospel ministry." Beecher noted the point; but after enjoying the consternation of the other side for a few minutes, said that he would not press it, and let the matter drop.

Meanwhile came in the anti-slavery imbroglio of 1834. The point was this: The students wished to discuss the question of slavery. It was vacation, and the Faculty were not on the ground. The Executive Committee forbade the discussion. The students seceded in a body; and Lane Seminary was left with more Professors than Students. For four years there were only five students to a class. Once, when term was about to open, not a single student had offered himself for the next class. Beecher went off on a recruiting expedition through the Western colleges. He came back with a dozen recruits. Next year a new class of thirty-five was formed. Lane Seminary had got over its "dry time."

Of the great quarrel of these years, resulting in the disruption of the Presbyterian Church, we will not speak at length. The world has come to a decision respecting it which will not be reversed. Most of the members of both schools acted honestly; they followed their leaders as a flock of sheep follows the bell-wether. Some of the leaders on both sides were honest and earnest, believing that they were contending for the "faith once delivered to the saints." But on the part of the chief moving spirits it was a mere struggle for power and place, as destitute of piety as the struggles of political cliques are of patriotism. Beecher strove earnestly to avoid disunion. Barring some warmth of expression, we find nothing to blame in his course.

So, for almost a score of years, Beecher fought out the battle at Lane, under many discouragements, among which not the least was the old trouble of want of funds. Tappan, whose subscription was to pay his salary, had failed, and the promised interest on his endowment was not forthcoming. The President and Theological Professor was more than once "hard up;" but somehow, at the pinch, money turned up, often from quite unexpected sources. However, he had all the while a pleasant home in a modest brick house, one of the Seminary buildings, standing in a grove of beeches, oaks, elms, and tulips spared from the primeval forest.

Here and there, in the closing volume, intermingled with notices of ecclesiastical quarrels, of troubles, cares, labors, and bereavements, we get glimpses of home-life at Walnut Hills. The house is full. Several of his own children, and of his third wife, are the regular inmates. The grove is the favorite resort of the young people of his congregation; for besides his Professorship in the Seminary, he is pastor of a church in Cincinnati. His study, now on the ground-floor, is the place where he receives students and friends. He is as odd in looks and habits as ever. His spectacles are, however, a less annoyance than of old; he has got a pair composed of a plain and a convex half, through which he can see at different distances. In "pigeon time" he has a loaded gun in one corner, and his youngest son is posted at the window to watch for the appearance of a flock. The signal is given; the Doctor leaps up from his writing; adjusts his spectacles to the long range, springs to the grove, takes a shot; readjusts his spectacles to short range, and goes on with his writing. We have space for but one more home scene. Thirteen children have been born to him; eleven are living, all past childhood, but widely scattered. Five were at home, the others at various places East and West. They had never been all together; some of them had never seen some of the others. A family meeting was at last arranged, and one Sunday morning in 1835 the whole living family met for the first time under the father's roof, with smiles and tears, thanksgiving and sorrowing. One son filled the father's pulpit in the morning, another in the evening; the family occupied three pews. The family meeting lasted two whole days. On the morning of the third, after prayer, a farewell hymn, and a solemn blessing from the patriarch, they parted, never again to meet on earth.

No years of Beecher's life were more earnest and active than the first fifteen of those at Lane Seminary. "Never," says his son-in-law, "did he wheel a greater number of heavenly wheelbarrows at one and the same time." Had he husbanded his energies, and turned them in a single channel, his mental force might have lasted far beyond the term of threescore years and ten. But this was not to be. Circumstances, and his own strong will and sense of duty, spurred him on to work to the utmost limit of physical and moral endurance. The end of endurance came. In 1850, when he had just reached his seventy-fifth year, he resigned his professorship, hoping that he might be able to revise some of his writings, which, he said, "without my revision must be useless, and which, I think, may be useful to the Church of God."

This purpose was only partially accomplished. Beecher returned to Boston in 1851. During the two following years he issued three volumes of his "Works," and tried to begin his "Memoirs." It was too late. The spring of his strong life was weakened. He could not say what he wished to tell. The most that he could do was to aid his children in the preparation of the work. For a few years he preached occasionally, and with some traces of his old power, and not wholly without his old success. Still it was clear to others, and most likely to himself, that he was failing, not rapidly, but slowly and surely. Memory went first; then the power of expression passed away. Yet there seemed to be an augmentation of bodily vigor. "The day he was eighty-one" [October 12, 1856], writes Professor Stowe, his son-in-law, "he was with me in Andover, and wished to attend my lecture in the Seminary. He was not quite ready when the bell rang, and I walked on in the usual path without him. Presently he came skipping across lots, laid his hand on the five-barred fence, which he cleared at a bound, and was in the lecture-room before me." Not quite a year after, the last letter which he ever wrote was penned. When he left Lane his salary was in arrears nearly $4000. Now after seven years came a draft for $1000, in part payment. He endeavored to reply to the letter which accompanied the draft. After six distinct efforts he wrote a letter which clearly shows the effort of his mind to break the cloud that was steadily gathering over it. There are flashes of his old strong diction, remembrances of the hymns which he had so often read, and glimpses of half-forgotten reminiscences of his early prime. Thus runs his last letter:

"DEAR FRIEND,—There are moments of hope and fear, and apprehension and relief, that may fill the soul. We knew that you would be pressed to advance the successive portions of our needed income, and of course our hopes left us in not a little doubt. But when increasing earthquakes swept over you in ceaseless continuousness, our hearts died within us, or waked only to hear that all was lost. When, therefore, on yesterday morning, on our first arrival home, your opened letter told me that all was well, with all the testimonials, it required time and an effort for our astonishment to get up, and to wake up our realizations, and to clothe our thoughts with wonder, gratitude, and praise. As soon as tears and emotion would permit, we bowed to God together, and, as the pious Montauk woman said to her benefactor, 'I think, Colonel Gardiner, God inclined you to give us this meat. I thank you also, Colonel Gardiner'—and in our condition, we think God also inclined you to do these things, and we thank you too, brother, for all your care for us."

Friends and children were, however, able and willing to see to it that the brave old veteran of fourscore years should be fully provided for. The Lane arrears were paid up; a house was purchased for him in Brooklyn, close by that of his most famous son; and here, with an annuity sufficient for his wants, he passed the last seven years of his life, ministered to by his children by blood and marriage. Month by month the veil between him and the outward world grew thicker, fold by fold. The connection between him and the world grew weaker and weaker. Memory was gone, language was gone—or seemed to be so. Yet now and then were strange flashes which seemed to say that the strong mind was curtained, not blinded. "Dr. Beecher," said some one to him, "you know a great deal: tell us what is the greatest of all things." For a moment the curtain seemed to be rent, and he replied, with his old vigor, terseness, and earnestness: "It is not theology, it is not controversy; but it is to save souls." Then the curtain fell again, and he was lost to human sight behind its folds. For the last year of his life all the organs of communication between him and the world without appeared to fail, except that indistinct phrases seemed to indicate that the mental life existed. Still his eye was bright, and his face bore an expression of strength and sweetness. Yet even to the very close there were moments when the veil was for a moment parted. Once he broke out in the magnificent words of the great Apostle: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me at that day;" adding, "that is my testimony; write it down; that is my testimony." Again, still later, he called to his daughter, thinking her to be his beloved Roxana, the wife of his youth: "Mother, mother, come and sit beside me; I have had a vision of heaven!" His utterance was as full and strong as in his best days. He went on: "I think I have begun to go: Oh, such scenes as I have been permitted to behold! I have seen the King of Glory himself."—"Did you see Jesus?" asked his daughter at length. "All was swallowed up in God himself," was the answer. For an hour he remained talking and praying. The next day he had to human perception only an indistinct remembrance of some great joy. What there was to himself, behind the closed veil, no man can know. The wisest and most thoughtful of men have believed that the soul which rises with us comes into this earthly life from God, who is its home, bearing with it dim remembrances of the glories of its former state. Upon stronger evidence we may believe that to the human being who has worthily passed almost through the probation of this mortal life is sometimes vouchsafed a glance across that immortal sea over which he must soon voyage, and a glimpse of the glories of his eternal home. If such grace be ever granted to man, we may almost trust that it was vouchsafed to Lyman Beecher at the close of his earthly life. But of this it is only given to us to know that the last indication of mortal life was a mute response to his wife, showing that he understood the hymn which she was repeating:

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly."

Then, with a face illuminated with a solemn and divine radiance, softly and tenderly, without even a sigh, he passed to the everlasting rest. He died on the 10th of January, 1863. He had just entered upon his eighty-eighth year. They buried him with tears of joy and songs of praise.

VI.—THE CHANGE OF BASE.

The Necessity of a Movement from the Chickahominy to the James.—Difficulties to be Surmounted.—Conflict at Beacon Dam.—Battle of Gaines's Mill.—Thrilling Incident.—Sufferings of the Rebels.—Charge of the Fifth Cavalry.—Testimony of Colonel Estvan.—Heroic Fighting.—Valor of the Rear-Guard of the Army of the Potomac.—Flight from the Hospital.—The Train on Fire.—Touching Scenes.—Serenity of General McClellan.

EARLY in June, 1862, the patriot army, under General George B. McClellan, having slowly followed the retreating rebels from Yorktown, encamped in the midst of the miasmatic swamps of the Chickahominy. The hospitals were filled with the sick, the wounded, and the dying. The patriot army, in its encampment, presented to the enemy a front of about twenty miles in length. The extreme left rested upon an almost impassable morass, called White Oak Swamp. The right wing was stationed upon some slight eminences on each side of the Chickahominy. Strong divisions were posted at some distance from the right wing, to guard against surprise. The left wing, protected by the swamp, was within five miles of the James River.

All the troops were sheltered by intrenchments. Eight divisions of the army were on the Richmond side of the Chickahominy. Two divisions, under General Fitz John Porter, with the regulars, under General Sykes, were posted on the left banks of the Chickahominy. Notwithstanding the vast amount of sickness, it was reported that one hundred and fifteen thousand could in an hour be marshaled in battle-array.

But it was speedily seen, even by eyes not practiced in military affairs, that the patriot army was in an extremely critical position. Never were troops more perfectly entrapped. The enemy were before them in great numbers, and so concentrated that they could direct their whole force, almost at any hour, upon any portion of our widely-extended lines. Should we withdraw the two divisions and the regulars from the left banks of the Chickahominy the rebels could, with a rush, destroy our only line of communication, and seize upon our immense supply of stores upon the Pamunky. Should we, on the other hand, send back across the Chickahominy the eight divisions besieging Richmond, it would be the relinquishment of the siege, and there would remain nothing before us but a disgraceful and disastrous retreat to Fortress Monroe, pursued by an exultant enemy. To remain as we were, was to accomplish nothing, and only to expose ourselves to sure destruction. It was manifest that there was no salvation for the army but in effecting a change of base, so that the dépôt of our supplies could be upon the James River. The supplies could then be brought up the river under the protection of our gun-boats; and thus the exposed line of transportation from the Pamunky could be avoided.

This change of base should have been effected immediately upon the destruction of the Merri-mac, when our army, without any difficulty, could have passed over from the York River to the James. Now it could only be accomplished under circumstances of the utmost peril. Still there was delay, while every hour of delay only added to the difficulty and the danger. On Wednesday, the 25th of June, General M'Clellan, who was manifestly oppressed with the most intense anxiety, telegraphed the Secretary of War:

"Several contrabands, just in, give information confirming the supposition that Jackson's advance is at or near Hanover Court House. I am inclined to think that Jackson will attack my right and rear. The rebel force is stated at 200,000, including Jackson and Beauregard. I regret my great inferiority of numbers, but feel that I am in no way responsible for it, as I have not failed to represent repeatedly the necessity of reinforcements; that this was the decisive point, and that all the available means of the Government should be concentrated here. I will do all I can do with the splendid army I have the honor to command, and, if it is destroyed by overwhelming numbers, can at least die with it and share its fate. But if the result of the action which will occur to-morrow, or within a short time, is a disaster, the responsibility can not be thrown on my shoulders. It must rest where it belongs. I feel that there is no use in my again asking for reinforcements."*

To this the President replied:

"Your dispatch of yesterday, suggesting the probability of your being overwhelmed by 200,000 men, and talking of whom the responsibility will belong to, pains me very much. I give you all I can, and act on the presumption that you will do the best you can with what you have; while you continue—ungenerously, I think—to assume that I could give you more if I would. I have omitted, I shall omit, no opportunity to send reinforcements whenever I possibly can."**

The morning of Thursday, the 26th of June, dawned upon the two hostile hosts. Twenty-five days had now passed since the battle of Seven Pines. Three months had elapsed since our troops first landed upon the Peninsula. The two armies had for several weeks been so near together that their pickets were within hailing distance, and often bandied jokes or conversed amicably with each other, exchanging newspapers and other trifles.

On the 25th of June a council of war had been held in the rebel capital. Nearly all the prominent generals of the rebellion were present. The front of General M'Clellan's army extended in a gentle curve along a line, as we have mentioned, more than twenty miles in extent. It was decided by the rebel officers to concentrate nearly their whole force, now greatly augmented, and to fall with the utmost possible impetuosity upon the extreme right wing of the National army, and annihilate it before it could receive any support. The victorious rebels would then, with a rush and a yell, fall upon the centre, and then upon the left wing, and thus, by piecemeal, utterly destroy the army. It was a well laid plan. Its execution seemed so feasible and simple that the rebels entertained no doubt whatever of its entire success. Unprofessional men all over the country had long anticipated this precise movement. It was a peril obvious to any ordinary common sense.

General M'Clellan was now so conscious of the exposed position of the army that, abandoning all offensive movements, he assumed a defensive attitude; and at this disastrously late hour, when the exultant rebels were just about to dash upon him, resolved to attempt a movement to the James River. The execution of this plan was exceedingly perilous in the presence of a vigilant and powerful foe; but there was no other salvation for the army. In preparation for this movement, there was a curious reconnoissance made by General M'Clellan and several officers of his staff. They climbed a very high tree within a hundred yards of the rebel pickets, and with spy-glasses surveyed the whole ground, and held a council of war. It was necessary to move the stores and baggage, much of it for a distance of thirty miles, mainly by a single road, exposed all the way to the enemy, who by several different roads, radiating from Richmond, could throw a heavy force upon any one point, or upon several points at the same time.

On the whole of Thursday, June 26, the woods resounded with cannon and musketry, as evolutions were going on upon both sides—the rebels preparing to make an attack, the patriots preparing for retreat. But in all the conflicts of that eventful day the patriot troops, led by Porter, Kearney, and Hooker—men who ever rushed where danger was thickest—won signal success. General Fitz John Porter had withdrawn his forces from Mechanicsville and Meadow Bridge, and had concentrated them upon a diminutive stream called Beaver Dam Creek. General M'Call's division was at Mechanicsville; General Stoneman's division was stationed twelve miles northwest, at Hanover Court House. The rebels had constructed several bridges across the Chickahominy, above Mechanicsville, and commenced crossing the stream in great force. About forty thousand passed over on Thursday, the 26th; twenty thousand the next day; and by noon of Saturday, the 28th, full seventy thousand rebels were on the left banks of the Chickahominy.* Jackson, Longstreet, A. P. Hill, and G. W. Smith led this strong array. From an eminence in the vicinity of Mechanicsville these dense columns could be seen as they crossed by the various bridges they had reared. It was one of the most sultry of summer days. Not a leaf moved in the breathless wind.

The whole rebel force was under the command of General Robert E. Lee, who had succeeded Johnston. In the afternoon of Thursday, the 26th, the first of the famous seven days' battles commenced. General Hill threw himself, with the impetuosity of assured success, upon the patriot troops under General M'Call, who held the advance of General Porter at Mechanicsville, upon the left banks of the Chickahominy. The conflict was very severe. But General M'Call had posted himself on the banks of a ravine called Beaver Dam. Here he had made an abatis and thrown up some light intrenchments, and the outnumbering enemy, notwithstanding the most desperate efforts, was unable to dislodge him. The battle raged with great fury till half past nine at night. The attacking rebels were about 60,000. The patriots numbered but 35,000. Thus terminated the first day's fight, with a decided repulse to the rebels. The exhausted soldiers, friend and foe, slept upon their arms. The most distinguished honor is due the patriot soldiers, who thus successfully repelled their greatly outnumbering assailants in this hard-fought battle of Mechanicsville.

All the night both parties were busy in collecting the wounded, and burying the dead. Each army was watchful to guard against a night attack. General M'Call and his staff bivouacked sleeplessly in the open air. During the night the whole of General Porter's baggage was sent across the Chickahominy in preparation for the retreat, and united with the immense train which was to struggle along, mainly by a single road, assailed at every point, to the banks of the James River. At the same time orders were given to evacuate White House, to destroy all the immense stores there which could not be removed, and also to burn all the magazines along the railway between the Pamunky and the Chickahominy. General Stoneman, with his flying artillery, was charged with the execution of this order.

A little after midnight, on Friday morning, General M'Call was ordered to fall back on the bridges which had been thrown across the Chickahominy about a mile in his rear. Here he was to make another desperate stand with the troops of Generals Porter, Morrell, and Sykes, and beat back the foe, while the main body of the army attempted the humiliating movement to which it was doomed. The soldiers now awoke for the first time to the consciousness that the siege of Richmond was abandoned, that the whole army was on the retreat, and that the divisions under General Porter were merely operating as a rear-guard, to beat back the exultant onrushing rebels.

At three o'clock in the morning the patriot troops, under General M'Call, commenced slowly retiring. The rebels were on the alert, and immediately pressed forward in pursuit, yet very cautiously, lest they should be drawn into a snare. With great precision and firmness the patriots, crowded by their assailants, fell back, not a man proving recreant to duty. General Porter formed them in line, with the other troops composing the rear-guard, in ranks of battle extending over two miles from the Chickahominy to Coal Harbor. The extreme left was held by General Meade.

Then followed success-ively Generals Butterfield, Martindale, Griffin, and Sykes. General Reynolds, of the reserve, held the right of the line at Coal Harbor. Generals Cook and Seymour were slightly in the rear to support any portion of the line which might be broken. General Fitz John Porter was in command of the whole corps. He had in all about 30,000 troops. Sixty pieces of cannon were advantageously stationed upon the eminences around. The enemy were advancing with forces now swelled to between sixty and ninety thousand.*

Cautiously, yet resolutely, the rebels advanced in three columns. The second day of the bloody fight, Friday, June 27, was to be ushered in, with its clouds of terror and its flow of blood. One rebel column advanced along the banks of the river. One marched by a parallel path about a mile inland. The third column moved directly upon Coal Harbor. It was not until near noon that the battle, in all its fury, commenced. It has been called the battle of Gaines's Mill, since a mill by that name was near the central point of attack. One hundred and twenty pieces of artillery, on the two sides, opened their tremendous fire. The hills shook with the concussion, and the two armies were soon enveloped in clouds of smoke. Under cover of this fire the rebels made several charges, with a disregard of death never surpassed. But the National troops were well posted; they fought with all the bravery which mortal men could show, and repulsed their overwhelming foes with prodigious slaughter.

During the action, which, as we have mentioned, extended along a line over two miles in length, the Rev. Wm. Dickson, Chaplain of the Twelfth Pennsylvania Reserves, was in a hospital attending to the wounded men. The hospital was in the shelter of a ravine, up which the rebels commenced marching several columns that they might outflank us. Soon the alarm reached the hospital that the rebels were upon them. Mr. Dickson ran up the side of the ravine and saw close at hand, in rapid march, the columns of the foe. At the same moment he heard a shout from a patriot battery in his rear, "Lie down; you are right in our way!" He threw himself upon his face, and there was a thunder roar, and a shell went shrieking over his head. Knowing that the guns were fired in line, and that the line extended along the only route for his retreat, he instantly sprang up, ran a few steps, and again threw himself upon the ground. There was another lightning flash, thunder roar, and shrieking shell, when he was again upon his feet. Thus he ran the perilous gauntlet of two batteries in full play; springing from the ground at every flash as the charge passed over him, and nicely calculating the time when to throw himself upon his face to avoid another discharge. The men working the guns often caught a glimpse of him, and shouted, "Out of the way, or you'll be shot!" He coolly shouted back, "Fire away. I'll take care of myself!" A man must not only have great strength of nerve, but must have been often under fire, to pass thus heroically through such an ordeal as this.

The battle is described by those who witnessed it as one of very peculiar picturesque beauty, if beauty can be ascribed to evolutions leading to such awful carnage. The extended plain was undulating, rising into many gentle swells densely wooded. Numerous batteries were thundering on every side. The polished weapons of over one hundred thousand combatants were gleaming over the hills and through the valleys in the rays of a brilliant June sun. Squadrons of cavalry were sweeping through the dells; columns of infantry, in dense black masses, with their bristling bayonets, were climbing the hills, or, defiling in long lines, were rushing upon the foe in impetuous charges. Flying artillery were moving with almost supernatural velocity from ridge to ridge, bellowing forth their deadly thunders. Thousands of lancers finely mounted, and with their floating pennons, were stationed along the banks of the ravine awaiting the summons to plunge into the maelstrom of death. Many of the reserves were concealed in the hollows or behind the dense foliage of the woods, and as the exigencies of the battle called them forth, they rose from their concealment, and, with loud cheers, rushed to meet the foe. Indeed, at one time it seemed as though the National troops, even against such fearful odds, would surely gain the victory.

General Butterfield signalized himself greatly on this day by his almost superhuman efforts to beat back the foe. His horse was shot under him. A fragment of a shell struck his hat. His sword was indented by a musket ball. Several of his aids fell at his side. Still, reckless of danger and death, he rallied his heroic men to the most desperate resistance, sharing with them every peril.

The fury of the cannonade was such that clouds of dust plowed up by the balls hung smotheringly over the battle-field. Thus hour after hour the desperate struggle was continued. Every man of the National reserves was at length in action. There was not another musket or another gun which General Porter could bring into the field. And now the rebel reserves, nearly twenty thousand strong, fresh and unbroken, are moving up upon our flank and rear. It is an awful moment. Our troops are worn out, their ammunition nearly exhausted, and the multitudinous foe are about to surround them, cutting off all possibility of retreat. There is a little disorder on the left wing. Some regiments break and retreat. The disorder spreads toward the centre. There is no panic, no wild, tumultuous flight. But the intelligent Northern soldiers perceive the hopelessness of continuing the struggle where they are, against such vast inequality of numbers, and they perceive also the folly of allowing themselves to be surrounded. Shouldering their muskets, and disdaining to run, they sullenly retire. The French Princes—the Comte de Paris and the Duc de Chartres—who had nobly drawn their swords to aid us in maintaining that republican liberty which France assisted us in establishing, threw themselves into the thickest of the peril to prevent the retreat from being converted into a rout. The rebels were advancing, assured of perfect victory, and in majestic strength.

"Then," writes the Prince de Joinville, "came the order for the cavalry to charge. I happened at this moment to be near its position. I saw the troopers draw their swords with the sudden and electrical impulse of determination and devotion. As they got into motion I asked a young officer the name of his regiment. 'The Fifth Cavalry,' he replied, brandishing his sabre with a soldier's pride in his regiment. Unfortunate young man! I saw the same regiment the next day. From the charge of that evening but two officers had returned. He was not one of them."

The patriot charge failed, and the broken squadrons, leaving the ground covered with their slain, were driven back in disorder. There were two batteries alone now left to check the onward sweep of this great billow of war. The gunners continued to load and fire with the utmost rapidity at point-blank range, opening immense gaps at every discharge in the rebel lines. But the foe advanced with courage which even the patriot troops were compelled to respect, notwithstanding the infamy of the rebel cause. The Union artillery horses had all been shot down; the guns were surrounded with the wounded and the dead. The surviving gunners, in the fading twilight, abandoned their pieces and fled. All these guns, twenty-two in number, were lost.

About 5 o'clock General M'Clellan had directed General Sumner, whose corps was at Fair Oaks, to send two brigades to the aid of General Porter, then so sorely pressed. French's and Meagher's were instantly put on the march for the battle-field about five miles distant. They moved at the double-quick. General French, in virtue of seniority, commanded. They met the troops of Porter sternly retiring before the foe. Forcing their way through the dense and broken mass, they ascended a hill and deployed in line of battle near Gaines's Mill. Then at the pas de charge, with loud cheers, while a smothering storm of balls and shells were poured upon them, they rushed upon the exultant rebels. Both the rebel infantry and artillery were driven back before them. The reinforcements having gained the crests of the hill made a stand, and the retreating troops rallied in their rear. "A Federal brigade," writes a rebel General, "commanded by Meagher, and consisting chiefly of Irishmen, offered the most heroic resistance. After a severe struggle our men gave way, and retired in great disorder. At this critical moment, foaming at his mouth with rage, and without his hat, General Cobb hastened up sword in hand, with his legion and renewed the attack. But the efforts of these troops were in vain. The brave Irishmen held their ground with a determination which excited the admiration even of our own officers."*

The rebels, like ocean billows, in incessant thundering surges, dashed vainly against the patriots. Eight o'clock came. The gloom of night was now at hand. The rebels had been effectually repulsed at every point along the line except the extreme left. Here the battle was still raging with the utmost desperation. French's and Meagher's brigades had effectually stemmed the rush of the foe, and now with but six thousand men firmly held the front, while the patriot troops, who were utterly exhausted by the long battle, threw themselves upon the ground to rest, a mile in the rear of their heroic guardians. A rebel colonel thus describes the close of this eventful day:

"It is due to our opponents to admit that they sustained the shock of our incessant attacks with undaunted bravery. Although some of their brigades had been fighting from 4 o'clock, A.M., to 8 o'clock, P.M., they had continued to stand firm, and it was only when they found, at the last-named hour, Jackson was about to attack them in the rear, that they abandoned their positions. Although their loss must have been severe, they retired in good order, with drums beating and colors flying, taking their slightly wounded and their baggage along with them. When hotly pressed in pursuit by Davis's and Wickham's cavalry regiments, they faced round and repulsed them."†

It was now night—a night of awful gloom. The second day's battle—the battle of Gaines's Mill—had ended, and silence succeeded the thunders of war which all the day had shaken the hills. Even the darkness could not conceal the harrowing spectacle of death's ravages. The dead lay upon the field in extended windrows. The wounded were to be counted by thousands. Their heart-rending cries and groans were audible on all sides.

"In by-gone days," writes Colonel Estvan, "I had been on many a battle-field in Italy and Hungary; but I confess that I never witnessed so pitiable a picture of human slaughter and horrible suffering."*

It is impossible to ascertain exactly the numbers lost in this severe conflict, owing to the series of battles which followed in such swift succession. During the battle General M'Clellan had his head-quarters at Savage's Station, on the railroad, south of the Chickahominy about five miles from the scene of conflict.† It was known that night that Jackson was in our rear, and, sweeping down the Pamunky, would in a few hours cut us off from our base of supplies at White House. All the night long broken squadrons of troops, dusty and wounded officers, and ambulances, laden with the torn and the dying, were arriving at the station, adding to the gloom and the consternation there. All could see that a fearful disaster had befallen the army, that the troops were on a rapid midnight retreat. And yet none but the leading officers knew any thing of the plans proposed to meet the dire exigency. Groups were collected with anxious faces discussing our probable doom. There seemed to be no hope for the salvation of the army. We were cut off from our supplies. The enemy, exultant, were everywhere. We were in rapid and disordered retreat, in no condition to do any thing but simply to attempt to ward off the blows which were falling thickly and heavily upon us. To add to the appalling prospect, we were encumbered with many thousands of sick and wounded men, whom it would be impossible thus hastily to remove.

* In the examination before the Congressional Committee upon the Conduct of the War, we find the following record:

"On the 27th, the battle of Gaines's Mill was fought, principally by the troops under General Porter. Our forces there engaged were from 27,000 to 30,000; the force of the enemy being from two to three times that number. The enemy were in such superior force that, although our troops fought with exceeding bravery, they were driven back with a loss of about 9000 men in killed, wounded, and missing.

"General M'Clellan was questioned as to the policy of leaving the right wing, consisting of only about 30,000 men to meet the attack of the superior force of the enemy, instead of withdrawing it to the right bank of the Chickahominy, before the battle of Gaines's Mill. His testimony on that point is as follows:

"Question. Whatever might have been the intentions of the enemy, as the attack was to have been made by him, would it not have been better to have placed both wings of our army on the same side of the Chickahominy prior to the battle of Gaines's Mill?

"Answer. I do not think that they ought to have been brought to the same side of the river before they actually were.

"Question. What advantage was gained by leaving the right wing of our army to be attacked by a greatly superior force?

"Answer. It prevented the enemy from getting on our flank and rear, and in my opinion, enabled us to withdraw the army and its material.

"Question. Will you explain what was done by the right wing of our army, at or about the time the left was engaged, which saved our flank from attack, and enabled the army and its material to be withdrawn?

"Answer. By desperate fighting they inflicted so great a loss upon the enemy as to check his movement on the left bank of the river, and gave us time to get our material out of the way."

† The Peninsula Campaign. Rev. J. J. Marks, D.D.

Through all the hours of this dreadful night hurry, confusion, and consternation seemed to reign every where. At Fair Oaks and Savage Station every house and barn and shed were filled with the wounded, and even the open fields were covered with them, as they were continually brought in, in numbers which seemed to have no end.

The night after the battle General M'Clellan telegraphed the Secretary of War that he did not consider himself responsible for the result, as the Government had not furnished him with the reinforcements he had so repeatedly demanded. To this the President replied:

"If you have had a drawn battle, or a repulse, it is the price we pay for the enemy not being in Washington. We protected Washington and the enemy concentrated on you. Had we stripped Washington, he would have been upon us before the troops could have got to you. Save your army at all events. Will send reinforcements as fast as we can. Of course they can not reach you to-day, to-morrow or next day."

It seems that even at this late hour General M'Clellan had not fully decided upon what course to pursue. General Heintzelman testified before the Congressional Committee that the night after the battle he was sent for by General M'Clellan. He found every thing packed ready to leave. General M'Clellan said that there were two things to be done. One was, to concentrate his forces and risk all on a battle. The other was, to withdraw to the James River. He stated at the same time the obvious fact, that should he risk a battle where he then was, and should he be beaten, his army would be utterly destroyed. General Heintzelman urged, that, under such circumstances, a battle should not be risked; that if that army were lost the cause would be lost; and that it were better to retire to the James River, and there wait for reinforcements. General M'Clellan replied, that those views were in accordance with his own, and an energetic retreat was immediately decided upon.

At midnight General Porter communicated to General French the order that his whole division was immediately to cross the Chickahominy on its march to the James River, and that General French was to remain behind to hold the enemy at bay until every man had passed the bridge. General French, with his gallant rear-guard, was then to cross over and destroy the bridges behind him. At the dead hour of night the weary soldiers were roused from their slumbers for a march of twenty miles, while pursued and cannonaded by a triumphant foe. Every one was in immediate motion. The bridges were crowded hour after hour by the vast mass of men, horses, and wagons of the retreating army. By daylight the next morning all had crossed, and the bridges were destroyed. The dead and many of the wounded were left behind. The rebel soldiers wandered over the gory field rifling the pockets of the slain. One rebel boasted that he thus obtained one hundred and fifty dollars in gold. Another collected in bank bills five hundred, and another one thousand dollars. Twenty-two guns, as we have above mentioned, a large number of small-arms, and a considerable amount of clothing were also abandoned in the retreat. The rebels, with their usual exaggeration, claimed the capture of fifteen thousand stand of arms.

The retreat, during Friday night, was pushed with the utmost vigor. The train of five thousand wagons, the ponderous siege guns, a herd of twenty-five thousand cattle, and the long, dense lines of the majestic army, pressed forward to seek the protection of the gun-boats on the James River, in an indescribable scene of haste, tumult, and confusion.

At length the sun of Saturday morning, June 28, rose over this scene of disaster and ruin. Not the report of a gun was to be heard. The rebels were looking for the retreat of our army toward the Pamunky, and not toward the James River. General Stoneman, with his cavalry, was sent to delude them into this belief, which he accomplished admirably. The bridges across the Chickahominy were destroyed, and it required some time for the rebels to rebuild them. Thus twelve hours were obtained for marching toward our new base, almost without molestation. About ten o'clock all communications with White House were cut off, the rebels having obtained possession of the line.

More than two thousand of the sick and wounded, in an awful state of suffering, were at Savage's Station and its immediate vicinity, terror-stricken in view of the prospect of being abandoned to the foe, whose barbaric treatment they dreaded more than death. Their cries for water, for food, for blankets, for the dressing of their wounds were piteous. The number of surgeons was entirely inadequate to the wants of the sufferers. The draft upon the nervous system of the surgeon performing a constant series of capital operations, in the midst of such scenes of misery, is so great that ere long he sinks under prostration which paralyzes every vital power and even endangers life. The most humane man, blest with the strongest nerves, after for a time breathing the poisoned atmosphere of festering wounds, gazing upon the most ghastly sights, and hearing shrieks from the sufferers which pierce the heart, is absolutely compelled to shut his eyes to the misery, and to turn a deaf ear to the most imploring cries for aid.

The scene of misery and death in the rebel camp must even have surpassed that in our own. As the rebels marched up to our intrenchments the slaughter which swept their ranks was awful. The battle was fought within six miles of Richmond. The rebel Colonel Estvan took into the city sixty vehicles containing two hundred of the most severely wounded men. Every hospital was then found crowded, and either from inefficiency or despair no suitable provision could be found for these poor sufferers. At last they were turned into an old shed which had been used for storing tobacco. Colonel Estvan indignantly writes:

"A sad hole it was for such a purpose; an open warehouse, unprovided with doors or windows, and with merely a few planks to serve for beds for the dying soldiers. On this memorable day our brave fellows had to endure every thing—hunger, thirst, and heat, besides facing death in its most fearful forms. And now, wounded at the very threshold of the dwellings of their own friends, whose rights and property they had been fighting for, we beheld them left to die uncared for in an open shed. And yet this city numbered as many as 40,000 inhabitants. It contained, moreover, many churches, admirably adapted for hospitals on such emergencies, and was well provided with clergy. Yet no church door was opened; no minister of religion came forward to soothe the last moments of the dying soldier. With mixed feelings of sadness and indignation I gave the order to place the wounded men inside the wretched building, and having bestowed a parting look on the ill-cared-for sufferers, I mounted my horse and hastened back to rejoin my regiment."

General McClellan kept his purposes unrevealed except to his prominent officers. Thus the great mass of the sub-officers and privates, spread, as we have said, along a line twenty miles in extent, could see all around them the indications of disaster and confusion, yet they knew not what it all meant, and could only guess respecting the movements which were now on foot. At Savage's Station there was a small cluster of houses, all of which were filled with the wounded. There were also pitched there three hundred hospital tents. Each of these tents contained about twenty men. One nurse was assigned to three tents. The tents were arranged in streets. Each surgeon had his ward, which contained about one hundred and fifty patients. The following testimony is rendered to the services of Dr. John Swinburne, of Albany, by Rev. J. J. Marks:

"Of this man I can not speak in terms of too high praise. He was thoughtless of himself, forgetful even of the wants of nature, untiring in his labors, uniting to the highest courage of man the tenderness of a woman and the gentleness of a child. In that terrible hour, when other surgeons were worn-out and exhausted, no labor appeared to diminish his vigor. After days of toil and nights of sleeplessness, he was as fresh and earnest as though he had stepped forth from a night of quiet sleep. And while others became impatient, and had to escape from those scenes to seek repose, he, operating for hours at a time, found relaxation and refreshment in going from tent to tent, counseling the surgeons, advising the nurses, and speaking words of cheer to the wounded and the dying."

To some of the sufferers death was coming every hour. They were immediately wrapped in their blankets, placed upon stretchers, and borne away to a little distance, when they were let down gently into a shallow grave, and their over-coats were spread upon them. If a chaplain could be present a short prayer was offered, and then a few shovelfuls of sand were thrown over them, and dust was left to return to dust. All the day of Saturday the regiments of the right wing of the National army were marching rapidly by Savage's Station, taking the Williamsburg road toward the James River. Frequent scouts were sent out to give warning of any approach of the enemy. The road led through a region of impenetrable swamps and forests, where it would be very easy to entrap an army into ambushes. The negroes, always our fast friends, lent us invaluable aid in these emergencies. They were our only guides. The country had not been explored by our cavalry, and our retreating troops struggled through these entangling mazes led only by the ignorant but faithful contrabands.

The most vigorous preparations had been made at White House to save as much of the property there as possible, by placing it on board transports and floating it down the stream to Fortress Monroe. The contrabands were in great terror lest they should be abandoned to their merciless masters. They were all taken, with their wives and children, in canal boats out into the stream. Every thing which could not be removed was committed to the flames. About seven o'clock Saturday evening the rebels arrived at White House, and found the post deserted, and nothing left but smouldering ruins.

"We had scarcely passed the White House," says Colonel Estvan, "when our attention was attracted by a dense column of smoke, apparently rising from the forest. Approaching cautiously in that direction, we discovered a huge burning pyramid. The Federal general had ordered every thing that could not be taken away to be piled up and burned. Property to the amount of millions of dollars was thus consigned to the flames that it might not fall into the hands of the victors. Our men rushed to the burning pile in order to save all they could from the flames. Hundreds of casks of preserved meats, coffee, sugar, rice, wine, including even Champagne and similar delicacies, with which the Federal army was amply provided, and of which we Southerners scarcely knew the names, were here piled up for destruction. But the enemy had done their work so skillfully that our poor fellows managed to get but little out of the fire. Fortunately, however, the whole place was strewed with serviceable cloth cloaks, which proved most useful to our ill-clad troops."

The route of the retreating army was directly through the heart of White Oak Swamp. Multitudes of wounded men hobbled along in the melancholy train. All the ambulances which could be found were loaded with such sufferers as it was possible to move. A large number who could not be moved were left to the tender mercies of the enemy.

The rebels, not fully comprehending the plans of General M'Clellan, were at this time confident of his capture, and of the destruction of his whole army. He had abandoned his intrenchments on the north side of the Chickahominy. His disordered divisions, in long extended lines, were in all the confusion of a tumultuous retreat. He was cut off from all communication with the base of his supplies at the White House. The Chickahominy, with broken bridges, was in his rear. The rebel generals, Longstreet, Magruder, and Huger, were pressing him fiercely. His escape seemed impossible.

At 10 o'clock Saturday night the last of the Union troops left Woodbury Bridge. A single company of cavalry had been left to guard the passage. As night came on, that they might deceive the rebels, they lighted camp-fires as for a vast army. The fires of the rebels gleamed brilliantly on the opposite banks. The scene presented was solemnly sublime. The night was dark, and gathering clouds threatened a tempest. The exhausted soldiers could not stop for rest. All the night long onward they dragged their weary limbs.

It was about six miles from Savage's Station to White Oak Swamp bridge. This whole distance was jammed full of wagons, horses, cannon, ambulances, pontoon-boats, and all the indescribable materiel of a great army. There were frequent halts when the current became clogged. The scene of confusion which then ensued beggars description. Twenty wagons would often be side by side. The efforts of the officers to push the line along, the shouting of the teamsters, the struggling of the horses, the occasional break-downs, presented a picture of tumult which Babel could hardly have surpassed. During the whole of the day there was but little fighting, as our movements were concealed from the knowledge of the enemy. Colonel B. S. Alexander was sent to the James River to order the gun-boats to be in position to protect the soldiers upon their arrival—to obtain guides for the different columns of the army, and to have supplies in readiness for the troops. He testifies that, while at head-quarters receiving his instructions, he was shown a printed order from General M'Clellan, then not issued, directing the destruction of the baggage of officers and men, and the tents, camps, equipage, and all things of that kind, appealing to the army to submit to this privation, as it would be only for a few days. He remonstrated with General M'Clellan against this extraordinary measure, assuring him that it would have so depressing an effect as seriously to demoralize the army, convincing the soldiers that they were retreating in hopeless defeat to save their lives. The order was not issued, and it is due to General M'Clellan to state that he testifies, before the same committee, that he had no recollection of having given such an order.*

The sun of the Sabbath morning, June 29, rose over this scene of tumult and consternation. It ushered in one of the most glaring and sultry of summer days. The heat was all but insupportable. One hour after midnight General M'Clellan, with his staff and escort, left Savage's Station, and, advancing five or six miles, established his head-quarters at White Oak Swamp. General Smith was intrusted with the post of honor—the charge of the rear. He was to beat the pursuing enemy back until the wagons were at a safe distance, and was then slowly to follow them. As the apparently interminable train, through the hours of the night, filed painfully along, Generals Sumner, Heintzelman, and Keys gradually brought their forces into position to repel the foe rushing upon them from Richmond and from the Chickahominy.

Early in the morning the whole army, with all its vast artillery and baggage trains, were on the move. Soon the enemy discovered the line of the retreat and commenced a vigorous pursuit. The patriot army took the road directly through White Oak Swamp toward Charles City. On this march General Heintzelman protected the rear. The rebels made several attempts to flank him; but he baffled all their efforts, repelled all their assaults, and throughout the day the pursuit was conducted by this thorough soldier with great ability and success. Our troops had not reached more than a mile and a half beyond Savage's Station when the pursuers commenced a furious assault. We slowly retired, beating back the advancing foe by an incessant storm of shot and shell from our artillery, which made a stand at every commanding point, and pierced the dense columns of the rebels with terrible destruction. There was not a breath of air. The sun poured down fiercely upon the unsheltered heads of the troops. There was an incessant rattle of musketry and roar of artillery. As we were slowly driven along we were compelled to leave our dead and many of the severely wounded behind us. The hurry was so great and the heat so intolerable, that the troops threw away their knapsacks and their outer garments, but desperately clenched their weapons, which they would surrender only with their lives.

Many from the effect of sun-stroke dropped by the way-side, foaming at the mouth and raving in delirium. During most of this time round shot and shells from the enemy's artillery were dropping in the midst of our ranks. Occasionally, as our rear-guard made a stand, a fierce battle ensued, with the most desperate charges of infantry and cavalry. Meagher's Irish Brigade rendered itself very conspicuous by the gallantry with which it rushed, with cheers which made the welkin ring, upon the swarming rebels. The Fifteenth Massachusetts also performed deeds of chivalric valor never surpassed. But it seems invidious to single out for special mention individual regiments or brigades where all ennobled themselves.

Gathering clouds in that rainy land brought the day to an early close, and a stormy night set in. The assailants had been effectually repulsed on every charge they had made, and the loud cheers of our troops announced the patriot victory; for it was indeed a victory for the rear-guard alone, of the retreating army, to beat back all the mighty hosts of rebellion which had emerged from Richmond in the pursuit. Still the National troops were ordered to press on as rapidly as possible through the darkness and the rain, and the pools of the swamp. They were compelled to leave their wounded comrades, groaning and dying on the little hillocks, to the mercilessness of the barbaric rebels.

On, on pressed the rear-guard through the Egyptian darkness of the tempest-riven night—the forest illumined by incessant flashes of lightning, and the heaviest peals of thunder breaking over their heads. All arms of the service were mixed and crowded together in the narrow road, while still a degree of order was preserved far better than could have been supposed possible. Columns of infantry, gun-carriages, squadrons of cavalry, were all commingled, while the gleaming lightning flashed along the bayonets and bright bands of the muskets, in strong contrast with the dark mass surging onward like a swollen stream.

The entire capacity of the road was filled with the moving multitude, as were also the fields beside the road wherever the ground was sufficiently firm. The whole line of the retreat was marked by abandoned baggage wagons, broken-down caissons, and all the debris of a routed army. It was observed that the men spoke in low tones of voice. All loud noises were avoided as the rear-guard pressed on, hoping to get through the swamp before the dawn of morning. One of the officers on this dreadful retreats says:

"My breakfast was nothing. My dinner at four o'clock was a raw egg and a biscuit. My supper consisted of two hard crackers. My drink was the stagnant, muddy water of the swamp, scooped up with my hand."

There is a little stream called White Oak Creek, which passes through the heart of the swamp. The bridge was destroyed as soon as the troops had crossed it. Now and then, all along the lines, soldiers, utterly exhausted, would throw themselves down for a few moments' sleep, and then, terrified lest they should fall into the hands of the enemy, would spring up, and, not more than half awake, toil painfully on.

In the earliest dawn of the morning of this day, as the army torrent was surging forward in its choked and narrow channel, few knew why or where, the Rev. J. J. Marks, the devoted, heroic chaplain of the Sixty-third Pennsylvania Regiment, rode to Savage's Station to see what could be done toward removing the thousands of sick and wounded men collected at that place. At General Heintzelman's tent he found the officers met in council, and orderlies, surgeons, commissaries, and colonels hurrying backward and forward in the wildest haste. The air was full of rumors of peril and disaster. General Heintzelman, with the calmness of one accustomed to danger, was issuing his commands; and after listening to Dr. Marks's appeal in behalf of the wounded, said that nothing could be done to save them; that all the wounded must be left at Savage's Station to meet such doom as the rebels might award to them. General M'Clellan had ordered all the ambulances to depart empty. He deemed that five thousand wounded men in the train of the army would so retard and embarrass its movements as to render escape impossible. It was therefore deemed a stern necessity to leave the wounded in the hands of the rebels. It is sadly to be deplored that the sick could not have been all removed a few days before the retreat commenced. Nobly Dr. Marks, and his friend Mr. Brunot, resolved to remain with the sufferers to minister to their wants and to share their fate. A colonel rode into the hospital grounds and said, as he withdrew the pickets, that within half an hour the rebels would be there. Every patient who could leave his cot now endeavored to escape.

"I beheld," says Dr. Marks, "a long scattering line of the patients staggering away, some carrying their guns and supporting a companion on an arm, others tottering feebly over a staff, which they appeared to have scarcely strength to lift up. One was borne on the shoulders of two of his companions, in the hope that when he had gone a little distance he might be able to walk. One had already sat down, fainting from the exertion of a few steps. Some had risen from the first rest, staggered forward a few steps and fell in the road; but after a few moments in the open air, and stimulated by the fear of the enemy, they could walk more strongly. Never have I beheld a spectacle more touching and more sad."*

An immense amount of provisions, which had been accumulated for the army, was here destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy. Hundreds of barrels of flour, rice, sugar, molasses, salt, and bread were piled up in immense pyramids and consigned to the flames. It was not easy to dispose suddenly of the ammunition, consisting of hundreds of barrels of powder and tons of shells. The following expedient was adopted. The whole mass of powder and shells was piled up in a long train of cars. The engine, under full pressure of steam, was attached. There was a descending grade of about two and a half miles from the station to the Chickahominy, where the railroad bridge had been destroyed. The torch was applied to the combustibles placed in the cars and the train put in motion. The currents of air fanned the flames, and in billows of fire they wreathed around the long serpentine train, whose wheels revolved every moment with more frightful velocity. As multitudes stood upon the hills watching the rushing meteor it seemed as though a serpent of fire, lashed with demoniac tortures, had escaped from the pit and was rushing it knew not where. Suddenly there was a tremendous crash. Tons of powder and hundreds of shells were exploding. An eye-witness writes:

"Bomb after bomb sprang from the fiery mass, hissing and screaming like fiends in agony, and coursing in every direction through the forests and the clear heavens. Rarely has there been a spectacle of greater wonder and grandeur. Such was the momentum of this train that when it reached the chasm it sprang out fully forty feet; and the engine and first car leaped over the first pier in the stream, and there they hang suspended, one of the most impressive monuments of the Peninsular disasters."

It was not until three o'clock in the afternoon that General Heintzelman and his staff left the station. A very affecting scene was now witnessed as the troops bade adieu to their sick and wounded friends, whom they were compelled to leave behind—to abandon as prisoners to the rebels.

"Fathers had to drag themselves away from the couches of their sons; and after they had gone a few steps would return to look once more. Up to this time the disabled had not known that they were to be left behind; and when it became manifest, the scene could not be pictured by human language. I heard one man crying out, 'O my God! is this the reward I deserve for all the sacrifices I have made, the battles I have fought, and the agony I have endured from my wounds?' Some of the younger soldiers wept like children; others turned pale and some fainted. Poor fellows! they thought this was the last drop in the cup of bitterness, but there were many yet to be added."

There is a large open plain of several hundred acres opposite Savage's Station. Along this plain the Williamsburg Road passes, by which our troops were mainly to effect their retreat. Beyond the plain is a dark pine forest. It was here on the edge of this forest that General Sumner was stationed with 20,000 men, who were to hold in check the enemy until our troops had escaped beyond White Oak Swamp. Here this heroic band for hours awaited the approach of the trebly outnumbering foe, while regiments and divisions and trains of wagons filed by them. The fate of the army was in their hands, and they proved worthy of the trust.

About five o'clock in the afternoon an immense cloud of dust announced the approach of the enemy. As they drew nearer, from their whole mass of artillery in front they opened a terrific fire. The national guns responded. For an hour not a musket was discharged, but the reverberating thunder of the cannon shook the hills. Then the whole majestic mass of the rebels, with their peculiar yell, not cheer, which their savage allies had apparently taught them, sprang forward upon the open plain, presenting a crested billow of glittering bayonets which it would seem that no mortal power could stem. Every musket in the Union line was brought into deliberate aim. Not a man wavered. For a moment there was a pause until it was certain that every bullet would fulfill its mission, and then there was a flash, followed by a storm of lead, which covered the ground with the dead and the dying. At the same moment, the cheer of the patriot responded to the yell of the rebel. I can not refrain from again quoting from the graphic pen of an eye-witness:

“Beaten back by this leaden storm the enemy wavered and retreated a few steps to the railroad. But soon after troops coming up behind them pressed the front line once more into the field. Again there leaped from ten thousand guns the fiery blast, and yell answered yell. For a moment there would be a pause, a lull in the battle, to be succeeded by the instantaneous discharge of five thousand guns; and then, as if the contending hosts had been stung to frenzy, the rage of the contest was redoubled. The clash of arms was occasionally interrupted by the coming into the field of fresh regiments, cheering their companions with loud shouts.

The dullest ear could perceive the difference between the voices of our men and those of the enemy. Ours shouted in clear, ringing, and manly tones, while the enemy's sounded like the scream of the panther and the yell of the savage. At one time in the conflict there was the simultaneous discharge of two thousand muskets, as if men had fired in each other's faces. It was a moment I shall never forget; the thought of the crushing, the piercing, and the agony; the life-blood gushing out; the strong arm palsied, and the bright eye darkened forever; the many souls appearing the same instant before God—all brought to the heart overwhelming emotions as if in a moment I had lived years.*

In the confusion and darkness of the smoke-enveloped field, as the shades of evening were deepening, two regiments approached each other, and each withheld its fire, anxiously uncertain whether the other were friend or foe. When they could almost touch with their muskets the patriot Colonel of the one, stepped forward and inquired, "What regiment is that?" hoping that he was in the presence of brothers. There was a moment's pause, and then the response was returned, "What regiment is yours?" "The Fifth Vermont," was the reply. "Then," exclaimed the rebel Colonel of the other, which proved to be the Eleventh Alabama, "in God's name take it—fire." Both regiments discharged their guns simultaneously into each other's bosoms when scarcely ten feet apart. What was the loss of the rebels is not known. But two hundred of the Vermonters, noble boys from their happy homes amidst the Green Mountains, were left by that fire dead or helplessly wounded upon the field. In this, which was one of the most desperate battles of the war, the rebels brought into action fifty thousand men to crush our rear-guard of twenty thousand. The patriots, under their heroic leader, were nobly the victors. They repelled and drove back their assailants. And as night parted the combatants, and the rebels gave up the strife to await the morning and the arrival of fresh troops, a shout of victory ran along our lines which resounded for miles through the solitudes of the forest. General M'Clellan, who, some miles in the rear, was conducting vigorously the retreat, was, by the heroic repulse thus given to the foe, enabled to save our retreating columns and baggage-trains by conveying them through the almost impassable slough of White Oak Swamp.

The battle continued quite into the night. Its roar, as heard by the retreating army in the depths of White Oak Swamp, was majestic and awful. During this dreadful day General M'Clellan remained most of the time at his head-quarters, in the interior of White Oak Swamp, watching the passage of the almost interminable lines of the army.

"Nothing," writes the Prince de Joinville, "disturbed the serene self-possession of the General-in-Chief. He had stopped to rest in the veranda of a house. The heat was overwhelming. The mistress came to complain that the soldiers were eating her cherries. The General rose with a smile, went himself and put a stop to their pillage. But he could not prevent the shells next day from setting fire to the house of his pretty hostess."

An account of the successful achievement of the change of base must be reserved for our next number.

OVER THE MEADOW.

THERE are some days one never forgets. I doubt if I ever forget those days, so long ago, but still so fresh as if they broke but yesterday—those days spent with Donald gathering the crimson jets of samphire! Oh, but they were days of grace, and though I've jogged through many calmer ones, there's been none like them—none.

Since I had just come from believing in fairy-folks haunting the green dimples of the hill, rowing all day down the meadow stream in wherries carved from bubbles by the wandering Djin, the wind, I must needs believe in something, and so I believed in him. Alas, and that passed by as well!

I have only to open my window on a still autumn morning with just a breath off the river, and once more I am Christine Miller and twenty, and the samphire is ripening over yonder, and Donald is the gay, handsome heart again, lithe and lovely; but soon this glamour passes too, and I know well that Donald's dead these ten years, and that I am only the Widow Brown with sixty years astern.

It was just across the river we always went when my mother had said: "Christine, where is your samphire for pickling, now your preserves be all made and your cowcubers done?"

So Donald would out with his boat, and Susan and Ned Brown and I with our baskets, and away we would spin over the water in the sunshine, making merry.

I had two lovers in those days, Ned Brown and Donald; but Donald he was born to be a lover, while Ned was an awkward, staring boy, always with his hands in his breeches pockets when they weren't handling a ship's rope, for he followed the sea between whiles.

It was Donald who helped me ashore, but it was Ned who staid behind to anchor the little craft; if I lost my footing in the boggy spots it was Donald who came to my help with a light-some solicitude, but all the time Ned's eyes never left me, and I knew that but for his clod-hopper ways he would rescue me first from a den of lions if need were. For all that Donald was my earliest and latest thought. "What will Donald think? Will Donald go? Will Donald come?" That was the catechism I learned alike Sunday and week-day; and, sooth to say, I hardly knew Ned lived at all save when I saw him before me!

* The Peninsula Campaign in Virginia, by Rev. J. J. Marks, D.D.

Ah, well-a-day, there's scarce a night, I believe, but in my dream I'm picking my way over the samphire-field behind Donald, and I see his foot slip and catch its balance again as he turns and holds out his hand to me, and always on his handsome face a smile hovers; and anon I trip, and before he can reach me I'm broad awake, sitting up in bed, with a star winking at me through the chink of the shutter. That's why I go to bed so early, for I'm sure to dream of Donald, and the samphire, and the days when we were keeping company!

One day—I remember it well—the heavens were like the streets of the new Jerusalem, all paven gold and sapphire-stone, and the crisp air guarded a smell of pine woods and falling leaves, and the river ran sparkling away to the sea, like a string of bright beads that had slipped the knot. But Donald, though he handled the oar briskly, and the boat sped like a flash from reach to reach of the curveting tide, was a trifle down at the mouth as he looked back at the shore yellowing and crimsoning in its autumn sunshine, and out upon the bar, where the unallayed waves tossed up, as by some wizard spell, huge columns and archways, that flashed and silvered and disappeared, like some spectral gateway, into the broad ocean beyond; and then, glancing back at me, I discerned a shadow fall darkly across his face as he said:

"You will be coming here often when I'm away."

"Never without thinking of you, Donald," I answered; and even though I whispered it I noted Ned tore his eyes from off me, and sent them gazing out at sea. Surely there's no ears nor eyes like true love's!

"Shall you be gone for long?" asked Susan.

"For months; maybe years!"

Now it was for me to look aghast; but I forbore to speak, for Ned—wasn't he all ears and eyes and wistful woefulness?

But when we were out upon the meadow, and Donald stooping close beside me over the tiny bristling spears of samphire, my curiosity was ready to blaze, but my pride hung fire. So we picked and picked, and the silence was growing hateful, when, suddenly, he stood upright and took off his hat, saying, with a grim smile that was more than half a frown,

"You don't ask me any thing; you don't care; Ned has been getting your heart away from me by inches; it is time for me to go!"

"Indeed, Master Donald," said I, quite put out, you know, "where got you the deed and title of my heart, that you can gainsay its gift by an inch or an ell?"

At that he looked befogged, and drew his hand along his brow, and cried,

"Christine, do you mean that you never loved me?"

"Do you mean that you ever asked me to?"

"I do now, for I shall love you forever!"

"That alters things," said I, coolly enough, considering the words were burning in on my heart.

"Then you do?"

"Do what?" For I was determined to make him come every step of the way. Was I to be so lightly won?

"Love me," he answered.

"Well, yes—a little—maybe!"

I suppose that answered his turn, for directly he grew gay and glad, made the air ring with his wild tunes and pleasant jests, till, at last, all agreed we never had spent so blithe a day on the meadow.

"What's dounce to some is dour to others," as I have heard the proverb run, in the tongue my mother brought with her when, a child with a speech of her own, she came from Scotland to these foreign shores of freedom.

And Donald went to the city to be clerk in a great importing house, and the boat was sold, and Ned was off and away to the Indies; and henceforth, if Susan and I wanted samphire, there was the bridge across, and the ferryman, but that was all.

Donald's mother was always an ambitious body, and nowise willing he should stay at home, and milk the cows, and plow the field, and reap the harvest, as his forefathers had done since ever they left the bonny Tweedside, and settled in America; for they emigrated long before my mother's people brought her here; and, being longer established, they felt what in the old country would be called a priority of rank over us later comers; so Donald's mother would have him a great man, with his money and his wits ready coined, and white hands, and genteel ways as the Great Mogul himself. Law me! when a youngster I used to take the Great Mogul for an elephant, and I don't rightly know his bearings to this day.

Well, first along, Donald wrote a thought gloomy; and my letters to him were like the light between riven clouds, he said; but in those days the mail didn't come bothering and disappointing you five or six times a day: it was odd if we got a letter from Donald much short of a fortnight old. You may guess how I counted the time till mail-day; how if it stormed, or froze, or parched, it was still the sweetest day that ever gathered to a dawn and smiled from east to west; how I dressed in my finest clothes, and watched and listened.

But one day, it was all in vain.

"No letters for Christine Miller!" sang out our postmaster—a saucy old rough, who would have called King Solomon himself by his Christian name—"who'd have guessed he'd forget ye a'ready?"

"Who, indeed!" thought I.

Oh, but the next fortnight was bitter long! and though a letter came it planted a thorn in my side.

"I am fast making friends," he wrote; "my employer has two agreeable daughters, who often make my evenings pleasant, and keep me out of harm's way, as mother would say."

"Harm's way!" thought I. "If that's out of it, where next?"

But there was more yet,—see, here it is now; how yellow it's grown! it drops in pieces at a touch, like the dear dust of its writer. Oh, to think that his hand and his thought fashioned these very words; that his eyes bent above them; that they are a part of him—of him—of whom I have no part! Oh, Donald! did you know how much I loved you?

Put them up. There's no need of them. I learned every word by heart, as one would a bit of poetry, without heed: a more spirited girl would have burned them all, or a truer wife; but I—I couldn't.

So he went on to say: "Christine, dear, couldn't you take a little more pains with your orthography and etymology? You left an f out of affection, and grafted it upon afraid; your hand is rather cramped; and, I notice, it is you for using your verbs at hap-hazard."

Who ever picked a love-letter to pieces like that? "He's getting ashamed of me," I cried, and flung the letter behind the back-log; but the fire was out, so I picked it up again.

Then I hunted up my Murray, and tried to wriggle the verbs into place; and what with a scrid of old Bailey's Dictionary, and practicing my hand daily, my next letter did my heart good; but, dear heart, his answer ran:

"Do remember that two negatives in a sentence are equal to an affirmative; or, when you say, 'I don't care for no one as I do for you,' I shall be obliged either to doubt you or fight my rival."

Now I couldn't see that!

Well, sometimes I got a letter after this, and sometimes I didn't; but always he found so much fault with mine that I nearly gave up in despair, and wrote only seldom.

In the mean while he came home twice for a week, and in that time took me to task as often as a step-mother, and always harping on the fine manners of the Miss Blanks.

I remember one afternoon in particular; it was when we were going out to Farmer Farley's to a husking-party, and when I was dressed he pulled me to pieces as if I had been a rag-baby.

"You've forgotten to take off your apron, Christie."

"Take off my apron! Why, I made it on purpose to wear."

"Ha, ha! You aren't going to be so countrified?"

"Why not? I am a country girl."

"I wonder what I should think to see Miss Amelia at a party wearing an apron!"

"You would write me to wear one directly."

"That cravat about your neck, love; it's frightfully old-fashioned. They are never worn in the city now."

"Christine Miller wears them here, and that ought to satisfy you."

"That is just what dissatisfies me; I want Christine Miller to wear the best."

"Well, is there any thing else you would like to alter?"

"Since you give me carte blanche; you—"

"What's that? I didn't know I'd given you any thing but tit for tat."

"It's a foreign word," said he, laughing.

"Please remember that I don't understand foreign words, if Miss Amelia does. English is more than a match for me, you know."

"I know you are for me."

"Then why don't you marry Miss Amelia?"

"I didn't mean that sort of a match; but since you mention it, I suppose I could if I would."

"Then I advise you to, Major Vanity; it will save you from turning yourself into a walking dictionary and a talking fashion-plate."

Well, at the husking, what does he do but flirt with all the girls and leave me in the doldrums; not but that there were plenty of others ready to come at my beck and call, but none of them were my sweet-heart; and when one has a sweet-heart all the other men are little more to one than so many clothes-poles.

"Did you have a fine time?" said he, going home.

"Wonderful fine! You spoke just ten words to me!"

"Why, you know, Christie, 'tis not good-mannered to mind your lady love in company!"

"Oh, Donald," said I, "you used to think less of manners and more of me!"

"I wouldn't be wise to contradict you!"

"Why not?" I asked, like a fool.

"Because you'd say I didn't stick to my text."

It wasn't the answer I'd expected, you see.

After he returned things went on pretty much the same, save that we wrote yet more seldom.

It was in the fall of the year, maybe eighteen months since Donald's last visit—the sky was full of great bounding clouds, like the wings of white birds that I've seen far out at sea, or like the sails of ships which the wind had filled. I took my basket and went over the bridge, all alone, to the samphire meadow; for Susan, she was laid up with a fever. Maybe I had been there half an hour, when all of a sudden some one's two hands fell on my two shoulders, and sent my wits flying abroad.

"Guess who it is!" said Donald's voice.

"What's the good of guessing, when I know for certain?"

"Pick up your basket, then, and come home with me."

"But mother wants the samphire."

"We'll get enough to-morrow."

So we went home to his mother's to tea, and she got out her best china, and her finest linen, and a silver cream-pitcher she had had ever since silver was first smelted, I believe.

"I suppose this will be yours, Christie, when you go to housekeeping," said she, dusting it as if it were like to crack at a breath.

"Thank you," said I; "but you won't lose it soon, for I shall need go to boarding-school before I'm fit to marry Donald."

"Law!" said she, "don't mind him; he's always taking me up short, just so. But then he is a master-hand for grand words. What a parson he'd make, now! Them Blanks have been the making of him."

"And the marring of me!" thinks I, selfishly enough.

Next day he came for me to go to the samphire meadow. It was one of those fine days again, like crystal for clearness, when you can seem to see into heaven itself, when in all the wide sky there is not a speck, and the distant woods paint themselves like flames against its wall. Well, Donald was as good as gold, and quite as lively as that is nowadays. He told me how he spent his time in the city, that I might know, at every chime of the clock, what employed him. Then he described the Operahouse, where he sometimes went with the Miss Blanks; and the witching music, that seemed only to echo the key-note of Heaven's own; and the beautiful singers, in their gowns of satin and gold trimmings, and their faces like angels and their voices like seraphs; and he set it all forth with such a knack that I almost believed he was reciting some fairy-tale that he had picked up in the great city. Law me! the city itself, in those days, was like some bewitched thing I didn't more than half believe in!

"Wasn't you surprised when you first see it?" I asked, all wild with listening.

"Christie," said he, stopping short, "I sha'n't answer till you correct those two pieces of bad grammar in your question."

"What are they?" says I.

"The more shame to you if you don't know!"

"Be patient with the ignorant and the fool," used to be a copy in my writing-book."

"The patience of Job would be put upon," said he, a trifle touched up.

"Oh dear," says I, "I wish I hadn't never been born, to vex you so!"

"There it is again, two negatives. I wish you hadn't!"

"Well, Donald, seems to me we have had enough of this. I'm tired of it, if you aren't."

"I am certain I am."

"Very well, then. It's plain you and I can't go on badgering each other at this rate forever. We may as well part company first as last, for I see it will come to that in the end. Perhaps you'll find some one who will give you an affirmative in exchange for my negative—Miss Amelia, for instance."

"Miss Amelia has nothing to do with the case in hand. There's no need of dragging her in. If you think we are no longer fit for each other, I think so too."

"That's settled, then, thank goodness!" for, though I hadn't meant a word of what I said, you know, how could I retract after such an answer, pray?

So we walked home in grim silence; but long before we reached our gate my stiff anger had melted into a piercing anguish, and my heart cried out for a grain of love, while scape-grace Pride stood warden at every loop-hole, and wouldn't let me hang out a flag of truce nor a signal of distress. As for Donald, he was now all a-flush and now like a ghost, and his eyes shot out sparks like a flint.

At the gate we parted in silence, and I saw that he lingered as if to latch it, as I stepped briskly up the foot-path; but I never turned nor glanced back, and presently I heard him call "Christine!" But I kept straight on, head up, heart down; and again "Christine!" but I never—oh me, if I only had!

Well; do you think after that I spent the night crying like any baby; and in the morning some one happened in, and said Donald had gone!

Mother she gave me a look, and when the visitor had gone—

"Did you know that?" asked she, sharply, for mother favored the match.

"Why should I? It's all up between Donald and me," I answered, shortly.

"Whose the blame?"

"Moods and tenses," said I, getting up to go out before she could say more; for whenever mother got excited she fell into her native Scotch tongue, and that I hated as badly as Donald did false syntax; and a trick of it she lent to me myself, and I've never fairly rid myself of it to this day.

"And temper, I'll warrant; you girls are all alike—it's a flash in the pan, and the flame ends in smoke," she concluded, before I was quite out of hearing.

You may guess if I wasn't pretty well down at the mouth; but I kept up amazingly before folks; so it was noised about that I had jilted Donald myself. Perhaps I had. And just at this time Ned Brown he came home from sea, and he deaved me so to marry him that I almost wished there wasn't any such thing as marriage.

He was to be captain next voyage, and have a ship of his own, and he would take me to Cadiz, and half round the globe, maybe.

I must confess that it appeared an atom tempting at first thought; but then I looked at Ned and remembered Donald, and the temptation sped in the twinkling of an eye; so I said, "No!" up and down; but presently I half repented me, for a gossip flew abroad that the Blanks had taken Donald into partnership, and he was going to marry Miss Amelia.

"Oh, Donald!" sighed I, "if you'd only stay single, prince nor palace would tempt me!"

But here was Ned, and there was Donald; and it was a good year since we had parted, and the gossip was sifted down to a certainty, and Ned would sail in a fortnight; and what was the good of two being miserable for nothing—married or single I should be that; so when he came again I promised to go to Cadiz with him, or wherever he pleased: it wouldn't make much difference to me.

So we were married; and Susan went with us up to the city, where the ship was taking in cargo. It was the first time we had ever been out of our home-nests, and it was as though some fairy had smuggled us upon enchanted ground, especially as there is no mortal particularly happy in those parts that ever I could hear tell of.

We had two or three days to spare before the ship would get under way, and Captain Brown, he took us round to see the sights, and it was enough to craze one. It was almost as much as your life was worth crossing the streets, to begin with, and that wasn't what I was used to, though I have had narrower chances for mine since: it was nothing but come and go, thither and yon, and the people never seemed to stop any more than if they were in a tread-mill. I wondered mightily when they took their meals; and more than once I waited for the procession to get by.

Well, one day we stopped before one of the splendid churches, just to look and admire, and soon we observed that carriages kept coming up and people going in; and Susan, says she,

"'Tisn't Sunday, is it?"

"Perhaps it's a funeral," said I.

"No, indeed," says Captain Brown; "it's a wedding, I guess. Don't you see the folks with their white gloves?"

"A wedding?" says Susan, all high. "Let's go in and see for ourselves."

"I doubt if we can get in," says the Captain, "they're crowding in so fast; but we can push up nearer, and heave anchor till the bride and bridegroom come."

Pretty soon there was a buzz, and a "There they come!" from the by-standers; and a gentleman handed a lady out of a carriage—a lady all lace and satin and flowers—a lady with a blush on the cheek and a smile on the lip.

"That's the bride," says Captain Brown.

"My!" cried Susan; "but where's the bridegroom? I had a sight rather see him."

"There!—there he is—that one that's just helping out the lady in gray; do you see, Christie? Wait; he'll turn round soon. There—"

"Oh!" cried Susan.

"Let us go," said the Captain, touching me gently. But I just stood still, with my eyes as if they had been glued upon Donald's face; and he gave a glance round the crowd, and fate would have it that his eyes met mine, and the blood flared up his cheek that was like death before, and his eyes said, plain as tongue could have spoken, "I loved you; see, this is your work!" And looking so, he passed on and disappeared.

"Sha'n't we go now?" said I, taking the Captain's arm, as cool as if nothing had happened.

"She's not a bit pretty," said Susan.

"Handsome men seldom marry pretty women," said I.

"No," said Captain Brown, who would have agreed with me if I had said black was white: "it's your homely men who do that; they get so pesky tired of seeing only their own ugly phiz aboard."

And we stood off for Cadiz at last; and, I can tell you, my first night at sea was a little too grand to be comfortable; but law sakes! I've been to sea with Captain Brown fifteen years and odd, on and off, and got sort of acclimated, so that I didn't think any more of going across the Atlantic than stepping across my chamber-floor of a cold morning.

Many are the nights I've been out when the ship didn't seem like any thing so much as a shaving, which the wind shook and tore, and the waves hungered for; when the darkness wrapped you like a cloak, save where far off the breakers beckoned with ghostly fingers, or gnashed their white teeth threateningly; when above the lonesome shriek of the tempest the creak of cordage, the slip and slap and tumble of yelping cataracts, the orders trumpeted abroad—above them all would break the woeful voice of a minute-gun, that carried in its breath dreadful tidings of shipwreck and death; of men and women clinging to straws; of ghastly faces one instant upturned, now whirled down, down by the whirling waters; of horrors that another hour might make our own.

And then the sun, rising over fair fields of sliding gems, and never weary of working its miracles far and near, while bearing us company the live-long day, till, like some shipwrecked world, splintered and raveled into a thousand atoms of glory, it sank sadly to its grave.

Then it was odds, but now and again we fell in with an iceberg, bound down for the Gulf Stream; towers and spires and fretted frost-work, all a-glitter in the sunlight, as fine as any cathedral I've ever gazed at in the Old World.

And land! the foreign countries that I've seen! Why, if any body had told me when I was a girl I should drive from post to pillar like that, I should have thought them mad.

Early or late, every one has their turn; and so it fell out, that one night, after the storm had raged like any wild creature for two days, we shipped our masts; and directly Captain Brown called to lower the boats, as that was our only chance, for the ship had sprung a leak and the sea rushed in with a will, and the pumps were of no more use than a cup. Now that is the time for a man to show the cut of his jib; if he has got a drop of meanness or cowardice in him, he won't stand face to face so with death without giving a hint of it. But it would have done your heart good to see Captain Brown's men, even the roughest and unseemliest, stand back and say to their mess-mates, "You next!"

We stuck to the boat for two days, and by that time our water was quite gone; and it strikes one strangely, I can tell you, to see one's self surrounded by that delicious liquid and one dying of thirst! But just as we had put the last crumb of biscuit into our mouths a French brig, bound for Algiers, took us off!

I can tell you, too, that I had never expected to see green fields, nor waving corn, nor blossoming way-sides again; neither to hear the sweet morning fluting of birds just awake in their nests in the old tangled garden at home, or the sweeter voices of friends or foes; no, I had given all that up, and looked calmly as I might out upon the gray glooming waters and up to the heavens as cheerless, if so be I might find some grain of comfort to last me through.

Well, none of us could speak a word of French but Captain Brown—he had picked up a little of the jargon on the French coast; and no one on the brig could speak English, and we had a droll time of it. We would each get so provoked with ourselves, and when all was said and done it was so funny, that I could exactly understand the sort of trials the workmen suffered when the Tower of Babel was under way. For all that the rest of the voyage wasn't a pleasure-trip altogether; we had some rough gales before we slipped into the harbor at Algiers, where we rocked at last, as safe as a thief in a mill, in comparison.

Dear me, I thought it was quite the prettiest anchorage in the world just then; it looked so social to see the ships rolling about as happy-go-lucky as if storms were things of another latitude; and the moonlight making free with the battlements of the grim old castle, and looking in at the ghastly loop-holes of the batteries that had, maybe, sent death to many a brave heart; and the folks ashore cooking supper over their fires in the open air, as I've seen the gipsies in Spain do, only these wore their rags differently; for among all my goings and comings what's struck me most is the odd fashions people have of rigging themselves.

After this I got out of the way of going with Captain Brown; besides, mother she was growing old and needed me at home; and, perhaps, I didn't quite care to repeat my experience.

In the mean time I had heard news of Donald; how that now he was forehanded, and now that his health was broken, and again that he was in the house for the insane. Well, he was not the first of his race that had brought up there at last; his mother came of a line of intermarriages equal to any in royalty. But during all that time between I had never laid eyes on him; for though he had been down often enough to see his mother it was always while I was at sea.

Dear me, I have good reason to remember the day Captain Brown went on his last voyage. He was to start off immediately after dinner; and as I passed him the pickled-peppers,

"Christie," said he, "why don't you ever have pickled samphire nowadays? How jolly we used to be getting it; no pickle like that for me, my hearties!"

"Just so," said mother, "none grows in these times I'll be bound. Oh, for the good old days—"

"Of Adam and of Eve?" asked the Captain, slyly.

"When you come home again," said I, "we will have some awaiting you!"

"And what if I never come?" said he.

"Hush, hush; what should hinder? And you that know the way so well—your own beaten path!"

"The pitcher goes often to the well," says mother.

"There, don't go to wooing trouble," said I.

Now the Captain was sort of a cheerful body in the house, and after he was gone it seemed so lonesome-like that I didn't know rightly what to take hold of first, so I just bethought myself of the samphire.

"Present time is best time!" thinks I, so on with my sun-bonnet and down with my basket, and away I labored across. Dear sakes, it wasn't quite as I had tripped that way thirty years ago; one's gait at fifty isn't a quick-step; and I much wondered if I were really the same high-tempered ignoramus that broke with Donald so long ago on this very spot I was going to.

"I've seen the world," thinks I, "and rubbed off some of the sharp edges;" and maybe I was a little proud that Donald even couldn't find fault with me then. Oh, vain self-glorying!

All the way over was so familiar I could have fallen down and kissed the ground, the bit of stone-wall, moss-incrusted, the old gnarled trees—could have pointed out to you the places where times and again we had rested, and the trees where Donald used to gather pine-cones for us!

"Ah me, thirty years can do a heap of mischief!" thinks I; and looking down I found the samphire as thick as bees at my feet, just as if it had been waiting thirty years for me to come.

But before I went to work, I don't know what possessed me, but I turned me about and gave a look all across the meadow; and some one was coming swiftly toward me from the other side.

"Who can that be?" thinks I. "Some stranger, doubtless, who has missed his way; it does walk like— Nonsense! don't be a fool, Christie Brown; do you walk as you did then?"

He came quickly up to me and held out both hands, then paused and drew back.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said he, touching his hat, "but I thought it was she, at a distance; your gait and your basket deceived me. You didn't pass her in the village, did you?"

"Who?" I asked.

"Christine Miller. I've been expecting to meet her here. The coach has gone already. I must give her up soon!"

From the first moment I had set eyes on his face I knew Donald, for all that his hair was white, his face so haggard, his eyes so sunken; and now it all rushed over me that he was beside himself, and had escaped from the asylum.

"Oh!" says I, taking the cue, "if it's Christine Miller you want, she was in the village to-day. Come, we will go and find her. I think, maybe, she will be at your mother's."

Upon that he scowled and sat down on a rock hard by, saying,

"Thank you. I had rather she came here. Don't let me trouble you farther."

Now I was scared to leave him there all alone; so I answered,

"No trouble, good Sir; but I'm an old woman, as you see, and wouldn't you be so kind as to go a piece across with me?"

"Oh," said he, as cute as could be, "with pleasure; but I thought you had just come to gather samphire."

"So I had, but I don't feel able to stay; and then perhaps we will meet her there."

Then he rose up with a sigh and gave me his arm, and—

"No," says he, "I've no reasonable hope to see her again, if she won't come here."

"Perhaps she's sick," said I.

"But you said you saw her to-day."

"Still she may not feel like walking this far."

"You did, for a less reason; and I must walk treble the distance to catch a stage at Buxton, now ours is gone."

"Then it's a shame to take you back with me," said I, to humor him.

"Not so; it is a pleasure to me."

Ah, well! though his poor face was as if he had set down all his accounts there—crissed and crossed and scratched out—he had still my Donald's winning ways, his gallant graces.

So he rambled on till we reached his mother's door, and she was just standing there a moment, looking at the sunlight on the lawn and the broad blue sky above; and soon as she spied us she cried out,

"Here's Donald, my son!"

And I slipped behind and left him in her arms. Poor soul! she was ailing herself, and her mind had gone from her these two years, but she knew him.

Well, I saw no more of them till after night-fall, when the girl who looked after his mother came rushing in for me. Said she, "Oh, Mr. Donald! he's raving like fury, and keeps calling for you, Miss Brown—leastways he cries 'Christie! Christie! where's Christie?'"

So I tied my kerchief over my head and went with her. They had him in bed, and two men they held him, and he beat the air with his arms, and his cries were like knives going through and through you.

"Donald, dear, what ails you?" I said, taking his hand; but he shook his fist in my face: "Do you think I don't know Christine Miller when I see her? Do you think to impose upon me like that?" said he.

And so he went on, and wouldn't believe it was I; but if I turned away would cry, "Christie! Christie!" just as he did that night at the gate.

But by-and-by he fell into a sleep, and they begged me not to leave him lest he should wake furious at finding me gone; so the men went to lie down in the next room, and left me alone there with him; and he slept as sweetly as a little child, and between whiles he smiled. And at last, when the white dawn sauntered up the horizon, he turned him on his side, and heaved a deep sigh, and opened wide his beautiful eyes—his eyes that no tears or terrors could rob of their loveliness—and he looked me full in the face, as sane as you are, and he stroked my hand softly and said:

"Poor Christie! The flaming sword that guarded Eden, and turned both ways, has kept us apart. How long is it, child, since then—how long?"

"Thirty years gone this day, Donald!"

He was silent a while.

"Why didn't you meet me, thirty years gone this day, on the samphire meadow?" Then said he, "Tell me why?"

"I never knew you wanted me there, Donald dear."

"Never knew? Why, I waited and waited for you; and the stage went by, but still I would not go, for I said, 'Something keeps her; she'd never throw true love away like that.'"

"No more I would, Donald dear."

"I said so! I said so! Yes, cotton's down, and wool ought to be"—he was wandering a bit—"and so I waited till my heart froze, and then I walked ten miles—ten miles to reach Buxton before the stage left, carrying my heart all the way like a log! And you never knew!"

"Dear heart, I loved you all the same; but some wrong has been done us. How should I know you waited for me, dear?"

I thought it no harm to speak to him so then, and he dying.

"I sent you word," said he; "I left you a note."

"A note? And what note? I've never heard one word from you since that night at the gate."

"Is that true?" said he, rising on his elbow.

"True as Heaven," said I.

"Heaven help us then," said he; "and you thought I had given you up without a word! Poor Christie! And I loved you so truly! But I've no time to lose; before the sun touches the samphire meadow I shall be beyond hearing; see, my voice fails me now; put your head down closer, closer; say, I shall—love you—till—death, and—beyond: one kiss—and away." So his lids dropped, and his soul was away beyond the morning, and the stars, and the pitiless radiances of earth, into the perfect light!

Then I laid him back upon the pillows, with a smile quite plain about his lips, and went out into the next room.

"Donald has gone!" I said, quietly.

"Gone? Donald gone?" cried his mother, from her chimney-corner. "Yes, yes; he said he must be gone bright and early; they sent for him. Well, good-speed to him! Oh, but Christie, is that you? Wait a bit. I like to have forgotten, my memory begins to fail me; Donald, he left something for you, a slip of paper, no more; I thought I'd sent it by the boy; but no, I mind now that I shut it in one of the books!"

And she toddled across the floor to a shelf where Donald's old school-books had stood this many a year: they were such sacred oracles in her eyes.

Now "the boy" had been a man these twenty years, with boys of his own.

Taking down an old tattered arithmetic, she produced a folded note and came hobbling with it to me.

"I thought it had gone by the boy; but now I'm glad you dropped in, Christie, for here it is!"

True enough; it was the note I should have had thirty years ago, that in all her days of reason she forgot, but this little touch of the past recalled to her; yellow and tender, but the words just as they came from Donald's heart, warm and yearning, that heart which would yearn no more forever!

"DEAR CHRISTIE"—he said, for it was as though he spoke—"I couldn't sleep last night for thinking of you, and wishing for daylight to go over and make it all up with you! I'm a fool for minding a bad tense or so, for what's that worth beside a loving heart to a heart that loves? And now to make matters worse, Mr. Blank has just sent for me; his partner's dead; and I'm to start bright and early, to go first across the river and buy wool for the firm, so I sha'n't have time to call and see you, hardly to scratch this; but if you'll meet me at the samphire meadow, where I shall stop to catch the stage, I shall thank you and my stars. Don't fail me, my only love! Whatever falls out, I am yours for time and eternity.

DONALD."

And he thought I failed him! But he is mine, through time and eternity; he said so! he said so!

It is ten years since the grass grew green on Donald's grave; and now it is tall and rank, and in early spring the blue violets hide there, and the ground-sparrow loves to build her nest there!

I never go to the samphire meadow now; I am an old woman indeed.

And Captain Brown—he was lost at sea that very voyage. Ah well, in heaven we neither marry nor are given in marriage!

THE HOUSES WE LIVE IN.

THERE is no country in the world where there are so many large and fine houses, in proportion to the number of inhabitants, as in these United States. This is owing, doubtless to some extent, to the greater freedom of enterprise, and the more general diffusion of wealth among our countrymen. Apart, however, from the fact that we have so many thriving fellow-citizens who have the means of faring sumptuously, there is such a passion for erecting, and living in, big houses that it seeks gratification without regard to prudence or comfort.

That irresistible Asmodeus, the tax-gatherer, to whom no door is closed, against whom the iron-chest, so defiant of burglar and incendiary, is not proof, and whose scrutiny penetrates even seal and envelope, has lately made some startling disclosures. His revelations of the enormous yearly incomes of a few, varying from one million eight hundred thousand to a score of thousands of dollars, have surprised us. His exhibit, however, of the annual revenues of many, though of an average sufficiently large to indicate a great degree of general prosperity, makes such a paltry show in comparison with the prevalent display of wealth as to astound us. These men of moderate incomes are the chief inhabitants of those long streets of stately houses which overshadow our large cities. The comparatively few who possess incomes of ten thousand dollars or more, and who alone can prudently live in such expensive residences, might all be housed in half a dozen blocks. The greater portion of our large houses with rentals rising from twelve hundred to three or four thousand dollars a year, are occupied by people whose incomes vary from twenty-five hundred to eight thousand. With such means they could live comfortably and even luxuriously in a cottage, but must pass a life of splendid misery in the palaces they inhabit.

They order these things differently in England, France, and other countries of Europe, where, notwithstanding their supposed political benightment, we may find something to learn socially. There, people think one-eighth or even one-tenth of their incomes a large enough amount to expend upon the rentals of their houses, while here one-fourth or one-third is the usual and even one-half a not infrequent proportion. The Englishman, with a thousand pounds a year, finds that comfort, which he knows so well how to appreciate, in a cottage or small house at a rent of sixty or eighty pounds per annum. The Frenchman, with a revenue of twenty or twenty-five thousand francs, satiates himself with his indispensable luxuries of gilt and looking-glass, in an apartment au second or au troisième at two hundred and fifty francs a month. He may have a tailor or a grisette under the same roof above him, but the social balance is restored by the fact that there is a Marquis or a Minister of State below him.

Lord Bacon says: "Houses are built to live in, and not to look on; therefore let use be preferred before uniformity, except where both may be had. Leave the goodly fabrics of houses for beauty only to the enchanted palaces of the poets, who build them with small cost." It might seem too obvious that houses are built to live in and not to look on to require the sanction of the great Bacon to impress the truth, were it not that we Americans practically deny it. We build our houses mainly for the purpose of being looked on. They are in nine cases out of ten constructed to attract notice and impress the beholder with the idea of the importance of their inhabitants. Eager as we are for the reality of worldly success, we are still more intent upon making a show of it. The imposing house, rising high in the fashionable thoroughfare, arrests the attention of the passer or the visitor, and the magnitude, the material, the elaborate ornamentation, and the choice situation, suggest to his calculating instincts the costliness of the structure. The purpose of the holder is gained. The splendid banner he has hung upon his outer wall passes with the casual observer for a proof of the strength within. The more thorough reconnoissance of the inevitable tax-gatherer, however, will penetrate the showy semblance of prosperity, and probably reveal the reality of a starving garrison.

The big and costly house being accepted as the visible sign of wealth has naturally become, in a land where riches alone give rank, a mark of social distinction. A city dame, whose husband's fortune had expanded enormously by virtue of Government contracts, was heard lately to boast that she had none but "brown-stone" houses on her visiting list. We need not remind our fashionable readers that it is the house, and not the occupant, which is visited. Friendship and hospitality, the veritable household gods of our ancient simple homes, have forsaken a faithless generation, and the gilded idols of fashion have taken their places. The visitor—we do not say friend, for the name is hardly heard nowadays by ears polite—never fails of her fashionable devotion, wherever a sufficiently fine temple invites her worship. The whole structure commands her ceremonious reverence; she bows down before the lofty walls and columns of stone, and on entering, while muttering the formula of the breviary of fashion, fixes her eyes in pious ecstasy upon the rose-wood and ormolu idols of her adoration.

So prevalent is the association of a big and costly house with the idea of social distinction that the very children confound the two. The school girls and boys, in their worst moments, when, forsaking their natural childhood, they become unnaturally like men and women, will boast a superiority over their comrades on the score of the magnitude and expensiveness of their parents' houses. In the earlier days of New York a three-story house was the badge of the aristocrat, and a two-story one the mark of the pariah. Now, girls and boys, we are told, are nobodies at a fashionable school, if their parents don't live in four or five story houses with brown-stone fronts.

A friend of ours, a man of moderate income and simple but refined tastes, finding a small house with a rent proportionate to his means, took it. The domicile was substantially and even handsomely constructed, and in every respect suitable to the decorous and prudent household which occupied it. Though sufficiently capacious for all the requirements of such a family, it chanced to be the smallest house in the street. It had been left in its original two-story diminutiveness, while its modest contemporaries had been either ambitiously elevated, or torn down to make way for more imposing structures, which now rose high above on either side and opposite the comparatively humble residence of our friend. Cheered by the genial warmth of his own happy fireside, his comfort was not chilled by the shadow thrown upon his little house by its lofty neighbors. His wife, however, was more sensitive; and finding that

Mrs. Jenkins opposite, who kept her carriage and was of course a desirable acquaintance, had called twice upon Mrs. Higgins next door, who had only moved there last May, while she had never called upon herself though she had been nearly two years in the neighborhood, began to be uncomfortable. The little house, which she had at first pronounced to be "a perfect bijou—just the place for us, so neat, so comfortable, so delightfully easy to keep in order"—now became "an old rickety barn, so old-fashioned, so impossible to make decent, though she and Bridget worked their arms off with sweeping and scrubbing from morning until night." The children, too, were no longer satisfied; for Tom had been called a poor boy by Master Augustus Jenkins, and told by that young aristocrat that his mother had forbid him playing with "them people's children which lived in the old two-story house opposite." Miss Sophronia Jenkins, too, had grossly insulted little Mary at school, by saying that "her father was not respectable; for he lived in nothing but a two-story house, and her mother had told her so."

Our friend, beset by these domestic complaints, began to be uneasy himself, and therefore readily consented to his wife's proposition to move. He was for going to the eastern part of the city, where there are still enough of those old-fashioned two-story houses, occupied by some sturdy ancient citizens or resolute Quakers, to keep a prudent man in countenance. His wife, however, resisted, and finally her husband was forced to give in, and take a three-story house, where he pines away solitary in a basement, having been forced, in consequence of his increased rent, to give up his friends, his sherry, and cigars.

Mothers who have marketable daughters to dispose of hold that a large house in a fashionable quarter is indispensable as a show-place for the exhibition of them and the attraction of good bidders. There is many an otherwise prudent paterfamilias who, unable to resist his wife's argumentative eloquence on this point, has stretched his income to its utmost elasticity, in order to give his darling Mary Anne the advantage of a "bringing out" under the favorable influence of a brown-stone front. We advise the unwary youth to be on his guard against the showy mansions of Fifth Avenue and Madison Square as so many marriage-traps to catch the uxoriously disposed; or, at any rate, we would recommend him, before he ventures to freely nibble at the savory beauties within, to consult the income-tax book, and find out whether the bait is as substantial as it would seem to be.

The obvious effect of people living in houses too expensive for their means, provided their establishments are proportionably sustained, is bankruptcy. The fine city mansions are probably the most frequent causes of the ruin of the merchant and tradesman. They are responsible too, undoubtedly, for much fraud and crime. Those of small income, living in large and fine houses, who contrive to strike a balance between their credit and debit accounts and escape disgrace and dishonor, are, however, forced to such shifts as they would blush to own. The large rent can only be paid by a reduction of other expenses of living. The builder or landlord receives that which should go to the butcher; and in many an expansive mansion there is but a lean larder. If the beef and mutton are not curtailed the more refined necessities of life must be forgone. Literature, taste, hospitality, and friendship are thus shut out by those great walls of stone. Books, pictures, friends—not mere visitors—and all such purifying influences and sweeteners of life, are given up for the possession of a senseless mass of so many feet of brick and mortar, brown-stone or marble, as it may be.

The big house and small income present an incongruity which is no less offensive to taste than opposed to all economy and comfort of life. How often do we find an imposing mansion only half occupied by the family which possesses it! With the larger part of the annual revenue absorbed by the rental, there is but little left for household expenses. The number of servants is reduced to a minimum, and the care of the four stories of brick and brown-stone left to the hard-tasked energies of a couple of raw Irish girls or of a single maid-of-all-work. Such establishments, of however imposing an exterior, are easily detected even by those upon whom they are designed to impose. You've only to ring the bell, when—as Mary the cook is up to her shoulders in soap-suds, and Bridget, her only coadjutor, is minding the baby, or peeling the potatoes, or setting the table, or making Master Tom's bed in the fourth story back-room—you are left so long to the contemplation of the resplendent portal of the magnificent structure, that you suspect at once that the domestic affairs within are not so prosperous as the show without would indicate. Your suspicion is confirmed when Mary, by a scrutinizing peep from the area below, and Bridget from the garret-window above, having satisfied themselves that you are neither the expected chimney-sweep nor the daily beggar, the palatial door is finally opened. This, however, is not effected until after a severe and protracted domestic commotion discernible even by the visitor at the door, from the reiterated cries of, "Bridget! Mary! Mary! Bridget! there's some one at the door!" the clanging of dropped sauce-pans, the emptying of coal-scuttles, the suppressed squalling of baby, and the slamming of doors. When the grand portal is finally opened, and you might naturally expect to face some venerable seneschal or liveried porter, or at least a decent Patrick or a tidy Bridget, you find yourself—with a very perceptible odor of soap-suds or baby—suddenly plunged into a cloud of steam or dust, through which smutty cook or disheveled maid is dimly visible.

In nine-tenths of the large and showy city houses the main stories might be cut out, and the garrets let down upon the basements not only without a diminution but with an increase in fact of the comfort of the pretended occupants. The chief floor of most of these mansions is merely kept as a store-room, for a stock of upholstery too fine and costly for use, for which, in truth, it never was intended. The possessors do not know or believe

"'Tis use alone that sanctifies expense,

And splendor borrows all her rays from sense."

The gilt, damask, and rose-wood, and the spacious apartments which they set off so garishly, are for no other purpose than to excite the admiration and envy of an occasional fool of fashion during a half hour's visit, or to loan once a year or so to some thousand young debauchees of both sexes, who do us the honor of dancing and feasting, and otherwise holding their nightly revels in our houses, in the course of each fashionable season.

Pope, in one of his letters, speaks of a fashionable woman who "visits those whom she would hang in her passion or beggar in her play." Our fashionable women may not be so actively wicked, but we believe them so passively obdurate that they would not care if those whom they visited were either hanged or beggared. How can they be otherwise than indifferent to the fate of those whom they do not know, see but rarely, and only recognize by the pass-words and badges of fashion? Yet it is for such that our Mrs. Smiths and Joneses, otherwise sensible and prudent housewives, sacrifice so much of their domestic comfort. In order to have a mansion sufficiently lofty to rise to the standard of fashionable height, and rooms spacious and resplendent enough to hold the swelling importance and catch the fastidious eye of the modish, they restrict themselves and their families to the narrowest quarters and the shortest commons. In order to sustain the big house with a limited income, the family is kept in the basement, that the wear and tear of the superfine parlors may be avoided, the splendor of which is so easy to tarnish and too expensive to renew. These show-places have been known to retain their original odor of new carpet and fresh varnish for years, so carefully have they been closed to daily human habitation. We know of nothing so repellent of all good fellowship as this smell of the upholsterer, which, by its predominance, is a sure indication of a want of the free atmosphere of hospitality. A whiff from the kitchen, or even a blast from a pipe or a cigar, would be savory in comparison. They would be satisfactory proofs, however gross, of some life in the house.

Strangers are surprised to find how chary we Americans, who inhabit such large houses, are of our hospitality. They naturally think that with all this expansiveness of space there must be largeness of entertainment. The foreign visitor is therefore disappointed that Mr. Jones who so pressingly when in London or Paris invited him to call upon him—"Smith and Jones, 1000 Park Place"—never asks him to dine at his fine mansion up town. The fact is, however, that Jones finds that his big house costs him so much to possess that he can not afford to live in it himself, much less entertain strangers. Every thing but the structure itself, which is at a maximum, is reduced to a minimum. He has but two servants, or three, if you count his wife, as you may well do, for the big house keeps her as busy as the rest. He can never dine at home, except on Sundays, for it is too troublesome and expensive to prepare a regular dinner each day. He has neither a choice bit in his larder, nor a bottle of wine in his cellar, nor any thing else wherewith to entertain a friend, unless it may be the conversation of Mrs. Jones, who is more copious than interesting upon her favorite subject of gentility. So he lives without friends, as he probably does without books and pictures, for he can not afford them. We can conceive of nothing more miserable than such an existence, and we can not imagine a more absurd act than to raise tall monuments of stone to our vanity at a cost which beggars us for life. Let us look for a moment at another picture.

Sydney Smith had a church-living bestowed upon him somewhere in Yorkshire, so far out of the way that "it was actually," as he humorously remarked, "twelve miles from a lemon." As there was no parsonage-house he was obliged to build one. "I sent for an architect," he says; "he produced plans which would have ruined me. I made him my bow: 'You build for glory, Sir; I, for use.' I returned him his plans, with five-and-twenty pounds, and sat down in my thinking-chair, and in a few hours Mrs. Sydney and I concocted a plan which has produced what I call the model of parsonage-houses." Although some people called the house ugly, all agreed that it was the most convenient of residences, and certainly none ever contained a merrier and happier family. "Economy," wrote his daughter, "in the estimation of common minds, often means the absence of all taste and comfort; my father had the rare art to combine it with both. For instance, he found it added much to the expense of building to have high walls; he therefore threw the whole space of the roof into his bedrooms, coved the ceilings and papered them, and thus they were all airy, gay, cheap, and pretty. Cornices he found expensive; so not one in the house; but the paper border thrown on the ceiling, with a line of shade under it. This relieved the eye and atoned for their absence. Marble chimney-pieces were too dear; so he hunted out a cheap, warm-looking Portland stone, had them cut after his own model, and the result was to produce some of the most cheerful, comfortable-looking fire-places I remember, for as many shillings as the marble ones would have cost him pounds."

In his humble home in Yorkshire Sydney Smith spent some of his most happy and respected years. He had always a welcome for his friends, among whom were great lords and statesmen, and entertained them simply but tastefully and substantially.

The big town-house to which every citizen aspires, and for the possession of which he is willing to make such sacrifices, has really, after all, but little to commend it on the score of taste. The division of the land into oblong parallelograms, which may be necessary for the convenience of city building, is not favorable to the picturesque. This original disadvantage is increased by the passion of our aspiring citizens for big houses. Unable from the narrowness of the lot to expand the structure laterally, they raise it longitudinally to such an excess that it becomes so disproportionately high as to appear to be in danger of toppling over, which it probably would do were not its equilibrium sustained by its equally lofty neighbors. The taste and sense of proportion of our architects are constantly outraged by the inordinate demands of their ambitious patrons for height. What care they for taste and proportion? They want magnitude and show. The largest possible visible manifestation of expense is their object. They consequently insist that as much stone shall be piled up as a lot twenty-five feet by a hundred can possibly hold; "the whole a labored quarry above ground." The laws of proportion are of course forced to yield to the laws of trade, and such houses are supplied as the market demands. Thus our cities are shadowed by long rows of disproportionately high houses, which remind us of those gawky, overgrown youths who have expended so much of their vigor in the excessive increase of their height that they have none left for the due expansion of their girth.

A man's character, it is often said, is represented by the house he builds. If this saying be true a wondrous uniformity of character must prevail among our citizens. Almost all the large city-houses are alike, but each has, notwithstanding, a very decided and significant expression. "We cost ever so many thousand dollars," they all say as emphatically as the owners themselves would declare if they had your ear. The prevailing sentiment in their construction has been the show of expense, and this is expressed in every foot of the superfine structure from foundation to chimney. The inordinate height, the elaborately-worked surface, the floridness and superfluity of ornamentation, the great impending cornice, the lofty windows of plate-glass, the heavily-embossed door, the columnar portal, and the ambitious elegance of the whole front are all, and were meant to be, so many visible items of cost. You can see the dollars all over, and no one ever passes our fine houses without instinctively estimating the price in so much money. "What a fine house Mr. Jenkins has; it must have cost thirty or forty thousand dollars!" as it may be, is the ordinary remark of the observer, as the sum he paid for it is the first announcement of Mr. Jenkins himself, to an admiring guest.

Where the intention of the architect, in sympathy with his ostentatious employer, is to impress upon his structure the idea of expense he seldom fails. The gross sentiment is readily made manifest; for he has only to exhibit extent of work and quantity of costly material, or the appearance of them, to produce the desired effect. With the predominating motive for constructing the superfine houses of the city we do not expect to find grace, beauty, or fitness, and we are not disappointed.

Most of our large city houses have especially ugly cornices. They are disproportionately heavy, and repel us like the frown of some beetle-browed churl. The roofs, too, were universally unbecoming until the late introduction of the French top. Our great houses, tall as they are, look for the most part only like unfinished structures. Viewed from a height, the whole city appears to be composed of a confused mass of buildings which had been irregularly sawed off above. The French roof gives a completeness to each house that secures its individuality and impresses greater dignity upon the whole.

Our street views, particularly in the fashionable quarters, are exceedingly sombre, though our city atmospheres are remarkably clear and favorable to brilliancy of effect. This is owing to the ponderous uniformity of our long rows of large houses, which shadow the causeways without relief from diversity of character or individuality of expression. If we can not have the endless variations of grace and beauty, let each man at least give us his own idea, absurd as it may be, and not that of all his neighbors. A diversified grotesqueness would be better than a dull uniformity.

There is, moreover, about most of our grand houses an aspect of desertion, or want of life, which is by no means enlivening to the thoroughfare. This is owing to the fact that the habitable parts of the house are either in the rear or the basement, and that the main portions facing on the street are devoted to the show-rooms, which are kept closed except on rare occasions. At night, especially, whole rows of the finest mansions, in the best squares and streets, are hid in a lugubrious cloud of darkness, without a glimmer hardly of light, except where, here and there, a house may be illuminated by the glare of a fashionable revel. We suspect that the occupants are, for the most part, in the basements on a severe regimen of restricted fire and gas, doing penance for the high cost or rents of their fine houses.

Many striking street effects are lost for want of tasteful adaptation of the house to its site. The corners, which afford such fine opportunities for architectural display, are generally terminated by sharp angles, with ugly bare walls of brick or stone. The house rows thus often look as if they had been sawed off to make way for the street. In European cities the corners are studiously enriched with curved and sculptured balconies, statues, monuments, fountains, and other elaborate and graceful works of art.

The internal arrangements of our houses are for the most part ingeniously contrived, for American mechanics are as cunning artificers as any in the world. We allude more particularly to the conveniences for heating, supplying water, and facilitating labor. The furnace was never a favorite of ours, for it generally keeps the house too hot and dry; but the severity of the past winter has reconciled us almost to the highest degree possible of artificial temperature. It is, moreover, one of the necessities of a big mansion with a comparatively poor occupant, for without the furnace he must either freeze or ruin himself by a multiplicity of fires. Ordinarily there is deficiency of means of ventilation. These should be compulsory, for if left to the will of the chilly tenants of the house they are sure not to avail themselves of them.

The American rage for facilitating labor has induced various contrivances which are more favorable to the ease of the servants than to the comforts of their employers. The call-pipes and dumb-waiters are our abomination; but perhaps they are indispensable where people of moderate means live in big houses. They may be necessary to relieve the overtasked arms and legs of the scanty service of the establishment; but they approximate too closely the society of the kitchen and that of the parlor, and have too many jars, shrieks, and other noises of their own to be favorable to domestic repose.

The inevitable parallelogram of the lot necessitates straight lines, and the aspiring loftiness of our big houses induces a disproportionate height, which deprive the apartments of that snugness and comfort found in rooms of lower ceilings and less regular sides. The halls and other useful parts of the house are often sacrificed for the show-rooms, to which we can not allude without condemning them. The decorations of the interior of our fine houses, like those of the exterior, are generally excessive, heavy, and unmeaning, but further remark upon them and the furniture may be left to a future occasion.

That the occupants of such houses as we have described should have but little affection for them is not surprising. The readiness with which they part with them, so characteristic of our fellow-citizens, shows how slight is their attachment. In other countries, and so it was in earlier times in our own, the house is deemed a sacred place. Law, so authoritative every where else, confesses itself powerless before the closed door of the citizen. This is a precinct that it considers too holy to violate, even for the ends of justice. An American or an Englishman within his own house bids defiance to the sheriff and all his officers. "An Englishman's house is his castle," is John Bull's proudest boast; and from our common inheritance of civil rights, might be our own if we cared to make it. The great Earl of Chatham said: "Every man's house is called his castle. Why? Because it is surrounded by a moat, or defended by a wall? No. It may be a straw-built hut; the wind may whistle around it, the rain may enter it, but the king can not."

We might suppose, apart from the reverential sanction of the law, that a man's house would become so endeared to him that he would hardly quit it except on compulsion. There are ties which naturally attach a man closer than hooks of steel to the place in which he and his family have passed much of their daily life. The first taste of connubial happiness, the birth of children, the death of a loved one, the joys and even the sorrows of domestic existence, the intercourse of friends, and the intimacy of home, associated as they must be with the house in which a man has lived long enough to experience them, would, it might be supposed, endear to his heart every stone and rafter in it. But our citizens do not live long enough in their houses to form such ties. The American takes his new wife to one, and, after his first-born, each of the rest of his children sees the light probably for the first time in a succession of others. We know of a family of ten children, no two of whom were born in the same house. In course of this rapid itineracy there can be no time for the associations and affections of life to crystallize into that gem of existence, the home. Each of our citizens lives in many houses, but lives not long enough in either to form a single home.

We know a gentleman, born and bred in and a permanent citizen of New York, with money enough to have and to hold the finest mansion in it, who leads such a migratory life that he has actually lived in three houses and three hotels in less than eighteen months. Two of the houses were ready-furnished, each of which he rented for six, and the third was a villa in the country, which he occupied for three months; the rest of the time was miscellaneously spent in shifting his movables, in which his wife and family, from their capacity of being moved, may be included, from caravansary to caravansary. His children can have no more idea of a home than so many erratic cuckoos.

The mania for change of residence, great as it has always been, has been excited to an unusual excess just now by the scarcity of houses, the increased demand for them, and the consequent high rents. It is no unusual thing for a citizen, though so rich that he might be supposed to be beyond the temptation, to abandon at a moment's notice his house and all his household goods to the first stranger who has the folly to pay the inordinate sum demanded for their six months' use. Seven and eight hundred dollars a month are not seldom asked for some of our fine city houses and their superfine upholstery. The price, high however as it may be, does not deter takers, who in fact are so eager and ready with their money that their offers surpass even the demands. Many of our citizens, to whom a few thousand dollars more or less can be of little account, have such an inveterate habit of trade that, unable to resist a good bargain, they trade away their homes without a momentary regret. They in fact chuckle over their smartness and good luck. The consequence is that there has been a general exodus from several of the most fashionable quarters, and the hotels are filled with homeless wanderers in the shape of thriving citizens, among whom some of the millionaires of the city are the most conspicuous.

Franklin said that "three moves are equal to one fire." Our practical philosopher, as was his wont, only regarded the subject in its material aspect. These frequent changes of residence, however, have more serious consequences than the mere injury or loss of so much property. They are destructive of much of that home-feeling which is so essential to the education of the affections and moral sentiments. In childhood the faculty of observation is the most prominent, and it is through this that not only the head but the heart of the child is first cultivated. Material things, being the objects upon which this early faculty is exercised, become of great importance. The house, the room, and the pieces of furniture, however insignificant in themselves, being associated in the mind of the child with all the affections of home, rise to the dignity of great moral influences. The impressions they make upon the child are so deep that they resist the utmost corrosiveness of time. The memory of the old as well as the young forever clings to the narrow scene of the joys and sorrows of childhood. The man of sensibility not only never forgets, but never ceases to love the most insignificant object associated with his early life. "I should hardly care," wrote Pope in one of his letters, "to have an old post pulled up that I remembered ever since I was a child." These impressions, so important in their moral influence, can hardly be made upon the heart of a child, however impressible, whose parents "live in three houses and three hotels in the course of eighteen months." The memory of his unsettled childhood must be too turbid to reflect a distinct image of any kind.

Writers of the imagination, poets, and novelists make a large use of the natural association of inanimate objects with the thoughts and affections, and thus produce some of their most striking effects. Their characters, indeed, would be as "airy nothings," inappreciable by the ordinary reader without a "local habitation." Scott and Dickens among English, and Hawthorne among American writers, may be taken as prominent examples of authors who are remarkable for the minute descriptions of the habitations of their imaginary personages. The very titles of some of their works, as "Bleak House," "The Old Manor," and "The House with Seven Gables," show how prominent a feature the mere dwelling is of their fancy pictures.

In real life, too, the same association is so strong and so universal that the humblest roofs which have once covered those who have risen to fame are revered by all. Thus Shakspeare's lowly birth-place and Washington's wooden home have become places sacred to the hearts of nations. The Americans are noted as among the most earnest worshipers of these venerable relics. It would therefore seem the more surprising that they should have so little respect for their own private sanctuaries, which they desecrate as if they had lost all faith in the existence of the household gods. Their want of reverence can only be accounted for by the fact that their houses are show-places and not homes—constructed to display their wealth, not to live in.

Though thirty years ago there were but very few city houses which cost over ten thousand dollars each, now there are long rows and solid blocks of mansions which are valued at five and ten times that amount. More and more expensive structures are rising each day. A successful tradesman is building a house for his own occupation which, it is said, will cost half a million of dollars at least. As he is a citizen who counts his income by millions, it may be supposed that he can not only well afford to build but to live in it. There is a white marble stable in New York which is reported to have cost thirty or forty thousand dollars, but could not now be built for twice that amount. What a house proportionate in dignity to the palatial habitation of his horses will cost the sumptuous proprietor when he builds one may be left to the wildest conjecture.

Pope, in one of his letters to Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, gives a memorable description of a great house of the baronial times of Old England. Its munificent provisions for hospitality may be an example to the swelling proprietors of our large mansions, as its decaying greatness may be a lesson of humility.

"You must expect nothing regular in my description," wrote Pope, "of a house that seems to be built before rules were in fashion; the whole is so disjointed, and the parts so detached from each other, and yet so joining again one can not tell how, that (in a poetical fit) you would imagine it had been a village in Amphion's time where twenty cottages had taken a dance together, were all out, and stood still in amazement ever since. A stranger would be grievously disappointed who should ever think to get into this house the right way: one would expect, after entering through the porch, to be let into the hall. Alas! nothing less; you find yourself in a brew-house. From the parlor you think to step into the drawing-room; but upon opening the iron-nailed door you are convinced by a flight of birds about your ears and a cloud of dust in your eyes that it is the pigeon-house....."

"The great hall is high and spacious, flanked with long tables, images of ancient hospitality. ....Here is one vast arched window, beautifully darkened with divers scutcheons of painted glass.....One shining pane bears date 1286. The youthful face of Dame Elinor owes more to this single piece than to all the glasses she ever consulted in her life. Who can say after this that glass is frail, when it is not half so perishable as human beauty or glory?.....And yet must not one sigh to reflect that the most authentic record of so ancient a family should lie at the mercy of every boy that throws a stone? In this hall, in former days, have dined gartered knights and courtly dames, with ushers, servers, and seneschals; and yet it was but the other night that an owl flew in hither, and mistook it for a barn....."

"Next the parlor lies the pigeon-house, by the side of which runs an entry that leads on one hand and the other into a bedchamber, a buttery, and a small hall called the chaplain's study. Then follow a brew-house, a little green and gilt parlor, and the great stairs, under which is the dairy. A little further on the right, the servants' hall; and by the side of it, up six steps, the old lady's closet, which has a lattice into the said hall, that while she said her prayers she might cast an eye on the men and maids. There are upon this ground-floor in all twenty-four apartments, hard to be distinguished by particular names....."

"All the upper story has for many years had no other inhabitants than certain rats, whose very age renders them worthy of this venerable mansion....."

"I had never seen half what I have described but for an old starched gray-headed steward, who is as much an antiquity as any in the place, and looks like an old family picture walked out of its frame. He failed not, as we passed from room to room, to relate several memoirs of the family; but his observations were particularly curious in the cellar: he showed where stood the triple rows of butts of sack, and where were ranged the bottles of tent for toasts in the morning. He pointed to the stands that supported the iron-hooped hogsheads of strong beer; then stepping to a corner he lugged out the tattered fragment of an unframed picture. 'This,' says he, with tears in his eyes, 'was from Sir Thomas, once master of the drink I told you of. He had two sons (poor young masters!) that never arrived at the age of this beer; they both fell ill in this very cellar, and never went out upon their own legs.'"

Pope found this old mansion an excellent place for retirement and study, and translated "a great deal" of his Homer there, six hundred years from the time it was first built. The venerable ruin still exists, for Hawthorne, in his last book—"Our English Home"—records a visit to it. It may be safely presumed that our flimsy and gaudy mansions will not last for centuries, and in their decay be chosen as meet places for poets to work in.

ST. LEON'S HEIR.

IT was late in the spring, or rather it should have been spring, and was so according to all the calculations and predictions of the almanacs; for it was the middle of April; but instead of the capricious tears and smiles, blue skies and thunder-clouds, balmy western breezes, and chilling east winds, which usually betoken the changeful moods of that most sensitive and womanly month of all the twelve, a cold, bitter, wintry storm was raging; one of those most unseasonable and unwelcome but not to be gainsayed northeast storms, which do so often creep into the lap of our Northern spring-time, and sweep with un pitying and remorseless fury over our rock-bound coast, bringing terror and dismay to our most adventurous sailors, destruction to our shipping, and dread and desolation to the dwellers upon land.

The storm had been gathering its fury for days, nay, even for weeks; lowering clouds, spiteful gusts of damp wind whirling in mad eddies, cold wintry showers mingled with hail and sleet and snow, and heavy masses of fog, now settling down in chill discomfort, now slowly drifting away to show a gleam of watery sunshine, gone even while the gazer speculated upon the chances of its continuance, had at last culminated in a howling tempest of mingled wind, hail, snow, and rain, which seemed to heighten in sullen intensity as the day waned toward its close.

But upon the sea-coast of Massachusetts, where our scene opens, the tempest seemed to sweep in unmitigated wildness; a thick, blinding mist brooded over the wide waste of waters, showing dense and wild, as if chaos were again uprising; and as the fierce wind rent its folds aside, and drifted them in torn fragments skurrying along beneath the murky, leaden skies, it revealed the heavy sea billows rolling sullenly shoreward, now showing black and inky against the snow-covered heights, now breaking and sparkling with a fearful phosphorescent light, till curling high in awful whiteness and foam, they flung themselves upon the rocky beach with a long resounding roar, and a fierce weight which sent the bitter salt spray shivering far and wide over the high land.

High up among the rocky cliffs of this now desolate-looking beach, and nestling closely in among them, as if it sought protection from their strength, or, as if it feared the stormy ocean might, in its unbridled wrath, open its huge jaws and suck it in like a second Jonah, covered a small but neat cottage; it was not "A cottage with a double coach-house,

A cottage of gentility,"

such as the city seekers after fresh air and sea-breezes delight themselves in, when, closing their well-furnished and airy town-houses, they crowd themselves and their little ones into some ill-contrived "house of seven gables" or more, for the pleasure and privilege of gasping all day upon a wide stretch of barren sea-beach, and shivering all night beneath two blankets and a sloping roof, simply because fashion is inexorable, and exuberant health, not sickness, demands the change.

The cottage in question, though small, was neat and substantial, but plain, unpretending, and unornamented in any degree; a narrow foot-path, little trodden, led up to the highway upon which it fronted, and no cultivated ground around it told of the agricultural thrift, or horticultural taste of the proprietor; it looked, as indeed it really was, the temporary home of a man who had no ownership in his surroundings, and whose daily living (scant though it might be, and possibly was) came to him from sources wholly independent of his dwelling-place.

Upon the dreary night in question, upon which our story commences, the lower room at the back of the house, and which commanded a full view of the stormy and vexed ocean, had but one inmate, the master of the establishment. The room itself was neat, even to scrupulousness, but intensely desolate-looking; destitute entirely of all the thousand little accessories of taste and occupancy which can give an aspect of quiet home-comfort and snugness to even the lowliest apartment. The small, shutterless, and uncurtained windows let in all the desolation of the outward scene, and there was nothing bright and glowing within to form a cheerful contrast with it; chairs and tables there were, indeed, enough possibly to serve the bare needs of the indwellers, but no superfluity even of these; an open stove stood far out into the room, with its long, dreary, black stove-pipe reaching to the distant wall, and thence to some remote and concealed chimney; but the fire had died out in the grate, and only the white ashes upon the hearth remained to tell that it had ever diffused warmth and cheerfulness around. Upon the low walls, which were covered with a clean but tasteless paper, of dingy colors, and stiff, ungraceful pattern, hung two or three large, showy-looking, colored maps, useful for reference doubtless, but certainly the humblest attempt in the way of ornamentation with which human taste ever satisfies its universal craving for the beautiful. A book-case of the cheapest construction, with a scant array of heavy uninviting-looking books of divinity, and a moon-faced clock, which made the slow time it chronicled still more oppressive by its dull and unvarying "tick-tack, tick-tack," completed the inventory of the furniture.

As we have already said, the room had but one occupant, a tall, thin old man, thin almost to emaciation; he was seated at a table in the middle of the room, a large open Bible lay upon the desk before him, upon it his thin white hands were clasped with the rigid clasp of pain, and upon them his face was bowed down and concealed, while the silvery hair, whose abundance showed that its whiteness was less the work of time than grief and anxiety, fell in gleaming disorder over his hidden face, clasped hands, and open book.

So still he was that, for a moment, the closest observer might have said, "He sleeps." But it was not sleep or quiet rest which weighed down that white head: it was the exhaustion of suffering, the benumbed and apathetic stillness which often succeeds a great and stormy grief; and if the eye of the gazer had remained fixed upon him for a few moments more a weak shudder, which shook his frame, and would have been a convulsion if his nature had had strength for it, would have given evidence that the deep suffering which had thus prostrated him was not over, only overpowered by physical weakness.

At last, as a wild burst of the tempest, louder and fiercer even than its precursors, smote upon the house, rocking it to its foundations, and dashing the mingled hail and spray with violence against the now darkening windows, the man slowly raised his head, and gazed out with a look of helplessness and despair, disclosing, as he thus lifted himself up, a face which, in spite of its traces of past and present suffering, was a pleasant and intellectual one, the habitual expression of which was mild and benevolent.

The dress of the old man as he thus raised himself up in his chair betokened his calling: the white neck-tie, the suit of well-worn but still respectable black, as well as a certain clerical, though undescribable, peculiarity in the way in which they were worn, at once betrayed the country preacher.

He sat for a few moments watching with sad eyes the dreary storm beating so fiercely upon his home, and shivering with a sort of inward chill at every wild sweep of the pitiless wind; and then, as if inaction could no longer be endured, he rose slowly and weakly from his chair, and betraying as he did so a lameness which must have made locomotion difficult to him, he paced the room nervously, though with a slow and evidently painful motion.

As the sound of his halting and uncertain steps broke upon the previous silence of the apartment the door of the room was pushed noiselessly and cautiously half-way open, and a female head was thrust silently in at the aperture, and a pair of keen black eyes peered wistfully around; and then, finding the object of her solicitude was up and in motion, the intruder pushed the door still wider, and advanced into the room.

She was a brisk, hale, cheerful-looking matron of about middle age, dressed neatly in Quaker garb of the olden fashion, with prim, snow-white cap and handkerchief, and spotless linen apron, and with a brisk, bustling manner, which was too kindly and too evidently well meant to make her busy bustling officiousness ever appear offensive.

"Waked up, ain't thee, David? Why, I want to know!" she said, good-naturedly, as she came into the room, rubbing her fat little hands together in a cheery sort of way, which seemed to indicate her readiness to be employed in any useful occupation which might offer itself. "I should have been in afore, only I peeked in at the door, and I see thee was asleep, and I didn't want to wake thee. Hope thee has had a real good, quiet nap; thee needed it, sure enough, goodness knows!"

"I have not been asleep, Sarah," said the old man, mildly.

"Thee hain't? Well, now, that's too bad! Why didn't thee sleep? I want to know! Why, I see thee laying down on the table, and I never mistrusted but what thee was getting a nap. Why, I should have been in long afore this if I'd known thee was not asleep, for thee's set thy fire all out, and I'm 'fraid thee's half chilled to death. I did not like to come in and disturb thee; and the fire is all out, just as black as the back. I'm 'fraid thee has been real cold. Hain't thee? Say, now."

"Oh no, I am not cold," replied her brother-in-law. "At least, I did not know that I was," he added, as a chill shook his weak frame, giving apparent contradiction to his words. "The fact is, my heart is so cold I do not think I am sensible of a chill any where else."

"I guess thee is cold, David, though thee doesn't think enough of thyself to know or care whether thee is or not. I say that's the fact," said the woman, kindly. "But we'll soon have a fire; and I wish, now, I had come in sooner; it seems kind of strange I didn't; but I hated to make a noise if thee was asleep, as I s'posed thee was;" and moving about with handy activity and zeal, she proceeded to replenish the fire; and as it shot up in a clear blaze under her skillful management she shut up the sacred volume, put away the reading-desk and table, and drew the old man's chair into a comfortable position by the warm hearth.

"Come, now, David," she said, kindly, when these friendly preparations were completed—"come and sit by the fire, won't thee? Thee's wearing thyself all out traveling hither and yon, back and forth, in that way—thee is now; and thee will make thy lameness a deal worse; and what's the good of it all? Come and set down, now, do; I tell thee, sure, there is no good in thy worrying and fretting and walking round in this way."

"I know it, Sarah," said the old man, sadly. "I know it only too well, and that is just it: it is because, as you say, I can do no good, that I do so worry. Oh! if I could do any thing—if I could only go out into the world, like other men, and seek for my poor lost child, I should not fret so; but lame, and weak, and helpless, what can I do? I sit here, Sarah, and listen to this howling storm, and feel that it may be my child, my only one, is homeless and shelterless, exposed to all its fury, and I drove her to it—I, her father, who doted upon her, drove her from my door, and refused to listen to her sad story. Oh! I sit here, dry and sheltered, and cry, 'God help me!' But what right have I to expect his help? I, who had no compassion upon my own child in her affliction, how shall I dare ask of my Heavenly Father to have compassion upon me? Oh, my child! my child! my poor deserted Mary!" and he wrung his hands in the wild impotence of sorrow.

"Don't thee, David, don't thee," said the woman, soothingly. "Thee is too hard upon thyself—thee is, now. Thee did what thee thought was thy duty, and the just God, who sees all hearts, will know thee meant right, even if thee did wrong, which I am by no means clear that thee did."

"But am I sure I did mean right? I thought so at the time; but who of us can be sure of his own motives? I can not tell. I sit and think, and think, until I am bewildered, and the dis-inctions between right and wrong are confounded to me, and that which I thought was good seems evil in my mind. But what was I to do? I had preached to my people against sin; as their spiritual teacher, I had warned them to hold no fellowship with sinners; I had counseled them to fly from all connection with the wrong-doer; I had said to them, 'No man can touch pitch and not be defiled;' and then, when the sin came home to me, as I believed, in the person of my own, only child, was I not called upon to practice what I had preached? I had exhorted them to 'cut off the right hand, to pluck out the right eye, if it offended;' and how could I dare to do otherwise when the case became my own? Could I shelter and encourage her whom I believed to be a sinner because she was my child? I thought not. I thought I was doing God's service and obeying His will when I said to her, 'Depart, and see my face no more.' I thought I was speaking in the name of Him whose servant I had vowed myself to be."

"Well, yes, David. I believe thee did honestly; and, if so, thee did right—did not thee?"

"No; I feel now as if I did wrong—all wrong. As I look back, I fear I was misled; perhaps I wanted the praise of the world, the speech of people. I am not sure of myself. What if I wanted my flock to say, 'Behold! he does not spare himself; like a second Abraham he obeys the word of the Lord, even if it be to sacrifice his only child!' Could this have been so? Could it have been my sinful spiritual pride? Could I have been thus self-deceived? Oh! I know not, I know not!"

"Nonsense, David!" said the Quakeress; "thee has, as thee says, clearly got thyself bewildered, till thee can't tell right from wrong; but I know, if thee doesn't. Thee did what thee thought was thy duty, and thee did it manfully, though it almost broke thy poor heart to do it; and so I say thee was right—I know thee was!"

"But it turned out that I was wrong," said the minister, sadly; "all wrong, all wrong."

"That is not thy fault," said the woman; "thee did what thee thought was right—that was thy part. God does not give perfect wisdom to any of his human creatures; we must all do the best we can, acting up to the light He gives us, and leave the end to Him; thee could not see into the coming time then, and thee can't now; we must all wait God's time."

"Yes, but I judged too hastily and I judged too harshly. Did not our blessed Master say, 'Judge not, that ye be not judged?'"

"Yes, but that means judge not severely, uncharitably, I reckon; don't it, David? Sure, did not the same Teacher say, 'Why judge ye not of your own selves what is right?' Why, David, we must judge in this world; we are called upon to do it continually, every day of our lives; we must do it; all is to be sure we use the best judgment God has given us, and take care not to let our sinful passions mislead us to judge harshly and unjustly of others.

Why, don't thee see, the world could not go on from day to day if we none of us ventured to form any judgment of other folks? If, whenever any wrong-doing came in our way, we were to shut our eyes and cry out, 'I judge not, I judge not!' what does thee think would become of us and of the world? Oh no! that would never do. If it comes to that; if thee is to let the wolf go at large, because thee is too scrupulous to judge him, what is to become of the innocent lambs? That won't do, David, nohow!"

"I believe you are right there, Sarah."

"Right! yes, I know I am. I'm glad thee sees it, that's all."

"But, Sarah," said the self-accusing and morbidly conscientious old man, "you said, judge not harshly; I am afraid I did, and my judgment wronged my poor child."

"True; yes, I believe it did. But, as I said before, we haven't got the gift of true wisdom, any of us; only the Highest has that. Thee used the best judgment thee had at the time, I suppose—did not thee?"

"Certainly I did, but I see now that it was wrong. Oh! I might have known it was wrong; I might have known my pretty Mary, my poor Lucy's only child, could not be what they said of her!"

"David," said the little Quakeress, in a tone of mild reproof, "thee is judging unjustly now, any way; thee is on the wrong track now, clearly. If thee had judged Mary innocent only because she was thy child and Lucy's, thee would have cause to blame thyself; but thee did better, thee judged impartially, and when thy reason condemned her thee gave her up; thee did what thee believed to be thy duty at the time, and I say thee was right, however it has turned out. I am no scholar—I never was, as thee knows, and I never had much wit or sense; I am not fit to argufy with thee, David—I know that very well; but I'll tell thee what: when I married thy brother Thomas, him and me didn't think jest alike on some matters—religious matters, I mean. I was brought up in the Friends' way of thinking, as thee knows, and he wasn't. Well, we didn't think alike on some matters then, and we never did think alike on them subjects to the longest day that he lived; but then they was only matters of belief—pints of doctrine, he called them; but in all matters of duty-doing, of daily living, of honesty, morality, and all that, him and me never differed, not a mite; and he used often to say to me, and I say the same to thee, that if we do honestly and faithfully what we in our best judgment believe to be right, it is right for us, and is all our Maker expects of us. 'Why, Sarah,' he used to say, 'If He had meant us to fly He'd have given us wings; and if He had expected us to judge perfect judgment He would have given us perfect wisdom, which He has not.' Yes, that's what thy brother Thomas used to say, and I guess he was about right; he was a good man, David, thy brother Thomas was, and a sensible—wasn't he?"

"Yes, oh yes," said the old man, passively repeating her words; "Thomas was a good man and a sensible one."

"Yes, indeed, he was that," said the widow, cordially; "and no one has a better right to say it than thee and me, for no one knew him so well as we did. And now, David," she continued, evidently with the kind intention of drawing him into conversation, and thus calling off his mind from its persistent and gloomy introspection, "I'll tell thee another thing—I'll tell thee what father used to say, and he was a real good man too, and had lived to be old, and had had a great deal of experience, and knew a deal of things, in a quiet sort of way. He used to say that, according to his belief, it wasn't so much the amount of good which a person actually did in this world, as what they had tried to do, which would be taken into the account; and I remember how he used to tell us this story—Law! goodness me! I remember jest how he used to look when he sot and told it! I can't tell thee if he read of it in a book, or heard tell of it, or knew it of his own knowledge—but that's no matter. But he used to say there was a manufactory of some kind once—I don't know justly what they made there, and I don't know, sakes alive! where it was either; I s'pose father knew, but if he ever told me I have forgotten now—but they worked in iron or steel there, one or t'other, and it was dreadful unhealthy work, as it naturally would be, for the little bits of iron or steel (whichever it was they worked in, and I'm sure I can't tell thee which it was, I'm so stupid), but it used to fly off in fine dust, and get into the eyes, and noses, and throats of the work-folks, and it caused bad eyes, sometimes blindness, and complaints of the throat and lungs, consumptions, and all that. Well, it was so very unhealthy it was hard to get any work-people; folks wouldn't work there even for great wages, only them as was real poor and desperate, and they couldn't stand it long. Well, there was a good rich man in that place—a very wise, learned sort of man—and he pitied the poor work-folk; he was not no-ways connected with the factory, thee understands, only he pitied the poor men and their wives and children, and he spent much time and thought and money to try to find out some way to help them, by masks, and spectacles, and, dear me! I can't tell thee what in the world he didn't try; but nothing seemed to do any good, or help the matter in the least.

"Well, one day he come in to the factory to show the works to some friends he had visiting him, and so he told how unhealthy it was, and pointed out the cause; and a young-woman of the company she spoke up, and she says, 'Why not hang up a magnet over each work-bench? wouldn't that do?' Well, I suppose she never gave the matter a second thought before she said that, but the wise man he see in a moment the value of what she had said; and it seems strange nobody had ever thought of it before, it was so simple. The experiment was tried at once, and it worked wonders, so that the business ceased to be unhealthy, and that chance-dropped word (as it seemed to be) saved hundreds of poor folks from sickness and misery and death. But father used to say (and this is the p'int of the story) that he really believed that, in the sight of the great God, the good man's many failures would count for more in the day of account than that young woman's wonderfully useful remark, which cost her neither time nor thought, labor nor money. Why, thee sees, she jest said it, hap-hazard, as it were, as I might say, 'It's cold;' and I guess father was nigh about right; don't thee think so?"

But the listener, if listener he could be called, did not answer her; in fact, he had not even heard her kind attempt to amuse him; the man's mind and thoughts had drifted entirely away from her and her social efforts in his behalf, and were tossing upon the wide sea of his own deep sorrow. Sitting, with a fixed look of woe upon his face, his locked hands resting helplessly upon his knee, he was gazing with sad eyes at the storm-beaten window, shivering all over whenever a fiercer burst than usual beat against the rattling casement; and again he rose, as if mechanically, and resumed his weary traverse of the room.

The sister-in-law sat for a few moments, watching with pitying eyes his slow and painful exercise, and then, with an instinctive feeling which told her if she would interest him at all she must keep to the one only subject which filled his mind to the exclusion of all others, she again addressed him:

"David," she said, kindly, "I do not see why thee should blame thyself so, even after all that's come and gone. To go back to the beginning, I believe thy daughter's match was never one of thy choosing."

"It was not, it was not!" said the preacher, stopping short, and facing her with eager glance. "You are right, Sarah; you do me justice there. I never liked the marriage, and, to go still farther back, I never wanted my Mary to go to the city at all. What need was there for her to leave me, her loving old father? I could support her here; my salary had fed and clothed and made us comfortable when there were more of us. Why need she go to learn to be a teacher? She was learned enough, and good enough, and pretty enough for me. Why did she not stay in the home and the station into which the good Lord put her? I did not want her to go, but I was overruled. They told me I was selfish to keep her here; that I was standing in her light; that it was for her good, and I was selfish to refuse; that it was weak in me. And then I gave consent, and she went, and my home was a home to me no longer. But I bore it. I would not let her know how I missed and wanted her, for I did not mean to be selfish and stand in her way. And so I lived upon her letters, telling me of her success and her happiness. And then came a long letter, telling me of her marriage. Ah! that was a sad day to me."

"Why, David," said the listener, looking up from her knitting-work in surprise, "thee don't mean to say thee did not hear of it till she was really married, does thee?"

"Yes, Sarah, I do. My poor Mary thought to give me a pleasant surprise. She said—she wrote, as she had no dear mother to help her to get ready it was no use to come home, and she seemed to think I should be pleased and proud to hear she was married to a young man so much above her in station; but I never was: I never liked it, and I never felt satisfied. If all was right, why did he not come down, and bring Mary home, and ask my consent? I did not like the hurry, and I did not like the match. I said then just what I say now—that I had far rather have seen my child the wife of a plain farmer or an honest mechanic, who had the power and the will to work for her support, than the wife of that gay, dissipated young man, with all his money and fashion. My friends called it a great match for Mary, and congratulated me upon it; but I did not feel so. Match? It was no match at all. My Mary, with her youth and beauty and innocence, and that wild, reckless spendthrift! A match like that between the serpent and the dove! Ay! and then," said the old father, now warming up with his subject, and speaking with a vehement energy strongly in contrast with his late weak listlessness—"then, when I heard the marriage was kept secret from his father, and Mary had never been noticed by his family, my heart misgave me, and I trembled for my child. I wrote at once to both of them. I conjured him by all he held sacred to have their marriage declared at once; and I entreated Mary, if this was not done, to leave him and return to me. I pointed out to her the risk she ran—that the love which was ashamed of its object was a love unworthy of her. But," he said, his voice sinking, "I suppose Mary loved him. He was young, and gay, and generous, and handsome; and oh, what woman ever listens to counsel against the man she loves! I had answers to my letters—answers from them both. Mary's letter was dutiful and pleading; she owned the truth of all that I had said, as it regarded other cases. But theirs was different; the concealment was only for a time, and was of importance to her husband's interests. She begged me to be patient and suspend my judgment until I knew him; and when I did—when I knew what a kind, devoted husband he was, I, too, should learn to love him. Poor child! it was a true woman's letter—all heart, no head; full of affectionate pleading, but no argument; and I could say no more."

"And his letter—what did he say to thee?"

"Cold and haughty; reminding me that my paternal relation to Mary gave me no right to interfere with his relations to his own family; that the duties I might feel it was incumbent upon me to preach to my rustic congregation were not just applicable to the career of a young man of wealth and fashion; that Mary (I noticed he did not call her his wife) was very happy with him, and then there was a very carefully worded intimation that farther interference on my part might destroy her happiness. That was enough: I saw that the husband of my only child was to be no son to me, and I never addressed him again; and months went by and I heard no more, and then came a few loving lines from Mary to tell me of the birth of her little child, but she did not mention her husband; and then there came to me, gradually, stories of his follies, of his extravagance, of his dissipation. I heard of him in gay scenes, but his wife was never mentioned, and I tried to think it was her duty as a mother which kept her away, but I feared, I feared; and not long after that one of my people brought me word he was about to marry a rich creole girl; that his marriage with my poor child was all a sham; that he had tired of her, and had treated her with unkindness in hopes to drive her from him; and failing in that, he had deserted her, and declared their marriage was not a legal one."

"The world's people are hard-hearted, I think, David," said the woman, meekly, as the old man paused and wiped his brow, wet with the great drops of excitement.

"Yes, yes, Sarah, they are so; and so was I, hard-hearted, hard-hearted—yes, that was it—that was the worst of all. I think I was crazy; I was wild with shame and rage; I never doubted the truth of the terrible story; I believed my poor child was all they said she was, and it never occurred to me that she too might have been innocent. I thought of her pure mother, from whose arms I had received her, and my brain grew mad with rage and shame; and when that very night she came to me—my Mary with her baby on her bosom—and begged me to shelter them, I would not listen to her. I bade her look for the last time upon the gray hairs she had dishonored, and depart. Oh, God forgive me! God forgive me! but I thought I was doing my duty—I, the appointed minister of Him who said, 'Go in peace; thy sins are forgiven thee!'"

"David! David! don't thee talk so wildly," said the gentle sister-in-law. "Don't thee, now; sure thee'll be all beat out if thee takes on so;" and rising as she spoke she led him gently back to his chair again.

"It makes little odds, Sarah," he said, submissively seating himself as she indicated: "the feeling is ever at my heart, and it is of little consequence whether I speak of it or not."

"But now, David, now when we know poor Mary was not sinful but sinned against, I think thee has much to be thankful for. I can imagine thy distress while thee held her to be an outcast: that was dreadful for thee; but now thee knows she was innocent, and is not that a great comfort to thee?"

"Yes, Sarah, it is a very great comfort, in one sense, certainly. But do you not see that while I thank God she is innocent I feel doubly the unkindness of my treatment of her; the more she was worthy of love and pity the worse seems my harsh rejection of her."

"And how long is it now since thee learned the truth of the story?"

"About three months ago. I saw his death in the papers, his death by accident. He was cut off in the midst of his sins, and only lived a few hours after his fall. Oh that was terrible, terrible, Sarah. May God have mercy upon him! Soon after, two young men, his lawyers they said they were, came to me inquiring for my daughter. They said he had retracted his vile slander upon his death-bed; had declared Mary to be indeed his lawful wife; and had signed papers to that effect, to give his property to her and her child; but had charged them not to make his marriage public, or even known unto his father, until they had found Mary and her child, and placed them in such a position as she ought to hold as his wife. And that was their errand here; they came to me for directions where to seek her; and alas! I could not tell them. Since then they have been upon the search, and so have I, but thus far, as you know, in vain."

"Oh! but thee will find her; depend on't; it's borne in on my mind thee will."

"I do not know. Three months is a long time to have searched in vain. And now— But hark! who is that? I heard a man's step on the planks. It is your son. Yes; it is Jonathan," he said, as a tall, slouching figure, in great-coat and umbrella, strode past the window like the very spirit of the storm. "He may have news!"

It is Jonathan, sure enough, as thee says," said the mother, "and as wet as water, too, I'll be bound, out in all this rain and storm;" and throwing down her knitting, she hurried out to open the door for her son, admitting, as she did so, a fierce gust of wind, which slammed every door in the house, and filled it with a salt dampness, which seemed to rush in like a smoke.

"Why, Jonathan!" said the mother, "ain't thee drowned? Come in, child; come in; do," she continued, addressing thus the tall lad, who, though armed and equipped with great-coat, slouched hat, and umbrella, seemed to be externally in a state of liquefaction.

"Come in, child! come in; don't stop to fuss with thy umbrella," she said, as the youth made several ineffectual attempts to furl his top-sails, in which he was frustrated by the wind—"but come in doors; do."

"Jonathan, Jonathan!" eagerly interposed the old man, who had followed his sister-in-law to the door, "have you—have you got any tidings? have you learned any thing?"

"Do let me in first, uncle," said the man rather roughly; "it is storming hard—raining cats and dogs, as they say; it's no night to stand on the door-stone and hold a parley;" and as he spoke he conquered the refractory umbrella, and, stepping inside the door, shut and bolted it as if instinctively to keep out the storming.

"I know, I know," said the old man, meekly, "I am very selfish, very; but forgive me, Jonathan, I am very miserable! Come in, my dear boy—forgive me, Jonathan, come in!"

"Why, Jonny!" said the mother, laying her hand upon his wet sleeve, "I declare thee is as wet as a sop! I don't believe thee's got a dry thread about thee! Thee is all of a drip like a water-spout. Thee'd best not go into uncle's room. Come into the kitchen, won't thee? there's a nice hot fire there, and I'll have thee as dry as a chip in less than ten minutes. Don't thee stop here in the entry to take thy coat off or thee'll raise an inundation, that's certain;" and she guided him into the fire-lighted kitchen, much as if he had been a well-trained pair of oxen and she their teamster.

Here, under his mother's able and zealous management, by the help of dry clothing and the glowing fire, Jonathan soon became, as she had predicted, as dry as a chip; but the drying process seemed internal as well as external, for he requested a cup of hot tea to take the shivers out of him.

"Why, mother," he said, as standing upon the warm hearth he slipped his feet into the slippers she had laid before him, "you can have no idea, sitting here, what a wild, terrible night it is outside. It was as much as I could to get here. I thought at one time I should have to give it up and turn back—the wind and hail beat so in my face, and the sleet cuts like a knife. But never mind, I'm all right now, 'dry as a bone!' Thank you, that will do nicely. Now for a fresh handkerchief, and I am a made man."

As the young man, thus speaking, turned round, shaking himself in his warm, dry garments with much satisfaction, and feeling himself carefully over, to be sure that the drying process was complete, his eye fell upon the old man, who had crept noiselessly after him, and now stood silently in the shadow of the chimney-piece, his tall figure bent forward in an attitude of meek patience and intense expectation, his thin hands turning nervously one over the other, and an eager question in every feature of his old care-worn face; and the youth, who, though petted and half-spoiled by his mother, was really a kind, warm-hearted fellow when not storm-soaked, was touched by the look of patient suffering worn into the lines of his face.

"I really have worn much to tell you, after all, uncle!" he began, in softened accents.

"Yes, yes! Jonathan; yes, my dear boy," said the old man, coming eagerly forward; and then, recollecting himself, he added, sadly, "but I—I can wait, Jonathan; don't mind me, you are tired and weary—I will wait."

"No, uncle, it is not much I have got to tell you, but I will tell you all I can. I think we have got some little tidings of her."

"What? what?" gasped the trembling old man, his quivering lips rather forming the word than giving utterance to the sound.

"Well, no great, to be sure, only I think we are on the right track now. A young woman, answering to the description of Mary, with a little child, was seen going into New York a week ago last Thursday, and I think there is no doubt it was her."

"Going—how? Jonathan, how was she traveling?"

The young man hesitated and glanced anxiously at his mother, as if doubting what reply to make. The clear-headed, practical woman caught the look, and replied to it as if he had spoken.

"Speak out, Jonathan—speak out, my son. In cases like this any concealment is unwise; thee had better tell uncle all thee knows."

"Well, then," said the young man, "she was afoot."

"On foot! traveling on foot at this season! my delicate Mary. Oh, my child, my child! out in all this terrible storm it may be."

Again the good, practical common-sense of the little Quakeress came to the rescue.

"No, no, David," she said, soothingly, "that is not likely at all; thee's borrowing trouble now sure; for if Mary was so near New York a week ago, it is not likely she is out traveling the country to-day. Cheer up, David! I think it is a great thing to hear of her so lately as only one week ago—just to hear she and her child were alive and well, only one week ago, David, that is much for thee!"

"And now," said the father, turning to Jonathan, "what do you think to do next?"

"Well, uncle, just what you think best. If it suits you, I will set off for New York."

"Yes, yes," said the father, trembling with eagerness; "that's best, and I will go with you. Let us set off at once—at once, Jonathan! I am ready—let us lose no time."

"Not to-night, uncle, if you please," said Jonathan; "you forget the storm, and, besides, I do not think it is necessary for you to go too. I will go alone, and do all you could do."

"No, no, Jonathan—let me go too—I must—I know you will do all you can—I know you are very kind; but it seems to me I should find her sooner than any one else. You must let me go with you!"

"I think uncle had better go, Jonny," said the mother; "the fatigue will be less wearing to him than this weary waiting and suspense. I think he had better go with thee."

"Oh yes, Sarah!" said the old man, "you are right; any thing that is action would be better than this terrible stillness. Let us go at once;" and he turned as if to look for his hat and cane.

"But, David," said the calm voice of the widow, "thee can't go to-night, thee knows."

"Yes, yes," he said, eagerly. "Why not? I shall not mind a little snow or rain—why not set off at once?—I am ready."

"Lord bless us!" said Jonathan, aside to his mother, "only hear him! wouldn't you think he could swim like a water-rat? It was all I could do to hold myself up against the wind. Why, he'd be wrecked before we got out of the lane. Go to-night—go to glory, more like!"

"Jonathan!" said the mother, reprovingly.

"Well, mother, I know; but it is too ridiculous to listen to. Here it is, a regular built tempest overhead, and rain, snow, and sleet up to one's knees; the road as slippery as the one which leads where sinners go; and to hear that jolly old cove talk of going off to-night, on foot, as if it was a moonlight night in June—I can't stand it."

"David," said the woman, quietly, "of course thee wants to get to New York as soon as thee can, and to do so thee must go in the cars, and they don't run again to-night, thee knows. What time do they go in the morning, Jonathan, does thee know?"

"Half past seven in the morning; and if uncle can be ready then—"

"Of course he can. Does thee understand, brother? thee must be ready by seven to-morrow. I'll have thy things all in order for thee; and thee must eat a good supper to-night, and try to sleep, and be all bright to begin thy journey; so come now and eat thy supper. I think thee might feel encouraged enough to relish thy tea to-night; and I'm sure, Jonny, thee must be hungry, so come in and have thy tea while it's hot—it's all ready, I guess; and, my son, thee must be up by times, and ask the milkman if he can take uncle to the station in his wagon, and after that he will not be exposed, even if it storms to-morrow."

"Oh yes, I'll see to that," said the young man, kindly, and mollified possibly by the prospect of his supper; "and, uncle, keep up your heart: I think we shall find Mary; and if we do, the law shall do her justice."

"Justice!" said the old man, stopping short on his way to the table; "what justice can the law do for my poor child?"

"Why, did not the lawyers say, if they could only find her, they had ample proof of the marriage, and she and her child would come in for all his property? By George! I'd like to see Mary have her own, every cent she is entitled to, as his widow."

"Never mind the money, Jonathan—I do not want it," said the old minister, opening his hands, and holding them up with an expression of abhorrence—"I don't want his money, not one cent of it!—what good did it ever do him?—what good would it do his child? I want my daughter, my comfort, my darling. We shall have enough to live upon; let them keep their gold—only let me have my child, with her good name vindicated, and I will be satisfied."

"Well, uncle, that may do for you; but, I say, if we find Mary, I sha'n't rest till she has all she is entitled to. And now, mother, do let us have that tea you have been telling us of—hot and strong, if you please—for remember I've had a long walk and a cold bath since my dinner."

The unseasonable storm had passed away, and the bright beams of the April sun were shining cheerfully through the lofty windows of a noble private library, save where their light was met and mellowed by a cloud of crimson silk drapery. The room into which that soft golden spring light was pouring was spacious and lofty, and fitted up in a style that did justice to the taste and munificence of its proprietor. The walls, from the rich carpet, in whose downy luxuriance, the hastiest step sunk noiselessly, to the vaulted ceiling, rich with the quaint carvings of Gothic tracery, were filled with valuable books and rare historical paintings; and the room, adorned as it was with marble busts and groups of classic statuary, would have looked too spacious and too grand for daily occupation, had not its stately magnificence been softened down by an indescribable air of luxurious comfort and inhabitancy.

It might have been that this redeeming feature was bestowed upon it by the various articles of feminine employment which lay scattered around, and by something which told of the habitual presence of woman and childhood; for a vase of freshly-arranged flowers drooped gracefully on the ormolu table which held a lady's pearl inlaid writing-desk; a costly rocking-horse, "all saddled, all bridled, all fit for the fight," was stabled in the remote corner of an alcove, and all the gregarious inhabitants of a "Noah's ark," and a heap of tiny literature lay piled in gay but incongruous confusion at the foot of a majestic pair of globes, and seemed to prove that, with all its lofty pretensions, the apartment was the commonly-frequented morning room of the household. Its only occupants now, however, with the exception of a splendid greyhound that stretched out upon the rug before the ample marble hearth, lay sleepily watching the dusky fire as it smouldered away beneath the yellow sunbeams, were two middle-aged gentlemen; for the master of the house, who was an elderly man, and an habitual invalid, was still in his own room, and his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Forrester, the widow of his youngest son, was in attendance upon him.

Of the two gentlemen, who, deeply ensconced in the cushioned chairs that looked far too luxurious for study, sat on either side of a table heaped with unopened letters, pamphlets, late publications, magazines, scientific reviews, and all the literary bijouterie of the day, the elder, whose slightly bald temples revealed a fine development of the intellectual organs, and whose manner was marked by a slight formality, was Herman Frazier, the solicitor and confidential legal adviser of Colonel Forrester, by whom he had been summoned to make certain required alterations in his will, and who was now awaiting in the library a call to his client's private apartment; the youngest gentleman, whose air and manner betrayed possibly more of the polish of social life, was the Rev. Arthur Morrison, the private tutor of the Colonel's grandson.

"Yes," said the latter gentleman, as if in answer to some remark of the other, "he is a noble and highly-gifted boy, certainly. Nature has endowed him as liberally as Fortune; he is a child of uncommon promise, in mind and person; and yet, I tremble to think how far short the fulfillment of his character may fall of the expectations we are forming of him."

"How so?" inquired his companion.

"Because his situation is too perilous; as, in the natural world, there are some mediums in passing through which even a pure ray of light direct from heaven is bent from its true course, so, in the moral world, there are situations that may warp and pervert the noblest natures; and this boy, the pet and declared heir of his aged grandfather, the idol of his widowed mother, by turns the plaything and the master of the entire household, and the love and admiration of all who look upon him, how can he learn self-government? Nine chances out of ten that he may grow up an unhappy, capricious being—a selfish friend, an ungrateful son!"

"I hope not; surely the reins are in your own hands, Morrison."

"Not so much as you may suppose," said the tutor, sadly; "not so much perhaps as they should be; my influence thrown into the opposite scale can do but little to nullify the force of circumstance and station; and besides, if the veritable truth be told, even I am not quite proof against his witchery. His character, young as he is, is so full of interest—so fearless, yet so affectionate—so ardent, yet so frank—so hasty and imperious, yet so candid and noble, that I love him in spite of his faults; or, rather, I believe I must say, I love his very faults, even in spite of myself; his very errors have their rise in something noble, and I always feel as if in weeding out a fault I might root up a virtue; yet he is forever in mischief. There he is now," he continued, as the angry tones of a child's voice made themselves heard in the study—"he is in the conservatory, lecturing old Parkins the gardener, possibly for turning his dog out of the green-houses, or for complaining that his rabbits eat up all the cauliflowers; my office is no sinecure, I can assure you. Come, will you go with me, and help read the riot act?"

The two gentlemen rose, and crossing the hall, approached the open door of the conservatory, where, screened by the plants, they had (unseen themselves) a full view of the unequal disputants.

The young heir, a fairy creature of six years old, stood with his back toward them; he had ceased speaking as they reached the door; but his closing words and lordly toss of his little curly head told that his harangue had been in the imperative mood.

"Indeed, Master Leon, you mustn't," answered the gardener, as he disengaged a tasseled cap from the very centre of a flowering orange-tree, where it had been tossed in anger, and handed it back to its imperious little owner, who received it with all the haughty grace that might have befitted a Cæsar. "Indeed you must be more careful: I can't have my plants broke so; I can't indeed!"

"Your plants, Parkins! I tell you they are mine; mine, to do what I please with, to break and destroy, or give away if I please. I heard my grandpapa tell Mr. Clifford only yesterday that every thing he had in the wide world was mine, and he had only me. Your flowers, indeed! nonsense! I tell you they are my flowers, all mine!"

"Well, Master Leon," said the man, sullenly, "maybe they be; I don't know about that. I did not mean they was mine, to be sure; I know they ain't, that's only my way of speaking. I only meant that Mrs. Forrester give me the care of 'em, and so they was mine to tend and take care of, that's all. I know your ma sets great store by that orange-tree. Your own father give it to her, a little slip of a thing in a bunch of flowers when they was married, and she got me to root it for her, and I did, and she sets her life by it; and that climbing rose your dog has tore down she brought out from town herself, and told me to take great care of it, and now, just look at it!"

"Well, what if she did?" answered the boy proudly, though his chest heaved and his cheek grew crimson; "mamma loves me better than all her roses, I know!"

"So she does, Leon," said the tutor, now stepping forward, and putting his hand gently on his little pupil's shoulder. "But do you think it is the best return you can make for all her love to destroy the flowers she prizes, and bring blame and discredit upon the servant she values and trusts?"

"No, no, indeed!" cried the repentant boy, springing into the arms of his friendly monitor, while the bright tears rolled from beneath his long silken lashes. "I did not think of that; I was wrong, very wrong. Parkins, I am sorry I spoke so to you," he said, holding out his little hand to the old man. "Ponto shall not come in here again if I can keep him out; and mamma shall not blame you either, for I will tell her it was I that broke her beautiful tree, and that Ponto tore down the roses."

"Lord bless you!" said the old man, cordially grasping the little hand so frankly offered him. "You are the very moral of your own dear father; and maybe the rose is not so much hurt after all," he said, good-naturedly, as he lifted up the torn and trampled wreaths. "I'll trim it and trail it up again, and maybe Mrs. Forrester will not happen to take notice of it, and will never know it was broken."

"Oh, but she shall know it," said the boy, "for I will go to her this moment and tell her all the mischief I have done. I had rather have her know it."

"Not now, my dear Leon," said the tutor, gently detaining him. "Mrs. Forrester is with your grandfather now, and it is time to begin your lessons. Some time when you are less heated and excited you may tell your mamma, if you please: I should rather you should; but not now." And as the tutor and Leon entered the library Mr. Frazier was called into the sick-room of his invalid client.

He found Colonel Forrester (who was a fine, benevolent-looking old man, whose pale high features wore a look of languor) sitting erect, wrapped in his velvet dressing-gown, and propped up by cushions in his easy-chair before a table covered with papers and writing materials. Mrs. Forrester, his daughter-in-law, a young and still lovely woman, was sitting with him, and they both received Mr. Frazier with courteous kindness.

"And now, dear father," said Mrs. Forrester, as, after arranging the cushions, placing a restorative upon the table, and slipping a vinaigrette into the old man's thin fingers, she tenderly bent and pressed her lips to his pale, calm brow, "do not tire yourself in talking as you did yesterday with Mr. Clifford, will you?"

"Never-fear, dear Helen," said the old Colonel, kindly, "I will be careful." And then Mrs. Forrester, having significantly pointed out to Mr. Frazier the situation of the bell, in case he should wish to summon an attendant, bade them good-morning and retired.

After her departure Colonel Forrester entered at once upon the business he wished to have arranged, calmly and distinctly pointing out the alterations he thought necessary to be made, while the lawyer took full but rapid notes of his expressed wishes.

"And all this property," he said, as he ran his eye over a paper the Colonel had given him, "is, if I understand you, to go to—"

"To my grandson, Francis Leon Forrester," and again there was silence, while the lawyer resumed his notes; at last, looking up from his papers, he said,

"Excuse me, but I thought this property—I mean the St. Leon property—belonged to your eldest son."

"You are right, it did," said the Colonel, with a sigh. "Let me explain. My first wife was the only child of Francis St. Leon. She died when my first child, Henry, was born, and all her own property which she inherited from her mother went to him. My younger son was the only child of my second wife, Olive Tracy. She had no fortune; but St. Leon, the grandfather of Henry, left, as you may have heard, a large estate. After the death of his daughter he became much attached to my second wife and her child, who was named for him; and when he died he left his property to his grandson Henry, but with the proviso that, if he died unmarried, the estate was to be given to me, to hold during my lifetime: but I was to give it by will to Francis and his children. Henry did, as you know, die unmarried not long ago; and my son Francis had already been called away; of course, as he left but one child, my little grandson Leon, all that property as well as my own goes to him. There are no other heirs to either of the estates, and I suppose he must be heir too to what Henry derived from his mother; but his estate has not been settled yet, his own lawyers will attend to that."

"Excuse the pain I have given you, Sir," said the solicitor: "I understand it now." He made a few more minutes, asked and received a few more directions, and then gathering up the papers, bade the Colonel adieu, and ringing the bell for an attendant, left the apartment.

The beams of the same bright spring sunshine which streamed so clearly and cheerily through the plate-glass windows of Colonel Forrester's library were dimly struggling through the dusky casements of an upper room in an obscure lodging-house in the city; but upon how different a scene was that golden light pouring its soft radiance! The room, a long, low garret, extended the length of the house, open to the rafters overhead, and with bare, naked walls, unpainted, unfinished, even unplastered, lighted by small windows at either end, and nearly destitute of furniture; it looked, and indeed it was, one of the very cheapest and most desolate abodes in which abject poverty ever sought to secure for itself a temporary shelter.

In the middle of the room, upon a rude, uncovered table immediately in front of the dim windows, lay the half-naked body of a little child, a boy of apparently four or five years old, the thin and tattered robe revealing its fair and beautiful proportions—fair, except that gaunt famine had somewhat narrowed the chest and made sharp the outlines of the small, delicate limbs, and pinched the pure, finely-cut features. The body had evidently been hastily deposited, and by rude hands, upon the table, and the little, white, ghastly, upturned face was bare to the gaze of the shuddering spectators; and where the soft rings of glossy, fair hair fell shimmering back from the high marble brow the blue veins looked thin and shrunken. But this was not all, for the clenching of the tiny hands, the set teeth, and widely-opened but glassy blue eyes told of a sudden and violent death.

Close by the body of the child, with her thin, skeleton hands clutching its scanty robe, her head bent low upon the table, her dark hair concealing her face and falling in disheveled masses over the bosom of the boy, crouched the miserable mother—the suspected infanticide! An hour ago and she had been alone—alone with her dead, alone with her great, shoreless, measureless woe; but now the story of violence, the suspicion of foul and unnatural murder, had crept down the long, steep stairway and stolen into the obscure street and out by by-way and thoroughfare, curdling the listener's blood, and poisoning even the fresh morning air with its sickening horror. And with the strange love of the horrible which pervades many minds, they had come up thither—men, women, and children—drawn, as the vulture and the carrion-crow, by the scent of blood they came—stealing in, one by one, in fearful silence and awful curiosity, and looking in upon the wretched mother and the dead boy as if it were some tragic spectacle of the play-house.

Thicker and thicker they had gathered; the laborer from his work; the shopman from his counter, the idler from the corner; the loafer from the street; women from the wash-tub and the cooking-stove; children from their play; till the long room was crowded with a dense mass of pallid, eager, human faces; yet a silence almost like the silence of deepest midnight hung over the strange assembly, and not a sound broke upon the stillness, except when an occasional convulsive sob, or a deep, shuddering sigh burst involuntarily from some absorbed spectator, and broke the fearful hush which had preceded it; and silent and motionless as the cold bosom of the dead child before her still bent the miserable and unknown mother.

Presently there was a stir in the hall below—quick steps ascending the miserable stairs—a parley held upon the landing-place, and voices of authority inquiring the way; and it was whispered by some one near the door that the doctors and the coroner's jury were coming; and as a party of gentlemen entered the room the unauthorized crowd, swaying to right and left, gave them passage-way to the central object of attention.

Shuddering the new-comers approached the table, and shuddering they surveyed the pitiful spectacle before them; a few moments they, too, stood in silence, sadly contemplating it, and then the coroner stooped, and touching the arm of the miserable mother, he asked, probably according to some set formula for such cases made and provided, if she was guilty of the child's death.

But the question fell upon unheeding ears; not once since the crowd had watched her had the wretched woman lifted up her head, or changed her constrained and painful attitude, or betrayed the slightest consciousness of what was going on around her, or indeed given any signs of life; and the question had to be repeated and shouted into her ear two or three times before her attention was aroused.

At last she seems to hear, and lifting up her face, which (famished, ghastly, and colorless as that of the corpse on which she had pillowed it) still retained traces of rare beauty, she looked with dull, uncomprehending eyes upon the fearful scene around her. Slowly she turned her leaden gaze from the group closest about her, the physicians and the coroner's jury, to the wild sea of human faces, all bending their terrible eyes upon her, and slowly came back to her her consciousness and memory—until, as her gaze rested upon the body of the child, the terrible truth seemed to break in upon her; and suddenly a wild light leaped into her eye, a deep crimson glowed upon her cheek, and dashing back the disordered hair from her face, she laid her hand upon the boy's icy bosom and answered, in tones of frantic energy,

"No, no!" she said, "not guilty, not guilty! I harmed him not, I could not; I am his mother, did not you know that? No, no! 'twas you and you that murdered my boy; yes! you, ye hard, un pitying men and women, who refused his mother a crust of bread for her famishing child.

"Yes, I will tell you; my husband, the father of this child, deserted us in our utmost need. He left me sick, and friendless, and penniless to the mercy of a merciless world; and worse, his slander, the slander of him who should have shielded us, closed against me the heart and the door ever open to me before; and no one, no one, not even my nearest and dearest, believed my sad story. Want came: and I applied to the parish for aid, but they said I had no settlement here; and I asked for employment, and they said I was a stranger and they dared not trust me. And beggary came: I asked for charity at the houses of the rich and great, but they told me I was young and healthy, and bade me work for my living; and then I parted with my garments, sold them, one by one, to procure food and shelter for my child till my scanty dress shocked the nice sense of those who go, night after night, to the opera to sit and witness, unblushingly, the hired display of woman's limbs; and I fled from the streets. And then I saw my boy's sweet eyes grow dim with want, and his blue lips turn gasping away, and quivering, shape themselves into a voiceless cry for 'bread, bread!' and I had no bread to give him. What was I to do? Had God forgotten us, the widow and the fatherless? I could not tell; I thought I could endure no more, I believed I was dying, and must I, could I, leave him behind to struggle, to suffer, perhaps to sin; to purchase it might be a short life of want and misery, with the loss of all Heaven's blessedness? And then the Tempter came to me and whispered awful things. He said my child was pure from every thought of sin, why might I not send him up in his bright innocence to Him who feedeth the young ravens when they cry, and where he should know hunger and want no more forever? Why might not his mother's love force open the gates of heaven and let him in? There he should be safe! I should never see him again, that I knew, for I should be a murderess! But would it not make a heaven of hell itself to think my boy was with the cherubim—drinking from the river of life, and eating of the bread of heaven for ever and ever? But I did not do it—I did not, I could not, I had not the courage, I was too weak; and besides I was a Christian—I would not listen to the Tempter. I left my child alone while I went out to seek for food for him; I left him alone and asleep yonder, and I came back to find him here and thus—dead! dead! Oh, is there no mercy in heaven for me? And you thought I had murdered him, my child, my darling! Ah, if I had—if I had periled my own soul to save my child, you would have called me an unnatural mother, would not you? ha, ha, ha!" and with that wild, unearthly laughter bubbling from her pale lips the frenzied woman sunk down again beside her child in strong convulsions.

As the two physicians, aided by the now pitying by-standers, lifted the poor unconscious mother from her sad resting-place and carried her to the miserable bed, two new-comers were added to the group around the table. These were the keepers of the lodging-house—a coarse but honest-looking man, and his wife, vulgar and most slatternly in her dress, but with a kind, motherly face, expressive now of strong emotions of pity and horror.

The testimony of the man at once cleared up the mystery which hung about the case, and rescued his poor lodger from all suspicion of the most foul and unnatural crime, at which humanity shudders. His testimony, corroborated by that of his wife, and given with much unnecessary circumlocution of words, but with evident directness of purpose, when cleared of its superabundant detail, amounted to the plain fact, that his wife having taken up some coffee or other articles of food to their poor lodger, whose poverty they well knew and pitied, found she had gone out, and discovered the child hanging dead between the bed and the wall, where he had probably fallen, and was too weak to be able to extricate himself. Filled with horror, she had rushed wildly down stairs, and proclaimed the terrible fact; and while her husband went up, removed the body of the child to the table, sent for the coroner and the physicians, and went forth himself to seek the mother, the wife, overcome by the awful shock, had lain in strong and continued hysterics. The man's search had, however, missed the mother, who had in the mean time returned, wholly unprepared for the awful scene awaiting her; and the man having just got back from his unavailing errand, had come up at once to give in his testimony. As an examination of the little body fully confirmed this account, the coroner's jury at once rendered their verdict of "Accidental death." And when this was fully understood by the lookers-on, a few earnest words from the coroner soon cleared the room of its motley assemblage; and then, having done all which could now be done for the sad principals in this terrible tragedy, the gentleman, having commended the mother to the pity and care of the keepers of the establishment, leaving with them money enough to meet the present wants of the case, and promising to return and make the necessary arrangements for the burial of the child and the removal of the woman, they too departed.

"George," said the elder of the two medical men, as together they made their way down the creaking, rickety staircase, and gladly emerged into the welcome fresh air and sunshine of the open street, doubly welcome after the scene they had just quitted—"I wish, if you are not particularly engaged, you would walk with me as far as my brother's office. I want to consult him, and I want you to go with me. The fact is," he said, putting his arm into that of his companion, "that I am faint and sick with horror."

"Certainly; I will go with you with pleasure," said his friend. "And I do not wonder that you feel faint; I declare I almost feel so myself; that terrible scene has quite unnerved you, nor can I wonder at it. I never beheld any thing in real life half so tragic as that frantic woman's look and manner. I protest I am afraid she will haunt us."

"It was horrible! horrible indeed, George!" answered his friend, shuddering as he spoke. "And more than that, George," he continued, convulsively pressing the arm upon which he leaned; "was there nothing, nothing in that wretched creature's look and tones which reminded you of—of—"

"Of—of what, Charles? Good Heaven, how you tremble! What do you mean?"

"Did she recall to you no memory of any one whom we used to know?—think, now?"

"No, Charles; by my word no! What and whom are you thinking of? And yet, since you suggest a likeness—oh! Charles, the eyes, the figure—and, more than all, the voice!—and yet, it could not be—it is not possible—it could not be her, she was well married! Charles, you can not mean the beautiful girl, the teacher from the country, whom we used to see in old Selwyn's pew at church?"

"The very same—Mary Stevenson."

"I forget the name, but I mean the girl whose beauty we all used to rave about. Why, did not she marry Harry Forrester? She did, I know."

"So she did, George."

"Well, then, that settles the question; it could not be her."

"Did you never hear that Forrester deserted her, declaring their marriage was not a formal or legal one?"

"Not a word of it; and I don't believe it now. The miserable scoundrel—she was only too good for him! Do not you remember our seeing her with him at the regatta, and afterward at the play? It was soon after their marriage—and how we all of us admired her loveliness and her gentle, lady-like manners? I remember well her intense enjoyment of the gay scene, which was all new to her, of course. Why, she was perfectly radiant in beauty and happiness; and I believe she was as good as she was beautiful. I honestly believe she was his lawful wife."

"I know that she was."

"You know it, Charles?"

"Yes; and it is about this that I want to consult my brother John. All this took place while you and I were in Germany, and it was only about a month ago that I chanced to hear of it. Possibly you do not know—for I did not till then—that when Forrester was dying (you knew, perhaps, he was killed by being thrown from his horse?)—"

"No; I did not even know that he was dead."

"Well, then, he sent for John and his partner Ames (they were his lawyers), and owned the legality of his marriage, and furnished them with necessary proofs to establish her claim, and made his will, leaving all his property to her and his child; but he strictly enjoined upon them not to disclose the facts till they had found Mary, and placed her in a respectable position, which no one doubted could be done at once. But John told me how earnestly and vainly he had pursued the search—tracing the poor girl and her child stage by stage of their wearisome journey on foot to her native town, where they learned the false story of her shame had preceded her, and her indignant father—a stern, old, orthodox clergyman—had spurned the poor, broken-hearted wanderer from his door, and they could trace her no farther."

"Good Heavens! then it might be her! What must she not have suffered! She spoke of sickness, want, famine, and madness. And oh! what a fearful item to add to Harry Forrester's long account."

"The scoundrel!—don't waste your pity upon him!"

"Well, you may be in time to save the mother; but that beautiful boy! Oh! if the discovery had been made only one day sooner it might have saved him. And to think of what that child was born to! Why, if he had lived, and had his rights, I suppose he would have been almost a millionaire."

"Quite one, I believe; he would have been heir to all his father's property, which was very considerable; all his grandfather St. Leon's wealth, which was very large; and, I suppose, half of the Forrester estate."

"And who heirs all this wealth, failing him, do you know?"

"A little fellow about the same age, the child of Colonel Forrester's second son. How strange it is!—he has been brought up in luxury and ease from his birth; and this boy, who really owned it all, has been a pauper and an outcast, and died at last in want and misery!"

Yes—it is terrible to think of! That wan, starved, half-naked, miserable, though beautiful child—that little, ghastly, coffinless object—was in reality—think of it!—St. Leon's true heir!

INFANCY AND AGE.

INFANCY was but the beaming
Of the life's morn's blushing ray;
Each weak thought, prophetic dreaming
Of the future far away;
How alike those childish fancies
Is the certainty of now;
How the memory backward dances
To the distant fairy past—
Seeming e'en from thence to cast
Childish dimples on the brow,
And to yield, as once before,
Every serious matter o'er.

Age is like the day-god setting
In the West, beyond the plain;
Life's faint measure fast forgetting,
Listening to another strain;
First it murmurs, faintly stealing
Through the portals of the tomb,
Then 'tis heard, its soul revealing,
As the spirit passes through,
Sweet in cadence, varied—new,
Chasing every sense of gloom
From the soul, and placing there
Spotless robes for it to wear.

GEORGE H. THOMAS.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THOMAS.

IN the last number of this Magazine was given a sketch of General Sherman, in which it was endeavored to show that the distinctive feature of his character is a certain nervousness of thought and action inspiring a restless and resistless energy. A good idea of General Thomas may be obtained by contrasting him with Sherman. One may be called a nervous man, while the other is a man of nerve. Sherman derives his strength from the momentum resulting from the rapidity with which he moves; Thomas moves slowly, but with equally resistless power, and accomplishes his purposes by sheer strength. Sherman is naturally the dashing leader of light, flying columns; Thomas the director of heavily-massed columns. He may be called heavy ordnance in contradistinction to Sherman, who may be likened to a whole battery of light rifle-guns; or, in the language of the prize-ring, Sherman is a light-weight and quick fighter, while Thomas is a heavy, ponderous pugilist, whose every blow is deadly. Sherman's plans are original, embracing new rules of war; Thomas originates nothing, but most skillfully directs his army on well-defined principles of the art. Sherman jumps at conclusions; Thomas's mind and body act with equal deliberation. His conclusions are arrived at after long and mature reflection. Sherman never takes thought of unexpected contingencies or failure. There is always a remedy for any failure of a part of Thomas's plans, or for the delinquencies of subordinates. Sherman never hesitates to answer. Thomas is slow to reply. One is quick and positive. The other is slow but equally positive. Thomas thinks twice before speaking once; and when he speaks his sentences are arranged so compactly, and, as it were, so economically, that they convey his idea at once. It is given as advice, but men receive it as an order and obey it implicitly.

The habits of the two men are radically different. Sherman is an innovator on the customs, not only of the army but every phase of social life, and is at least one generation ahead of the American people, fast as it imagines itself. Thomas belongs to a past generation, and his exceedingly regular habits belong to the "good old time." He has been confirmed by long service in the habits of camp, and appears never to be satisfied unless living, as is customary, in camps. In September, 1862, his division of Buell's army was encamped at Louisville, Kentucky, his quarters being in the outskirts of the city. While encamped here, a member of General Halleck's staff arrived from Washington city and delivered to Thomas an order to relieve Buell, and assume command of the Army of the Ohio. In order to put himself in communication with the Commander-in-Chief, Thomas was compelled to ride into the city and take rooms at the hotel nearest the telegraph office. He employed the day in communicating with General Halleck, urging the retention of Buell, and in declining the proposed promotion. Late at night he retired to his bed. But the change from a camp cot to clean feathers was too much for the General, and he found it impossible to sleep; and at a late hour in the night he was compelled to send his Provost Marshal to his head-quarters for his camp-cot. The reorganization of the army, the murder of General Nelson, and other events occurring about the same time, conspired to keep the General a guest at the hotel for a week. During all that time he slept as usual on his cot, banished the chamber-maids from his room, and depended for such duty as they usually performed on his old colored servant.

His style of living in camp is comfortable and even elegant. His mess consists of himself and two aids. His mess ware is principally silver of elaborate finish. The writer breakfasted once or twice with the General during the Chickamauga campaign. On the occasion of each visit daylight and breakfast were announced simultaneously by an elderly, dignified, and cleanly attired colored servant, who brought an excellent whisky punch, with "Colonel Flynt's compliments," as an appetizer. The breakfast-table was spread under the fly of the tent which served as a kitchen, and on it smoked fresh beef, ham, and strong black coffee. At each silver plate was a napkin of the purest white, artistically folded in the latest style of the first-class hotels, a silver water-goblet, a china cup, and the usual knives and silver forks. Better beef and better coffee could not have been found in the country in which the army was campaigning, while the hot rolls and potatoes baked in the hot ashes of a neighboring fire would have made many a French cook blush.

When beginning the campaign of Atlanta Sherman endeavored to effect an important innovation in the habits of his army by carrying out to the very letter his instructions to "move light," i. e., without extra baggage. In order to impress upon his officers the necessity of setting a good example to the men he published an order, in which he stated that the "General commanding intended making the campaign without tent or baggage." The hint was lost on most of the officers, and among others on Thomas, who moved in his usual heavy style, with a complete head-quarter train and the usual number of tents, adding indeed to the usual allowance, a large wagon arranged with desks, which, when covered by a hospital-tent fly, made a very complete Adjutant-General's office. The campaign began, and Sherman made several days' march without his tent, sleeping any where that night overtook him, but before reaching Resaca he was very glad to take up his abode near Thomas's head-quarters and make use of his tents and Adjutant-General's office.

System and method are absolutely necessary to Thomas's existence, and nothing ruffles or excites him so much as innovations on his habits or changes in his customs. He discards an old coat with great reluctance; and during the earlier part of the war, when his promotions came to him faster than he could wear out his uniforms, it was almost impossible to find him donning the proper dress of his rank. He wore the uniform of a Colonel for several months after he had been confirmed a Brigadier-General, and only donned the proper uniform when going into battle at Mill Spring. He was confirmed a Major-General in June, 1862, but did not mount the twin stars until after the battle of Stone River, fought on the last day of the same year, and then they only found their way to his shoulders by a trick of his body servant. This methodical and systematic feature of his character found an admirable illustration in an incident which occurred during the battle of Chickamauga. After the rout of the corps of M'Cook and Crittenden, Thomas was left to fight the entire rebel army with a single corps of less than twenty thousand men. The enemy, desirous of capturing this force, moved in heavy columns on both his flanks. His artillery opened upon Thomas's troops from front and both flanks; but still they held their ground until Steadman, of Granger's corps, reached them with reinforcements. As Steadman came up and saluted Thomas as he inquired how the battle went. Thomas, in a vexed and indignant manner replied:

"The damned scoundrels are fighting without any system."

Steadman thereupon suggested that he should pay the enemy back in his own coin. Thomas followed his suggestion. As soon as Granger came up with the rest of the corps he assumed the offensive, and while Bragg continued to move on his flanks he pushed forward against the rebel centre, so scattering it by a vigorous blow that, fearful of having his army severed in two, Bragg abandoned his flank movement in order to restore his centre. This delayed the resumption of the battle until nearly sunset, and Thomas was enabled to hold his position until nightfall covered the retirement to Rossville Gap.

Thomas is not easily ruffled. It is difficult alike to provoke his anger or enlist his enthusiasm. He is by no means blind to the gallantry of his men, and never fails to notice and appreciate their deeds, but they never win from him any other than the coldest words in the coldest but at the same time kindest of commendatory tones. He grows really enthusiastic over nothing, though occasionally his anger may be aroused. When it is, his rage is terrible. During the campaign in Kentucky, in pursuit of Bragg in 1862, Thomas was second in command of the army under Buell. The new recruits committed many depredations upon the loyal Kentuckians. While they were passing a small stream near Bardstown, Thomas was approached by a farmer whom he knew to be a good Union man, and who made complaint that one of the General's staff officers had carried off the only horse left on his farm. The General turned black with anger at such an accusation against one of his staff officers, and demanded to know where and who the offender was. The farmer pointed to a mounted infantry officer, but who was attached to one of the regiments and not to the General's staff. The General rode up to him and demanded to know where he had obtained the horse which he rode. The officer replied that he had "impressed" him. The General knew the man had no authority to impress horses, and choking with rage, he poured on the devoted head of the delinquent a torrent of invective. He drew his sword, and putting the point under the shoulder straps of the officer, ripped them off, and then compelled him to dismount and lead the animal to the place whence he had stolen him. He also required him to pay the farmer for his trouble and the loss of service of the animal.

The self-control and coolness of Thomas under fire and amidst the excitement and dangers of battle is absolutely surprising. He has been well described in an episode of the battle of Chickamauga as the "Statue Thomas." During that terrible conflict the Statue warmed into life but twice. At daylight on the second day, before the battle had been resumed, Rosecrans rode along the line of battle, examining the position which the troops had taken as best they could, without other guide than the sound of cannon or other director than stern necessity. He rode up to Thomas's quarters near the left centre of the field and asked him several questions regarding the battle of the day before. Thomas alluded briefly to the events of the fight, and in speaking of his brilliant charge exclaimed rather warmly, "Whenever I touched their flanks they broke, General, they broke," repeating the last words with unusual zest and evident satisfaction. At the same moment he caught the eyes of several officers turned upon him, and, as if ashamed of his momentary enthusiasm, the blood mounted to his cheeks and he blushed like a woman. His eyes were bent immediately on the ground, and the rest of his remarks were confined to a few brief replies to the questions addressed to him.

The other instance occurred during the afternoon of the second day's battle, and in the midst of a lull which had followed the retreat of M'Cook and Crittenden and the falling back of Thomas's right division. The General was sitting in the rear of the line of battle of his right as re-formed, engaged in watching a heavy cloud of dust in the distance, and in such a direction that it might be the enemy, or it might be the reserve forces of Gordon Granger, which had been posted some distance in rear of the battlefield at Rossville, and which it was hoped would march to the aid of the army. The doubt under which he labored cast a visible cloud over the General's spirits, and excited his nerves to an unusual degree. He had no disposition to resume the fight, and, fearful of the result of the next attack of the rebels, was anxious to avoid a resumption of the battle. He consequently watched the development of the cloud of dust in the distance with painful anxiety. If it dissolved to reveal friends then they were doubly welcome, for fresh friends insured the safe retirement of the army. If it disclosed the enemy, then the day and army were lost, and it became the duty of those who formed the last square at Chickamauga to throw into the teeth of the victorious enemy a defiance as grandly contemptuous as that of Cambronne, and die. There was no escape if the troops advancing from the rear were, as it was feared, the cavalry of the enemy. The anxiety of the General increased with every moment of delay in the development of the character of the advancing columns. At one time he said nervously to his staff, "Take my glass, some of you whose horse stands steady—tell me what you can see." A civilian standing near him remarked that he felt sure that he could see the United States flag. "Do you think so? do you think so?" asked the General, nervously. Shortly after Captain Johnston, of General Negley's staff, reported to Thomas for duty, and the General requested him to venture toward the advancing force and learn if he could to which army it belonged. Johnston was gone for some time, running the gauntlet of the rebel sharpshooters, who were fast enveloping Thomas's left wing. During his absence the anxiety of Thomas increased until it grew painful to the observer, and the relaxation which followed the revelation of the fact that the coming force were friends was a positive relief to the by-standers. As Johnston returned with General Steadman the nerves of Thomas calmed down, and his excitement was hardly visible save in the petulant tone and manner in which he cursed Bragg for fighting without any system. During the fight which ensued he remained as passive and apparently as unconcerned as if he were in the safest place imaginable.

The contrast between Thomas and Sherman may be extended even to their personal appearance; and in this, as in character, the difference is most marked. Thomas's figure is very striking. Something of his height is lost to the eye by the heaviness of his figure. If he were as thin as Sherman, he would look the six feet two or three inches which have been attributed to him. He is about five feet ten in height; but so much does his heaviness detract from the appearance of height that he does not appear so tall. Thick-set, robust, and healthy, he moves heavily and slowly, but by no means feebly or unsteadily. His beard and hair were sandy at the beginning of the war, but they have since become silver sprinkled, and add to the great dignity of his appearance. His features are all large, with the exception of his nose; a long, thin Grecian feature which Napoleon would have admired. His lips are rather thick, rounded, and red. His chin and jaws, large and squarely cut, with his great, steady, though not bright eyes, indicate more than any others of his features his firmness and positiveness of character. His countenance is at all times severe and grave, but not necessarily stern. He seldom smiles; the writer, during two years' acquaintance, saw him smile only once; but the constant seriousness of his countenance is not repulsive. It may be called forbidding. It certainly forbids trifling. The simplest-minded man, seeking audience of him, will understand, on being received by the General, by a glance at his countenance, that he must be brief and to the point. His presence is no place for loungers. His visitors must have business to transact or retire, and they never require any other hint than the countenance of the General. He is a man in earnest, and it does not take long to discover it. He is perhaps as free from display and pretension as any man in the army. He never does any thing for "effect." His manner admits of no familiarity. There is dignity in every gesture, but not necessarily either grace or love.

No one has ever accused General Thomas of being a genius—military or otherwise. His success has been obtained by long service and patient industry, and he is an example of what may be accomplished by the unremitting toil of a practical man. He is possessed naturally of that good, clear sense which is often inappropriately called common-sense, but which is of no common order at all. He has never been brilliantly educated, and is neither a brilliant thinker nor converser. He is doubtless well versed in West Point lore and the art of war. His education has been derived principally from a long and varied experience with the world, which has rendered him pre-eminently a practical man. His mind consequently takes naturally, as has been before stated, to method, and every thing he does is completed (in the full sense of the word) in a methodical manner. There is little that is original in his plans or his mode of executing them, but all are distinguished for their practicability and completeness. His calculations leave a wide range for contingencies, delays, and accidents, and are not easily disturbed by untoward incidents and unexpected developments. He never goes into a campaign or battle without knowing exactly how to get out of it safely, in case the necessity for retreating arises. He has on more than one occasion furnished the means of getting the armies of others out of danger. At Stone River, when Rosecrans was defeated on the first day and his council proposed to retreat, Thomas showed that the safety of the army depended upon remaining and assuming the offensive. At Chickamauga, when the same leader left his army in the midst of a terrible battle and at the beginning of a rout of the greater part of it, Thomas again came to the rescue and covered the retreat in a manner which saved the day and the army.

With the army Thomas is a most popular leader. He has the deep-seated and deep-rooted affection of his men, which is not the less sincere because it is undemonstrative. He is looked upon by the army with a sort of affectionate reverence. His character is free from any stain, and he stands forth in the army as above suspicion. He has gone through the war without apparently exciting the jealousy of a single officer. He has so regulated his advancement, so retarded, in fact, his promotion, that when, as the climax to two years' hard service, he fought a great battle and saved a great army, and was hailed and recognized by the whole country as a hero, not one jealous or defeated officer was found to utter dissent to this popular verdict. He has in the highest degree the confidence of his men. There is a universal feeling of perfect confidence reposed in him, and to this more than to any other thing the nation owed the safety of its army at Chickamauga. This feeling of confidence in their leader did more to hold his corps together on that day—did more to keep up the esprit du corps of his command during the terrible attacks to which it was subjected, than did all the discipline which had otherwise been drilled into the men. The men of the two routed corps were just as good, just as brave, and just as tenacious fighters as were Thomas's men, but they had no faith at all in the wisdom of their leader. Men will not stand and fight under officers in whom they have not the most implicit faith. Such confidence is reposed in Thomas to the fullest degree, and is accompanied by an affectionate regard which adds to its strength.

Soldiers have a very natural mode of expressing their affection by titles of endearment, indicative of the peculiarities of the subjects of their admiration. Thomas has been christened with dozens of "nicknames." When he was at West Point and in the regular army in Mexico, he was called "Old Reliable," from his recognized and proverbial fidelity to the service. During the Mill Spring and Stone River campaigns he won from his men the sobriquet of "Old Pap Safety." This was subsequently boiled down into "Pap Thomas," by which name he is still called more frequently than by any other. His slow gait and quiet dignified style of traveling gained him the title of "Old Slow-trot." "Uncle George," and "George H." are often used by the men in facetious hours, and the titles always linger on the tongues of the soldiers like sweet morsels. "Corinthian Thomas" is a name which has been given him since his late victory at Nashville. And though these titles are used by the men with an air and in a tone indicating familiarity with their leader, none of them ever knew him to sacrifice, in his communication with them, his dignity in the slightest degree. They have no difficulty in reaching his ear. They always find a patient listener and a sound adviser, and a kindly mannered and pleasant director. He never laughs and jokes with soldiers or officers, but his mild voice and quiet manner win him more of the love of his men than any momentary familiarity could do. He has been known to halt in the march and spend ten or fifteen minutes in directing stragglers to their commands.

The present war has been the school of many of our best officers, and dearly has the country paid in its best blood the tuition of some. Bull Run was the price which the country paid for having its erroneous idea of war violently corrected. The failure of the first assault on Vicksburg and of the attack on Kenesaw Mountain were fearful prices paid to correct certain errors of judgment in Sherman's mind. We paid for McClellan's violation of a well known rule of war in placing the Chickahominy between his battalions. Numerous similar instances might be named, showing how the country has been compelled to pay terrible penalties of blood for the ignorance of unworthy and incompetent leaders; but enough. Thomas's training in the art of war has cost the country not a single disaster or sacrifice. On the contrary, he has saved the country, on more than one occasion, the fearful penalty it was about to pay for the ignorance of other leaders. He has been prominent in three grand campaigns. Two of them he has conducted on his own plans and in person. In the other he acted as second in command. The two which he planned and conducted were complete successes; and the other, as far as he was concerned, a magnificent triumph. His first campaign in the war for the Union was that against the fortified camp of Zollicoffer at Mill Springs, Kentucky. His plan embraced an assault upon the rebel works; but before he could get into position to do this the enemy marched out of his works and attacked him in his camp, failing in an attempt to surprise him. The rebels failed also in the battle which ensued, and were terribly defeated, with heavy loss and at the sacrifice of the organization of their army. Night alone, under cover of which it crossed the Cumberland River, prevented the capture of the entire force under General Crittenden. Fourteen pieces of artillery, fifteen hundred horses, with all the stores of the enemy, with a large number of prisoners, fell into our hands. This victory was complete, and doubly welcome as the first success since the battle of Bull Run. The country hailed it as the first sign of the rejuvenation and reorganization of the army. The rebel "army of Western Kentucky" has never been heard of since that disastrous day; and Crittenden, its commander, sank at once into disgrace and oblivion as a consequence of his defeat.

In the campaign and battle of Chickamauga Thomas was second in command to Rosecrans, but in all its important actions his is the principal figure. The story of Chickamauga has been often, and, in one or two instances, well told; but the whole truth about it must be reserved until time shall permit the historian to tell it without fear or favor. Thomas stands forth the undisputed hero of that day—the single spirit upon whom all depends. He is the central figure. There are no heroes beside him. The young and noble ones who died, as Lytle and Burnham, Van Pelt and Jones, and those not less noble spirits who distinguished themselves and lived to be rewarded, as Baird and Dick Johnston, old Steadman and young Johnston, who guided his columns to the assault, Wood and Harker—all these surrounding Thomas but add to his glory as the parhelion adds to the beauty of the sun. On the first day at Chickamauga Thomas did his share toward the destruction of a great rebel army, but it was in vain. The fruits of his victory were frittered away by others. There was no general advance when he advanced. On the second day it was too late; the enemy had succeeded in crossing his whole force over the Chickamauga, and the opportunity to destroy his force in detail was gone forever. Circumstances devolved upon Thomas the task of saving a great army, not destroying one. The duty was nobly performed, and the army nobly saved; and though those who were not present, and who judge of the battle from hearsay, may be mystified by the circumlocution and vagueness of official reports, those who staid at Chickamauga know that Thomas alone retrieved that disaster and saved Rosecrans's army.

His last campaign and battles at Nashville are perhaps his greatest. Fought but yesterday, as it were, the public is not yet weary with the tales that are still being told of them. The operations were conducted in a manner characteristic of the man. The retreat and concentration at Nashville was a masterly performance, executed without confusion and completed without loss. The battle before the city was one of hard blows and simple manœuvres, fought after ample preparation and deliberation. The columns were heavy and massed, and the lines strong and deep. The action was slow and measured. In the midst of the engagement are numerous lulls—lulls employed in dreadful preparation, in re-arranging lines and massing columns. There are numerous deliberate assaults of strong positions, and in every minute detail of the general plan there is visible a combined effort of each part of the army to reach some vital point of the enemy's position, the key of the battle-field. When this is won the battle is ended. The victory is the result of cool, deliberate action. The troops are tools in the hands of their leader, and are made willing and trusty instruments through the absolute and unbounded confidence which they feel in him.

In these three campaigns the career of General Thomas is chiefly embraced. In the minor events of his military career there is nothing to detract from the glory which attaches to him in these.

ON THE HEIGHTS.

I STAND alone upon the heights of years,
 As stood on Sinai's peak of old
 The prophet, while as if unrolled
 Like pictured scroll the traversed vale appears.

Far down the rugged slopes by worn feet trod
 Is dimly seen, 'midst shine and shade,
 The glimmer of that fairy glade
 Which basks forever in the smile of God.

And nearer, yet still far, 'twixt it and me
 Lies, golden still, that fair domain
 Whence to my listening heart again
 Is born Youth's unforgotten melody.

The twilight deepens, and the Morning Land
 With silvery streams, the fervent noon,
 Memory's music, all must soon
 Fade in the gathering night so near at hand.

Yet as stood Moses in that awful gloom
 Whence shone Thy word as living fire,
 While all his rapt soul did aspire
 To Thee, above the darkness of the tomb;

So I—though gazing backward tearfully
 Beholding life's sweet visions fade,
 While swiftly falls the gathering shade
 Of Age—fear not, since face to face with Thee,

My God, who seemest on these heights of years
 Nearer than in life's sunny vales;
 Whose strength my weakness never fails
 To lift from out the dust of mortal fears.

Alone? 'Tis well; for thus this heart of mine
 Shall, like the prophet's tablet, lie
 Bared to the light: that only Thy
 Dear name be graven there—the Love divine.

ALLAN'S NEIGHBOR.—[SEE APRIL NUMBER, PAGE 635.]

ARMADALE.

CHAPTER III.

THE CLAIMS OF SOCIETY.

MORE than an hour after Allan had set forth on his exploring expedition through his own grounds, Midwinter rose, and enjoyed, in his turn, a full view by daylight of the magnificence of the new house.

Refreshed by his long night's rest, he descended the great staircase as cheerfully as Allan himself. One after another, he too, looked into the spacious rooms on the ground-floor in breathless astonishment at the beauty and the luxury which surrounded him. "The house where I lived in service when I was a boy was a fine one," he thought, gayly; "but it was nothing to this! I wonder if Allan is as surprised and delighted as I am?" The beauty of the summer morning drew him out through the open hall door, as it had drawn his friend out before him. He ran briskly down the steps, humming the burden of one of the old vagabond tunes which he had danced to long since, in the old vagabond time. Even the memories of his wretched childhood took their color, on that happy morning, from the bright medium through which he looked back at them. "If I was not out of practice," he thought to himself, as he leaned on the fence and looked over at the park, "I could try some of my old tumbling tricks on that delicious grass." He turned; noticed two of the servants talking together near the shrubbery, and asked for news of the master of the house. The men pointed with a smile in the direction of the gardens; Mr. Armadale had gone that way more than an hour since, and had met (as had been reported) with Miss Milroy in the grounds. Midwinter followed the path through the shrubbery, but, on reaching the flower-garden, stopped, considered a little, and retraced his steps. "If Allan has met with the young lady," he said to himself, "Allan doesn't want me." He laughed as he drew that inevitable inference, and turned considerately to explore the beauties of Thorpe-Ambrose on the other side of the house.

Passing the angle of the front wall of the building, he descended some steps, advanced along a paved walk, turned another angle, and found himself in a strip of garden ground at the back of the house. Behind him was a row of small rooms situated on the level of the servants' offices. In front of him, on the farther side of the little garden, rose a wall, screened by a laurel hedge, and having a door at one end of it, leading past the stables to a gate that opened on the high-road. Perceiving that he had only discovered, thus far, the shorter way to the house, used by the servants and trades-people, Midwinter turned back again, and looked in at the window of one of the rooms on the basement story as he passed it. Were these the servants' offices? No; the offices were apparently in some other part of the ground-floor; the window he had looked in at was the window of a lumber-room. The next two rooms in the row were both empty. The fourth window, when he approached it, presented a little variety. It served also as a door; and it stood open to the garden at that moment.

Attracted by the book-shelves which he noticed on one of the walls, Midwinter stepped into the room. The books, few in number, did not detain him long; a glance at their backs was enough, without taking them down. The Waverley Novels, Tales by Miss Edgeworth, and by Miss Edgeworth's many followers, the Poems of Mrs. Hemans, with a few odd volumes of the illustrated gift-books of the period, composed the bulk of the little library. Midwinter turned to leave the room, when an object on one side of the window, which he had not previously noticed, caught his attention and stopped him. It was a statuette standing on a bracket—a reduced copy of the famous Niobe of the Florence Museum. He glanced from the statuette to the window, with a sudden doubt which set his heart throbbing fast. It was a French window; and the statuette was on his left hand as he stood before it. He looked out with a suspicion which he had not felt yet. The view before him was the view of a lawn and garden. For a moment his mind struggled blindly to escape the conclusion which had seized it—and struggled in vain. Here, close round him and close before him; here, forcing him mercilessly back from the happy present to the horrible past, was the room that Allan had seen in the Second Vision of the Dream.

He waited, thinking and looking round him while he thought. There was wonderfully little disturbance in his face and manner; he looked steadily from one to the other of the few objects in the room, as if the discovery of it had saddened rather than surprised him. Matting of some foreign sort covered the floor. Two cane chairs and a plain table comprised the whole of the furniture. The walls were plainly papered, and bare—broken to the eye in one place by a door leading into the interior of the house; in another, by a small stove; in a third, by the book-shelves which Midwinter had already noticed. He returned to the books; and, this time, he took some of them down from the shelves.

The first that he opened contained lines in a woman's handwriting, traced in ink that had faded with time. He read the inscription—"Jane Armadale, from her beloved father. Thorpe-Ambrose, October, 1828." In the second, third, and fourth volumes that he opened the same inscription reappeared. His previous knowledge of dates and persons helped him to draw the true inference from what he saw. The books must have belonged to Allan's mother; and she must have inscribed them with her name, in the interval of time between her return to Thorpe-Ambrose from Madeira and the birth of her son. Midwinter passed on to a volume on another shelf—one of a series containing the writings of Mrs. Hemans. In this case the blank leaf at the beginning of the book was filled on both sides with a copy of verses, the writing being still in Mrs. Armadale's hand. The verses were headed "Farewell to Thorpe-Ambrose," and were dated "March, 1829"—two months only after Allan had been born.

Entirely without merit in itself, the only interest of the little poem was in the domestic story that it told. The very room in which Midwinter then stood was described—with the view on the garden, the window made to open on it, the book-shelves, the Niobe, and other more perishable ornaments which Time had destroyed. Here, at variance with her brothers, shrinking from her friends, the widow of the murdered man had, on her own acknowledgment, secluded herself, without other comfort than the love and forgiveness of her father, until her child was born. The father's mercy and the father's recent death filled many verses—happily too vague in their commonplace expression of penitence and despair to give any hint of the marriage-story in Madeira to any reader who looked at them ignorant of the truth. A passing reference to the writer's estrangement from her surviving relatives and to her approaching departure from Thorpe-Ambrose followed. Last came the assertion of the mother's resolution to separate herself from all her old associations; to leave behind her every possession, even to the most trifling thing she had, that could remind her of the miserable past; and to date her new life in the future from the birthday of the child who had been spared to console her—who was now the one earthly object that could still speak to her of love and hope. So the old story of passionate feeling that finds comfort in phrases rather than not find comfort at all was told once again. So the poem in the faded ink faded away to its end.

Midwinter put the book back with a heavy sigh, and opened no other volume on the shelves. "Here in the country-house, or there on board the Wreck," he said, bitterly, "the traces of my father's crime follow me, go where I may." He advanced toward the window; stopped and looked back into the lonely, neglected little room. "Is this chance?" he asked himself. "The place where his mother suffered is the place he sees in the Dream; and the first morning in the new house is the morning that reveals it, not to him, but to me. Oh, Allan! Allan! how will it end?"

The thought had barely passed through his mind before he heard Allan's voice, from the paved walk at the side of the house, calling to him by his name. He hastily stepped out into the garden. At the same moment Allan came running round the corner, full of voluble apologies for having forgotten, in the society of his new neighbors, what was due to the laws of hospitality and the claims of his friend.

"I really haven't missed you," said Midwinter; "and I am very, very glad to hear that the new neighbors have produced such a pleasant impression on you already."

He tried, as he spoke, to lead the way back by the outside of the house; but Allan's flighty attention had been caught by the open window and the lonely little room. He stepped in immediately. Midwinter followed, and watched him in breathless anxiety as he looked round. Not the slightest recollection of the Dream troubled Allan's easy mind. Not the slightest reference to it fell from the silent lips of his friend.

"Exactly the sort of place I should have expected you to hit on!" exclaimed Allan, gayly. "Small and snug and unpretending. I know you, Master Midwinter! You'll be slipping off here when the county families come visiting; and I rather think on those dreadful occasions you won't find me far behind you. What's the matter? You look ill and out of spirits. Hungry? Of course you are! unpardonable of me to have kept you waiting—this door leads somewhere, I suppose; let's try a short cut into the house. Don't be afraid of my not keeping you company at breakfast. I didn't eat much at the cottage; I feasted my eyes on Miss Milroy, as the poets say. Oh, the darling! the darling! she turns you topsy-turvy the moment you look at her. As for her father, wait till you see his wonderful clock! It's twice the size of the famous clock at Strasbourg, and the most tremendous striker ever heard yet in the memory of man!"

Singing the praises of his new friends in this strain, at the top of his voice, Allan hurried Midwinter along the stone passages on the basement floor which led, as he had rightly guessed, to a staircase communicating with the hall. They passed the servants' offices on the way. At the sight of the cook and the roaring fire, disclosed through the open kitchen door, Allan's mind went off at a tangent, and Allan's dignity scattered itself to the four winds of heaven as usual.

"Aha, Mrs. Gripper; there you are with your pots and pans, and your burning fiery furnace! One had need be Shadrach, Meshach, and the other fellow to stand over that. Breakfast as soon as ever you like. Eggs, sausages, bacon, kidneys, marmalade, water-cresses, coffee, and so forth. My friend and I belong to the select few whom it's a perfect privilege to cook for. Voluptuaries, Mrs. Gripper, voluptuaries, both of us. You'll see," continued Allan, as they went on toward the stairs, "I shall make that worthy creature young again; I'm better than a doctor for Mrs. Gripper. When she laughs she shakes her fat sides; and when she shakes her fat sides she exerts her muscular system; and when she exerts her muscular system—Ha! here's Susan again. Don't squeeze yourself flat against the balusters, my dear; if you don't mind hustling me on the stairs, I rather like hustling you. She looks like a full-blown rose when she blushes, doesn't she? Stop, Susan! I've some orders to give. Be very particular with Mr. Midwinter's room: shake up his bed like mad, and dust his furniture till those nice round arms of yours ache again. Nonsense, my dear fellow! I'm not too familiar with them; I'm only keeping them up to their work. Now then, Richard! where do we breakfast? Oh, here. Between ourselves, Midwinter, these splendid rooms of mine are a size too large for me; I don't feel as if I should ever be on intimate terms with my own furniture. My views in life are of the snug and slovenly sort—a kitchen chair, you know, and a low ceiling. Man wants but little here below, and wants that little long. That's not exactly the right quotation; but it expresses my meaning, and we'll let alone correcting it till the next opportunity."

"I beg your pardon," interposed Midwinter, "here is something waiting for you which you have not noticed yet."

As he spoke, he pointed a little impatiently to a letter lying on the breakfast-table. He could conceal the ominous discovery which he had made that morning from Allan's knowledge; but he could not conquer the latent distrust of circumstances which was now roused again in his superstitious nature—the instinctive suspicion of every thing that happened, no matter how common or how trifling the event, on the first memorable day when the new life began in the new house.

Allan ran his eye over the letter, and tossed it across the table to his friend. "I can't make head or tail of it," he said; "can you?"

Midwinter read the letter slowly, aloud. "SIR, —I trust you will pardon the liberty I take in sending these few lines to wait your arrival at Thorpe-Ambrose. In the event of circumstances not disposing you to place your law-business in the hands of Mr. Darch—" He suddenly stopped at that point, and considered a little.

"Darch is our friend the lawyer," said Allan, supposing Midwinter had forgotten the name. "Don't you remember our spinning the half-crown on the cabin table, when I got the two offers for the cottage? Heads, the major; tails, the lawyer. This is the lawyer."

Without making any reply, Midwinter resumed reading the letter. "In the event of circumstances not disposing you to place your law-business in the hands of Mr. Darch, I beg to say that I shall be happy to take charge of your interests, if you feel willing to honor me with your confidence. Enclosing a reference (should you desire it) to my agents in London, and again apologizing for this intrusion, I beg to remain, Sir, respectfully yours, A. PEDGIFT, SEN."

"Circumstances?" repeated Midwinter, as he laid the letter down. "What circumstances can possibly indispose you to give your law-business to Mr. Darch?"

"Nothing can indispose me," said Allan. "Besides being the family lawyer here, Darch was the first to write me word at Paris of my coming in for my fortune; and, if I have got any business to give, of course he ought to have it."

Midwinter still looked distrustfully at the open letter on the table. "I am sadly afraid, Allan, there is something wrong already," he said. "This man would never have ventured on the application he has made to you, unless he had some good reason for believing it would succeed. If you wish to put yourself right at starting, you will send to Mr. Darch this morning, to tell him you are here, and you will take no notice for the present of Mr. Pedgift's letter."

Before more could be said on either side the footman made his appearance with the breakfast-tray. He was followed, after an interval, by the butler—a man of the essentially confidential kind, with a modulated voice, a courtly manner, and a bulbous nose. Any body but Allan would have seen in his face that he had come into the room having a special communication to make to his master. Allan, who saw nothing under the surface, and whose head was running on the lawyer's letter, stopped him bluntly with the point-blank question: "Who's Mr. Pedgift?"

The butler's sources of local knowledge opened confidentially on the instant. Mr. Pedgift was the second of the two lawyers in the town. Not so long established, not so wealthy, not so universally looked up to as old Mr. Darch. Not doing the business of the highest people in the county, and not mixing freely with the best society, like old Mr. Darch. A very sufficient man, in his way, nevertheless. Known as a perfectly competent and respectable practitioner all round the neighborhood. In short, professionally next best to Mr. Darch; and personally superior to him (if the expression might be permitted) in this respect—that Darch was a Crusty One and Pedgift wasn't.

Having imparted this information, the butler, taking a wise advantage of his position, glided, without a moment's stoppage, from Mr. Pedgift's character to the business that had brought him into the breakfast-room. The Midsummer Audit was near at hand; and the tenants were accustomed to have a week's notice of the rent-day dinner. With this necessity pressing, and with no orders given as yet, and no steward in office at Thorpe-Ambrose, it appeared desirable that some confidential person should bring the matter forward. The butler was that confidential person; and he now ventured accordingly to trouble his master on the subject.

At this point Allan opened his lips to interrupt, and was himself interrupted before he could utter a word.

"Wait!" interposed Midwinter, seeing in Allan's face that he was in danger of being publicly announced in the capacity of steward. "Wait!" he repeated eagerly, "till I can speak to you first."

The butler's courtly manner remained alike unruffled by Midwinter's sudden interference and by his own dismissal from the scene. Nothing but the mounting color in his bulbous nose betrayed the sense of injury that animated him as he withdrew. Mr. Armadale's chance of regaling his friend and himself that day with the best wine in the cellar trembled in the balance as the butler took his way back to the basement story.

"This is beyond a joke, Allan," said Midwinter, when they were alone. "Somebody must meet your tenants on the rent-day who is really fit to take the steward's place. With the best will in the world to learn, it is impossible for me to master the business at a week's notice. Don't, pray don't let your anxiety for my welfare put you in a false position with other people! I should never forgive myself if I was the unlucky cause—"

"Gently, gently!" cried Allan, amazed at his friend's extraordinary earnestness. "If I write to London by to-night's post for the man who came down here before, will that satisfy you?"

Midwinter shook his head. "Our time is short," he said; "and the man may not be at liberty. Why not try in the neighborhood first?"

You were going to write to Mr. Darch. Send at once, and see if he can't help us between this and post-time."

Allan withdrew to a side-table on which writing materials were placed. "You shall breakfast in peace, you old fidget," he replied—and addressed himself forthwith to Mr. Darch, with his usual Spartan brevity of epistolary expression. "DEAR SIR,—Here I am, bag and baggage. Will you kindly oblige me by being my lawyer? I ask this, because I want to consult you at once. Please look in in the course of the day, and stop to dinner if you possibly can. Yours truly, ALLAN ARMADALE." Having read this composition aloud with unconcealed admiration of his own rapidity of literary execution, Allan addressed the letter to Mr. Darch, and rang the bell. "Here, Richard, take this at once, and wait for an answer. And, I say, if there's any news stirring in the town, pick it up and bring it back with you. See how I manage my servants!" continued Allan, joining his friend at the breakfast-table. "See how I adapt myself to my new duties! I haven't been down here one clear day yet, and I'm taking an interest in the neighborhood already."

Breakfast over, the two friends went out to idle away the morning under the shade of a tree in the park. Noon came, and Richard never appeared. One o'clock struck, and still there were no signs of an answer from Mr. Darch. Midwinter's patience was not proof against the delay. He left Allan dozing on the grass, and went to the house to make inquiries. The town was described as little more than two miles distant; but the day of the week happened to be market-day, and Richard was being detained no doubt by some of the many acquaintances whom he would be sure to meet with on that occasion.

Half an hour later the truant messenger returned, and was sent out to report himself to his master under the tree in the park.

"Any answer from Mr. Darch?" asked Midwinter, seeing that Allan was too lazy to put the question for himself.

"Mr. Darch was engaged, Sir. I was desired to say that he would send an answer."

"Any news in the town?" inquired Allan, drowsily, without troubling himself to open his eyes.

"No, Sir; nothing in particular."

Observing the man suspiciously as he made that reply, Midwinter detected in his face that he was not speaking the truth. He was plainly embarrassed, and plainly relieved when his master's silence allowed him to withdraw. After a little consideration, Midwinter followed, and overtook the retreating servant on the drive before the house.

"Richard," he said, quietly, "if I was to guess that there is some news in the town, and that you don't like telling it to your master, should I be guessing the truth?"

The man started and changed color. "I don't know how you have found it out, Sir," he said; "but I can't deny you have guessed right."

"If you will let me hear what the news is, I will take the responsibility on myself of telling Mr. Armadale."

After some little hesitation, and some distrustful consideration on his side, of Midwinter's face, Richard at last prevailed on himself to repeat what he had heard that day in the town.

The news of Allan's sudden appearance at Thorpe-Ambrose had preceded the servant's arrival at his destination by some hours. Wherever he went, he found his master the subject of public discussion. The opinion of Allan's conduct among the leading towns-people, the resident gentry of the neighborhood, and the principal tenants on the estate, was unanimously unfavorable. Only the day before, the committee for managing the public reception of the new squire had sketched the progress of the procession; had settled the serious question of the triumphal arches; and had appointed a competent person to solicit subscriptions for the flags, the flowers, the feasting, the fire-works, and the band. In less than a week more the money could have been collected, and the rector would have written to Mr. Armadale to fix the day. And now, by Allan's own act, the public welcome waiting to honor him had been cast back contemptuously in the public teeth! Every body took for granted (what was unfortunately true) that he had received private information of the contemplated proceedings. Every body declared that he had purposely stolen into his own house like a thief in the night (so the phrase ran), to escape accepting the offered civilities of his neighbors. In brief, the sensitive self-importance of the little town was wounded to the quick; and of Allan's once enviable position in the estimation of the neighborhood not a vestige remained.

For a moment Midwinter faced the messenger of evil tidings in silent distress. That moment past, the sense of Allan's critical position roused him, now the evil was known, to seek the remedy.

"Has the little you have seen of your master, Richard, inclined you to like him?" he asked.

This time the man answered without hesitation, "A pleasanter and kinder gentleman than Mr. Armadale no one could wish to serve."

"If you think that," pursued Midwinter, "you won't object to give me some information which will help your master to set himself right with his neighbors. Come into the house."

He led the way into the library, and, after asking the necessary questions, took down in writing a list of the names and addresses of the most influential persons living in the town and its neighborhood. This done, he rang the bell for the head footman, having previously sent Richard with a message to the stables, directing an open carriage to be ready in an hour's time.

"When the late Mr. Blanchard went out to make calls in the neighborhood it was your place to go with him, was it not?" he asked, when the upper servant appeared. "Very well. Be ready in an hour's time, if you please, to go out with Mr. Armadale." Having given that order, he left the house again on his way back to Allan, with the visiting list in his hand. He smiled a little sadly as he descended the steps. "Who would have imagined," he thought, "that my foot-boy's experience of the ways of gentlefolks would be worth looking back at one day for Allan's sake?"

The object of the popular odium lay innocently slumbering on the grass, with his garden hat over his nose, his waistcoat unbuttoned, and his trowsers wrinkled half-way up his outstretched legs. Midwinter roused him without hesitation, and remorselessly repeated the servant's news.

Allan accepted the disclosure thus forced on him without the slightest disturbance of temper. "Oh, hang 'em!" was all he said. "Let's have another cigar." Midwinter took the cigar out of his hand, and, insisting on his treating the matter seriously, told him in plain words that he must set himself right with his offended neighbors by calling on them personally to make his apologies. Allan sat up on the grass in astonishment; his eyes opened wide in incredulous dismay. Did Midwinter positively meditate forcing him into a "chimney-pot hat," a nicely-brushed frock-coat, and a clean pair of gloves? Was it actually in contemplation to shut him up in a carriage, with his footman on the box and his card-case in his hand, and send him round from house to house, to tell a pack of fools that he begged their pardon for not letting them make a public show of him? If any thing so outrageously absurd as this was really to be done, it could not be done that day at any rate. He had promised to go back to the charming Milroy at the cottage and to take Midwinter with him. What earthly need had he of the good opinion of the resident gentry? The only friends he wanted were the friends he had got already. Let the whole neighborhood turn its back on him if it liked—back or face the Squire of Thorpe-Ambrose didn't care two straws about it.

After allowing him to run on in this way until his whole stock of objections was exhausted, Midwinter wisely tried his personal influence next. He took Allan affectionately by the hand. "I am going to ask a great favor," he said. "If you won't call on these people for your own sake, will you call on them to please me?"

Allan delivered himself of a groan of despair, stared in mute surprise at the anxious face of his friend, and good-humoredly gave way. As Midwinter took his arm, and led him back to the house, he looked round with rueful eyes at the cattle hard by, placidly whisking their tails in the pleasant shade. "Don't mention it in the neighborhood," he said; "I should like to change places with one of my own cows."

Midwinter left him to dress, engaging to return when the carriage was at the door. Allan's toilet did not promise to be a speedy one. He began it by reading his own visiting cards; and he advanced it a second stage by looking into his wardrobe, and devoting the resident gentry into the infernal regions. Before he could discover any third means of delaying his own proceedings, the necessary pretext was unexpectedly supplied by Richard's appearance with a note in his hand. The messenger had just called with Mr. Darch's answer. Allan briskly shut up the wardrobe, and gave his whole attention to the lawyer's letter. The lawyer's letter rewarded him by the following lines:

"SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of to-day's date, honoring me with two proposals—namely, ONE inviting me to act as your legal adviser, and ONE inviting me to pay you a visit at your house. In reference to the first proposal, I beg permission to decline it with thanks. With regard to the second proposal, I have to inform you that circumstances have come to my knowledge relating to the letting of the cottage at Thorpe-Ambrose which render it impossible for me (in justice to myself) to accept your invitation. I have ascertained, Sir, that my offer reached you at the same time as Major Milroy's; and that, with both proposals thus before you, you gave the preference to a total stranger, who addressed you through a house agent, over a man who had faithfully served your relatives for two generations, and who had been the first person to inform you of the most important event in your life. After this specimen of your estimate of what is due to the claims of common courtesy and common justice, I can not flatter myself that I possess any of the qualities which would fit me to take my place on the list of your friends. I remain, Sir, your obedient servant, JAMES DARCH."

"Stop the messenger!" cried Allan, leaping to his feet, his ruddy face aflame with indignation. "Give me pen, ink, and paper! By the Lord Harry, they're a nice set of people in these parts; the whole neighborhood is in a conspiracy to bully me!" He snatched up the pen in a fine frenzy of epistolary inspiration. "SIR,—I despise you and your letter—" At that point the pen made a blot, and the writer was seized with a momentary hesitation. "Too strong," he thought; "I'll give it to the lawyer in his own cool and cutting style." He began again on a clean sheet of paper. "SIR,—You remind me of an Irish bull. I mean that story in Joe Miller, where Pat remarked, in the hearing of a wag hard by, that 'the reciprocity was all on one side.' Your reciprocity is all on one side. You take the privilege of refusing to be my lawyer, and then you complain of my taking the privilege of refusing to be your landlord." He paused fondly over those last words. "Neat!" he thought. "Argument and hard hitting both in one. I wonder where my knack of writing comes from?" He went on, and finished the letter in two more sentences. "As for your casting my invitation back in my teeth, I beg to inform you my teeth are none the worse for it. I am equally glad to have nothing to say to you, either in the capacity of a friend or a tenant.—ALLAN ARMA-DALE." He nodded exultingly at his own composition, as he addressed it and sent it down to the messenger. "Darch's hide must be a thick one," he said, "if he doesn't feel that!"

The sound of wheels outside suddenly recalled him to the business of the day. There was the carriage waiting to take him on his round of visits; and there was Midwinter at his post, pacing to and fro on the drive. "Read that," cried Allan, throwing out the lawyer's letter; "I've written him back a smasher."

He bustled away to the wardrobe to get his coat. There was a wonderful change in him; he felt little or no reluctance to pay the visits now. The pleasurable excitement of answering Mr. Darch had put him in a fine aggressive frame of mind for asserting himself in the neighborhood. "Whatever else they may say of me, they sha'n't say I was afraid to face them." Heated red-hot with that idea, he seized his hat and gloves, and, hurrying out of the room, met Midwinter in the corridor with the lawyer's letter in his hand.

"Keep up your spirits!" cried Allan, seeing the anxiety in his friend's face, and misinterpreting the motive of it immediately. "If Darch can't be counted on to send us a helping hand into the steward's office, Pedgift can."

"My dear Allan, I was not thinking of that; I was thinking of Mr. Darch's letter. I don't defend this sour-tempered man—but I am afraid we must admit he has some cause for complaint. Pray don't give him another chance of putting you in the wrong. Where is your answer to his letter?"

"Gone!" replied Allan; "I always strike while the iron's hot—a word and a blow, and the blow first, that's my way. Don't, there's a dear good fellow, don't fidget about the steward's books and the rent-day. Here! here's a bunch of keys they gave me last night: one of them opens the room where the steward's books are; go in and read them till I come back. I give you my sacred word of honor I'll settle it all with Pedgift before you see me again."

"One moment," interposed Midwinter, stopping him resolutely on his way out to the carriage. "I say nothing against Mr. Pedgift's fitness to possess your confidence, for I know nothing to justify me in distrusting him. But he has not introduced himself to your notice in a very delicate way; and he has not acknowledged (what is quite clear to my mind) that he knew of Mr. Darch's unfriendly feeling toward you when he wrote. Wait a little before you go to this stranger; wait till we can talk it over together to-night."

"Wait!" replied Allan. "Haven't I told you that I always strike while the iron's hot? Trust my eye for character, old boy; I'll look Pedgift through and through, and act accordingly. Don't keep me any longer, for Heaven's sake. I'm in a fine humor for tackling the resident gentry; and if I don't go at once, I'm afraid it may wear off."

With that excellent reason for being in a hurry, Allan boisterously broke away. Before it was possible to stop him again he had jumped into the carriage and had left the house.

CHAPTER IV.

THE MARCH OF EVENTS.

MIDWINTER'S face darkened when the last trace of the carriage had disappeared from view. "I have done my best," he said, as he turned back gloomily into the house. "If Mr. Brock himself were here, Mr. Brock could do no more!"

He looked at the bunch of keys which Allan had thrust into his hand, and a sudden longing to put himself to the test over the steward's books took possession of his sensitive self-tormenting nature. Inquiring his way to the room in which the various movables of the steward's office had been provisionally placed, after the letting of the cottage, he sat down at the desk, and tried how his own unaided capacity would guide him through the business records of the Thorpe-Ambrose estate. The result exposed his own ignorance unanswerably before his own eyes. The Ledgers bewildered him; the Leases, the Plans, and even the Correspondence itself, might have been written, for all he could understand of them, in an unknown tongue. His memory reverted bitterly as he left the room again to his two years' solitary self-instruction in the Shrewsbury bookseller's shop. "If I could only have worked at a business!" he thought. "If I could only have known that the company of Poets and Philosophers was company too high for a vagabond like me!"

He sat down alone in the great hall; the silence of it fell heavier and heavier on his sinking spirits; the beauty of it exasperated him, like an insult from a purse-proud man. "Curse the place!" he said, snatching up his hat and stick. "I like the bleakest hill-side I ever slept on better than I like this house!"

He impatiently descended the doorsteps, and stopped on the drive, considering by which direction he should leave the park for the country beyond. If he followed the road taken by the carriage, he might risk unsettling Allan by accidentally meeting him in the town. If he went out by the back gate, he knew his own nature well enough to doubt his ability to pass the room of the dream without entering it again. But one other way remained—the way which he had taken, and then abandoned again, in the morning. There was no fear of disturbing Allan and the major's daughter now. Without further hesitation Midwinter set forth through the gardens to explore the open country on that side of the estate.

Thrown off its balance by the events of the day, his mind was full of that sourly-savage resistance to the inevitable self-assertion of wealth, so amiably deplored by the prosperous and the rich; so bitterly familiar to the unfortunate and the poor. "The heather-bell costs nothing!"

he thought, looking contemptuously at the masses of rare and beautiful flowers that surrounded him; "and the butter-cups and daisies are as bright as the best of you!" He followed the artfully-contrived ovals and squares of the Italian garden, with a vagabond indifference to the symmetry of their construction and the ingenuity of their design. "How many pounds a foot did you cost?" he said, looking back with scornful eyes at the last path as he left it. "Wind away over high and low like the sheep-walk on the mountain-side, if you can!"

He entered the shrubbery which Allan had entered before him; crossed the paddock and the rustic bridge beyond, and reached the major's cottage. His ready mind seized the right conclusion at the first sight of it; and he stopped before the garden gate to look at the trim little residence which would never have been empty, and would never have been let, but for Allan's ill-advised resolution to force the steward's situation on his friend.

The summer afternoon was warm; the summer air was faint and still. On the upper and the lower floor of the cottage the windows were all open. From one of them, on the upper story, the sound of voices was startlingly audible in the quiet of the park, as Midwinter paused on the outer side of the garden inclosure. The voice of a woman, harsh, high, and angrily complaining—a voice with all the freshness and the melody gone, and with nothing but the hard power of it left—was the discordantly predominant sound. With it, from moment to moment, there mingled the deeper and quieter tones, soothing and compassionate, of the voice of a man. Although the distance was too great to allow Midwinter to distinguish the words that were spoken, he felt the impropriety of remaining within hearing of the voices, and at once stepped forward to continue his walk. At the same moment the face of a young girl (easily recognizable as the face of Miss Milroy, from Allan's description of her) appeared at the open window of the room. In spite of himself Midwinter paused to look at her. The expression of the bright young face, which had smiled so prettily on Allan, was weary and disheartened. After looking out absently over the park she suddenly turned her head back into the room; her attention having been apparently struck by something that had just been said in it. "Oh, mamma, mamma," she exclaimed, indignantly, "how can you say such things!" The words were spoken close to the window; they reached Midwinter's ears, and hurried him away before he heard more. But the self-disclosure of Major Milroy's domestic position had not reached its end yet. As Midwinter turned the corner of the garden fence, a tradesman's boy was handing a parcel in at the wicket gate to the woman servant. "Well," said the boy, with the irrepressible impudence of his class, "how is the missus?" The woman lifted her hand to box his ears. "How is the missus?" she repeated, with an angry toss of her head as the boy ran off. "If it would only please God to take the missus it would be a blessing to every body in the house."

No such ill-omened shadow as this had passed over the bright domestic picture of the inhabitants of the cottage, which Allan's enthusiasm had painted for the contemplation of his friend. It was plain that the secret of the tenants had been kept from the landlord so far. Five minutes more of walking brought Midwinter to the park gates. "Am I fated to see nothing and hear nothing to-day which can give me heart and hope for the future?" he thought, as he angrily swung back the lodge gate. "Even the people Allan has let the cottage to are people whose lives are embittered by a household misery which it is my misfortune to have found out!"

He took the first road that lay before him and walked on, noticing little, immersed in his own thoughts. More than an hour passed before the necessity of turning back entered his mind. As soon as the idea occurred to him he consulted his watch, and determined to retrace his steps, so as to be at the house in good time to meet Allan on his return. Ten minutes of walking brought him back to a point at which three roads met; and one moment's observation of the place satisfied him that he had entirely failed to notice, at the time, by which of the three roads he had advanced. No sign-post was to be seen; the country on either side was lonely and flat, intersected by broad drains and ditches. Cattle were grazing here and there; and a wind-mill rose in the distance above the pollard willows that fringed the low horizon. But not a house was to be seen, and not a human creature appeared on the visible perspective of any one of the three roads. Midwinter glanced back in the only direction left to look at—the direction of the road along which he had just been walking. There, to his relief, was the figure of a man, rapidly advancing toward him, of whom he could ask his way.

The figure came on, clad from head to foot in dreary black—a moving blot on the brilliant white surface of the sun-brightened road. He was a lean, elderly, miserably respectable man. He wore a poor old black dress-coat, and a cheap brown wig, which made no pretense of being his own natural hair. Short black trowsers clung like attached old servants round his wizen legs; and rusty black gaiters hid all they could of his knobbed ungainly feet. Black crape added its mite to the decayed and dingy wretchedness of his old beaver hat; black mohair, in the obsolete form of a stock, drearily encircled his neck and rose as high as his haggard jaws. The one morsel of color he carried about him was a lawyer's bag of blue serge as lean and limp as himself. The one attractive feature in his clean-shaven, weary old face, was a neat set of teeth—teeth (as honest as his wig), which said plainly to all inquiring eyes, "We pass our nights on his looking-glass, and our days in his mouth."

All the little blood in the man's body faintly reddened his fleshless cheeks as Midwinter advanced to meet him, and asked the way to Thorpe-Ambrose. His weak watery eyes looked hither and thither in a bewilderment painful to see. If he had met with a lion instead of a man, and if the few words addressed to him had been words expressing a threat instead of a question, he could hardly have looked more confused and alarmed than he looked now. For the first time in his life Midwinter saw his own shy uneasiness in the presence of strangers reflected, with ten-fold intensity of nervous suffering, in the face of another man—and that man old enough to be his father.

"Which do you please to mean, Sir—the Town or the House? I beg your pardon for asking, but they both go by the same name in these parts."

He spoke with a timid gentleness of tone, an ingratiatory smile, and an anxious courtesy of manner, all distressingly suggestive of his being accustomed to receive rough answers in exchange for his own politeness, from the persons whom he habitually addressed.

"I was not aware that both the House and the Town went by the same name," said Midwinter—"I meant the House." He instinctively conquered his own shyness as he answered in those words; speaking with a cordiality of manner which was very rare with him in his intercourse with strangers.

The man of miserable respectability seemed to feel the warm return of his own politeness gratefully; he brightened and took a little courage. His lean forefinger pointed eagerly to the right road. "That way, Sir," he said, "and when you come to two roads next, please take the left one of the two. I am sorry I have business the other way—I mean in the town. I should have been happy to go with you, and show you. Fine summer weather, Sir, for walking? You can't miss your way if you keep to the left. Oh, don't mention it! I'm afraid I have detained you, Sir. I wish you a pleasant walk back, and—good-morning."

By the time he had made an end of speaking (under an impression apparently that the more he talked the more polite he would be) he had lost his courage again. He darted away down his own road, as if Midwinter's attempts to thank him involved a series of trials too terrible to confront. In two minutes more his black retreating figure had lessened in the distance till it looked again, what it had once looked already, a moving blot on the brilliant white surface of the sun-brightened road.

The man ran strangely in Midwinter's thoughts while he took his way back to the house. He was at a loss to account for it. It never occurred to him that he might have been insensibly reminded of himself, when he saw the plain traces of past misfortune and present nervous suffering in the poor wretch's face. He blindly resented his own perverse interest in this chance foot-passenger on the high-road, as he had resented all else that had happened to him since the beginning of the day. "Have I made another unlucky discovery?" he asked himself, impatiently. "Shall I see this man again, I wonder? who can he be?"

Time was to answer both those questions before many days more had passed over the inquirer's head.

Allan had not returned when Midwinter reached the house. Nothing had happened but the arrival of a message of apology from the cottage. "Major Milroy's compliments, and he was sorry that Mrs. Milroy's illness would prevent his receiving Mr. Armadale that day." It was plain that Mrs. Milroy's occasional fits of suffering (or of ill-temper) created no mere transitory disturbance of the tranquillity of the household. Drawing this natural inference, after what he had himself heard at the cottage nearly three hours since, Midwinter withdrew into the library to wait patiently among the books until his friend came back.

It was past six o'clock when the well-known hearty voice was heard again in the hall. Allan burst into the library in a state of irrepressible excitement, and pushed Midwinter back unceremoniously into the chair from which he was just rising before he could utter a word.

"Here's a riddle for you, old boy!" cried Allan. "Why am I like the resident manager of the Augean stable before Hercules was called in to sweep the litter out? Because I have had my place to keep up, and I've gone and made an infernal mess of it! Why don't you laugh? By George, he doesn't see the point! Let's try again. Why am I like the resident manager?"

"For God's sake, Allan, be serious for a moment!" interposed Midwinter. "You don't know how anxious I am to hear if you have recovered the good opinion of your neighbors."

"That's just what the riddle was intended to tell you!" rejoined Allan. "But if you will have it in so many words, my own impression is that you would have done better not to disturb me under that tree in the park. I've been calculating it to a nicety, and I beg to inform you that I have sunk exactly three degrees lower in the estimation of the resident gentry since I had the pleasure of seeing you last."

"You will have your joke out," said Midwinter, bitterly. "Well, if I can't laugh, I can wait."

"My dear fellow, I'm not joking: I really mean what I say. You shall hear what happened; you shall have a report in full of my first visit. It will do, I can promise you, as a sample for all the rest. Mind this, in the first place, I've gone wrong, with the best possible intentions. When I started for these visits I own I was angry with that old brute of a lawyer, and I certainly had a notion of carrying things with a high hand. But it wore off somehow on the road; and the first family I called on I went in, as I tell you, with the best possible intentions. Oh dear, dear! there was the same spick-and-span reception-room for me to wait in, with the neat conservatory beyond, which I saw again and again and again at every other house I went to afterward. There was the same choice selection of books for me to look at—a religious book, a book about the Duke of Wellington, a book about sporting, and a book about nothing in particular, beautifully illustrated with pictures. Down came papa with his nice white hair, and mamma with her nice lace cap; down came young Mister with the pink face and the straw-colored whiskers, and young Miss with the plump cheeks and the large petticoats. Don't suppose there was the least unfriendliness on my side; I always began with them in the same way; I insisted on shaking hands all round. That staggered them to begin with. When I came to the sore subject next—the subject of the public reception—I give you my word of honor I took the greatest possible pains with my apologies. It hadn't the slightest effect; they let my apologies in at one ear and out at the other, and then waited to hear more. Some men would have been disheartened: I tried another way with them; I addressed myself to the master of the house, and put it pleasantly next. 'The fact is,' I said, 'I wanted to escape the speechifying—my getting up, you know, and telling you to your face you're the best of men, and I beg to propose your health; and your getting up and telling me to my face I'm the best of men, and you beg to thank me; and so on, man after man, praising each other and pestering each other all round the table.' That's how I put it, in an easy, light-handed, convincing sort of way. Do you think any of them took it in the same friendly spirit? Not one! It's my belief they had got their speeches ready for the reception, with the flags and the flowers, and that they're secretly angry with me for stopping their open mouths just as they were ready to begin. Anyway, whenever we came to the matter of the speechifying (whether they touched it first or I), down I fell in their estimation the first of those three steps I told you of just now. Don't suppose I made no efforts to get up again! I made desperate efforts. I found they were all anxious to know what sort of life I had led before I came in for the Thorpe-Ambrose property, and I did my best to satisfy them. And what came of that, do you think? Hang me if I didn't disappoint them for the second time! When they found out that I had actually never been to Eton or Harrow, or Oxford or Cambridge, they were quite dumb with astonishment. I fancy they thought me a sort of outlaw. At any rate, they all froze up again; and down I fell the second step in their estimation. Never mind! I wasn't to be beaten; I had promised you to do my best, and I did it. I tried cheerful small-talk about the neighborhood next. The women said nothing in particular; the men, to my unutterable astonishment, all began to console with me. I shouldn't be able to find a pack of hounds, they said, within twenty miles of my house; and they thought it only right to prepare me for the disgracefully careless manner in which the Thorpe-Ambrose covers had been preserved. I let them go on condoling with me, and then what do you think I did? I put my foot in it again. 'Oh, don't take that to heart!' I said; 'I don't care two straws about hunting or shooting either. When I meet with a bird in my walk I can't for the life of me feel eager to kill it; I rather like to see the bird flying about and enjoying itself.' You should have seen their faces! They had thought me a sort of outlaw before; now they evidently thought me mad. Dead silence fell upon them all; and down I tumbled the third step in the general estimation. It was just the same at the next house, and the next, and the next. The devil possessed us all, I think. It would come out, now in one way and now in another, that I couldn't make speeches—that I had been brought up without a university education—and that I could enjoy a ride on horseback without galloping after a wretched, stinking fox or a poor, distracted little hare. Those three unlucky defects of mine are not excused, it seems, in a country gentleman (especially when he has dodged a public reception to begin with). I think I got on best, upon the whole, with the wives and daughters. The women and I always fell, sooner or later, on the subject of Mrs. Blanchard and her niece. We invariably agreed that they had done wisely in going to Florence; and the only reason we had to give for our opinion was, that we thought their minds would be benefited, after their sad bereavement, by the contemplation of the master-pieces of Italian Art. Every one of the ladies—I solemnly declare it—at every house I went to came, sooner or later, to Mrs. and Miss Blanchard's bereavement and the master-pieces of Italian Art. What we should have done without that bright idea to help us I really don't know. The one pleasant thing at any of the visits was when we all shook our heads together, and declared that the master-pieces would console them. As for the rest of it, there's only one thing more to be said. What I might be in other places I don't know; I'm the wrong man in the wrong place here. Let me muddle on for the future in my own way, with my own few friends; and ask me any thing else in the world, as long as you don't ask me to make any more calls on my neighbors."

With that characteristic request Allan's report of his exploring expedition among the resident gentry came to a close. For a moment Midwinter remained silent. He had allowed Allan to run on from first to last without uttering a word on his side. The disastrous result of the visits, coming after what had happened earlier in the day; and threatening Allan, as it did, with exclusion from all local sympathies at the very outset of his local career, had broken down Midwinter's power of resisting the stealthily depressing influence of his own superstition. It was with an effort that he now looked up at Allan; it was with an effort that he roused himself to answer.

"It shall be as you wish," he said, quietly. "I am sorry for what has happened; but I am not the less obliged to you, Allan, for having done what I asked you."

His head sank on his breast; and the fatalist resignation which had once already quieted him on board the Wreck, now quieted him again. "What must be will be," he thought once more. "What have I to do with the future, and what has he?"

"Cheer up!" said Allan. "Your affairs are in a thriving condition at any rate. I paid one pleasant visit in the town, which I haven't told you of yet. I've seen Pedgift, and Pedgift's son, who helps him in the office. They're the two jolliest lawyers I ever met with in my life—and what's more, they can produce the very man you want to teach you the steward's business."

Midwinter looked up quickly. Distrust of Allan's discovery was plainly written in his face already; but he said nothing.

"I thought of you," Allan proceeded, "as soon as the two Pedgifts and I had had a glass of wine all round to drink to our friendly connection. The finest sherry I ever tasted in my life; I've ordered some of the same—but that's not the question just now. In two words I told these worthy fellows your difficulty, and in two seconds old Pedgift understood all about it. 'I have got the man in my office,' he said, 'and before the audit-day comes I'll place him with the greatest pleasure at your friend's disposal.'"

At this last announcement Midwinter's distrust found its expression in words. He questioned Allan unsparingly. The man's name, it appeared, was Bashwood. He had been some time (how long, Allan could not remember) in Mr. Pedgift's service. He had been previously steward to a Norfolk gentleman (name forgotten) in the westward district of the county. He had lost the steward's place, through some domestic trouble, in connection with his son, the precise nature of which Allan was not able to specify. Pedgift vouched for him, and Pedgift would send him to Thorpe-Ambrose two or three days before the rent-day dinner. He could not be spared, for office-reasons, before that time. There was no need to fidget about it; Pedgift laughed at the idea of there being any difficulty with the tenants. Two or three days' work over the steward's books with a man to help Midwinter who practically understood that sort of thing, would put him all right for the audit; and the other business would keep till afterward.

"Have you seen this Mr. Bashwood yourself, Allan?" asked Midwinter, still obstinately on his guard.

"No," replied Allan; "he was out—out with the bag, as young Pedgift called it. They tell me he's a decent elderly man. A little broken by his troubles, and a little apt to be nervous and confused in his manner with strangers; but thoroughly competent and thoroughly to be depended on—those are Pedgift's own words."

Midwinter paused and considered a little, with a new interest in the subject. The strange man whom he had just heard described, and the strange man of whom he had asked his way where the three roads met, were remarkably like each other. Was this another link in the fast lengthening chain of events? Midwinter grew doubly determined to be careful, as the bare doubt that it might be so passed through his mind.

"When Mr. Bashwood comes," he said, "will you let me see him, and speak to him, before any thing definite is done?"

"Of course I will!" rejoined Allan. He stopped and looked at his watch. "And I'll tell you what I'll do for you, old boy, in the mean time," he added; "I'll introduce you to the prettiest girl in Norfolk! There's just time to run over to the cottage before dinner. Come along, and be introduced to Miss Milroy."

"You can't introduce me to Miss Milroy to-day," replied Midwinter; and he repeated the message of apology which had been brought from the major that afternoon. Allan was surprised and disappointed; but he was not to be foiled in his resolution to advance himself in the good graces of the inhabitants of the cottage. After a little consideration he hit on a means of turning the present adverse circumstances to good account. "I'll show a proper anxiety for Mrs. Milroy's recovery," he said, gravely. "I'll send her a basket of strawberries, with my best respects, to-morrow morning."

Nothing more happened to mark the end of that first day in the new house.

The one noticeable event of the next day was another disclosure of Mrs. Milroy's infirmity of temper. Half an hour after Allan's basket of strawberries had been delivered at the cottage, it was returned to him intact (by the hands of the invalid lady's nurse), with a short and sharp message, shortly and sharply delivered. "Mrs. Milroy's compliments and thanks. Strawberries invariably disagreed with her." If this curiously petulant acknowledgment of an act of politeness was intended to irritate Allan, it failed entirely in accomplishing its object. Instead of being offended with the mother, he sympathized with the daughter. "Poor little thing," was all he said, "she must have a hard life of it with such a mother as that!"

He called at the cottage himself later in the day, but Miss Milroy was not to be seen; she was engaged up stairs. The major received his visitor in his working apron—far more deeply immersed in his wonderful clock, and far less readily accessible to outer influences than Allan had seen him at their first interview. His manner was as kind as before; but not a word more could be extracted from him on the subject of his wife than that Mrs. Milroy "had not improved since yesterday."

The two next days passed quietly and uneventfully. Allan persisted in making his inquiries at the cottage; but all he saw of the major's daughter was a glimpse of her on one oc-casian, at a window on the bedroom floor. Nothing more was heard from Mr. Pedgift; and Mr. Bashwood's appearance was still delayed. Midwinter declined to move in the matter until time enough had passed to allow of his first hearing from Mr. Brock, in answer to the letter which he had addressed to the rector on the night of his arrival at Thorpe-Ambrose. He was unusually silent and quiet, and passed most of his hours in the library among the books. The time wore on wearily. The resident gentry acknowledged Allan's visit by formally leaving their cards. Nobody came near the house afterward; the weather was monotonously fine. Allan grew a little restless and dissatisfied. He began to resent Mrs. Milroy's illness; he began to think regretfully of his deserted yacht.

The next day—the twentieth—brought some news with it from the outer world. A message was delivered from Mr. Pedgift, announcing that his clerk, Mr. Bashwood, would personally present himself at Thorpe-Ambrose on the following day; and a letter in answer to Midwinter was received from Mr. Brock.

The letter was dated the 18th, and the news which it contained raised not Allan's spirits only but Midwinter's as well. On the day on which he wrote, Mr. Brock announced that he was about to journey to London, having been summoned thither on business connected with the interests of a sick relative, to whom he stood in the position of trustee. The business completed, he had good hope of finding one or other of his clerical friends in the metropolis who would be able and willing to do duty for him at the rectory; and, in that case, he trusted to travel on from London to Thorpe-Ambrose in a week's time or less. Under these circumstances, he would leave the majority of the subjects on which Midwinter had written to him to be discussed when they met. But as time might be of importance in relation to the stewardship of the Thorpe-Ambrose estate, he would say at once that he saw no reason why Midwinter should not apply his mind to learning the steward's duties, and should not succeed in rendering himself invaluable serviceable in that way to the interests of his friend.

Leaving Midwinter reading and re-reading the rector's cheering letter, as if he was bent on getting every sentence in it by heart, Allan went out rather earlier than usual, to make his daily inquiry at the cottage—or, in plainer words, to make a fourth attempt at improving his acquaintance with Miss Milroy. The day had begun encouragingly, and encouragingly it seemed destined to go on. When Allan turned the corner of the second shrubbery, and entered the little paddock where he and the major's daughter had first met, there was Miss Milroy herself loitering to and fro on the grass, to all appearance on the watch for somebody.

She gave a little start when Allan appeared, and came forward without hesitation to meet him. She was not in her best looks. Her rosy complexion had suffered under confinement to the house, and a marked expression of embarrassment clouded her pretty face.

"I hardly know how to confess it, Mr. Armadale," she said, speaking eagerly, before Allan could utter a word, "but I certainly ventured here this morning in the hope of meeting with you. I have been very much distressed; I have only just heard, by accident, of the manner in which mamma received the present of fruit you so kindly sent to her. Will you try to excuse her? She has been miserably ill for years, and she is not always quite herself. After your being so very, very kind to me (and to papa), I really could not help stealing out here in the hope of seeing you, and telling you how sorry I was. Pray forgive and forget, Mr. Armadale—pray do!" Her voice faltered over the last words, and, in her eagerness to make her mother's peace with him, she laid her hand on his arm.

Allan was himself a little confused. Her earnestness took him by surprise, and her evident conviction that he had been offended honestly distressed him. Not knowing what else to do, he followed his instincts, and possessed himself of her hand to begin with.

"My dear Miss Milroy, if you say a word more you will distress me next," he rejoined, unconsciously pressing her hand closer and closer, in the embarrassment of the moment. "I never was in the least offended; I made allowances—upon my honor I did—for poor Mrs. Milroy's illness. Offended!" cried Allan, reverting energetically to the old complimentary strain. "I should like to have my basket of fruit sent back every day, if I could only be sure of its bringing you out into the paddock the first thing in the morning."

Some of Miss Milroy's missing color began to appear again in her cheeks. "Oh, Mr. Armadale, there is really no end to your kindness," she said; "you don't know how you relieve me!" She paused; her spirits rallied with as happy a readiness of recovery as if they had been the spirits of a child; and her native brightness of temper sparkled again in her eyes as she looked up, shyly smiling in Allan's face. "Don't you think," she asked, demurely, "that it is almost time now to let go of my hand?"

Their eyes met. Allan followed his instincts for the second time. Instead of releasing her hand, he lifted it to his lips and kissed it. All the missing tints of the rosier sort returned to Miss Milroy's complexion on the instant. She snatched away her hand as if Allan had burned it.

"I'm sure that's wrong, Mr. Armadale," she said, and turned her head aside quickly, for she was smiling in spite of herself.

"I meant it as an apology for—for holding your hand too long," stammered Allan. "An apology can't be wrong, can it?"

There are occasions (though not many) when the female mind accurately appreciates an appeal to the force of pure reason. This was one of the occasions. An abstract proposition had been presented to Miss Milroy, and Miss Milroy was convinced. If it was meant as an apology, that (she admitted) made all the difference. "I only hope," said the little coquette, looking at him slyly, "you're not misleading me. Not that it matters much now," she added, with a serious shake of her head. "If we have committed any improprieties, Mr. Armadale, we are not likely to have the opportunity of committing many more."

"You're not going away?" exclaimed Allan, in great alarm.

"Worse than that, Mr. Armadale. My new governess is coming."

"Coming?" repeated Allan. "Coming already?"

"As good as coming, I ought to have said—only I didn't know you wished me to be so very particular. We got the answers to the advertisements this morning. Papa and I opened them and read them together half an hour ago—and we both picked out the same letter from all the rest. I picked it out because it was so prettily expressed, and papa picked it out because the terms were so reasonable. He is going to send the letter up to grandmamma in London by to-day's post; and if she finds every thing satisfactory, on inquiry, the governess is to be engaged. You don't know how dreadfully nervous I am getting about it already—a strange governess is such an awful prospect. But it is not quite so bad as going to school; and I have great hopes of this new lady, because she writes such a nice letter! As I said to papa, it almost reconciles me to her horrid, unromantic name."

"What is her name?" asked Allan. "Brown? Grubb? Scraggs? Any thing of that sort?"

"Hush! hush! nothing quite so horrible as that. Her name is Gwilt. Dreadfully unpoetical, isn't it? And the name of her reference is nearly if not quite as bad—Mrs. Oldershaw. She must be a respectable person, though; for she lives in the same part of London as grandmamma. Stop, Mr. Armadale! we are going the wrong way. No; I can't wait to look at those lovely flowers of yours this morning—and (many thanks) I can't accept your arm. I have staid here too long already. Papa is waiting for his breakfast, and I must run back every step of the way. Thank you for making those kind allowances for mamma; thank you again and again—and good-by!"

"Won't you shake hands?" asked Allan.

She gave him her hand. "No more apologies, if you please, Mr. Armadale," she said, saucily. Once more their eyes met; and once more the plump dimpled little hand found its way to Allan's lips. "It isn't an apology this time!" cried Allan, precipitately defending himself. "It's—it's a mark of respect."

She started back a few steps, and burst out laughing. "You won't find me in your grounds again, Mr. Armadale," she said, merrily, "till I have got Miss Gwilt to take care of me!" With that farewell she gathered up her skirts and ran back across the paddock at the top of her speed.

Allan stood watching her in speechless admiration till she was out of sight. His second interview with Miss Milroy had produced an extraordinary effect on him. For the first time since he had become the master of Thorpe-Ambrose he was absorbed in serious consideration of what he owed to his new position in life. "The question is," pondered Allan, "whether I hadn't better set myself right with my neighbors by becoming a married man? I'll take the day to consider, and if I keep in the same mind about it I'll consult Midwinter to-morrow morning."

When the morning came, and when Allan descended to the breakfast-room, resolute to consult his friend on the obligations that he owed to his neighbors in general, and to Miss Milroy in particular, no Midwinter was to be seen. On making inquiry it appeared that he had been observed in the hall; that he had taken from the table a letter which the morning's post had brought to him; and that he had gone back immediately to his own room. Allan at once ascended the stairs again, and knocked at his friend's door.

"May I come in?" he asked.

"Not just now," was the answer.

"You have got a letter, haven't you?" persisted Allan. "Any bad news? Any thing wrong?"

"Nothing. I'm not very well this morning. Don't wait breakfast for me; I'll come down as soon as I can."

No more was said on either side. Allan returned to the breakfast-room a little disappointed. He had set his heart on rushing headlong into his consultation with Midwinter, and here was the consultation indefinitely delayed. "What an odd fellow he is!" thought Allan. "What on earth can he be doing, locked in there by himself?"

He was doing nothing. He was sitting by the window, with the letter which had reached him that morning open in his hand. The handwriting was Mr. Brock's, and the words written were these:

"MY DEAR MIDWINTER,—I have literally only two minutes before post-time to tell you that I have just met (in Kensington Gardens) with the woman, whom we both only know, thus far, as the woman with the red Paisley shawl. I have traced her and her companion (a respectable-looking elderly lady) to their residence—after having distinctly heard Allan's name mentioned between them. Depend on my not losing sight of the woman until I am satisfied that she means no mischief at Thorpe-Ambrose; and expect to hear from me again as soon as I know how this strange discovery is to end. Very truly yours, DECIMUS BROCK."

After reading the letter for the second time Midwinter folded it up thoughtfully, and placed it in his pocket-book, side by side with the manuscript narrative of Allan's dream.

"Your discovery will not end with you, Mr.

Brock," he said. "Do what you will with the woman, when the time comes the woman will be here."

He looked for a moment in the glass—saw that he had composed himself sufficiently to meet Allan's eye—and went down stairs to take his place at the breakfast-table.

THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.*

IT is with great pleasure that a student finds himself returning from the alien sphere of politics to the congenial sphere of letters, and from the region of national and party divisions to the fellowship of learning, undivided and perpetual. It is with especial pleasure that an English student of history finds himself in the company of those who are pursuing the same study in America. The members of the Historical Society, kindly recognizing the bond of literary kindred, have invited me to take part in their proceedings this evening; and I am told that I shall not be selecting an unacceptable theme for my remarks in directing your attention to some points connected with the history of one of the great Universities of our common race.

The name of Oxford calls up at once the image of venerable antiquity embodied in all the architectural beauty of the past. To the historic eye the city is, in fact, the annals of England written in gray-stone. And those annals are a varied and moving tale. If you measure by mere time, the antiquity of the old cities of Christendom is but a span compared with the antiquity of Egypt. But if you measure by history, it is rather the antiquity of Egypt that is a span. "Those buildings must be very old," said an American visitor to his Oxford host, pointing to a very black-looking pile. "No," was the reply; "the color of the stone deceives you; their age is only two hundred years." Two hundred years, though a great antiquity to the inhabitant of a new country, are but as the flight of a weaver's shuttle to the age of the Pyramids. It is by another measure that the age of such cities as Oxford must be meted. Between her earliest and latest monuments lies the whole intellectual history of Christendom, from the very infancy of medieval faith to this skeptical maturity (as it seems to us) of modern science, together with all the political, social, and ecclesiastical memories which intellectual history brings in its train. Movements and reactions, the ebb and flow of contending and fluctuating thought, have left their traces all around. As you walk those streets you see, in the spirit of history, Duns Scotus and Roger Bacon, Wycliffe, Erasmus, Wolsey, the chiefs and martyrs of the Reformation, Hooker, Laud, Butler, Shelley; while you meet in the flesh the leaders, on the one hand, of the great Anglican—or rather, Romanizing—reaction; and, on the other, the leaders of what seems likely to prove a second and more complete Reformation.

Nowhere do you feel more intensely the power of the Past, and the ascendancy of the dead over the living. This influence, in truth, weighs somewhat too heavily on the intellectual life of Oxford, while it is too feeble in the intellectual life of a new country like this. An Oxford student can preserve his independence, and even his individual activity of mind, only by cultivating a very large and liberal interest in the general fortunes and destinies of humanity.

Nor is the calmness of the past less felt in Oxford than its power. Thither turn your steps, if you desire to put off for a time the excitement of the passing hour. The keep of the Norman castle is that from which the Empress Maud made her escape during the war in the time of Stephen. Merton College is a memorial of the Barons' war in the reign of Henry III.; Magdalen of the wars of the Roses. Traces of the political and ecclesiastical struggle between Charles I. and the Commons are every where to be seen. Over the gate of University College stands the statue of James II., who, when he sojourned within those walls, was striking the last blow struck by a Stuart king for the Stuart cause. Five civil wars—with their divisions, that seemed eternal—their hatreds, that seemed inextricable—all turned to charitable memories and tranquil dust.

This spell of antiquity is potent enough to overpower even the presence of youth. When I left Oxford, in the dead quiet of the summer vacation, the colleges lay with their gray walls on their broad expanses of lawn, and among their immemorial trees, still and pensive as a vision of the past. Now they are full, if not of the most profitable, of the merriest life on earth. Active forms move about the quadrangles, cheerful voices are heard from the windows which surround them. In the morning the more industrious are engaged in their studies, full of the intellectual hopes of youth. In the afternoon there are parties going forth to and returning from their sports. Then the windows of the old dining-halls glow with a ruddy light; and soon after there come from other windows the sounds of merriment, which do not, in all cases, give place to the stillness of the student's evening task. If it were summer, we should have parties of students in very unacademical costumes coming back from the cricket-match or the boat-race; and if a victory had been won, we should hear it celebrated in a way which would make the old walls ring—though, among a people trained to respect authority, the apparently uncontrollable wildness of the evening's festivities easily gives way to order in the morning. Yet all this no more dispels the pensiveness that hangs round the ancient city than the bright green leaves of spring dispel the sombre tint of its walls. The impression, on the contrary, is rather made more intense by the contrast. The old dial, whose shadow has measured out so many lives, will soon measure out these also, little as youth may think of its end. The old clock will soon toll away this generation, as it has tolled away the generations that are gone. On the college books are written the names of the fathers of these youths, of their grandfathers, of their ancestors for centuries past. They too, when they wrote their names there, were young.

* This paper, with its completion, which will appear in our next Number, is the substance of a Lecture delivered before the Historical Society of New York, in December, 1864, by GOLDWIN SMITH, Esq., Professor of History in the University of Oxford. In case any coincidence should be observed between parts of this lecture and a paper on the Colleges of Oxford, published about ten years ago in Fraser's Magazine, it may be as well to say that they are by the same author.—ED. HARPER'S MAG.

Before entering on the history of Oxford it will be as well, for the benefit of such of my hearers as may not have visited England, briefly to explain the character of the institution, which, though nearly identical with that of the University of Cambridge, differs essentially from that of the universities in this country, and from that of most, if not all, the universities on the continent of Europe—the possible exception being the universities of Spain. The University of Oxford is a Federation of Colleges. Each college is a separate institution for the purposes of instruction and discipline, has its own governing body, consisting of a Head (variously styled President, Principal, Warden, Provost, Master, and—in the case of Christchurch—Dean) and Fellows; its own endowments, its own library, lecture-rooms, and dining-hall; its own domestic chapel, where service is performed by its own chaplains. Each has also its own code of statutes, and the power, subject to those statutes, of making laws for itself. The college instructors, called Tutors, are generally chosen from the number of the Fellows, as are also the administrators of college discipline, called Deans or Censors. All the members of the colleges are members of the University, and subject to University government and laws. The University holds the public examinations and confers the degrees. It legislates, through its Council and Convocation, on what may be called Federal subjects, and administers Federal discipline through its Vice-Chancellor and Proctors. In the matter of discipline there is, I believe, a speculative difference of opinion as to the Federal jurisdiction of the proctors within the college gates, but the bond of mutual interest between all the members of the Federation is too strong to allow this or any State-right question ever to threaten us with an academical civil war. There is also a University staff of teachers in all the subjects of instruction, called the Professors, to whose lectures the students from all the colleges resort, and whose duty it is to carry the instruction to a higher point than it can be carried by the college tutors, who are mostly younger men, not permanently devoted to a college life, but intending to take one of the many ecclesiastical benefices in the gift of the colleges, or to embrace, in course of time, some other active calling. The Federal element is embodied in the public buildings of the University—the Bodleian Library; the Examination Schools, which occupy the lower part of the same great Tudor quadrangle; the Radcliffe Library, from the dome of which the best view of the city is obtained; the Convocation House, in which University statutes are passed and University degrees conferred; the Theatre, in which the memory of founders and benefactors is celebrated at the gay ceremony of the Summer Commemoration, prize compositions recited, and honorary degrees bestowed on distinguished visitors; the University Museum; the University Press; and, above all, the University Church of St. Mary, which, with its beautiful spire, crowns the Academic City, and in which sermons are preached to the assembled University, after the hour of college chapel, from a pulpit not unfamed in the annals of religious thought.

The mainspring of the system, as regards education, lies in the University Examinations for the degree of Bachelor of Arts. At these examinations the majority of the students seek only to attain the standard required for an ordinary, or "pass" degree. The more aspiring become candidates for "honors," and obtain a place in the first, or one of the lower classes, according to their merits. The publication of these class-lists is, as might be expected, the great event of university life, and it is not an insignificant event in the domestic and social life of England. The training of those who read for high honors at Oxford or Cambridge is probably the severest that youth anywhere undergoes, and it is prolonged, generally speaking, to the age of twenty-two. The system of competition is not carried quite so high at Oxford as at Cambridge, where the candidates are not only divided into classes, but arranged in each class in their order of merit; whereas at Oxford they are only divided into classes, and the names arranged alphabetically in each class. Whether such strong stimulants of youthful ambition, and such marked distinctions for youthful attainment would be necessary or desirable in a perfect state of things, is perhaps a doubtful question. But in English society, as it is, the intellectual honors thus awarded by national authority are useful as a counterpoise, however imperfect, to the artificial distinctions of hereditary rank and wealth. Nor can it be denied that the class-lists have given England men in all departments, from theology to finance, whose high training has lent loftiness to their own character and aspirations, and to the character and aspirations of their nation. The College Fellowships, which are bestowed by examination, and to which stipends are attached, averaging about £200, or $1000, a year, form additional and more substantial prizes for exertion among the flower of our students, and it is in the competition for these that the highest intellectual efforts of all are probably made. Our almost exclusive subjects of instruction, till recently, were the classics, with ancient philosophy and ancient history, mathematics being recognized, and by some of our students carried to a high point, but not held in the same honor; though at Cambridge they were the dominant study. Recently, by an Academic revolution, something like that which substituted the classical for the scholastic system in the sixteenth century, we have thrown open our doors to physical science, modern history, jurisprudence, and political economy, to which honors are now awarded legally, equal to those conferred on classics—though classics still, practically, retain the foremost place. The degrees higher than that of Bachelor of Arts—that of Master of Arts, and those of Bachelor or Doctor of Theology, Civil Law, or Medicine—are rather marks of academical standing than rewards of intellectual exertion, though there is an examination for the degree in Civil Law, and one of a more effective character for the degree in Medicine. The degree of Doctor of Civil Law is conferred as an honorary mark of distinction on illustrious visitors of all kinds—generals, admirals, politicians, and diplomats, as well as men of letters or science. Law and Medicine, of which the universities were the schools in the Middle Ages, are now studied, the first in the chambers of London barristers, the second in the great London hospitals. Of Theology England has no regular school. The universities, which were once places of professional as well as of general training in England, as they are still on the Continent, are now in England places of general training alone. They are the final schools of those among our English youth who can afford to give themselves the advantage, and pay to their country the tribute of a long liberal education.

It is still a disputed question whether the universities belong to the Established Church or to the nation. The Dissenters have recently been admitted by Parliament to the Bachelor's degree. An effort is now being made, which has occasioned a pretty sharp struggle in the House of Commons, to throw open to them the Master's degree, which would make them members of Convocation, the governing body of the University. The Fellowships of colleges are all confined to members of the Established Church. If England seems, in this and some other respects, now to lag behind other nations in the march of liberty, it is partly because at one time she had so much outstripped them all.

The Colleges still retain something of their medieval and monastic character, though modern life and Protestantism have, to a great extent, broken through the founder's rule. The Fellows—such of them, at least, as are in residence—still live partly in common, dining together in the college hall, where they sit at the upper end, on a kind of dais, while the students sit at long tables down the hall, and retiring together after dinner to their "common-room" (an institution unknown to our austere founders), to take dessert and wine, and talk over the subjects of the day. What is of more importance, they still forfeit their Fellowships on marriage; whence, as was before mentioned, few of them settle down permanently to college life, which, though pleasant for a time, becomes very dreary as a man grows old, and when all the companions of his youth are gone. The jealous gates of the old monastic quadrangles, however, which, according to the founders' statutes, were to admit no female form more dangerous than that of an elderly laundress, have quite forgotten their ungracious duty, as a visitor to our summer festival of Commemoration will easily see.

One of the most striking objects in the High Street is a long, dark range of buildings, in a late Gothic style, called University College—a name which increases to strangers the difficulty of understanding the relations between the colleges and the University. This is the oldest of our existing foundations, and its reputed founder is King Alfred, whose effigy appears in the hall and common-room, beside those of Eldon, Stowell, and Windham, the later and more authentic worthies of the college. Its real founder, however, was unquestionably William of Durham, a learned and munificent ecclesiastic of the thirteenth century, who bequeathed a sum of money to the University for the support of students in theology, and whose theologians were afterward settled by the University on this spot, though in a humbler house. There can be little doubt that Oxford, as one of the chief cities of Saxon England, was a place of education in the time and under the auspices of Alfred, whose birth-place, Wantage, was close by. But no authentic evidence definitely connects the great restorer of Anglo-Saxon learning and institutions with the University or any of its foundations; though, on the strength of spurious testimony, a court of law has actually recognized him as the Founder, and his successors on the throne of England as the Visitors, of the college founded by the University out of the bequest of William of Durham. If he erected or revived any schools at Oxford, the scythe of the Norman conquest passed over them. Yet William of Durham, if he were now alive, would scarcely be grieved to see that his foundation had become a monument to the memory of Alfred.

We may more reasonably look to the monasteries of which there are remains at Oxford for the origin of the present University. Learning owes a tribute to the beautiful ruins of these houses wherever they are found, for on them first her ark rested when the waters of the barbarian deluge were beginning to subside. In their cloisters her expiring lamp was first revived; from them its rays first shone out again over the dark waste. The Abbey of Bec, in Normandy, which sent forth Lanfranc, the precursor of the great civilians, and Anselm, the precursor of the great schoolmen, was itself the germ of a university.

Certain, however, it is that in the reigns of the Norman successors of William the Conqueror there was a university at Oxford, and that in the reign of Henry III. there was a great university. One chronicler says, a university with thirty thousand students. This is scarcely credible. But the medieval city swarmed and overflowed with ardent youths flocking to the sole source of knowledge and the great avenue of promotion.

A bastion in the city walls was rented, as appears by the city records, for the habitation of students. The University was then not only a place of liberal education, but the school of the great professions, which, as we have said, have since migrated to the capital. The whole academical course at that period, up to the highest degree in any one of the Faculties, occupied sixteen years. There were also grammar-schools for boys. So that all ages were mingled together. Not only all ages, but natives of all countries. There was then not only an England, a France, a Germany, an Italy, a Spain, but a Christendom with one Church, one Pope, one Priesthood, one ecclesiastical law, one language for all educated men, and a group of common universities which were now appearing in the different lands of Europe, like stars coming out, one by one, in the medieval night. Students went from one university to another, learning at each the special kind of knowledge for which each was famous. French youths came to the scholastic disputations of Oxford, and Oxford doctors taught in the schools of Paris. Perhaps the love of wandering, not yet quelled in the half-civilized heart, had something to do with the migrations of the student, as it had with the expeditions of the pilgrim.

The studies were, first, "Arts," including all the subjects of general instruction known at the time; and afterward, Theology, Law, or Medicine. Law was the great study of those who desired to make their fortunes and to rise in the world. Its monks, who struggled hard to win the great places of learning for themselves and for the cause of which they were the champions, wished to release students in Theology from the necessity of proceeding through "Arts." But the academic spirit seems to have prevailed, and to have enforced the previous course of general study as a preparation for the theologian: a sound decision, if the theologian is to know man as well as God; or, to put the case more truly, if to know God he must know man. The cardinal study, however, and the particular glory of Oxford, was the scholastic philosophy, a study condemned by Bacon, and in its superannuated decrepitude justly condemned, as bearing no fruit. If it bore no fruit, it at least, in the mind of the medieval student, bore the leaves and blossoms of most romantic hope. But we have ceased to regard it with contempt. We know that, in its hour, it played no mean part in training the intellect of man. And if it bore no material fruits, it bore the moral fruit of a faith in the world of ideas, and a deep interest in the unseen. It belongs to the spiritual, though chimerical, age of monasticism, cathedrals, and crusades. Duns Scotus, the "Subtle Doctor," Alexander Hales, the "Irrefragable Doctor," and Ockham, the great Nominalist, were among the glories of scholastic Oxford; and they are glories the lustre of which is now dimmed, but, while science and humanity are grateful to him who serves them in his allotted place and time, will never die. Wycliffe himself was one of the greatest of the schoolmen. In the keen reasonings of the school philosophy he sharpened the controversial weapons with which he was to assail the errors and corruptions of the Church. In its high dreams he formed his ideal theory of a Christian world.

There is a name in the annals of medieval Oxford more famous in philosophy than any of these. The good taste of the last century pulled down, under a local improvement act, an arch which spanned Folly Bridge and contained a chamber hallowed by tradition as Friar Bacon's study. There, according to the legend, the great and formidable Franciscan, the man of too much light for a dark age, the father and protomartyr of modern science, pursued studies which, in his case at least, had a practical and fruitful, as well as a metaphysical side. There, as wondering ignorance fancied, the mighty master of the Black Art, now called Science, and the study of the laws of God, held forbidden converse with the Brazen Head. And there, we may more easily believe, was compounded for the first time a black powder which possessed a magical power indeed, and at the first explosion of which the walls of the feudal castle fell to the ground.

The teaching was of the professorial kind, the oral lectures of the Professor being, in that age, not a mere supplement to books, but the only great source of knowledge, the only way of publishing new ideas. The lectures were given not in regular lecture-rooms, but in church porches, and wherever the lecturer could find space and shelter, while eager multitudes crowded to hear the great teacher of the day. Knowledge has since been drunk from purer springs, but never, perhaps, with a thirstier lip. The scholars also exercised their logical powers, and at once displayed their acquirements and gained a more thorough mastery over them, by the practice of disputations—the tournaments of the intellectual knight—with a Moderator as the umpire, to rule the lists and adjudge the prize.

In modern times the University of Oxford, like every thing connected with the Anglican Church, has been conservative. She has, in fact, been the citadel of the Conservative party. In the thirteenth century, her heroic age, her leaning, both in religion and politics, was to the liberal side; and she belonged not to the reactionary, but to the progressive element of the medieval Church and society—to that which prepared, not to that which struggled to avert, and afterward to cancel, the Reformation. There was a sympathy for the doctrines of the Waldenses; there was a strong sympathy, at least among the younger students, for the doctrines of Wycliffe. The learned Bishop of Lincoln, Grossteste, the leading man of Oxford in the reign of Henry III., was the head of a party in the Church and nation which protested against the encroachments and the corruptions of the Court of Rome, and died anathematized by the Pope, sainted as a patriot by the people. This party of independence in the Church was closely connected with the party of constitutional liberty in the State; and Oxford, afterward the stronghold of Charles I., was then the stronghold of De Montfort. Not the hearts only of Oxford students were with the champions of liberty, but their arms; and at the defense of Northampton they fought against the King under their own banner, and, according to the chronicles, fought well. From the spirit of Oxford, it has been truly said, if not from Oxford itself, emanated the famous poetic pamphlet in favor of constitutional government.

*Nec omnis arctatio privat libertatem,
Nec omnis districtio tollit potestatem.
Ad quid vult libera lex reges arctari?
Ne possint adultera lege maculari.*

*Et hac coarctatio non est servitutis;
Sed est ampliatio regie virtutis.
Igitur communitas regni consulatur;
Et quid universitas sentiat sciatur.*

Let the believers in liberty pray for us that we may have another heroic age.

There were no colleges then. The students lived in hostels or halls, most of which were afterward absorbed by the spreading buildings of the colleges, under one of the Masters of Arts or Doctors of the University, selected as their tutor. They were divided into nations, or Northerners and Southerners, according to the part of the kingdom from which they came. I should say the academical community in those days resembled rather a modern German university than the modern Oxford, if I had not before me the indignant words of a learned writer who protests against our comparing the academic adherents of Grossteste and De Montfort with "the bemuddled Burschen, who vaped at the barricades of Berlin and Vienna;" and declares the Oxford scholars, in those golden days, were characterized as much by the spirit of duty, intelligence, and order, as the Burschen are by that of anarchy and absurdity. But order—in the material sense at least—was not invariably characteristic of the Oxford scholar. Our modern "Town and Gown rows" are the faint and attenuated relics of the desperate affrays which in the Middle Ages took place between the impetuous students of the university and the strong-handed burghers of the feudal town. A penitential procession, which the citizens were compelled annually to perform, long kept alive the memory of one of the bloodiest of these encounters. There were fights also, and sanguinary fights, between the students and the Jews, who had not failed to come in considerable force to a university for the practice of usury, or to draw upon themselves the hatred of their debtors—further inflamed and sanctified in its own eyes by fanatical antipathy to the misbeliever. The tragic memory of a great massacre attaches to a spot called the Seven Deadly Sins, the site of the Old Jewry, now occupied by New Inn Hall. Sometimes, again, there were conflicts between the two "Nations" far more serious than those between the clubs in a modern German university; and on one occasion they drew out in the fields near the town, and fought a pitched battle with bows and arrows. Papal Legates were never welcome visitors among the English, who always, in their most Catholic times, had a something of Protestantism and a good deal of Teutonic independence in their hearts; and the Lord Legate Otho, in the thirteenth century, having visited Oxford in the course of his mission, was—in consequence of a quarrel between his cook and one of the hungry scholars, who had been drawn by the steam of a legate's dinner to the kitchen—set upon by the academic populace, and with great difficulty escaped with his life. The royal authority in those feudal times was fitfully interposed to punish tumults rather than preserve order. That concourse of students, of all ranks and nations, not a few of them mendicants, was no doubt an active-minded, ill-governed, inflammable mass—the quintessence of the intellect, but also of the turbulence of their time.

The first college, and the prototype of all the rest, both at Oxford and Cambridge, was founded by Walter de Merton, Chancellor of England under Henry III. and Edward I., who deserves the honor due to a man of genius, if it be a proof of genius to bid a new institution live. It stands on the south of the city, close to Christchurch meadow, with a chapel, or rather church, and tower, famed as examples of the best Gothic style, with three quadrangles of different epochs, a front toward the meadow like a great Tudor mansion, and a pleasant garden with a grove of limes. The little dark quadrangle, called—nobody knows why—"Mob Quad," is the oldest part of the pile, and the cradle of college life. Merton had before him the different elements of his idea—the monasteries, with their strict discipline; the halls or hostels of students, with their secular studies; the stipends or exhibitions which the wealthy friends of learning were in the habit of giving to needy scholars, but which ended with the life of the giver. He adopted the architectural form and something of the strict rule of a monastery, but without the asceticism or the vows, devoting his house to prayer as well as to study, and attaching to it a chapel for the performance of religious services, but making study the distinctive object. His design was expressed in his code of statutes, which were to a great extent copied by subsequent founders. According to these, the Scholars (now the Fellows) of Merton College were to be of good character, chaste, peaceful, humble, indigent and in need of assistance, apt for study, and desirous of making progress in it. Their qualifications were to be tested by a probationary novitiate of one year. The Fellowship was to be forfeited by neglect of study, or by the acquisition of such a benefice in the Church as would render the Fellow no longer in need of assistance. The Fellows were to reside constantly in college, and regularly to attend the schools of the university. They were first to study "the liberal arts and philosophy;" then to pass on to theology, except four or five, who might study canon law. One of them also was to be a grammarian—for the benefit, probably, of the children of the founder's kin who were to be brought up in the house. The rule of study was simply that of the schools of the university. The rule of life prescribed common meals, at which the Fellows were to sit in silence, after the monastic fashion, and listen to the reader; uniform dress; the use of the Latin tongue; strict obedience; surveillance of the juniors by the seniors; and periodical inquiries, like those made at the monastic chapters, into the character and conduct of all the members of the society. Attendance at the canonical hours and the celebration of masses was enjoined on all, and, for this purpose, those of the society were required to be in priest's orders. Masses were said in this, as in all mediæval foundations, for the founder's soul. The college was to be governed by a Warden—"a man circumspect in spiritual and in temporal affairs." There were also to be subordinate officers for discipline, and for managing the estates and keeping the accounts; and every year, after harvest, the Warden was to make his progress through the estates, and report to the society on his return. The annual stipend of each Fellow was to be fifty shillings, subject to mulcts for absence from the schools. The Warden was to have fifty merks for his table and two horses for his progress. The number of Fellows was to increase with the estate, and this increase none, under pain of their founder's high displeasure, were to oppose, saving in very urgent cases, such as a heavy debt, a suit with a powerful adversary (when, in those days, gold would have been too needful to obtain justice), losses by fire, a murrain among the flocks, general collections for poor students, the ransom of the prince or a prelate, a public contribution for the defense of the Holy Land. Each Fellow at his election was to take an oath to obey the statutes; and though power is given to the society to make new rules, no power is given to alter those of the founder.

The last regulation proved very fatal in after-times to the welfare of Merton's foundation, and to that of the other foundations which were modeled after the pattern of his, because it kept them stationary while all around was moving, unchanging while all around was changed. But it evinces no special illiberality or tyrannical tendency on the part of its good author. The men of his generation, the men of many generations after his, having no extensive knowledge of history, would have no conception of the great onward movement of humanity which the study of history, ranging over long periods of time and including great revolutions, has revealed, and which would convict of an arrogance bordering on insanity the man who should, in these times, presume to bind his own ideas on any community as an inviolable and immutable law. To them all seemed fixed and unchanging as the solid earth, of the revolutions of which they were as little conscious as they were of the progress of the political, social, and intellectual world. They painted the Apostles in the dress of their own age, and thought that men would wear the same dress till the end of time. They had no idea that fifty shillings a year would ever cease to be a comfortable income for a Scholar; or that a Warden, in making his annual progress round the estates of his college, would ever be able to travel more rapidly and conveniently than on horseback. And in truth, if they had thought that the poetry and enjoyment of traveling would never be greater than it was in those annual rides in the summer-time through woods and over hills, by castle and abbey and feudal town, not from hotel to hotel, but from one country grange to another, their error would not have been great. Merton allows his Warden and Fellows to make new rules as occasion might require, in addition to those he gave them, and in this he shows himself a liberal legislator for his day. He was scarcely in his grave, however, before his inability, as a mortal, to mould his fellow-men exactly according to his will became apparent in deviations from his rule: and we have the Visitor of his college, Archbishop Peckham, fulminating against the admission of interdicted studies, the neglect of the rule of indigence, and other violations and perversions of the founder's law.

The necessity of respecting individual freedom was as little understood in the Middle Ages as that of making provision for reasonable changes in institutions. Men saw no evil in absolutely surrendering their individuality into the hands of a founder, whether he were the founder of a monastic order such as St. Dominic or St. Francis, or the founder of a college such as Merton. As little did a founder see any evil in accepting and enforcing the surrender. And in those simple times of faith and devotion both parties erred in ignorance, and therefore in comparative innocence. But the error of both grew more conscious and less innocent when Loyola deliberately set himself to turn his followers not only into intellectual slaves, but into "living corpses," and when his followers renounced the freedom to which they had been called to become the instruments of his design.

Merton's College was ecclesiastical, as all literary institutions and learned men were in the Middle Ages, when, in fact, society was divided into the soldier, the priest, the burgher, and the serf. But it belonged to the secular, not to the regular clergy. No monk was to be admitted among the Fellows; and in case the Visitor should exercise his office by deputy, the deputy was not to be a monk—provisions which seem to denote that the founder's leaning was to the party of nationality and independence, not to the Papal party, of which the monkish orders were the most zealous and effective supporters. And in truth the sons of Dominic hardly succeeded in gaining a firm ascendancy over the native independence of the Anglo-Saxons. England was never in the dominions of the Inquisition.

The enactment that the Fellows of Merton should all be indigent had, no doubt, as its primary object, the fulfillment of the founder's charitable intentions toward poor students. But the men of those times also entertained an ascetic preference for poverty, as the higher spiritual state—an error, as we all know, if the doctrine be applied to the wages of honest labor, and not merely to those who live in idleness and luxury by the sweat of another brow; yet an error more respectable than the worship of wealth, and in this respect to be classed with the other chimerical but not ignoble fancies of the time. Poor men were also the most likely to render perfect obedience, for the sake of their founder's bread, to all the requirements of his rule. Nor was there any lack of indigence in medieval Oxford. Many of the youths who had found their way from the bonds and darkness of feudalism to the light, freedom, and hope of the University were, as was before said, actual mendicants. They were in the habit of receiving regular licenses from the Vice-Chancellor to beg.

Our picture of a medieval college would hardly be complete without the servants—the manciple, cook, butler, barber, and porter, and the groom who kept the horses for the annual progress. There were in some colleges regular members of the foundation, with “commons” or allowances like the Head and Fellows. Chaucer has described the manciple of a temple (that is, a college of lawyers in London), and the description will serve equally well for the manciple of a college at Oxford. Domestic service then was not a commercial contract, but a sort of personal allegiance, like the fealty of a vassal to his lord, and probably, as a general rule, it lasted through life. It now seems, in America at least, to have almost reached its last stage of existence.

I have cited Chaucer. He has given, in the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, a picture (not the least admirable in that gallery of social portraits) of an Oxford student of this, or of a rather later period, which will no doubt represent to us sufficiently well the inmates of the House of Merton:

A clerk there was of Oxenforde also,
That unto logike hadde long ygo.
As lene was his hors as is a rake,
And he was not right fat I undertake;
But loked holwe and thereto soberly.
Ful thredbare was his overest courtepy,
For he hadde gotten him yet no benefice,
Ne was nought worldly to have an office.
For him was lever han at his beddes hed
A twenty bokes, clothed in black or red,
Of Aristotle and his philosophie,
Than robes rich, or fidel, or sautrie.
But all be that he was a philosopre,
Yet hadde he but litel gold in cofre;
But all that he might of his frendes hente,
On bokes and on lerning he it spente;
And besily gan for the soules praie
Of him that yave him wherewith to scolaie.
Of studie took he moste cure and hede;
Not a word spake he more than was nede;
And that was said in forme and reverence,
And short and quike and ful of high sentence.
Souning in moral vertue was his speche,
And gladly wolde he lerne and gladly teche.

If this description is as true as it is genial and vivid, “Oxenforde” had no reason to be ashamed of her “clerks.” Though their philosophy produced no gold, they must have been very far from an ignoble or worthless element in the nation.

Such was the most ancient of these communities, the thread of whose corporate lives has run through so many centuries, and survived so many revolutions; in whose domestic archives are recorded the daily habits and expenses of so many successive generations. Would that they had left a record of their thoughts and feelings too, or even of the events that passed before their eyes!

If you come to Merton, or to any of the colleges of which it was the type, in the present day, you will see the old buildings and feel their influence, but you will trace only the faint and fading remains of the original institution. You will find the Fellows still dining together, and still unmarried; but you will have no reader at meals, nor will the meal be silent, nor will the speech be in the Latin tongue. What is of more importance, the scholars of Merton, who have assumed the common name of Fellows, instead of being students in the schools of the University, have themselves become teachers, engaged in the tuition of the students who fill the extended buildings of the college. This is a change which has taken place in the colleges generally since the date of their foundation, though in some, especially those of later date, the rudiments of the system of college tuition are discernible in the original statutes. Junior members have generally been added to the foundation, if they were not originally a part of it, who receive stipends from the college, and wear a special gown to distinguish them as foundationers, but are not members of the governing body. To these the name of Scholars is now appropriated, though in the earlier colleges it was given to those who are now the Fellows. Such of the Fellows as are still students study in London, in the precincts of the law or in the great schools of medicine.

Baliol is of earlier date than Merton as a foundation, but it was not till a later period, and probably in imitation of Merton, that it took the shape of a regular college. John Baliol—the father of that Baliol who was King of Scotland for a day—besought his wife Der-vorguilla, on his death-bed, to continue the charitable assistance which he had given to poor Oxford scholars during his life. The “noble and virtuous lady,” in fulfillment of this request, bought a house in Oxford, and placed her husband's scholars in it. She gave them a short and sensible code of statutes, enjoining them to attend divine service on festivals, and on other days to frequent the schools of the university; to pray for her husband's soul; and to observe some simple rules of life. A young scholar, or servitor, was to be fed with the broken meat from their table. As the foundation of a Baliol, the college is a monument of the close connection which existed between the English and Scotch nobility, and of the tendency which the two nations showed to unite with each other, till the wars of Edward I. put deadly enmity between them, and delayed their union for four centuries. In its outward appearance Baliol, in spite of its new buildings, the offspring of the revived Gothic taste, is perhaps the least attractive of all the colleges; but for many years past it has been the most distinguished in intellect, and the foremost in the race for university honors. Let no one, looking on its ugliness, conclude that beauty is unfavorable to learning. The talisman of its intellectual greatness has not been ugliness, but freedom. Dervorguilla was led by her good sense, or by some happy accident (let us hope by her good sense), to leave the members of her college great liberty in elections to Fellowships—not fettering them, as most of the founders did, with preferences to the natives of favored counties or of founder's kin. They were thus enabled to select and reward merit, to secure the most distinguished names for their society, and the best teachers for their students, and to place a poor and originally very humble college at the head of the whole University.

Exeter College and Oriel College are memorials of the unhappy times of Edward II. The founder of Oriel College, Adam de Brome, a chaplain of the unfortunate king, felt that he had fallen on evil days; for in the opening of his statutes he concludes a long jeremiad on the corruptions and miseries of the age with the dismal declaration that all visible things are visibly tending to annihilation (quæ visibilia habent essentiam tendunt visibiliter ad non esse). Evil days they were indeed—the days of a weak king, when weakness in a king was criminal; of civil discord, of disastrous and humiliating war, of famine and misery that loosened the very bonds of society. And it was something that, with all this around them, men could still live in the world of intellect, and, with a hopeful though a sorrowful hand, cast bread on the waters, to be found in a happier hour. Walter de Stapylton, Bishop of Exeter, the founder of Exeter College, perished in an insurrection of the populace of London on the eve of his master's fall. The elections to the Fellowships at Oriel College, like those at Baliol, were left comparatively open, and with the same result. Among the illustrious men numbered among the Fellows in recent times were Arnold, Whately, and—perhaps more famous than either—J. H. Newman, whose genius organized and led the great Romanizing reaction in the Church of England, which ought to bear his name rather than that of his friend and coadjutor, Dr. Pusey.

The great Palladian building opposite to University College, in High Street, was substituted by the classicizing taste of the last century for the ancient buildings of Queen's College. This college was founded by Eggesfield, chaplain to Philippa, the Queen of Edward III., and was commended to the patronage of all Queens Consort by the founder, who could himself only give "a widow's mite" toward the accomplishment of his design. The permission to speak French as well as Latin, and the injunction to cultivate courtly manners, betoken Eggesfield's acquaintance, as a royal chaplain, with the court—one of the gayest and most gallant courts, the most full of spirit and life, perhaps, that ever met in halls devoted to the "dull pomp of kings." Eggesfield was also full of mystical fancies and extravagant symbolism. The members of his college were to be thirteen, answering to the number of Christ and the Apostles; they were to sit at dinner as he imagined Christ and the Apostles had sat at the Last Supper; they were to wash the feet of thirteen poor men once every year; they were to maintain seventy poor boys, in honor of the seventy disciples; they were to have in their chapel a candelabrum with seven branches, to typify the seven gifts of the Spirit, and worst the seven devils. A symbolical needle is still presented to each of the Fellows at the annual College festival, with the words, "Take this and be thrifty," to recall an absurd etymology (Aiguille) of the founder's name; and from some fancy, perhaps equally childish, the college is still summoned to dinner by the sound of a horn. Such puerilities mingled with the highest designs of these men; so true is it that in their grandest works they were "like noble boys at play." It is a cherished but a baseless tradition that, within the walls of the college founded by his mother's chaplain, was educated the heroic boy whose first feat of arms was performed at Crecy; who led England at Poitiers; and whose name, if we could honestly claim it, would be dear to us, less because he was the first soldier, than because, with all his faults, and all the stains on his bright career, he was the first gentleman of his age. Queen's College has a somewhat better pretension to the honor of having educated the victor of Agincourt, who is said to have resided here under the tuition of his uncle, Cardinal Beaufort.

And now a crisis arrived in the history of the University. Whether it was from the troubles consequent on the preaching of Wycliffe, or from any other cause, the numbers of the students fell off, and the schools were becoming deserted, when a friend appeared to restore the prosperity of Oxford by a new and more magnificent foundation.

CHAPTER V.

THE GOLDEN DUSTMAN FALLS INTO BAD COMPANY.

WERE Bella Wilfer's bright and ready little wits at fault, or was the Golden Dustman passing through the furnace of proof and coming out dross? Ill news travels fast. We shall know full soon.

On that very night of her return from the Happy Return, something chanced which Bella closely followed with her eyes and ears. There was an apartment at the side of the Boffin mansion, known as Mr. Boffin's room. Far less grand than the rest of the house, it was far more comfortable, being pervaded by a certain air of homely snugness, which upholstery despotism had banished to that spot when it inexorably set its face against Mr. Boffin's appeals for mercy in behalf of any other chamber. Thus, although a room of modest situation—for its windows gave on Silas Wegg's old corner—and of no preten-sions to velvet, satin, or gilding, it had got itself established in a domestic position analogous to that of an easy dressing-gown or pair of slippers; and whenever the family wanted to enjoy a particularly pleasant fireside evening, they enjoyed it, as an institution that must be, in Mr. Boffin's room.

Mr. and Mrs. Boffin were reported sitting in this room when Bella got back. Entering it, she found the Secretary there too; in official attendance it would appear, for he was standing with some papers in his hand by a table with shaded candles on it, at which Mr. Boffin was seated thrown back in his easy-chair.

"You are busy, Sir," said Bella, hesitating at the door.

"Not at all, my dear, not at all. You're one of ourselves. We never make company of you. Come in, come in. Here's the old lady in her usual place."

Mrs. Boffin adding her nod and smile of welcome to Mr. Boffin's words, Bella took her book to a chair in the fireside corner, by Mrs. Boffin's work-table. Mr. Boffin's station was on the opposite side.

"Now, Rokesmith," said the Golden Dustman, so sharply rapping the table to bespeak his attention as Bella turned the leaves of her book that she started; "where were we?"

"You were saying, Sir," returned the Secretary, with an air of some reluctance and a glance toward those others who were present, "that you considered the time had come for fixing my salary."

"Don't be above calling it wages, man," said Mr. Boffin, testily. "What the deuce! I never talked of my salary when I was in service."

"My wages," said the Secretary, correcting himself.

"Rokesmith, you are not proud, I hope?" observed Mr. Boffin, eying him askance.

"I hope not, Sir."

"Because I never was, when I was poor," said Mr. Boffin. "Poverty and pride don't go at all well together. Mind that. How can they go well together? Why it stands to reason. A man, being poor, has nothing to be proud of. It's nonsense."

With a slight inclination of his head, and a look of some surprise, the Secretary seemed to assent by forming the syllables of the word "nonsense" on his lips.

"Now, concerning these same wages," said Mr. Boffin. "Sit down."

The Secretary sat down.

"Why didn't you sit down before?" asked Mr. Boffin, distrustfully. "I hope that wasn't pride? But about these wages. Now, I've gone into the matter, and I say two hundred a year. What do you think of it? Do you think it's enough?"

"Thank you. It is a fair proposal."

"I don't say, you know," Mr. Boffin stipulated, "but what it may be more than enough. And I'll tell you why, Rokesmith. A man of property, like me, is bound to consider the market-price. At first I didn't enter into that as much as I might have done; but I've got acquainted with other men of property since, and I've got acquainted with the duties of property. I mustn't go putting the market-price up because money may happen not to be an object with me. A sheep is worth so much in the market, and I ought to give it and no more. A secretary is worth so much in the market, and I ought to give it and no more. However, I don't mind stretching a point with you."

"Mr. Boffin, you are very good," replied the Secretary, with an effort.

"Then we put the figure," said Mr. Boffin, "at two hundred a year. Then the figure's disposed of. Now, there must be no misunderstanding regarding what I buy for two hundred a year. If I pay for a sheep, I buy it out and out. Similarly, if I pay for a secretary, I buy him out and out."

"In other words, you purchase my whole time?"

"Certainly I do. Look here," said Mr. Boffin, "it ain't that I want to occupy your whole time; you can take up a book for a minute or two when you've nothing better to do, though I think you'll a'most always find something useful to do. But I want to keep you in attendance. It's convenient to have you at all times ready on the premises. Therefore, betwixt your breakfast and your supper—on the premises I expect to find you."

The Secretary bowed.

"In by-gone days, when I was in service myself," said Mr. Boffin, "I couldn't go cutting about at my will and pleasure, and you won't expect to go cutting about at your will and pleasure. You've rather got into a habit of that, lately; but perhaps it was for want of a right specification betwixt us. Now, let there be a right specification betwixt us, and let it be this. If you want leave, ask for it."

Again the Secretary bowed. His manner was uneasy and astonished, and showed a sense of humiliation.

"I'll have a bell," said Mr. Boffin, "hung from this room to yours, and when I want you I'll touch it. I don't call to mind that I have any thing more to say at the present moment."

The Secretary rose, gathered up his papers, and withdrew. Bella's eyes followed him to the door, lighted on Mr. Boffin complacently thrown back in his easy-chair, and drooped over her book.

"I have let that chap, that young man of mine," said Mr. Boffin, taking a trot up and down the room, "get above his work. It won't do. I must have him down a peg. A man of property owes a duty to other men of property, and must look sharp after his inferiors."

Bella felt that Mrs. Boffin was not comfortable, and that the eyes of that good creature sought to discover from her face what attention she had given to this discourse, and what impression it had made upon her. For which reason Bella's eyes drooped more engrossedly over her book, and she turned the page with an air of profound absorption in it.

"Noddy," said Mrs. Boffin, after thoughtfully pausing in her work.

"My dear," returned the Golden Dustman, stopping short in his trot.

"Excuse my putting it to you, Noddy, but now really! Haven't you been a little strict with Mr. Rokesmith to-night? Haven't you been a little—just a little little—not quite like your old self?"

"Why, old woman, I hope so," returned Mr. Boffin, cheerfully, if not boastfully.

"Hope so, deary?"

"Our old selves wouldn't do here, old lady. Haven't you found that out yet? Our old selves would be fit for nothing here but to be robbed and imposed upon. Our old selves weren't people of fortune; our new selves are; it's a great difference."

"Ah!" said Mrs. Boffin, pausing in her work again, softly to draw a long breath and to look at the fire. "A great difference."

"And we must be up to the difference," pursued her husband; "we must be equal to the change; that's what we must be. We've got to hold our own now, against every body (for every body's hand is stretched out to be dipped into our pockets), and we have got to recollect that money makes money, as well as makes every thing else."

"Mentioning recollecting," said Mrs. Boffin, with her work abandoned, her eyes upon the fire, and her chin upon her hand, "do you recollect, Noddy, how you said to Mr. Rokesmith when he first came to see us at the Bower, and you engaged him—how you said to him that if it had pleased Heaven to send John Harmon to his fortune safe, we could have been content with the one Mound which was our legacy, and should never have wanted the rest?"

"Ay, I remember, old lady. But we hadn't tried what it was to have the rest then. Our new shoes had come home, but we hadn't put 'em on. We're wearing 'em now, we're wearing 'em, and must step out accordingly."

Mrs. Boffin took up her work again, and plied her needle in silence.

"As to Rokesmith, that young man of mine," said Mr. Boffin, dropping his voice and glancing toward the door with an apprehension of being overheard by some eavesdropper there, "it's the same with him as with the footmen. I have found out that you must either scrunch them, or let them scrunch you. If you ain't imperious with 'em, they won't believe in your being any better than themselves, if as good, after the stories (lies mostly) that they have heard of your beginnings. There's nothing betwixt stiffening yourself up, and throwing yourself away; take my word for that, old lady."

Bella ventured for a moment to look stealthily toward him under her eyelashes, and she saw a dark cloud of suspicion, covetousness, and conceit overshadowing the once open face.

"How's'ever," said he, "this isn't entertaining to Miss Bella. Is it, Bella?"

A deceiving Bella she was, to look at him with that pensively abstracted air, as if her mind were full of her book, and she had not heard a single word!

"Hah! Better employed than to attend to it," said Mr. Boffin. "That's right, that's right. Especially as you have no call to be told how to value yourself, my dear."

Coloring a little under this compliment, Bella returned, "I hope, Sir, you don't think me vain?"

"Not a bit, my dear," said Mr. Boffin. "But I think it's very creditable in you, at your age, to be so well up with the pace of the world, and to know what to go in for. You are right. Go in for money, my love. Money's the article. You'll make money of your good looks, and of the money Mrs. Boffin and me will have the pleasure of settling upon you, and you'll live and die rich. That's the state to live and die in!" said Mr. Boffin, in an unctuous manner. "R—r—rich!"

There was an expression of distress in Mrs. Boffin's face, as, after watching her husband's, she turned to their adopted girl, and said: "Don't mind him, Bella, my dear."

"Eh?" cried Mr. Boffin. "What! Not mind him?"

"I don't mean that," said Mrs. Boffin, with a worried look, "but I mean, don't believe him to be any thing but good and generous, Bella, because he is the best of men. No, I must say that much, Noddy. You are always the best of men."

She made the declaration as if he were objecting to it; which assuredly he was not in any way.

"And as to you, my dear Bella," said Mrs. Boffin, still with that distressed expression, "he is so much attached to you, whatever he says, that your own father has not a truer interest in you and can hardly like you better than he does."

"Says too!" cried Mr. Boffin. "Whatever he says! Why, I say so, openly. Give me a kiss, my dear child, in saying Good-Night, and let me confirm what my old lady tells you. I am very fond of you, my dear, and I am entirely of your mind, and you and I will take care that you shall be rich. These good looks of yours (which you have some right to be vain of, my dear, though you are not, you know) are worth money, and you shall make money of 'em. The money you will have will be worth money, and you shall make money of that too. There's a golden ball at your feet. Good-night, my dear."

Somehow, Bella was not so well pleased with this assurance and this prospect as she might have been. Somehow, when she put her arms round Mrs. Boffin's neck and said Good-Night, she derived a sense of unworthiness from the still anxious face of that good woman, and her obvious wish to excuse her husband. "Why, what need to excuse him?" thought Bella, sitting down in her own room. "What he said was very sensible, I am sure, and very true, I am sure. It is only what I often say to myself. Don't I like it then? No, I don't like it, and, though he is my liberal benefactor, I disparage him for it. Then pray," said Bella, sternly putting the question to herself in the looking-glass as usual, "what do you mean by this, you inconsistent little Beast?"

The looking-glass preserving a discreet ministerial silence when thus called upon for explanation, Bella went to bed with a weariness upon her spirit which was more than the weariness of want of sleep. And again in the morning she looked for the cloud, and for the deepening of the cloud, upon the Golden Dustman's face.

She had begun by this time to be his frequent companion in his morning strolls about the streets, and it was at this time that he made her a party to his engaging in a curious pursuit. Having been hard at work in one dull inclosure all his life, he had a child's delight in looking at shops. It had been one of the first novelties and pleasures of his freedom, and was equally the delight of his wife. For many years their only walks in London had been taken on Sundays when the shops were shut; and when every day in the week became their holiday they derived an enjoyment from the variety and fancy and beauty of the display in the windows, which seemed incapable of exhaustion. As if the principal streets were a great Theatre and the play were childishly new to them, Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, from the beginning of Bella's intimacy in their house, had been constantly in the front row, charmed with all they saw and applauding vigorously. But now, Mr. Boffin's interest began to centre in book-shops; and more than that—for that of itself would not have been much—in one exceptional kind of book.

"Look in here, my dear," Mr. Boffin would say, checking Bella's arm at a bookseller's window; "you can read at sight, and your eyes are as sharp as they're bright. Now, look well about you, my dear, and tell me if you see any book about a Miser."

If Bella saw such a book Mr. Boffin would instantly dart in and buy it. And still, as if they had not found it, they would seek out another book-shop, and Mr. Boffin would say, "Now, look well all round, my dear, for a Life of a Miser, or any book of that sort; any Lives of odd characters who may have been Misers."

Bella, thus directed, would examine the window with the greatest attention, while Mr. Boffin would examine her face. The moment she pointed out any book as being entitled Lives of eccentric personages, Anecdotes of strange characters, Records of remarkable individuals, or any thing to that purpose, Mr. Boffin's countenance would light up, and he would instantly dart in and buy it. Size, price, quality, were of no account. Any book that seemed to promise a chance of miserly biography Mr. Boffin purchased without a moment's delay and carried home. Happening to be informed by a bookseller that a portion of the Annual Register was devoted to "Characters," Mr. Boffin at once bought a whole set of that ingenious compilation, and began to carry it home piecemeal, confiding a volume to Bella, and bearing three himself. The completion of this labor occupied them about a fortnight. When the task was done, Mr. Boffin, with his appetite for Misers whetted instead of satiated, began to look out again.

It very soon became unnecessary to tell Bella what to look for, and an understanding was established between her and Mr. Boffin that she was always to look for Lives of Misers. Morning after morning they roamed about the town together, pursuing this singular research. Miserly literature not being abundant, the proportion of failures to successes may have been as a hundred to one; still Mr. Boffin, never wearied, remained as avaricious for misers as he had been at the first onset. It was curious that Bella never saw the books about the house, nor did she ever hear from Mr. Boffin one word of reference to their contents. He seemed to save up his Misers as they had saved up their money. As they had been greedy for it, and secret about it, and had hidden it, so he was greedy for them, and secret about them, and hid them. But beyond all doubt it was to be noticed, and was by Bella very clearly noticed, that, as he pursued the acquisition of those dismal records with the ardor of Don Quixote for his books of chivalry, he began to spend his money with a more sparing hand. And often when he came out of a shop with some new account of one of those wretched lunatics, she would almost shrink from the sly dry chuckle with which he would take her arm again and trot away. It did not appear that Mrs. Boffin knew of this taste. He made no allusion to it, except in the morning walks when he and Bella were always alone; and Bella, partly under the impression that he took her into his confidence by implication, and partly in remembrance of Mrs. Boffin's anxious face that night, held the same reserve.

While these occurrences were in progress, Mrs. Lammle made the discovery that Bella had a fascinating influence over her. The Lammles, originally presented by the dear Veneerings, visited the Boffins on all grand occasions, and Mrs. Lammle had not previously found this out; but now the knowledge came upon her all at once. It was a most extraordinary thing (she said to Mrs. Boffin): she was foolishly susceptible of the power of beauty, but it wasn't altogether that; she never had been able to resist a natural grace of manner, but it wasn't altogether that; it was more than that, and there was no name for the indescribable extent and degree to which she was captivated by this charming girl.

This charming girl having the words repeated to her by Mrs. Boffin (who was proud of her being admired, and would have done any thing to give her pleasure), naturally recognized in Mrs. Lammle a woman of penetration and taste. Responding to the sentiments, by being very gracious to Mrs. Lammle, she gave that lady the means of so improving her opportunity, as that the captivation became reciprocal, though always wearing an appearance of greater sobriety on Bella's part than on the enthusiastic Sophronia's. Howbeit, they were so much together that, for a time, the Boffin chariot held Mrs. Lammle oftener than Mrs. Boffin: a preference of which the latter worthy soul was not in the least jealous, placidly remarking, "Mrs. Lammle is a younger companion for her than I am, and Lor! she's more fashionable."

But between Bella Wilfer and Georgiana Podsnap there was this one difference, among many others, that Bella was in no danger of being captivated by Alfred. She distrusted and disliked him. Indeed, her perception was so quick, and her observation so sharp, that after all she mistrusted his wife too, though with her giddy vanity and willfulness she squeezed the mistrust away into a corner of her mind, and blocked it up there.

Mrs. Lammle took the friendliest interest in Bella's making a good match. Mrs. Lammle said, in a sportive way, she really must show her beautiful Bella what kind of wealthy creatures she and Alfred had on hand, who would as one man fall at her feet enslaved. Fitting occasion made, Mrs. Lammle accordingly produced the most passable of those feverish, boastful, and indefinitely loose gentlemen who were always lounging in and out of the City on questions of the Bourse and Greek and Spanish and India and Mexican and par and premium and discount and three-quarters and seven-eighths. Who in their agreeable manner did homage to Bella as if she were a compound of fine girl, thoroughbred horse, well-built drag, and remarkable pipe.

But without the least effect, though even Mr. Fledgeby's attractions were cast into the scale.

"I fear, Bella dear," said Mrs. Lammle one day in the chariot, "that you will be very hard to please."

"I don't expect to be pleased, dear," said Bella, with a languid turn of her eyes.

"Truly, my love," returned Sophronia, shaking her head, and smiling her best smile, "it would not be very easy to find a man worthy of your attractions."

"The question is not a man, my dear," said Bella, coolly, "but an establishment."

"My love," returned Mrs. Lammle, "your prudence amazes me—where did you study life so well!—you are right. In such a case as yours, the object is a fitting establishment. You could not descend to an inadequate one from Mr. Boffin's house, and even if your beauty alone could not command it, it is to be assumed that Mr. and Mrs. Boffin will—"

"Oh! they have already," Bella interposed.

"No! Have they really?"

A little vexed by a suspicion that she had spoken precipitately, and withal a little defiant of her own vexation, Bella determined not to retreat.

"That is to say," she explained, "they have told me they mean to portion me as their adopted child, if you mean that. But don't mention it."

"Mention it!" replied Mrs. Lammle, as if she were full of awakened feeling at the suggestion of such an impossibility. "Men-tion it!"

"I don't mind telling you, Mrs. Lammle—" Bella began again.

"My love, say Sophronia, or I must not say Bella."

With a little short, petulant "Oh!" Bella complied. "Oh!—Sophronia then—I don't mind telling you, Sophronia, that I am convinced I have no heart, as people call it; and that I think that sort of thing is nonsense."

"Brave girl!" murmured Mrs. Lammle.

"And so," pursued Bella, "as to seeking to please myself, I don't; except in the one respect I have mentioned. I am indifferent otherwise."

"But you can't help pleasing, Bella," said Mrs. Lammle, rallying her with an arch look and her best smile, "you can't help making a proud and an admiring husband. You may not care to please yourself, and you may not care to please him, but you are not a free agent as to pleasing: you are forced to do that, in spite of yourself, my dear; so it may be a question whether you may not as well please yourself too, if you can."

Now, the very grossness of this flattery put Bella upon proving that she actually did please in spite of herself. She had a misgiving that she was doing wrong—though she had an indistinct foreshadowing that some harm might come of it thereafter, she little thought what consequences it would really bring about—but she went on with her confidence.

"Don't talk of pleasing in spite of one's self, dear," said Bella. "I have had enough of that."

"Ay?" cried Mrs. Lammle. "Am I already corroborated, Bella?"

"Never mind, Sophronia, we will not speak of it any more. Don't ask me about it."

This plainly meaning Do ask me about it, Mrs. Lammle did as she was requested.

"Tell me, Bella. Come, my dear. What provoking burr has been inconveniently attracted to the charming skirts, and with difficulty shaken off?"

"Provoking indeed," said Bella, "and no burr to boast of! But don't ask me."

"Shall I guess?"

"You would never guess. What would you say to our Secretary?"

"My dear! The hermit Secretary, who creeps up and down the back stairs, and is never seen!"

"I don't know about his creeping up and down the back stairs," said Bella, rather contemptuously, "further than knowing that he does no such thing; and as to his never being seen, I should be content never to have seen him, though he is quite as visible as you are. But I pleased him (for my sins), and he had the presumption to tell me so."

"The man never made a declaration to you, my dear Bella!"

"Are you sure of that, Sophronia?" said Bella. "I am not. In fact, I am sure of the contrary."

"The man must be mad," said Mrs. Lammle, with a kind of resignation.

"He appeared to be in his senses," returned Bella, tossing her head, "and he had plenty to say for himself. I told him my opinion of his declaration and his conduct, and dismissed him. Of course this has all been very inconvenient to me, and very disagreeable. It has remained a secret, however. That word reminds me to observe, Sophronia, that I have glided on into telling you the secret, and that I rely upon you never to mention it."

"Mention it!" repeated Mrs. Lammle, with her former feeling. "Men-tion it!"

This time Sophronia was so much in earnest that she found it necessary to bend forward in the carriage and give Bella a kiss. A Judas order of kiss; for she thought, while she yet pressed Bella's hand after giving it, "Upon your own showing, you vain heartless girl, puffed up by the doting folly of a dustman, I need have no relenting toward you. If my husband, who sends me here, should form any schemes for making you a victim, I should certainly not cross him again." In those very same moments Bella was thinking, "Why am I always at war with myself? Why have I told, as if upon compulsion, what I knew all along I ought to have withheld? Why am I making a friend of this woman beside me, in spite of the whispers against her that I hear in my heart?"

As usual, there was no answer in the looking-glass when she got home and referred these questions to it. Perhaps if she had consulted some better oracle the result might have been more satisfactory; but she did not, and all things consequent marched the march before them.

On one point connected with the watch she kept on Mr. Boffin she felt very inquisitive, and that was the question whether the Secretary watched him too, and followed the sure and steady change in him, as she did? Her very limited intercourse with Mr. Rokesmith rendered this hard to find out. Their communication now at no time extended beyond the preservation of commonplace appearances before Mr. and Mrs. Boffin; and if Bella and the Secretary were ever left alone together by any chance he immediately withdrew. She consulted his face when she could do so covertly, as she worked or read, and could make nothing of it. He looked subdued; but he had acquired a strong command of feature, and, whenever Mr. Boffin spoke to him in Bella's presence, or whatever revelation of himself Mr. Boffin made, the Secretary's face changed no more than a wall. A slightly knitted brow, that expressed nothing but an almost mechanical attention, and a compression of the mouth, that might have been a guard against a scornful smile—these she saw from morning to night, from day to day, from week to week, monotonous, unvarying, set, as in a piece of sculpture.

The worst of the matter was that it thus fell out insensibly—and most provokingly, as Bella complained to herself, in her impetuous little manner—that her observation of Mr. Boffin involved a continual observation of Mr. Rokesmith. "Won't that extract a look from him?"—"Can it be possible that makes no impression on him?" Such questions Bella would propose to herself, often as many times in a day as there were hours in it. Impossible to know. Always the same fixed face.

"Can he be so base as to sell his very nature for two hundred a year?" Bella would think. And then, "But why not? It's a mere question of price with others besides him. I suppose I would sell mine if I could get enough for it." And so she would come round again to the war with herself.

A kind of illegibility, though a different kind, stole over Mr. Boffin's face. Its old simplicity of expression got masked by a certain craftiness that assimilated even his good-humor to itself. His very smile was cunning, as if he had been studying smiles among the portraits of his misers. Saving an occasional burst of impatience, or coarse assertion of his mastery, his good-humor remained to him, but it had now a sordid alloy of distrust; and though his eyes should twinkle and all his face should laugh, he would sit holding himself in his own arms, as if he had an inclination to hoard himself up, and must always grudgingly stand on the defensive.

What with taking heed of these two faces, and what with feeling conscious that the stealthy occupation must set some mark on her own, Bella soon began to think that there was not a candid or a natural face among them all but Mrs. Boffin's. None the less because it was far less radiant than of yore, faithfully reflecting in its anxiety and regret every line of change in the Golden Dustman's.

"Rokesmith," said Mr. Boffin, one evening when they were all in his room again, and he and the Secretary had been going over some accounts, "I am spending too much money. Or leastways, you are spending too much for me."

"You are rich, Sir."

"I am not," said Mr. Boffin.

The sharpness of the retort was next to telling the Secretary that he lied. But it brought no change of expression into the set face.

"I tell you I am not rich," repeated Mr. Boffin, "and I won't have it."

"You are not rich, Sir?" repeated the Secretary, in measured words.

"Well," returned Mr. Boffin, "if I am, that's my business. I am not going to spend at this rate to please you or any body. You wouldn't like it if it was your money."

"Even in that impossible case, Sir, I—"

"Hold your tongue!" said Mr. Boffin. "You oughtn't to like it in any case. There! I didn't mean to be rude, but you put me out so, and after all I'm master. I didn't intend to tell you to hold your tongue. I beg your pardon. Don't hold your tongue. Only, don't contradict. Did you ever come across the life of Mr. Elwes?" referring to his favorite subject at last.

"The miser?"

"Ah, people called him a miser! People are always calling other people something. Did you ever read about him?"

"I think so."

"He never owned to being rich, and yet he might have bought me twice over. Did you ever hear of Daniel Dancer?"

"Another miser? Yes."

"He was a good 'un," said Mr. Boffin, "and he had a sister worthy of him. They never called themselves rich neither. If they had called themselves rich, most likely they wouldn't have been so."

"They lived and died very miserably. Did they not, Sir?"

"No, I don't know that they did," said Mr. Boffin, curtly.

"Then they are not the Misers I mean. Those abject wretches—"

"Don't call names, Rokesmith," said Mr. Boffin.

"—That exemplary brother and sister—lived and died in the foulest and filthiest degradation."

"They pleased themselves," said Mr. Boffin, "and I suppose they could have done no more if they had spent their money. But, however, I ain't going to fling mine away. Keep the expenses down. The fact is, you ain't enough here, Rokesmith. It wants constant attention in the littlest things. Some of us will be dying in a work-house next."

"As the persons you have just cited," quietly remarked the Secretary, "thought they would, if I remember, Sir."

"And very creditable in 'em, too," said Mr. Boffin. "Very independent in 'em! But never mind them just now. Have you given notice to quit your lodgings?"

"Under your direction I have, Sir."

"Then I tell you what," said Mr. Boffin; "pay the quarter's rent—pay the quarter's rent, it'll be the cheapest thing in the end—and come here at once, so that you may be always on the spot, day and night, and keep the expenses down. You'll charge the quarter's rent to me, and we must try and save it somewhere. You've got some lovely furniture; haven't you?"

"The furniture in my rooms is my own."

"Then we sha'n't have to buy any for you. In case you was to think it," said Mr. Boffin, with a look of peculiar shrewdness, "so honorably independent in you as to make it a relief to your mind, to make that furniture over to me in the light of a set-off against the quarter's rent, why ease your mind, ease your mind. I don't ask it, but I won't stand in your way if you should consider it due to yourself. As to your room, choose any empty room at the top of the house."

"Any empty room will do for me," said the Secretary.

"You can take your pick," said Mr. Boffin, "and it'll be as good as eight or ten shillings a week added to your income. I won't deduct for it; I look to you to make it up handsomely by keeping the expenses down. Now, if you'll show a light, I'll come to your office-room and dispose of a letter or two."

On that clear, generous face of Mrs. Boffin's Bella had seen such traces of a pang at the heart while this dialogue was being held, that she had not the courage to turn her eyes to it when they were left alone. Feigning to be intent on her embroidery, she sat plying her needle until her busy hand was stopped by Mrs. Boffin's hand being lightly laid upon it. Yielding to the touch, she felt her hand carried to the good soul's lips, and felt a tear fall on it.

"Oh, my loved husband!" said Mrs. Boffin. "This is hard to see and hear. But my dear Bella, believe me that in spite of all the change in him he is the best of men."

He came back, at the moment when Bella had taken the hand comfortingly between her own.

"Eh?" said he, mistrustfully looking in at the door. "What's she telling you?"

"She is only praising you, Sir," said Bella.

"Praising me? You are sure? Not blaming me for standing on my own defense against a crew of plunderers, who would suck me dry by dribbles? Not blaming me for getting a little hoard together?"

He came up to them, and his wife folded her hands upon his shoulder, and shook her head as she laid it on her hands.

"There, there, there!" urged Mr. Boffin, not unkindly. "Don't take on, old lady."

"But I can't bear to see you so, my dear."

"Nonsense! Recollect, we are not our old selves. Recollect, we must scrunch or be scrunched. Recollect, we must hold our own. Recollect, money makes money. Don't you be uneasy, Bella, my child; don't you be doubtful. The more I save, the more you shall have."

Bella thought it was well for his wife that she was musing with her affectionate face on his shoulder; for there was a cunning light in his eyes as he said all this which seemed to cast a disagreeable illumination on the change in him, and make it morally uglier.

CHAPTER VI.

THE GOLDEN DUSTMAN FALLS INTO WORSE COMPANY.

It had come to pass that Mr. Silas Wegg now rarely attended the minion of fortune and the worm of the hour, at his (the worm's and minion's) own house, but lay under general instructions to await him within a certain margin of hours at the Bower. Mr. Wegg took this arrangement in great dudgeon, because the appointed hours were evening hours, and those he considered precious to the progress of the friendly move. But it was quite in character, he bitterly remarked to Mr. Venus, that the upstart who had trampled on those eminent creatures, Miss Elizabeth, Master George, Aunt Jane, and Uncle Parker, should oppress his literary man.

The Roman Empire having worked out its destruction, Mr. Boffin next appeared in a cab with Rollin's Ancient History, which valuable work being found to possess lethargic properties, broke down, at about the period when the whole of the army of Alexander the Macedonian (at that time about forty thousand strong) burst into tears simultaneously, on his being taken with a shivering fit after bathing. The Wars of the Jews, likewise languishing under Mr. Wegg's generalship, Mr. Boffin arrived in another cab with Plutarch: whose Lives he found in the sequel extremely entertaining, though he hoped Plutarch might not expect him to believe them all. What to believe, in the course of his reading, was Mr. Boffin's chief literary difficulty indeed; for some time he was divided in his mind between half, all, or none; at length, when he decided, as a moderate man, to compound with half, the question still remained, which half? And that stumbling-block he never got over.

One evening, when Silas Wegg had grown accustomed to the arrival of his patron in a cab, accompanied by some profane historian charged with unutterable names of incomprehensible peoples, of impossible descent, waging wars any number of years and syllables long, and carrying illimitable hosts and riches about, with the greatest ease, beyond the confines of geography—one evening the usual time passed by, and no patron appeared. After half an hour's grace Mr. Wegg proceeded to the outer gate, and there executed a whistle, conveying to Mr. Venus, if perchance within hearing, the tidings of his being at home and disengaged. Forth from the shelter of a neighboring wall Mr. Venus then emerged.

"Brother in arms," said Mr. Wegg, in excellent spirits, "welcome!"

In return, Mr. Venus gave him a rather dry good-evening.

"Walk in, brother," said Silas, clapping him on the shoulder, "and take your seat in my chimney-corner; for what says the ballad?

'No malice to dread, Sir,
And no falsehood to fear,
But truth to delight me, Mr. Venus,
And I forgot what to cheer.
Li toddle dee om dee.
And something to guide,
My ain fireside, Sir,
My ain fireside.'

With this quotation (depending for its neatness rather on the spirit than the words) Mr. Wegg conducted his guest to his hearth.

"And you come, brother," said Mr. Wegg, in a hospitable glow, "you come like I don't know what—exactly like it—I shouldn't know you from it—shedding a halo all around you."

"What kind of halo?" asked Mr. Venus.

"Ope, Sir," replied Silas. "That's your halo."

Mr. Venus appeared doubtful on the point, and looked rather discontentedly at the fire.

"We'll devote the evening, brother," exclaimed Wegg, "to prosecute our friendly move. And arterwards, crushing a flowing wine-cup—which I allude to brewing rum and water—we'll pledge one another. For what says the Poet?

'And you needn't Mr. Venus be your black bottle,
For surely I'll be mine,
And we'll take a glass with a slice of lemon in it to which you're partial,
For auld lang syne.'

This flow of quotation and hospitality in Wegg indicated his observation of some little querulousness on the part of Venus.

"Why, as to the friendly move," observed the last-named gentleman, rubbing his knees peevishly, "one of my objections to it is, that it don't move."

"Rome, brother," returned Wegg: "a city which (it may not be generally known) originated in twins and a wolf, and ended in Imperial marble: wasn't built in a day."

"Did I say it was?" asked Venus.

"No, you did not, brother. Well-inquired."

"But I do say," proceeded Venus, "that I am taken from among my trophies of anatomy, am called upon to exchange my human various for mere coal-ashes various, and nothing comes of it. I think I must give up."

"No, Sir!" remonstrated Wegg, enthusiastically. "No, Sir!

'Charge, Chester, charge,
On, Mr. Venus, on!'

Never say die, Sir! A man of your mark!"

"It's not so much saying it that I object to," returned Mr. Venus, "as doing it. And having got to do it whether or no, I can't afford to waste my time on groping for nothing in cinders."

"But think how little time you have given to the move, Sir, after all," urged Wegg. "Add the evenings so occupied together, and what do they come to? And you, Sir, harmonizer with myself in opinions, views, and feelings, you with the patience to fit together on wires the whole frame-work of society—I allude to the human skelinton—you to give in so soon!"

"I don't like it," returned Mr. Venus moodily, as he put his head between his knees and stuck up his dusty hair. "And there's no encouragement to go on."

"Not them Mounds without," said Mr. Wegg, extending his right hand with an air of solemn reasoning, "encouragement? Not them Mounds now looking down upon us?"

"They're too big," grumbled Venus. "What's a scratch here and a scrape there, a poke in this place and a dig in the other, to them? Besides; what have we found?"

"What have we found?" cried Wegg, delighted to be able to acquiesce. "Ah! There I grant you, comrade. Nothing. But on the contrary, comrade, what may we find? There you'll grant me. Any thing."

"I don't like it," pettishly returned Venus as before. "I came into it without enough consideration. And besides again. Isn't your own Mr. Boffin well acquainted with the Mounds? And wasn't he well acquainted with the deceased and his ways? And has he ever showed any expectation of finding any thing?"

At that moment wheels were heard.

"Now, I should be loth," said Mr. Wegg, with an air of patient injury, "to think so ill of him as to suppose him capable of coming at this time of night. And yet it sounds like him."

A ring at the yard bell.

"It is him," said Mr. Wegg, "and he is capable of it. I am sorry, because I could have wished to keep up a little lingering fragment of respect for him."

Here Mr. Boffin was heard lustily calling at the yard gate, "Halloa! Wegg! Halloa!"

"Keep your seat, Mr. Venus," said Wegg. "He may not stop." And then called out, "Halloa, Sir! Halloa! I'm with you directly, Sir! Half a minute, Mr. Boffin. Coming, Sir, as fast as my leg will bring me!" And so with a show of much cheerful alacrity stumped out to the gate with a light, and there, through the window of a cab, descried Mr. Boffin inside, blocked up with books.

"Here! lend a hand, Wegg," said Mr. Boffin, excitedly, "I can't get out till the way is cleared for me. This is the Annual Register, Wegg, in a cab-full of wollumes. Do you know him?"

"Know the Animal Register, Sir?" returned the Impostor, who had caught the name imperfectly. "For a trifling wager, I think I could find any Animal in him, blindfold, Mr. Boffin."

"And here's Kirby's Wonderful Museum," said Mr. Boffin, "and Caulfield's Characters, and Wilson's. Such Characters, Wegg, such Characters! I must have one or two of the best of 'em to-night. It's amazing what places they used to put the guineas in, wrapped up in rags. Catch hold of that pile of wollumes, Wegg, or it'll bulge out and burst into the mud. Is there any one about to help?"

"There's a friend of mine, Sir, that had the intention of spending the evening with me when I gave you up—much against my will—for the night."

"Call him out," cried Mr. Boffin, in a bustle; "get him to bear a hand. Don't drop that one under your arm. It's Dancer. Him and his sister made pies of a dead sheep they found when they were out a walking. Where's your friend? Oh, here's your friend. Would you be so good as help Wegg and myself with these books? But don't take Jemmy Taylor of Southwark, nor yet Jemmy Wood of Gloucester. These are the two Jemmys. I'll carry them myself."

Not ceasing to talk and bustle, in a state of great excitement Mr. Boffin directed the removal and arrangement of the books, appearing to be in some sort beside himself until they were all deposited on the floor, and the cab was dismissed.

"There!" said Mr. Boffin, gloating over them. "There they are, like the four-and-twenty fiddlers—all of a row. Get on your spectacles, Wegg; I know where to find the best of 'em, and we'll have a taste at once of what we have got before us. What's your friend's name?"

Mr. Wegg presented his friend as Mr. Venus.

"Eh?" cried Mr. Boffin, catching at the name. "Of Clerkenwell?"

"Of Clerkenwell, Sir," said Mr. Venus.

"Why, I've heard of you," cried Mr. Boffin. "I heard of you in the old man's time. You knew him. Did you ever buy any thing of him?" With piercing eagerness.

"No, Sir," returned Venus.

"But he showed you things; didn't he?"

Mr. Venus, with a glance at his friend, replied in the affirmative.

"What did he show you?" asked Mr. Boffin, putting his hands behind him, and eagerly advancing his head. "Did he show you boxes, little cabinets, pocket-books, parcels, any thing locked or sealed, any thing tied up?"

Mr. Venus shook his head.

"Are you a judge of china?"

Mr. Venus again shook his head.

"Because if he had ever showed you a tea-pot I should be glad to know of it," said Mr. Boffin. And then, with his right hand at his lips, repeated, thoughtfully, "a Tea-pot, a Tea-pot," and glanced over the books on the floor, as if he knew there was something interesting connected with a tea-pot somewhere among them.

Mr. Wegg and Mr. Venus looked at one another wonderingly: and Mr. Wegg, in fitting on his spectacles, opened his eyes wide, over their rims, and tapped the side of his nose: as an admonition to Venus to keep himself generally wide awake.

"A Tea-pot," repeated Mr. Boffin, continuing to muse and survey the books; "a Tea-pot, a Tea-pot. Are you ready, Wegg?"

"I am at your service, Sir," replied that gentleman, taking his usual seat on the usual settle, and poking his wooden leg under the table before it. "Mr. Venus, would you make yourself useful, and take a seat beside me, Sir, for the convenience of snuffing the candles?"

Venus complying with the invitation while it was yet being given, Silas pegged at him with his wooden leg, to call his particular attention to Mr. Boffin standing musing before the fire, in the space between the two settles.

"Hem! Ahem!" coughed Mr. Wegg, to attract his employer's attention. "Would you wish to commence with an Animal, Sir—from the Register?"

"No," said Mr. Boffin, "no, Wegg." With that, producing a little book from his breast-pocket, he handed it with great care to the literary gentleman, and inquired, "What do you call that, Wegg?"

"This, Sir," replied Silas, adjusting his spectacles, and referring to the title-page, "is Merryweather's Lives and Anecdotes of Misers. Mr. Venus, would you make yourself useful and draw the candles a little nearer, Sir?" This to have a special opportunity of bestowing a stare upon his comrade.

"Which of 'em have you got in that lot?" asked Mr. Boffin. "Can you find out pretty easy?"

"Well, Sir," replied Silas, turning to the table of contents and slowly fluttering the leaves of the book, "I should say they must be pretty well all here, Sir; here's a large assortment, Sir; my eye catches John Overs, Sir, John Little, Sir, Dick Jarrel, John Elwes, the Reverend Mr. Jones of Blewbury, Vulture Hopkins, Daniel Dancer—"

"Give us Dancer, Wegg," said Mr. Boffin.

With another stare at his comrade, Silas sought and found the place.

"Page a hundred and nine, Mr. Boffin. Chapter eight. Contents of chapter, 'His birth and estate. His garments and outward appearance. Miss Dancer and her feminine graces. The Miser's Mansion. The finding of a treasure. The Story of the Mutton Pies. A Miser's Idea of Death. Bob, the Miser's cur. Griffiths and his Master. How to turn a penny. A substitute for a Fire. The Advantages of keeping a Snuff-box. The Miser dies without a Shirt. The Treasures of a Dunghill—'"

"Eh? What's that?" demanded Mr. Boffin.

“‘The Treasures,’ Sir,” repeated Silas, reading very distinctly, “‘of a Dunghill.’ Mr. Venus, Sir, would you oblige with the snuffers?” This, to secure attention to his adding with his lips only, “Mounds!”

Mr. Boffin drew an arm-chair into the space where he stood, and said, seating himself and slyly rubbing his hands:

“Give us Dancer.”

Mr. Wegg pursued the biography of that eminent man through its various phases of avarice and dirt, through Miss Dancer’s death on a sick regimen of cold dumpling, and through Mr. Dancer’s keeping his rags together with a hay-band, and warming his dinner by sitting upon it, down to the consolatory incident of his dying naked in a sack. After which he read on as follows:

“‘The house, or rather the heap of ruins, in which Mr. Dancer lived, and which at his death devolved to the right of Captain Holmes, was a most miserable, decayed building, for it had not been repaired for more than half a century.’”

(Here Mr. Wegg eyed his comrade and the room in which they sat: which had not been repaired for a long time.)

“‘But though poor in external structure, the ruinous fabric was very rich in the interior. It took many weeks to explore its whole contents; and Captain Holmes found it a very agreeable task to dive into the miser’s secret hoards.’”

(Here Mr. Wegg repeated ‘secret hoards,’ and pegged his comrade again.)

“‘One of Mr. Dancer’s richest escreteires was found to be a dung-heap in the cow-house; a sum but little short of two thousand five hundred pounds was contained in this rich piece of manure; and in an old jacket, carefully tied, and strongly nailed down to the manger, in bank-notes and gold were found five hundred pounds more.’”

(Here Mr. Wegg’s wooden leg started forward under the table and slowly elevated itself as he read on.)

“‘Several bowls were discovered filled with guineas and half guineas; and at different times on searching the corners of the house they found various parcels of bank-notes. Some were crammed into the crevices of the wall;’”

(Here Mr. Venus looked at the wall.)

“‘Bundles were hid under the cushions and covers of the chairs;’”

(Here Mr. Venus looked under himself on the settle.)

“‘Some were reposing snugly at the back of the drawers; and notes amounting to six hundred pounds were found neatly doubled up in the inside of an old tea-pot. In the stable the Captain found jugs full of old dollars and shillings. The chimney was not left unsearched, and paid very well for the trouble; for in nineteen different holes, all filled with soot, were found various sums of money, amounting together to more than two hundred pounds.’”

On the way to this crisis Mr. Wegg’s wooden leg had gradually elevated itself more and more, and he had nudged Mr. Venus with his opposite elbow deeper and deeper, until at length the preservation of his balance became incompatible with the two actions, and he now dropped over sideways upon that gentleman, squeezing him against the settle’s edge. Nor did either of the two, for some few seconds, make any effort to recover himself; both remaining in a kind of pecuniary swoon.

But the sight of Mr. Boffin sitting in the arm-chair hugging himself, with his eyes upon the fire, acted as a restorative. Counterfeiting a sneeze to cover their movements, Mr. Wegg, with a spasmodic “Tish-ho!” pulled himself and Mr. Venus up in a masterly manner.

“Let’s have some more,” said Mr. Boffin, hungrily.

“John Elwes is the next, Sir. Is it your pleasure to take John Elwes?”

“Ah!” said Mr. Boffin. “Let’s hear what John did.”

He did not appear to have hidden any thing, so went off rather flatly. But an exemplary lady named Wilcocks, who had stowed away gold and silver in a pickle-pot in a clock-case, a canister-full of treasure in a hole under her stairs, and a quantity of money in an old rat-trap, revived the interest. To her succeeded another lady, claiming to be a pauper, whose wealth was found wrapped up in little scraps of paper and old rag. To her, another lady, apple-woman by trade, who had saved a fortune of ten thousand pounds and hidden it “here and there, in cracks and corners, behind bricks and under the flooring.” To her, a French gentleman, who had crammed up his chimney, rather to the detriment of its drawing powers, “a leather valise, containing twenty thousand francs, gold coins, and a large quantity of precious stones,” as discovered by a chimney-sweep after his death. By these steps Mr. Wegg arrived at a concluding instance of the human Magpie:

“‘Many years ago there lived at Cambridge a miserly old couple of the name of Jardine: they had two sons: the father was a perfect miser, and at his death one thousand guineas were discovered secreted in his bed. The two sons grew up as parsimonious as their sire. When about twenty years of age they commenced business at Cambridge as drapers, and they continued there until their death. The establishment of the Messrs. Jardine was the most dirty of all the shops in Cambridge. Customers seldom went in to purchase, except perhaps out of curiosity. The brothers were most disreputable-looking beings; for, although surrounded with gay apparel as their staple in trade, they wore the most filthy rags themselves. It is said that they had no bed, and, to save the expense of one, always slept on a bundle of packing-cloths under the counter. In their housekeeping they were penurious in the extreme. A joint of meat did not grace their board for twenty years. Yet when the first of the brothers died, the other, much to his surprise, found large sums of money which had been secreted even from him."

"There!" cried Mr. Boffin. "Even from him, you see! There was only two of 'em, and yet one of 'em hid from the other."

Mr. Venus, who since his introduction to the French gentleman had been stooping to peer up the chimney, had his attention recalled by the last sentence, and took the liberty of repeating it.

"Do you like it?" asked Mr. Boffin, turning suddenly.

"I beg your pardon, Sir?"

"Do you like what Wegg's been a-reading?"

Mr. Venus answered that he found it extremely interesting.

"Then come again," said Mr. Boffin, "and hear some more. Come when you like; come the day after to-morrow, half an hour sooner. There's plenty more; there's no end to it."

Mr. Venus expressed his acknowledgments and accepted the invitation.

"It's wonderful what's been hid at one time and another," said Mr. Boffin, ruminating; "truly wonderful."

"Meaning, Sir," observed Wegg, with a propitiatory face to draw him out, and with another peg at his friend and brother, "in the way of money."

"Money," said Mr. Boffin. "Ah! And papers."

Mr. Wegg, in a languid transport, again dropped over on Mr. Venus, and again recovering himself, masked his emotions with a sneeze.

"Tish-ho! Did you say papers too, Sir? Been hidden, Sir?"

"Hidden and forgot," said Mr. Boffin. "Why the bookseller that sold me the Wonderful Museum—where's the Wonderful Museum?" He was on his knees on the floor in a moment, groping eagerly among the books.

"Can I assist you, Sir?" asked Wegg.

"No, I have got it; here it is," said Mr. Boffin, dusting it with the sleeve of his coat. "Wollume four. I know it was the fourth wollume that the bookseller read it to me out of. Look for it, Wegg."

Silas took the book and turned the leaves.

"Remarkable petrefaction, Sir?"

"No, that's not it," said Mr. Boffin. "It can't have been a petrefaction."

"Memoirs of General John Reid, commonly called The Walking Rushlight, Sir? With portrait?"

"No, nor yet him," said Mr. Boffin.

"Remarkable case of a man who swallowed a crown piece, Sir?"

"To hide it?" asked Mr. Boffin.

"Why, no, Sir," replied Wegg, consulting the text, "it appears to have been done by accident. Oh! This next must be it. 'Singular discovery of a will, lost twenty-one years.'"

"That's it!" cried Mr. Boffin. "Read that."

"A most extraordinary case," read Silas Wegg aloud, "'was tried at the last Maryborough assizes in Ireland. It was briefly this: Robert Baldwin, in March, 1782, made his will, in which he devised the lands now in question to the children of his youngest son; soon after which his faculties failed him, and he became altogether childish and died, above eighty years old. The defendant, the eldest son, immediately afterward gave out that his father had destroyed the will; and no will being found he entered into possession of the lands in question, and so matters remained for twenty-one years, the whole family during all that time believing that the father had died without a will. But after twenty-one years the defendant's wife died, and he very soon afterward, at the age of seventy-eight, married a very young woman: which caused some anxiety to his two sons, whose poignant expressions of this feeling so exasperated their father, that he in his resentment executed a will to disinherit his eldest son, and in his fit of anger showed it to his second son, who instantly determined to get at it, and destroy it, in order to preserve the property to his brother. With this view, he broke open his father's desk, where he found—not his father's will which he sought after, but the will of his grandfather, which was then altogether forgotten in the family.'"

"There!" said Mr. Boffin. "See what men put away and forget, or mean to destroy, and don't!" He then added in a slow tone, "As—ton—ish—ing!" And as he rolled his eyes all round the room, Wegg and Venus likewise rolled their eyes all round the room. And then Wegg, singly, fixed his eyes on Mr. Boffin looking at the fire again; as if he had a mind to spring upon him and demand his thoughts or his life.

"However, time's up for to-night," said Mr. Boffin, waving his hand after a silence. "More the day after to-morrow. Range the books upon the shelves, Wegg. I dare say Mr. Venus will be so kind as help you."

While speaking, he thrust his hand into the breast of his outer coat, and struggled with some object there that was too large to be got out easily. What was the stupefaction of the friendly movers when this object at last emerging, proved to be a much-dilapidated dark lantern!

Without at all noticing the effect produced by this little instrument, Mr. Boffin stood it on his knee, and, producing a box of matches, deliberately lighted the candle in the lantern, blew out the kindled match, and cast the end into the fire. "I'm going, Wegg," he then announced, "to take a turn about the place and round the yard. I don't want you. Me and this same lantern have taken hundreds—thousands—of such turns in our time together."

"But I couldn't think, Sir—not on any account, I couldn't,"—Wegg was politely beginning, when Mr. Boffin, who had risen and was going toward the door, stopped:

"I have told you that I don't want you, Wegg."

Wegg looked intelligently thoughtful, as if that had not occurred to his mind until he now brought it to bear on the circumstance. He had nothing for it but to let Mr. Boffin go out and shut the door behind him. But the instant he was on the other side of it Wegg clutched Venus with both hands, and said in a choking whisper, as if he were being strangled:

"Mr. Venus, he must be followed, he must be watched, he mustn't be lost sight of for a moment."

"Why mustn't he?" asked Venus, also strangling.

"Comrade, you might have noticed I was a little elevated in spirits when you come in to-night. I've found something."

"What have you found?" asked Venus, clutching him with both hands, so that they stood interlocked like a couple of preposterous gladiators.

"There's no time to tell you now. I think he must have gone to look for it. We must have an eye upon him instantly."

Releasing each other, they crept to the door, opened it softly, and peeped out. It was a cloudy night, and the black shadow of the Mounds made the dark yard darker. "If not a double swindler," whispered Wegg, "why a dark lantern? We could have seen what he was about if he had carried a light one. Softly, this way."

Cautiously along the path that was bordered by fragments of crockery set in ashes the two stole after him. They could hear him at his peculiar trot, crushing the loose cinders as he went. "He knows the place by heart," muttered Silas, "and don't need to turn his lantern on, confound him!" But he did turn it on, almost in that same instant, and flashed its light upon the first of the Mounds.

"Is that the spot?" asked Venus in a whisper.

"He's warm," said Silas in the same tone.

"He's precious warm. He's close. I think he must be going to look for it. What's that he's got in his hand?"

"A shovel," answered Venus. "And he knows how to use it, remember, fifty times as well as either of us."

"If he looks for it and misses it, partner," suggested Wegg, "what shall we do?"

"First of all, wait till he does," said Venus.

Discreet advice too, for he darkened his lantern again, and the mound turned black. After a few seconds he turned the light on once more, and was seen standing at the foot of the second mound, slowly raising the lantern little by little until he held it up at arm's-length, as if he were examining the condition of the whole surface.

"That can't be the spot too?" said Venus.

"No," said Wegg, "he's getting cold."

"It strikes me," whispered Venus, "that he wants to find out whether any one has been groping about there."

"Hush!" returned Wegg, "he's getting colder and colder.—Now he's freezing!"

This exclamation was elicited by his having turned the lantern off again, and on again, and being visible at the foot of the third mound.

"Why, he's going up it!" said Venus.

"Shovel and all!" said Wegg.

At a nimbler trot, as if the shovel over his shoulder stimulated him by reviving old associations, Mr. Boffin ascended the "serpentine walk," up the Mound which he had described to Silas Wegg on the occasion of their beginning to decline and fall. On striking into it he turned his lantern off. The two followed him, stooping low, so that their figures might make no mark in relief against the sky when he should turn his lantern on again. Mr. Venus took the lead, towing Mr. Wegg, in order that his refractory leg might be promptly extricated from any pitfalls it should dig for itself. They could just make out that the Golden Dustman stopped to breathe. Of course they stopped too, instantly.

"This is his own Mound," whispered Wegg, as he recovered his wind, "this one."

"Why all three are his own," returned Venus.

"So he thinks; but he's used to call this his own, because it's the one first left to him; the one that was his legacy when it was all he took under the will."

"When he shows his light," said Venus, keeping watch upon his dusky figure all the time, "drop lower and keep closer."

He went on again, and they followed again. Gaining the top of the Mound, he turned on his light—but only partially—and stood it on the ground. A bare lopsided weather-beaten pole was planted in the ashes there, and had been there many a year. Hard by this pole his lantern stood: lighting a few feet of the lower part of it and a little of the ashy surface around, and then casting off a purposeless little clear trail of light into the air.

"He can never be going to dig up the pole!" whispered Venus as they dropped low and kept close.

"Perhaps it's holler and full of something," whispered Wegg.

He was going to dig, with whatsoever object, for he tucked up his cuffs and spat on his hands, and then went at it like an old digger as he was. He had no design upon the pole, except that he measured a shovel's length from it before beginning, nor was it his purpose to dig deep. Some dozen or so of expert strokes sufficed. Then he stopped, looked down into the cavity, bent over it, and took out what appeared to be an ordinary case-bottle: one of those squat, high-shouldered, short-necked glass bottles which the Dutchman is said to keep his Courage in. As soon as he had done this he turned off his lantern, and they could hear that he was filling up the hole in the dark. The ashes being easily moved by a skillful hand, the spies took this as a hint to make off in good time. Accordingly, Mr. Venus slipped past Mr. Wegg and towed him down. But Mr. Wegg's descent was not accomplished without some personal inconvenience, for his self-willed leg sticking into the ashes about half-way down, and time pressing, Mr. Venus took the liberty of hauling him from his tether by the collar: which occasioned him to make the rest of the journey on his back, with his head enveloped in the skirts of his coat, and his wooden leg coming last, like a drag. So flustered was Mr. Wegg by this mode of traveling, that when he was set on the level ground with his intellectual developments uppermost, he was quite unconscious of his bearings, and had not the least idea where his place of residence was to be found, until Mr. Venus shoved him into it. Even then he staggered round and round, weakly staring about him, until Mr. Venus with a hard brush brushed his senses into him and the dust out of him.

Mr. Boffin came down leisurely, for this brushing process had been well accomplished, and Mr. Venus had had time to take his breath, before he reappeared. That he had the bottle somewhere about him could not be doubted; where, was not so clear. He wore a large rough coat, buttoned over, and it might be in any one of half a dozen pockets.

"What's the matter, Wegg?" said Mr. Boffin. "You are as pale as a candle."

Mr. Wegg replied, with literal exactness, that he felt as if he had had a turn.

"Bile," said Mr. Boffin, blowing out the light in the lantern, shutting it up, and stowing it away in the breast of his coat as before. "Are you subject to bile, Wegg?"

Mr. Wegg again replied, with strict adherence to truth, that he didn't think he had ever had a similar sensation in his head, to any thing like the same extent.

"Physic yourself to-morrow, Wegg," said Mr. Boffin, "to be in order for next night. By-the-by, this neighborhood is going to have a loss, Wegg."

"A loss, Sir?"

"Going to lose the Mounds."

The friendly movers made such an obvious effort not to look at one another, that they might as well have stared at one another with all their might.

"Have you parted with them, Mr. Boffin?" asked Silas.

"Yes; they're going. Mine's as good as gone already."

"You mean the little one of the three, with the pole atop, Sir."

"Yes," said Mr. Boffin, rubbing his ear in his old way, with that new touch of craftiness added to it. "It has fetched a penny. It'll begin to be carted off to-morrow."

"Have you been out to take leave of your old friend, Sir?" asked Silas, jocosely.

"No," said Mr. Boffin. "What the devil put that in your head?"

He was so sudden and rough, that Wegg, who had been hovering closer and closer to his skirts, dispatching the back of his hand on exploring expeditions in search of the bottle's surface, retired two or three paces.

"No offense, Sir," said Wegg, humbly. "No offense."

Mr. Boffin eyed him as a dog might eye another dog who wanted his bone; and actually retorted with a low growl, as the dog might have retorted.

"Good-night," he said, after having sunk into a moody silence, with his hands clasped behind him, and his eyes suspiciously wandering about Wegg. "No! stop there. I know the way out, and I want no light."

Avarice, and the evening's legends of avarice, and the inflammatory effect of what he had seen, and perhaps the rush of his ill-conditioned blood to his brain in his descent, wrought Silas Wegg to such a pitch of insatiable appetite, that when the door closed he made a swoop at it and drew Venus along with him.

"He mustn't go!" he cried. "We mustn't let him go! He has got that bottle about him. We must have that bottle!"

"Why, you wouldn't take it by force?" said Venus, restraining him.

"Wouldn't I? Yes I would. I'd take it by any force, I'd have it at any price! Are you so afraid of one old man as to let him go, you coward?"

"I am so afraid of you as not to let you go," muttered Venus, sturdily, claspings him in his arms.

"Did you hear him?" retorted Wegg. "Did you hear him say that he was resolved to disappoint us? Did you hear him say, you cur, that he was going to have the Mounds cleared off, when no doubt the whole place will be rummaged? If you haven't the spirit of a mouse to defend your rights, I have. Let me go after him."

As in his wildness he was making a strong struggle for it, Mr. Venus deemed it expedient to lift him, throw him, and fall with him; well knowing that, once down, he would not be up again easily with his wooden leg. So they both rolled on the floor, and, as they did so, Mr. Boffin shut the gate.

CHAPTER VII.

THE FRIENDLY MOVE TAKES UP A STRONG POSITION.

THE friendly movers sat upright on the floor, panting and eying one another, after Mr. Boffin had slammed the gate and gone away. In the weak eyes of Venus, and in every reddish dust-colored hair in his shock of hair, there was a marked distrust of Wegg and an alertness to fly at him on perceiving the smallest occasion. In the hard-grained face of Wegg, and in his stiff knotty figure (he looked like a German wooden toy), there was expressed a politic conciliation, which had no spontaneity in it. Both were flushed, flustered, and rumped, by the late scuffle; and Wegg, in coming to the ground, had received a humming knock on the back of his devoted head, which caused him still to rub it with an air of having been highly—but disagreeably—astonished. Each was silent for some time, leaving it to the other to begin.

"Brother," said Wegg, at length breaking the silence, "you were right, and I was wrong. I forgot myself."

Mr. Venus knowingly cocked his shock of hair, as rather thinking Mr. Wegg had remembered himself, in respect of appearing without any disguise.

"But comrade," pursued Wegg, "it was never your lot to know Miss Elizabeth, Master George, Aunt Jane, nor Uncle Parker."

Mr. Venus admitted that he had never known those distinguished persons, and added, in effect, that he had never so much as desired the honor of their acquaintance.

"Don't say that, comrade!" retorted Wegg. "No, don't say that! Because, without having known them, you never can fully know what it is to be stimulated to frenzy by the sight of the Usurper."

Offering these excusatory words as if they reflected great credit on himself, Mr. Wegg impelled himself with his hands toward a chair in a corner of the room, and there, after a variety of awkward gambols, attained a perpendicular position. Mr. Venus also rose.

"Comrade," said Wegg, "take a seat. Comrade, what a speaking countenance is yours!"

Mr. Venus involuntarily smoothed his countenance, and looked at his hand, as if to see whether any of its speaking properties came off.

"For clearly do I know, mark you," pursued Wegg, pointing his words with his forefinger, "clearly do I know what question your expressive features puts to me."

"What question?" said Venus.

"The question," returned Wegg, with a sort of joyful affability, "why I didn't mention sooner that I had found something. Says your speaking countenance to me: 'Why didn't you communicate that when I first come in this evening? Why did you keep it back till you thought Mr. Boffin had come to look for the article?' Your speaking countenance," said Wegg, "puts it plainer than language. Now, you can't read in my face what answer I give?"

"No, I can't," said Venus.

"I knew it! And why not?" returned Wegg, with the same joyful candor. "Because I lay no claims to a speaking countenance. Because I am well aware of my deficiencies. All men are not gifted alike. But I can answer in words. And in what words? These. I wanted to give you a delightful sap—pur—ize!"

Having thus elongated and emphasized the word Surprise, Mr. Wegg shook his friend and brother by both hands, and then clapped him on both knees, like an affectionate patron who entreated him not to mention so small a service as that which it had been his happy privilege to render.

"Your speaking countenance," said Wegg, "being answered to its satisfaction, only asks then, 'What have you found?' Why, I hear it say the words!"

"Well?" retorted Venus, snappishly, after waiting in vain. "If you hear it say the words, why don't you answer it?"

"Hear me out!" said Wegg. "I'm a-going to. Hear me out! Man and brother, partner in feelings equally with undertakings and actions, I have found a cash-box."

"Where?"

"—Hear me out!" said Wegg. (He tried to reserve whatever he could, and, whenever disclosure was forced upon him, broke into a radiant gush of Hear me out.) "On a certain day, Sir—"

"When?" said Venus, bluntly.

"N—no," returned Wegg, shaking his head at once observantly, thoughtfully, and playfully. "No, Sir! That's not your expressive countenance which asks that question. That's your voice; merely your voice. To proceed. On a certain day, Sir, I happened to be walking in the yard—taking my lonely round—for in the words of a friend of my own family, the author of All's Well arranged as a duet:

"Deserted, as you will remember, Mr. Venus, by the waning moon,

When stars, it will occur to you before I mention it, proclaim night's cheerless noon,

On tower, fort, or tented ground,

The sentry walks his lonely round,

The sentry walks:"

—under those circumstances, Sir, I happened to be walking in the yard early one afternoon, and happened to have an iron rod in my hand, with which I have been sometimes accustomed to beguile the monotony of a literary life, when I struck it against an object not necessary to trouble you by naming—"

"It is necessary. What object?" demanded Venus, in a wrathful tone.

"—Hear me out!" said Wegg. "The Pump. —When I struck it against the Pump, and found, not only that the top was loose and opened with a lid, but that something in it rattled. That something, comrade, I discovered to be a small flat oblong cash-box. Shall I say it was disappointingly light?"

"There were papers in it," said Venus.

"There your expressive countenance speaks indeed!" cried Wegg. "A paper. The box was locked, tied up, and sealed, and on the outside was a parchment label, with the writing, 'MY WILL, JOHN HARMON, TEMPORARILY DEPOSITED HERE.'"

"We must know its contents," said Venus.

"—Hear me out!" cried Wegg. "I said so, and I broke the box open."

"Without coming to me!" exclaimed Venus.

"Exactly so, Sir!" returned Wegg, blandly and buoyantly. "I see I take you with me! Hear, hear, hear! Resolved, as your discriminating good sense perceives, that if you was to have a sap—pur—IZE it should be a complete one! Well, Sir. And so, as you have honored me by anticipating, I examined the document. Regularly executed, regularly witnessed, very short. Inasmuch as he has never made friends, and has ever had a rebellious family, he, John Harmon, gives to Nicodemus Boffin the Little Mound, which is quite enough for him, and gives the whole rest and residue of his property to the Crown."

"The date of the will that has been proved must be looked to," remarked Venus. "It may be later than this one."

"—Hear me out!" cried Wegg. "I said so. I paid a shilling (never mind your sixpence of it) to look up that will. Brother, that will is dated months before this will. And now, as a fellow-man, and as a partner in a friendly move," added Wegg, benignantly taking him by both hands again, and clapping him on both knees again, "say have I completed my labor of love to your perfect satisfaction, and are you sap—pur—IZED?"

Mr. Venus contemplated his fellow-man and partner with doubting eyes, and then rejoined stiffly:

"This is great news indeed, Mr. Wegg. There's no denying it. But I could have wished you had told it me before you got your fright to-night, and I could have wished you had ever asked me as your partner what we were to do, before you thought you were dividing a responsibility."

"—Hear me out!" cried Wegg. "I knew you was a-going to say so. But alone I bore the anxiety, and alone I'll bear the blame!" This with an air of great magnanimity.

"Now," said Venus. "Let's see this will and this box."

"Do I understand, brother," returned Wegg with considerable reluctance, "that it is your wish to see this will and this—"

Mr. Venus smote the table with his hand.

"—Hear me out!" said Wegg. "Hear me out! I'll go and fetch 'em."

After being some time absent, as if in his covetousness he could hardly make up his mind to produce the treasure to his partner, he returned with an old leathern hat-box, into which he had put the other box, for the better preservation of commonplace appearances, and for the disarming of suspicion. "But I don't half like opening it here," said Silas, in a low voice, looking around: "he might come back, he may not be gone; we don't know what he may be up to, after what we've seen."

"There's something in that," assented Venus. "Come to my place."

Jealous of the custody of the box, and yet fearful of opening it under the existing circumstances, Wegg hesitated. "Come, I tell you," repeated Venus, chafing, "to my place." Not very well seeing his way to a refusal, Mr. Wegg then rejoined in a gush, "—Hear me out!—Certainly." So he locked up the Bower and they set forth: Mr. Venus taking his arm, and keeping it with remarkable tenacity.

They found the usual dim light burning in the window of Mr. Venus's establishment, imperfectly disclosing to the public the usual pair of preserved frogs, sword in hand, with their point of honor still unsettled. Mr. Venus had closed his shop door on coming out, and now opened it with the key and shut it again as soon as they were within; but not before he had put up and barred the shutters of the shop window. "No one can get in without being let in," said he then, "and we couldn't be more snug than here." So he raked together the yet warm cinders in the rusty grate, and made a fire, and trimmed the candle on the little counter. As the fire cast its flickering gleams here and there upon the dark greasy walls, the Hindoo baby, the African baby, the articulated English baby, the assortment of skulls, and the rest of the collection, came starting to their various stations as if they had all been out, like their master, and were punctual in a general rendezvous to assist at the secret. The French gentleman had grown considerably since Mr. Wegg last saw him, being now accommodated with a pair of legs and a head, though his arms were yet in abeyance. To whomsoever the head had originally belonged, Silas Wegg would have regarded it as a personal favor if he had not cut quite so many teeth.

Silas took his seat in silence on the wooden box before the fire, and Venus dropping into his low chair produced from among his skeleton hands his tea-tray and tea-cups, and put the kettle on. Silas inwardly approved of these preparations, trusting they might end in Mr. Venus's diluting his intellect.

"Now, Sir," said Venus, "all is safe and quiet. Let us see this discovery."

With still reluctant hands, and not without several glances toward the skeleton hands, as if he mistrusted that a couple of them might spring forth and clutch the document, Wegg opened the hat-box and revealed the cash-box, opened the cash-box and revealed the will. He held a corner of it tight, while Venus, taking hold of another corner, searchingly and attentively read it.

"Was I correct in my account of it, partner?" said Mr. Wegg at length.

"Partner, you were," said Mr. Venus.

Mr. Wegg thereupon made an easy, graceful movement, as though he would fold it up; but Mr. Venus held on by his corner.

"No, Sir," said Mr. Venus, winking his weak eyes and shaking his head. "No, partner. The question is now brought up, who is going to take care of this. Do you know who is going to take care of this, partner?"

"I am," said Wegg.

"Oh dear no, partner," retorted Venus. "That's a mistake. I am. Now look here, Mr. Wegg. I don't want to have any words with you, and still less do I want to have any anatomical pursuits with you."

"What do you mean?" said Wegg, quickly.

"I mean, partner," replied Venus, slowly, "that it's hardly possible for a man to feel in a more amiable state toward another man than I do toward you at this present moment. But I am on my own ground, I am surrounded by the trophies of my art, and my tools is very handy."

"What do you mean, Mr. Venus?" asked Wegg again.

"I am surrounded, as I have observed," said Mr. Venus, placidly, "by the trophies of my art. They are numerous, my stock of human wares is large, the shop is pretty well crammed, and I don't just now want any more trophies of my art. But I like my art, and I know how to exercise my art."

"No man better," assented Mr. Wegg, with a somewhat staggered air.

"There's the Miscellanies of several human specimens," said Venus, "(though you mightn't think it) in the box on which you're sitting. There's the Miscellanies of several human specimens in the lovely compo-one behind the door;" with a nod toward the French gentleman. "It still wants a pair of arms. I don't say that I'm in any hurry for 'em."

"You must be wandering in your mind, partner," Silas remonstrated.

"You'll excuse me if I wander," returned Venus; "I am sometimes rather subject to it. I like my art, and I know how to exercise my art, and I mean to have the keeping of this document."

"But what has that got to do with your art, partner?" asked Wegg, in an insinuating tone.

Mr. Venus winked his chronically-fatigued eyes both at once, and adjusting the kettle on the fire, remarked to himself, in a hollow voice, "She'll bile in a couple of minutes."

Silas Wegg glanced at the kettle, glanced at the shelves, glanced at the French gentleman behind the door, and shrank a little as he glanced at Mr. Venus winking his red eyes, and feeling in his waistcoat pocket—as for a lancet, say—with his unoccupied hand. He and Venus were necessarily seated close together, as each held a corner of the document, which was but a common sheet of paper.

"Partner," said Wegg, even more insinuatingly than before, "I propose that we cut it in half, and each keep a half."

Venus shook his shock of hair, as he replied, "It wouldn't do to mutilate it, partner. It might seem to be canceled."

"Partner," said Wegg, after a silence, during which they had contemplated one another, "don't your speaking countenance say that you're a-going to suggest a middle course?"

Venus shook his shock of hair as he replied, "Partner, you have kept this paper from me once. You shall never keep it from me again. I offer you the box and the label to take care of, but I'll take care of the paper."

Silas hesitated a little longer, and then suddenly releasing his corner, and resuming his buoyant and benignant tone, exclaimed, "What's life without trustfulness! What's a fellow-man without honor! You're welcome to it, partner, in a spirit of trust and confidence."

Continuing to wink his red eyes both together—but in a self-communing way, and without any show of triumph—Mr. Venus folded the paper now left in his hand, and locked it in a drawer behind him, and pocketed the key. He then proposed "A cup of tea, partner?" To which Mr. Wegg returned, "Thank'ee, partner," and the tea was made and poured out.

"Next," said Venus, blowing at his tea in his saucer, and looking over it at his confidential friend, "comes the question, What's the course to be pursued?"

On this head Silas Wegg had much to say. Silas had to say That, he would beg to remind his comrade, brother, and partner, of the impressive passages they had read that evening; of the evident parallel in Mr. Boffin's mind between them and the late owner of the Bower, and the present circumstances of the Bower; of the bottle; and of the box. That, the fortunes of his brother and comrade, and of himself, were evidently made, inasmuch as they had but to put their price upon this document, and get that price from the minion of fortune and the worm of the hour: who now appeared to be less of a minion and more of a worm than had been previously supposed. That, he considered it plain that such price was stateable in a single expressive word, and that the word was, "Halves!" That, the question then arose when "Halves!" should be called. That, here he had a plan of action to recommend, with a conditional clause. That, the plan of action was that they should lie by with patience; that, they should allow the Mounds to be gradually leveled and cleared away, while retaining to themselves their present opportunity of watching the process—which would be, he conceived, to put the trouble and cost of daily digging and delving upon somebody else, while they might nightly turn such complete disturbance of the dust to the account of their own private investigations—and that, when the Mounds were gone, and they had worked those chances for their own joint benefit solely, they should then, and not before, explode on the minion and worm. But here came the conditional clause, and to this he entreated the special attention of his comrade, brother, and partner. It was not to be borne that the minion and worm should carry off any of that property which was now to be regarded as their own property. When he, Mr. Wegg, had seen the minion surreptitiously making off with that bottle, and its precious contents unknown, he had looked upon him in the light of a mere robber, and, as such, would have despoiled him of his ill-gotten gain, but for the judicious interference of his comrade, brother, and partner. Therefore, the conditional clause he proposed was, that, if the minion should return in his late sneaking manner, and if, being closely watched, he should be found to possess himself of any thing, no matter what, the sharp sword impending over his head should be instantly shown him, he should be strictly examined as to what he knew or suspected, should be severely handled by them his masters, and should be kept in a state of abject moral bondage and slavery until the time when they should see fit to permit him to purchase his freedom at the price of half his possessions. If, said Mr. Wegg by way of peroration, he had erred in saying only "Halves!" he trusted to his comrade, brother, and partner not to hesitate to set him right, and to reprove his weakness. It might be more according to the rights of things, to say Two-thirds; it might be more according to the rights of things, to say Three-fourths. On those points he was ever open to correction.

Mr. Venus, having wafted his attention to this discourse over three successive saucers of tea, signified his concurrence in the views advanced. Inspired hereby, Mr. Wegg extended his right hand, and declared it to be a hand which never yet. Without entering into more minute particulars. Mr. Venus, sticking to his tea, briefly professed his belief, as polite forms required of him, that it was a hand which never yet. But contented himself with looking at it, and did not take it to his bosom.

"Brother," said Wegg, when this happy understanding was established, "I should like to ask you something. You remember the night when I first looked in here, and found you floating your powerful mind in tea?"

Still swilling tea, Mr. Venus nodded assent.

"And there you sit, Sir," pursued Wegg with an air of thoughtful admiration, "as if you had never left off! There you sit, Sir, as if you had an unlimited capacity of assimilating the flagrant article! There you sit, Sir, in the midst of your works, looking as if you'd been called upon for Home, Sweet Home, and was oblegging the company!"

'A exile from home splendor dazzles in vain,
O give you your lowly Preparations again,
The birds stuffed so sweetly that can't be expected to come at your call,
Give you these with the peace of mind dearer than all.
Home, Home, Home, sweet Home!"

"—Be it ever," added Mr. Wegg in prose as he glanced about the shop, "ever so ghastly, all things considered, there's no place like it."

"You said you'd like to ask something; but you haven't asked it," remarked Venus, very unsympathetic in manner.

"Your peace of mind," said Wegg, offering condolence, "your peace of mind was in a poor way that night. How's it going on. Is it looking up at all?"

"She does not wish," replied Mr. Venus with a comical mixture of indignant obstinacy and tender melancholy, "to regard herself, nor yet to be regarded, in that particular light. There's no more to be said."

"Ah, dear me, dear me!" exclaimed Wegg with a sigh, but eying him while pretending to keep him company in eying the fire, "such is Woman! And I remember you said that night, sitting there as I sat here—said that night when your peace of mind was first laid low, that you had taken an interest in these very affairs. Such is coincidence!"

"Her father," rejoined Venus, and then stopped to swallow more tea, "her father was mixed up in them."

"You didn't mention her name, Sir, I think?" observed Wegg, pensively. "No, you didn't mention her name that night."

"Pleasant Riderhood."

"In—deed!" cried Wegg. "Pleasant Riderhood. There's something moving in the name. Pleasant. Dear me! Seems to express what she might have been if she hadn't made that unpleasant remark—and what she ain't in consequence of having made it. Would it at all pour balm into your wounds, Mr. Venus, to inquire how you came acquainted with her?"

"I was down at the water-side," said Venus, taking another gulp of tea and mournfully winking at the fire—"looking for parrots"—taking another gulp and stopping.

Mr. Wegg hinted, to jog his attention: "You could hardly have been out parrot-shooting in the British climate, Sir?"

"No, no, no," said Venus, fretfully. "I was down at the water-side looking for parrots brought home by sailors, to buy for stuffing."

"Ay, ay, ay, Sir!"

"—And looking for a nice pair of rattlesnakes, to articulate for a Museum—when I was doomed to fall in with her and deal with her. It was just at the time of that discovery in the river. Her father had seen the discovery being towed in the river. I made the popularity of the subject a reason for going back to improve the acquaintance, and I have never since been the man I was. My very bones is rendered flabby by brooding over it. If they could be brought to me loose, to sort, I should hardly have the face to claim 'em as mine. To such an extent have I fallen off under it."

Mr. Wegg, less interested than he had been, glanced at one particular shelf in the dark.

"Why I remember, Mr. Venus," he said, in a tone of friendly commiseration "(for I remember every word that falls from you, Sir), I remember that you said that night, you had got up there—and then your words was, 'Never mind.'"

"—The parrot that I bought of her," said Venus, with a despondent rise and fall of his eyes. "Yes; there it lies on its side, dried up; except for its plumage, very like myself. I've never had the heart to prepare it, and I never shall have now."

With a disappointed face, Silas mentally con- signed this parrot to regions more than tropical, and, seeming for the time to have lost his power of assuming an interest in the woes of Mr. Venus, fell to tightening his wooden leg as a preparation for departure: its gymnastic performances of that evening having severely tried its constitution.

After Silas had left the shop, hat-box in hand, and had left Mr. Venus to lower himself to oblivion-point with the requisite weight of tea, it greatly preyed on his ingenuous mind that he had taken this artist into partnership at all. He bitterly felt that he had overreached himself in the beginning by grasping at Mr. Venus's mere straws of hints, now shown to be worthless for his purpose. Casting about for ways and means of dissolving the connection without loss of money, reproaching himself for having been betrayed into an avowal of his secret, and complimenting himself beyond measure on his purely accidental good-luck, he beguiled the distance between Clerkenwell and the mansion of the Golden Dustman.

For Silas Wegg felt it to be quite out of the question that he could lay his head upon his pillow in peace without first hovering over Mr. Boffin's house in the superior character of its Evil Genius. Power (unless it be the power of intellect or virtue) has ever the greatest attraction for the lowest natures; and the mere defiance of the unconscious house-front, with his power to strip the roof off the inhabiting family like the roof of a house of cards, was a treat which had a charm for Silas Wegg.

As he hovered on the opposite side of the street, exulting, the carriage drove up.

"There'll shortly be an end of you," said Wegg, threatening it with the hat-box. "Your varnish is fading."

Mrs. Boffin descended and went in.

"Look out for a fall, my Lady Dustwoman," said Wegg.

Bella lightly descended, and ran in after her.

"How brisk we are!" said Wegg. "You won't run so gayly to your old shabby home, my girl. You'll have to go there, though."

A little while, and the Secretary came out.

"I was passed over for you," said Wegg. "But you had better provide yourself with another situation, young man."

Mr. Boffin's shadow passed upon the blinds of three large windows as he trotted down the room, and passed again as he went back.

"Yoop!" cried Wegg. "You're there, are you? Where's the bottle? You would give your bottle for my box, Dustman!"

Having now composed his mind for slumber, he turned homeward. Such was the greed of the fellow, that his mind had shot beyond halves, two-thirds, three-fourths, and gone straight to spoliation of the whole. "Though that wouldn't quite do," he considered, growing cooler as he got away. "That's what would happen to him if he didn't buy us up. We should get nothing by that."

We so judge others by ourselves, that it had never come into his head before that he might not buy us up, and might prove honest, and prefer to be poor. It caused him a slight tremor as it passed; but a very slight one, for the idle thought was gone directly.

"He's grown too fond of money for that," said Wegg; "he's grown too fond of money." The burden fell into a strain or tune as he stumped along the pavements. All the way home he stumped it out of the rattling streets, piano with his own foot, and forte with his wooden leg, "He's GROWN TOO FOND OF MONEY FOR THAT, he's GROWN TOO FOND OF MONEY."

Even next day Silas soothed himself with this melodious strain, when he was called out of bed at daybreak to set open the yard-gate and admit the train of carts and horses that came to carry off the little Mound. And all day long, as he kept unwinking watch on the slow process which promised to protract itself through many days and weeks, whenever (to save himself from being choked with dust) he patrolled a little cinderous beat he established for the purpose, without taking his eyes from the diggers, he still stumped to the tune: "He's GROWN TOO FOND OF MONEY FOR THAT, he's GROWN TOO FOND OF MONEY."

THE OLD LETTER.

I BURNED the others, one by one; but my courage failed at last,
And I snatched this, scorched and yellow, where the fire's breath had passed.
I could not let it lie there, for it turned like a thing in pain;
And I love it for the old times' sake that never come again.

They used to call me beautiful; I had nothing else beside.

There was none more great or wise than he in all the world wide;

And it's still a sort of pleasure—very mournful though it be—

To know he once could think such thoughts, and write such words of me.

But my poor beauty faded; 'twas the only thing I had. I was always weak and foolish, and my whole life grew sad,

For the cruel blighting fever left me pitiful to see (Oh, it's true that "Beauty's fleeting!"), and my Love no more loved me.

I have nothing to forgive him; still, he very soon forgot. Men have much to do and think of that we girls have not. A man has little thought to spare for his own chosen wife; Women's minds are very narrow, and a girl's love is her life.

They say I should forget him, but I can not if I would, For since my beauty left me I have tried hard to be good; And his name is always on my lips, when I pray to—God above—

Oh, surely I may pray for one I can never cease to love!

I was never fit to be his wife, even when my face was fair; But every one may pray to Heaven; we are all equal there.

And God, in His great mercy, will not pass my prayers by. I have one thing left to live for—to pray for him till I die.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 4th of April. It comprises the details of Sherman's march from Savannah in Georgia, through South Carolina, to Goldsborough in North Carolina; of Sheridan's operations in the Valley of the Shenandoah, and his junction with Grant's army; and of the series of actions before Richmond, culminating with the capture of Petersburg and Richmond.

General Sherman's march from the Savannah to the Neuse River was completed on the 22d of March. Just sixty-five days had elapsed since he began the movement, January 16, by the transportation from Savannah to Beaufort of Howard's command, which consisted of Blair's and Logan's corps. This was the right wing, as it had been in the march from Atlanta. Slocum's command, constituting the left wing, started four days later, marching up the right bank of the Savannah to Sister's Ferry. To this wing belonged Williams's and Davis's—the Twentieth and Fourteenth corps. Slocum's column was delayed several days at Sister's Ferry, being unable, on account of the height of water in the river, to use the pontoons. A crossing was effected February 4. Howard, in the mean time, had driven the enemy from Pocotaligo, and having passed through and burned M'Phersonville, was moving across the Salkehatchie. Blair's corps had the advance and effected the passage of the river in the face of the enemy, who had here great natural advantages for resisting Sherman's progress. Howard's congratulatory letter to General Blair speaks thus of the important success gained in effecting so rapid a progress at this critical stage of the march:

"Your First Division, under Major-General Mower, with almost incredible celerity, cleared Whippy Swamp, seven burned bridges, and the road filled with felled trees; made a successful reconnoissance to Braxton's Bridge, forcing the enemy to destroy it, and to defend the causeway; then, aided by the Ninth Illinois mounted infantry, drove back the enemy, reached River's bridges so quickly as to arrest and effectually prevent their destruction. The same division, under the same indomitable leadership, in one day made two infantry roadways through the swamp, a mile and a half in extent, demonstrated strongly on the enemy's fortified front, completely turned his position, and planted itself firmly on the eastern shore of this indescribably ugly Salkehatchie. All this was done in the face of canister, shells, and a sharp, obstinate musketry fire from behind works. Your Fourth Division, under Brevet Major-General Giles A. Smith, also crossed this wide and troublesome swamp, walking in water above the knee, skirmished successfully with the enemy, and cut off all reinforcements from below, which might have hindered General Mower's success."

The greatest topographical obstacles to Howard's march had thus been overcome, and the movements of the right wing from this point were very rapid. Two positions—Bambury and Midway—were soon gained on the railroad from Charleston to Augusta. This success must be attributed to Sherman's strategy in the earlier stages of the march. The enemy was not allowed to concentrate his force. Three points—Charleston, Branchville, and Augusta—were simultaneously threatened by Sherman's first movements, and each one of these points was so vital that the Confederates divided their force between them, so that the resistance in either direction was not formidable. If, for instance, the enemy had concentrated on the line of the Salkehatchie, then the left wing, under Slocum, would, in its advance northward, have made it quite impossible either to hold that line long or to retreat safely. So complete was the success of this manoeuvre that the force which had been drawn from Hood's old army to protect Augusta was prevented from taking any part in the way of co-operation with Beauregard and Hardee during the entire campaign in South Carolina. Hardee, at Charleston, would have been placed in a similar position had it not been for the single line of retreat which Gillmore, who was operating with a separate column against Charleston, had left open northward from that city. But for the force at Augusta there was no line left open. At first threatening Augusta very strongly, both with Kilpatrick's cavalry and Slocum's command, Sherman very soon left that city out of his combinations, while he, at the same time, by advancing Kilpatrick and Slocum northward to the Charlotte and Augusta Railroad, isolated the Confederate force there gathered from the forces in his immediate front. This movement of the left wing brought it up to the support of the right.

By the 14th of February both Slocum and Howard were across the North Edisto; Orangeburg, north of Branchville, had been occupied; and Beauregard compelled to fall back to the Congaree for the defense of Columbia, the capital of the State. The very next day Logan's corps had gained a position on the north bank of the Congaree. The whole right wing succeeded in effecting the passage of that stream, and on the 17th Columbia was surrendered. The destruction of the railroads running in every direction from the city was very complete. The city itself was almost entirely destroyed by fire, notwithstanding General Sherman's efforts to arrest the conflagration. Twenty thousand bales of cotton were burned, besides several hundred buildings. In the mean time Hardee was evacuating Charleston, but too late to be of any immediate service to Beauregard, who, with Hampton's cavalry, was compelled to fall back continually as Sherman advanced. From Columbia Sherman made a feint northward toward Charlotte, in North Carolina, and in the course of a week had his army well in hand at Winnsborough. Up to this point the railroad from Columbia was destroyed. The feint toward Charlotte was still maintained, while the greater portion of the army moved eastward to Cheraw, where twenty-five pieces of artillery were captured, together with eighteen tons of powder and several thousand bales of cotton. On the 11th of March General Grant received the first official dispatch from Sherman, dated at Laurel Hill on the 8th. According to this dispatch the army was perfectly successful, and had met with no formidable resistance. On the 11th Sherman entered Fayetteville, and communication with Wilmington by way of Cape Fear River was at once established.

During this march Kilpatrick had twice encountered the enemy. The first engagement was at Aiken, a few miles northeast of Augusta, and was fought with Wheeler's cavalry. The result was a repulse of the enemy. Near Fayetteville another action took place on March 10, with Wade Hampton's command. Kilpatrick had advanced toward Fayetteville for the purpose of intercepting Hardee, who was due at that point. He was just too late for this. Hampton, bringing up Hardee's rear, here made an attack before Kilpatrick's entire command had been brought up. The attack succeeded at first,

Kilpatrick was even compelled to abandon his headquarters and two pieces of artillery; but bringing up the rest of his column he led a charge against the enemy, driving him from the field and recapturing his camp and guns.

Sherman started from Fayetteville for Goldsborough on the 14th. The successes already gained by General Schofield had made the Neuse River immediately available as a base of operations. The enemy in his front was now stronger than he had been at any other stage of the march. Bragg and Hardee had joined Johnston, to whom had been assigned the conduct of the campaign in North Carolina on the part of the Confederates. It was probable, therefore, that, in the march to the Neuse, Sherman would have to measure his strength against Johnston, and he made his arrangements with a view to that event. The main portion of the army, with the wagon-trains, were dispatched on the road to Goldsborough. Another column, headed by Kilpatrick, and consisting of two divisions of the Twentieth and two of the Fourteenth corps, advanced on the road to Raleigh, the other two divisions of Slocum's command being between this column and Howard. Kilpatrick met the enemy's cavalry about five miles from Fayetteville on the evening of the 15th. His infantry supports coming up, he attacked and drove the enemy from his advanced line, capturing three guns and 200 prisoners. The Confederates fell back to Moore's Cross Roads, near Averysborough, where they held a strong position, between Cape Fear and Black rivers, with a stream in front. On the 16th there was fighting all day, which made such an impression upon the enemy that during the night he abandoned his line. Thus the way was uncovered for the army to advance on Goldsborough.

Another battle was fought near Bentonsville, 12 miles from the Neuse. Here the enemy was found strongly intrenched on the 19th. In an attempt to flank this position a portion of the Twentieth Corps sustained a repulse, taking advantage of which the enemy succeeded in pushing back the whole line. A new line was formed, behind hasty intrenchments. The enemy made five charges against this line, and was each time repulsed. At night he retired. On the 20th Sherman attacked with his whole army, and the enemy that night fell back to Smithfield, and Sherman the next day was at Goldsborough, which Schofield had already occupied. Terry's column had also come up from Wilmington. The three armies had formed a junction on the very day appointed by Sherman.

Schofield's march from Newbern to Goldsborough had begun on the 6th of March. The force opposed to Schofield was that of General Bragg, who made his first stand at Kinston, having been considerably reinforced. Kinston is 32 miles from Newbern and 22 from Goldsborough. A few miles below Kinston there was active skirmishing on the 7th, and the next day a portion of the Federal skirmish line was captured by a flank movement of the enemy. The loss in prisoners was about 1,500 men; three guns also were captured. In attempting to follow up this advantage by an attack later in the day the enemy was repulsed. He again attacked on the 10th, when he was so severely punished as to be forced to fall back across the Neuse, leaving the way open to Kinston, which was occupied by Schofield on the 13th. Eight days afterward Goldsborough was occupied.

On the 27th of February Sheridan began to "ride" again up the Valley of the Shenandoah, leaving Hancock in command of his Department, at Winchester. On reaching Waynesborough a battle occurred between Early and Custer's divisions, which resulted in the rout of the Confederates. Sheridan captured eleven cannon and about 1300 prisoners. Charlottesville was surrendered the next day. From this point, on the 6th of March, Sheridan moved in two columns southward toward the James. One division, under General Deven, took a directly southern route to Scottsville, destroying all mills, merchandise, and bridges on the line of march, and along the Rivanna River to Columbia. The other division proceeded down on the railroad to Lynchburg, destroying it as far as to Amherst—a distance of over 40 miles. From Scottsville Deven's division proceeded westward along the banks of the James, destroying every lock on the canal as far as to Duguldsville, twenty miles from Lynchburg. In a dispatch dated the 10th, at Columbia, Sheridan says that he had captured fourteen guns. Not being able to cross the James on account of the high water, he moved around the north side of Richmond, and, crossing at Deep Bottom, joined General Meade's army south of Petersburg.

On the 25th of March General Lee suddenly attacked General Grant's lines south of the Appomattox. The first fortification south of that stream is Fort M'Gilvrey. Nearly a mile to the left of this work is Fort Steadman on Hare's Hill, and still farther to the left Fort Haskell. Between Steadman and Fort Haskell are mortar batteries. Fort Steadman is about the strongest position on the whole line, and for this reason was probably selected by General Lee as the point of attack. Here the distance between the opposing lines was not more than two or three hundred yards. This gave the enemy an opportunity to mass his troops in the night time so close to the Federal lines as to be able at light to make an attack and carry the fort before reinforcements could be brought. The great length of Grant's line from the James to Hatcher's Run also heightened the prospect of success. The design of Lee was, no doubt, to follow up the first success by the capture of the neighboring works, and then making the line a part of his own, to command Grant's Military Railroad. If his success should be all that he hoped, he would even venture to cut Grant's entire left from its base at City Point and from the army north of the James. Three divisions of Lee's army were massed in front of Fort Steadman, and at day-break, by a sudden rush, succeeded in surprising and capturing the garrison, and turned the guns against the neighboring batteries. Three of the latter had to be abandoned, and were occupied by the enemy. In the attempt to capture Fort Haskell the Confederates were checked. This portion of the line was held by the First Division of Parke's (Ninth) Corps. The Third Division, under Hart- raft, composed of new recruits, came up to the support of the First, and the Federal batteries were brought into position to pour a concentrated fire upon the enemy in Fort Steadman. Under cover of this cannonade Hartraft succeeded, after a partial repulse, in recapturing the fort with all its guns. In his retreat the enemy lost about 1800 prisoners. His total loss at this point can not have been less than 3000. The Federal loss was under a thousand. This battle was over early in the forenoon, and while under a flag of truce the enemy was gathering in his dead and wounded another fierce battle was going on at Hatcher's Run. Here the attack was made by Grant with the Second and Sixth Corps, the Fifth being held in reserve. The enemy's picket line was captured, and then a position was taken to await the counter attack of the enemy, which was made at 2.30 o'clock P.M. The battle lasted till eight o'clock at night, when the Federal line remained intact.

The failure of Lee's attack, in connection with the combinations of General Grant, now nearly perfected, would doubtless have necessitated the evacuation of Richmond. But Grant had determined that the evacuation of Manassas should not be repeated here—that the retreat of Lee's army from Richmond should not proceed deliberately to its conclusion, and at its own motion. He forthwith assumed the offensive. Sheridan's cavalry was now beginning to come up. Giving this "rough rider" scarcely time to newly shoe his horses, Grant hurried him off toward Dinwiddie Court House, with the Fifth Corps moving on the right as an infantry support. This movement was fairly under way on Wednesday, March 29. The greater portion of the Army of the James had been withdrawn to the south side. Sheridan found the enemy in full strength, and on the 30th there was considerable skirmishing, the results of which were rather unfavorable to the national troops. But the Fifth Corps gained a position on the Boydton Plank Road, from which on the 31st it advanced westward against the White Oak Road. Encountering the enemy at Gravelly Run an engagement was fought which terminated in a repulse of Warren's Corps. This repulse exposed Sheridan, and it was with great difficulty that the latter was able to hold his ground. Sheridan's command consisted of two corps—Deven's and Custer's—Crook's division of cavalry, and a cavalry brigade under General Mackenzie. On Saturday these, with the Fifth Corps, were placed under the absolute control of Sheridan, who at once ordered General Griffin to relieve Warren. Thus reorganized, this command moved against the enemy, who was intrenched at Big Five Forks, covering the Southside Railroad. During the first portion of the day only the cavalry force appeared in the enemy's immediate front; but as soon as Sheridan had succeeded in driving the enemy into his intrenchments, he brought up Griffin on the right, completely flanked the enemy, and captured six thousand men.

As soon as General Grant heard of Sheridan's victory on Saturday he ordered an attack along the whole line in front of Petersburg. This assault was so successful that on Sunday night the national troops occupied the entire line of rebel intrenchments from the Appomattox above Petersburg to the river below. During the night Petersburg was abandoned. At three o'clock Sunday afternoon Lee had telegraphed to Davis that his army had been driven out of its intrenchments, and that he must abandon Petersburg—that Richmond also must be given up. So that on the morning of Monday, April 3, Grant moved into Petersburg before daylight; and four hours later Weitzel, with the troops—chiefly negroes—left north of the James, entered Richmond. Weitzel captured in Richmond nearly five hundred guns, five thousand stand of arms, and six thousand prisoners. Thirty locomotives and three hundred cars were abandoned by the enemy. The rebel fleet in the James was destroyed. General Ewell, before leaving, had fired the city, but the fire was not very destructive, except in the business part of the place. On the 4th of April President Lincoln—who, with a number of foreign ministers, had been for some days at City Point—entered Richmond, where he was received with great enthusiasm by the people. There is every evidence that Lee's army was fairly routed in the battles of Saturday and Sunday, losing very heavily in prisoners and from desertion. Its line of retreat was in the direction of Burkesville, toward Danville; and all along the line were strewn muskets and ammunition and artillery caissons, betokening a great degree of demoralization.

The Confederate Congress adjourned on the 18th of March, the session having been prolonged a few days, in compliance with the request of the President, who stated that he had an important document to present. This was sent in on the 13th. Mr. Davis said that the new perils with which the country was environed rendered necessary further and more effective legislation than had been contemplated. The capture of the sea-ports and the devastation of large tracts of country had encouraged their foes and dispirited many of the people. The capital was in great peril. The only way to save the Confederacy was to devote all the resources of men and money in the country. Many of the measures which he had recommended had not been passed at all, and others so late as to have lost much of their value. Men, money, and supplies must be had. In order to get supplies for the armies in North Carolina and Virginia the Treasury must have at least two millions of dollars in gold. The Impressment law prohibited the seizure of supplies without making payment at their value at the time of impressment. The limit fixed for the issue of Treasury notes had been almost reached, and the Treasury could not in all cases furnish funds for making payment; if those who had supplies would not voluntarily let the Government have them on credit, they should be taken. Moreover, the system of valuation should be changed. The law required that the market-price should be paid; but in consequence of the depreciation of the currency there was no market-price, and the most extravagant rates were arbitrarily fixed, which no one expected would ever be paid in coin. "None believe that the Government can ever redeem in coin the obligation to pay fifty dollars a bushel for corn, or seven hundred and fifty dollars a barrel for flour." The President suggested that the prices should be fixed at the present value in coin, with reasonable interest, and that the holder should have his option of receiving his pay in kind or in coin. The measures adopted to raise revenue were clearly insufficient; and, in any case, there must be financial embarrassment. The measures for recruiting the army were wholly inadequate; all class exemptions should be abolished, and the militia laws so amended as really to place all the militia at the control of the Confederate Government. He hoped that much good would result from the passage of the bill authorizing the employment of negro soldiers, though far less than if it had been passed earlier. The suspension of the writ of habeas corpus was now not merely advisable, but indispensable; if Congress refused to authorize this, they must bear the responsibility. Mr. Davis stated that after the failure of the Peace Conference, in consequence of a suggestion to that effect made by General Ord, Lee wrote to Grant that he was authorized to meet him with a view to adjust the difficulties by means of a Military Convention; but that Grant replied that he had authority to enter into a convention only upon subjects of a purely military character, and that General Ord could only have meant that Grant would not refuse an interview with Lee upon any subject on which he had a right to act. The general tone of this message was despondent, and a vein of censure upon Congress ran through it.—A select committee of the Senate presented a sharp report in reply. The general purport was that Congress had done all which it should or could have done, and that the censures of the President, express or implied, were uncalled for. In the course of the report the fact is brought out that the Secretary of the Treasury had made an error of four hundred millions in stating the amount of the public debt. The report, which was adopted without a division, concludes with an expression of "regret that the Executive deemed it necessary to transmit to Congress a message so well calculated to excite discord and dissension." The Senate would have preferred to have received the message without comment; but "it had been induced to an opposite course because they believe that Congress would be derelict in its duty to permit its legitimate and constitutional duty to be destroyed by Executive admonitions such as those contained in the message under consideration, without some public exposition of its conduct."—A committee of the House presented a report to the same general effect; although no action was taken upon it, it was understood to represent the sentiment of the majority of the members.—Few of the measures recommended by the President were acted upon. That for procuring gold was adopted under protest. The Senate report says: "It is unfortunate that the necessity for coin in the Commissary Department was not made known until the message under consideration was received. The use of coin in one department of the Government is calculated to superinduce the necessity for its use in all other departments; and hence the policy of the proposed measure, in a financial view, is very questionable. The necessity for supplies, however, overrides all other considerations." The gold bill provides that, in order to procure the means of purchasing supplies for the army, the Secretary of the Treasury may borrow three millions of dollars in coin, the amount to be repaid within two years after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States; payment to be secured by a pledge of any cotton or tobacco owned by the Confederate Government, with interest at the rate of six per cent., payable semi-annually in coin. In case this loan can not be procured, a direct tax, payable in kind, is to be levied upon all gold and silver coin, gold dust, bullion, and foreign exchange within the Confederate States; the tax to be due on the first day of April, and collected as soon after as possible.—In the mean while the bill to arm the slaves had passed on the 7th of March. It provides that the President may ask and accept from the owners of negro slaves as many able-bodied negro men as he may deem expedient, to perform military service in any capacity he may direct; that the troops so raised shall receive the same rations, clothing, and compensation as other troops in the same branch of service; that if the needed number is not thus furnished the President may call for three hundred thousand troops in addition to those already subject to military service, irrespective of color; but that only a quarter of the male slaves in any State, between the ages of 18 and 45, shall be called out; and that nothing in this act shall be construed to alter the existing relations between master and slaves. The recommendation of General Lee that slave soldiers should be freed was thus set aside. Hunter, of Virginia, voted for the bill, in obedience to the orders of the State Legislature; but he made a violent speech in opposition to it. To arm the slaves, he said, was to abandon the principles upon which the war was undertaken; but if they were armed they must be emancipated; when they came scarred out of the conflict they must be free.

Governor Vance, of North Carolina, shortly before the capture of Richmond put forth an urgent appeal to the people, saying Lee's army must, for three or four months to come, depend for food upon portions of Virginia and North Carolina. He himself donated half his stock of provisions to the Government, placing his own family and dependents upon half rations, and recommending that other citizens follow his example.

Robert C. Kennedy, convicted of acting as a spy, and also of carrying on unlawful warfare in attempting to burn the city of New York last November, was hung at Fort Lafayette, in New York Harbor, on the 25th of March. By his own confession he set fire personally to four hotels and to Barnum's Museum. It appears that there were only about six persons engaged in the plot, all of whom made their escape to Canada. Kennedy was arrested in Detroit, while endeavoring to return to the South under a feigned name.

On the 31st of March the steam transport General Lyon, from Wilmington for Fortress Monroe, having on board between five and six hundred persons, including a number of soldiers and male and female Southern refugees, caught fire when off Cape Hatteras, and was entirely consumed. The flames were ignited by a light coming in contact with a kerosene barrel, and in a very short time the whole vessel was enveloped. The General Sedgwick and a schooner were both near the General Lyon while she was burning; but notwithstanding every effort was made to give succor, very few of the unfortunate passengers could be rescued, owing to the high wind and the heavy sea. Out of the entire number only thirty-five or forty are so far known to have been saved.

An effort to connect the two continents by telegraph, by way of Behring's Strait, has been commenced. Early in March a vessel sailed from San Francisco for Sitka in Russian America, bearing the pioneer exploring company for the line. A party will land at Victoria, and endeavor to work their way along Frazer's River, to connect with the Russo-American branch; and thence proceed through the almost unknown region between the Rocky Mountains and the Coast Range.

A year ago there were twelve soldiers of the Revolutionary army living, to whom an extra pension was granted by Congress. There are now but five: Lemuel Cook, of Clarendon, New York, aged 90; Samuel Downing, of Edinburg, New York, aged 98; William Hutchins, of Penobscot, Maine, aged 100; Alexander Maroney, of Yates, New York, aged 94; and James Barham, of Missouri, aged 101.

The scheme for uniting the British provinces in America into a confederation has fallen through, the Government of Nova Scotia having formally declined to enter into the compact. They propose that, instead of uniting with Canada, the three maritime provinces, New Brunswick, Prince Edward's Island, and Nova Scotia, shall form a separate legislative union of their own.

History of Julius Cæsar, by the Emperor NAPOLEON. The prime idea of this work is to vindicate the First Napoleon and the Empire which he founded, and which the Second Napoleon has re-established. I shall aim, writes the historian, "to prove that when Providence raises up such men as Cæsar, Charlemagne, and Napoleon, it is to trace out to peoples the path they ought to follow; to stamp with the seal of their genius a new era; and to accomplish in a few years the labor of many centuries. Happy the people who comprehend and follow them! Woe to those who misunderstand and combat them! They do as the Jews did, they crucify their Messiah; they are blind and culpable: blind, for they do not see the impotence of their efforts to suspend the definitive triumph of good; culpable, for they only retard progress by impeding its prompt and fruitful application. In fact neither the murder of Cæsar nor the captivity of St. Helena have been able to destroy irrevocably two popular causes, overthrown by a league which disguised itself under the mask of liberty. Brutus by slaying Cæsar plunged Rome into the horrors of civil war; he did not prevent the reign of Augustus, but he rendered possible those of Nero and Caligula. The ostracism of Napoleon by confederated Europe has been no more successful in preventing the Empire from being resuscitated; and, nevertheless, how far are we from the great questions solved, the passions calmed, and the legitimate satisfactions given to peoples by the first Empire."—There is, indeed, a singular likeness between the characters and careers of Cæsar and Napoleon. Each founded a great empire on the ruins of a disorganized republic. Each added to the highest qualities of a commander high qualities as a statesman. Each showed that he was or might have been the historian of the actions which he performed, for if Napoleon had written the substance of the Conversations at St. Helena, they would have taken rank with the Commentaries of Cæsar. The career of each was cut short, and his work was apparently destroyed; in the case of each it was revived by a nephew. Whether the Empire restored by the nephew of Napoleon shall have the five hundred glorious years of that restored by the nephew of Cæsar, no prophet can predict. The resemblance between Cæsar and Napoleon extends even to their persons. The best portraits of Cæsar might be easily mistaken for likenesses of Napoleon. For the execution of his task the French Emperor has accumulated such resources of material and assistance as were never before at the command of a man who undertook to write history. He has labored, if reports are to be believed, with a patient industry equaled only by that with which Gibbon wrought out the story of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, or that with which Carlyle has built up his Life of Frederick. Every page bears marks of thought, research, and revision. The style is nervous and emphatic, without running into affectation. Half of this first volume is devoted to a description of the state of the Roman people when Cæsar appeared upon the stage. The remainder of the volume brings the history down to the proconsulship of Cæsar just before "the hatred of his enemies forced him, like Sylla, to seize upon the dictatorship, but for a more noble cause, and by a course of proceeding exempt from vengeance and cruelty."

Louis Napoleon evidently hopes that the means by which the President of the French Republic made himself Emperor of France will be described by the future historian of his reign in similar terms. Whatever may be the verdict of after-ages upon this Imperial Life of Cæsar, it is certain that it is for the readers of to-day the most notable literary work of the time. Travels in Central Asia, by ARMINIUS VÁMBÉRY. The author, a Hungarian, endowed in a remarkable degree with the national gift of acquiring foreign tongues, devoted himself from an early age to the study of the languages and literature of the Oriental peoples. A residence of some years at Constantinople, in Turkish houses, and frequent visits to Islamite schools and libraries, transformed him in appearance, not merely into a Turk, but into an Effendi. From the western borders of the Orient he proposed to visit the proper East, and traverse the vast desert plateau of Central Asia, the hive from which have swarmed the races which we improperly term Tartar, to which the generic name of Altaic has been more properly assigned. From Constantinople he went to Persia, keeping up his character of an Oriental. At Teheran he fell in with a company of Hadjis, or begging pilgrims, on their return to Turkestan from Mecca and Medina. They received him into their company, and with them he made a long journey, occupying just a year in going and returning, through the wild nomades of Central Asia—the most ferocious race upon earth, unless, perhaps, the Africans of Dahomey may dispute the pre-eminence. He visited Khiva, Bokhara, and Samarcand; saw the sepulchre of Timour the Lame, whom we call Tamerlane. For months he wandered about, clothed only in the rags of a dervish, without necessary food, in constant peril of perishing by a death of cruelty, if not of torture. Of all Europeans who have undertaken that perilous journey he is the only one who, in recent times, has returned to tell his story. He has told it admirably, mostly from memory; for he was in a country "where to hear is regarded as impudence, to ask as a crime, and to take notes as a deadly sin." We propose in our next number to give an abstract of some of the leading points of the information imparted by Vámbéry, and content ourselves here with pronouncing his book as one of the three best works of travel that have appeared within the last ten years. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

To the long list of military works, bearing the imprint of D. Van Nostrand, two of great value have been recently added. General GILLMORE'S Report of the Engineer and Artillery Operations against the Defenses of Charleston Harbor in 1863 gives a perfect view of that branch of modern warfare which consists in measuring the offensive power of heavy artillery against the defensive power of earth-works; for Fort Sumter, after the bombardment which it endured, was practically converted into an earth-work. The profuse illustrations, and the affluence of subsidiary documents embodied in the special reports of subordinate officers, impart additional value to a work which without them would have been of high worth.—Of still higher permanent import is Mr. ALEXANDER L. HOLLEY'S exhaustive Treatise on Ordnance and Ar- mor, which embodies a complete description of the material, mode of fabrication, requirements, and capabilities of European and American cannon as produced and proposed by the famous gun-makers of the day. The work is indeed mainly designed for the professional rather than for the unprofessional reader; but the illustrations, nearly five hundred in number, with the accompanying descriptions, will enable any intelligent person to form some fair general idea of what is implied in the word artillery as used in modern warfare.

We have of late had frequent occasion to speak of the growing taste for elegant books, which has been found to warrant publishers in putting forth editions of standard works in a style in which the exterior form is worthy of the intrinsic value. The foremost place in publications of this class must be accorded to the new edition of the works of WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY undertaken by Messrs. Harper and Brothers. The three first volumes contain Vanity Fair, the work by which Thackeray first took his place in the front rank of our imaginative literature. In respect of "getting up," including typography, paper, and binding, the edition leaves nothing to be desired. Thackeray, a clever artist before he had proved himself a great writer, illustrated his own works. The illustrations to Vanity Fair are his best. Afterward he was too busy with the pen to care much for the pencil. Besides the seventy and odd "full-page" pictures which are specially noted in the list of illustrations, there are twice as many "Initials," "Tail-Pieces," and "Bits," scattered through the text. Not a few of these are among the best of the whole; all have been reproduced with rare fidelity to the original drawings, and with the utmost delicacy of execution. In an odd little tail-piece, introduced at the close of Chapter IX., Thackeray has given, with two or three dots and a dozen strokes of the pencil, a portrait of himself quite as true as the picture elaborately engraved from Lawrence's excellent drawing, which forms the frontispiece to these volumes.

Among well "got-up" editions of good books, we may mention those put forth by W. J. Widdleton of the Poems of WINTHROP MACWORTH PRAED, and Dr. DORAN's Annals of the English Stage. Praed's Poems of Society, Charades, and Enigmas, though they do not belong to a high class in art, are beyond question the first of their class. In this sphere he was first, with no one who came near enough to him to be fairly placed as second.—Dr. Doran, now editor of the London Athenæum, who has given a genial tone to that once truculent periodical, has in his Annals grouped under biographical heads an immense number of anecdotes of the men and women who have played leading parts on the British stage, from the time of Betterton down to that of Edmund Kean.—Noteworthy also for its attractive exterior is the Life of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, translated from the German of LAMPADIUS by WILLIAM LEONHARD GAGE (published by F. Leypoldt). Mendelssohn, the "Seraphael" of Elizabeth Shepherd's excellent novel, "Charles Auchester," was noted not more for his musical genius than for the rare beauty and purity of his personal character. "There may come a day yet," wrote Chorley, "when the example of Mendelssohn's life, yet more than of his works, may be invoked." To the enthusiastic sketch by the German author, the accomplished translator has added brief supplementary sketches by Benedict, Chorley, Rellstab, Bayard Taylor, Willis, and Dwight.

Method of Philological Study of the English Language, by FRANCIS A. MARCH. This little work indicates a great change which must soon take place in our courses of liberal education. There was a time when the study of Latin and Greek was pursued for its own sake. A man then learned the classic tongues that he might be able to read Homer and Virgil, Demosthenes and Cicero, Horace and Æschylus, Thucydides and Livy. If one could not read the classic tongues he could find nothing worth reading. When in the course of time the literature of the English language came in every department to exceed in value that of the Greek and Latin, the study of these languages kept its place in our schemes of education, but rather as a means of intellectual training than for its own sake. Not one student in ten was ever expected to read more than the few works comprised in the college course. But the teaching of these languages had been reduced to a science. Every line had its comment and explanatory note, elucidating its logical and rhetorical character, and explaining every historical allusion contained in it. The student who never after read a page of his text-book had learned much of the philosophy of language and of the manners and customs of the Greeks and Romans. If he knew little Latin and Greek, he knew much of the Greeks and Latians. Now there is no reason why the study of our own language should not in like manner be made a means of discipline and a nucleus for general information. To accomplish this Mr. March has treated certain passages of Bunyan, Milton, and Shakspeare, precisely as others have treated passages of Horace, Virgil, and Æschylus. Thus the Introduction to Pilgrim's Progress contains only about one hundred words. There are some four thousand words used in the questions upon this passage; not a few of them involving a great amount of subsidiary reading. The student is expected to write an account of the life and works of Bunyan; to tell what famous Englishmen were contemporary with him; to define an allegory; to tell what clauses are leading and what dependent; to give grammatical equivalents for different phrases; to show what words are direct and what metaphorical; to point out poetical forms; to throw lines which are printed as prose into metrical form, and so on. The opening of Paradise Lost, a scene from Julius Cæsar, one from the Merchant of Venice, two or three stanzas from the Faery Queen, and a passage from the Canterbury Tales, are treated in the same exhaustive manner. Copious references are supplied, from which the pupil will find the information to enable him to answer the questions. The student who shall have mastered the passages thus treated will have undergone an intellectual discipline quite as strict as though he had thoroughly mastered as many lines of Homer or Virgil, without having performed the mere drudgery of committing to memory declensions and conjugations and thumbing the lexicon. Although the absolute value of classical study is unchanged, its relative value, compared with other departments of discipline and knowledge, is greatly diminished; and we believe that the critical study of our own living language will, for the great body of students, in time supersede that of the dead tongues, which will take their proper place as special branches of study for those whose tastes or professions render them pleasant or necessary. This little work of Professor March, which should be adopted as a text-book in academies and colleges, indicates the mode in which this end is to be gained. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Mineralogy and Geology, by WORTHINGTON HOOKER. This is the third volume of the admirable series entitled "Science for the School and Family." Like the previous volumes on Natural Philosophy and Chemistry, it is designed for beginners. Unlike many books professing to be "elementary," it does not presuppose that its readers are already masters of the subjects upon which it undertakes to inform them; nor does it assume that every reader will have time or inclination to devote a lifetime to geology. The purpose of the book is to convey to the pupil just that information which every well-informed person ought to possess; to bring out prominently the common geological phenomena which any one may observe in his daily walks; to teach him the exact truth about things of which he will be likely to wish to know something; teaching nothing which he must unlearn, should time or inclination induce him to pursue his studies farther. This excellent idea has been excellently executed. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Culture of the Observing Faculties, by WARREN BURTON, is another effort in the direction of the realistic training of children. The author, in briefly defining the objects which he had in view, and which he has fairly attained, says: "If you would go hand in hand with genial Nature and have children learn easily and much from things all around them; if you would enjoy sensible, animated talks with quick-witted and blithe companions; if you would learn much yourselves while teaching others, put in practice the suggestions of this little book." (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Life and Times of Sir William Johnson, by WILLIAM L. STONE. This work was projected and partly executed a quarter of a century ago by the late William L. Stone, whose life of Brant has gained for him an honorable place among our minor historians. His son, bearing the same name, has completed the task left unfinished by the death of the father. Sir William Johnson, born in Ireland in 1715, came to America at the age of twenty-three, taking up his residence in the Valley of the Mohawk for the purpose of managing estates acquired there by his uncle, Admiral Sir Peter Warren. He learned the language of the Indians, took for wife the sister of Brant, was formally adopted as a sachem, and acted a prominent part in the struggle between the English and the French for the supremacy in the region of Central New York. His Life and Times thus form an important chapter in our colonial history. This has been faithfully written by Mr. Stone from a superabundance of material collected by his father and himself. This material might have made five volumes as well as two; had it been condensed into one it would have been still better. As it stands, the work is a valuable if not attractive monograph relating to our ante-revolutionary history. The general reader will think it heavy; the student of history will thank the author for the care with which he has gathered his facts, and for the amplitude with which he has presented them. (Published by J. Munson.)

ried Arnold Grey, a widowed father, middle-aged, and rich, moving in a circle of society above that to which his young wife had belonged. Christian's "mistake" was two-fold: first, in marrying a man whom she did not love, but only respected; and secondly, in trying to keep from him the knowledge of her former attachment, although he had known it from the first. The story begins, where most novels end, with the marriage. Its great purpose—for it has a purpose—is to combat the false and pernicious doctrine put forth in many places under vague and high-sounding phrases, but which in its ultimate analysis resolves itself into this: that if a woman finds that she does not love her husband she must run away from him, for "affinity," or as some phrase it, "love is the sole morality of marriage." Miss Mulock's teaching is, that duty is the morality of marriage, as of every thing else. She works out her doctrine thus: Christian goes to her new home, where she finds the two children of her husband, and two unmarried women, one the sister of her husband, the other the sister of his first wife. All receive her coldly, and annoy her with sarcasm and covert insult. But she resolves from the first to be a true wife; and if she tries to conceal her former attachment it is for her husband's sake. She wins the love of her step-children, and finally that of their aunts; that of her husband she has had from the first; and finds at last that she has come to love him with a deep and earnest affection; and so by resolute walking in the path of duty finds the great reward given sooner or later to all who thus walk. The novel, while faultless as a story, is better than a sermon. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Cape Cod, by HENRY D. THOREAU. This work has all the characteristic excellence of its author; the singularly shrewd and thoughtful observation of natural facts, the dry remote humor, and the wild intellectual independence, which have made Thoreau's name eminent among naturalists. The residents of the Cape must not be offended if they and their dwelling-place are treated as if they were curious specimens of antediluvian civilization. Thoreau treats his own Concord in the same passionless strain. "Cape Cod" is the work of a robust, manly scholar. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.)

Any game or amusement which gives outdoor exercise to females is worthy of attention on hygienic grounds. The game of Croquet has become fairly naturalized among us, and we trust that it will become national, like that of Base-Ball. The laws of the game, the implements used in playing it, and all other necessary information respecting it are embodied in a neat and fully illustrated brochure, entitled Croquet, the Laws and Regulations of the Game, by JOHN JACQUES. (Published by Williams and Co.)

Tony Butler, issued in "Blackwood's Magazine;" Luttrell of Arran, by CHARLES LEVER; and Uncle Silas, by J. S. LE FANU, are all readable novels. The name of Le Fanu is hardly known in America, although he has written some of the best stories that have appeared in the "Dublin University Magazine." Lever, in dedicating his latest work to Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu, says: "He who can write such stories as 'Wylder's Hand,' or 'Uncle Silas,' needs no praise of mine; but I can at least say how warmly I admire his genius, how heartily I enjoy his genial humor, and how thoroughly I appreciate his right to his second Christian name; and if these be not claims enough for success, let him be assured there are few men can show more." ## Editor's Easy Chair.

THROUGH the early spring every mind and heart were intent upon the wonderful march of Sherman. As a military movement it is one of the most remarkable ever known, both for the vigor and skill of its execution and the decisiveness of its results. Its story when told, even in the most hurried manner, by those who see with their minds as well as their eyes, is intensely interesting, and will yet furnish literature and art with a thousand striking suggestions. Macaulay's New Zealander, who stops upon his way to sketch the ruins of London, to moralize upon the ancient lairs of bears and bulls in Wall Street, need not imagine that we, who are contemporary with this great event, are not fully aware of its importance and romance. We give him notice that we know and value our heroes who live before his Agamemnons. The little skirmishes and slight campaigns of the Revolution are already paled by the imposing gravity of these modern operations. The Edinburgh Review already finds in the stupendous combinations of United States military genius the only adequate suggestion of the exploits of Wellington and Napoleon.

To every American, however, the point of chief pride and interest is that these armies are composed of the same stuff as that which fled panic-stricken from Bull Run, not yet four years ago! That woe!ful Monday! That universal incredulity, horror, anguish, shame! It is too dismal to remember! And yet no true American heart composed itself to rest that night without a clear conviction that, despite the dreary tale, Americans were not cowards.

The Easy Chair stopped a day or two afterward to see Bourbon. He was not sorry for what had happened. He had no shame. There was a sullen, defiant cheerfulness in his aspect, and a sinister composure in his greeting.

"Good-morning, Mr. Easy Chair!"

"Good-morning, Mr. Bourbon."

"Have you heard from Bull Run, Mr. Easy Chair?"

"Yes, I am sorry to say I have."

Then with a sudden fierceness as if he gloried in the disgrace of the American flag:

"How the rebels didn't run, Sir! how they didn't run, Sir!" and his voice rose into a shrill shriek.

"I never supposed they were cowards," was the reply. But he excitedly continued:

"Who ran away, Sir? Ha, ha! who ran?"

—Well, who ran? The men who have marched from Chattanooga to Savannah, and from Savannah victoriously northward; the men whose ponderous tread has shaken to pieces the cause that triumphed at Bull Run. Who ran? The men who, undisciplined, were McDowell's mob: and, organized, are Sherman's army.

Without the least malevolence toward England we may say it is not surprising that a nation which has, under the circumstances of the last four years, developed such military resources, should now be very politely mentioned. If the war had made us a military people, England might well fear. For if history had nothing better to do than to repeat herself, there would then be danger of collision between us. Or if the war had been what Earl Russell called it, a war for empire upon the part of the United States, then England might fear. For in that case we should certainly lay hands upon her.

But the march of Sherman is for peace, not for war. The one thing that this country most ardently wishes is peace; and when the battles are over and the soldiers return, who will wish more drafts and heavier taxes? The training given us by the war will make peace more secure and more honorable. It will not put us in love with fighting, nor any other nation in love with fighting us.

The marvelous progress of Sherman will have another result also. It has carried the perils and desolation of war through the very heart of the section that began the war. The remotest plantations, which had not dreamed that by any chance the sound or sight of an army would disturb their repose, have been overrun with troops and left trampled and devastated. The war which was gayly wooed has suddenly bared its terrible face upon its worshipers and burned them to the bone. It will be long and long before they court its withering embrace again. The men who recoiled before the plantations at Bull Run upon the border, have now penetrated the interior and taught the plantations at home what war truly is. "How they didn't run!" said Bourbon, four years ago. Does he remember the words that were so cruel in those dark days?

It seems so long ago since we all laughed over Pickwick that it is not easy to believe that the author of Pickwick is by no means an old man, and, with undiminished power, is writing "Our Mutual Friend."

It is undeniable that he is still easily master. We may say that he is extravagant, unnatural, sentimental, uneven; that he can not describe "society" without caricaturing it at every touch, that he is melodramatic, and imitates himself. We may say indeed what we will, but when we have found all our faults we must gratefully acknowledge the opulent and refreshing genius. Even in his stories which are thought to be least satisfactory, "Little Dorrit," for instance, there are characters and creations which become a part of current life and literature. The Circumlocution Office, in which the art of how not to do it was practiced and perfected, is so familiar as to have become necessary, if we would express in one picturesque phrase the infinite vexatious delays of the official service of Government. The description of the Marshalsea prison and the life there, in "Little Dorrit," is a completed picture of which the prison scenes in Pickwick are merely studies; and in the same novel there is that tender chapter, "Nobody's Disappearance," one of the most exquisitely simple and touching love passages in our literature.

But it is in the felicitous oddity of his conceits, and in a certain power of investing the most familiar objects with romance, that Dickens is without a rival. Thus in "Our Mutual Friend" there is a young woman in London who is a dwarf, and who makes dolls' dresses. "Miss Jenny Wren, Dolls' Dress-maker. Dolls attended at their own residences." In a vein of the most airy and felicitous humor we are told how she makes the great ladies try the dresses on. "Bless you, godmother," said Miss Wren, "I have to scud about town at all hours.

If it was only sitting at my bench, cutting-out and sewing, it would be comparatively easy work; but it's the trying-on by the great ladies that takes it out of me." And then she goes on to relate how the trying-on is achieved. There is some grand day in the Park, or a Drawing-Room, or a Show, or a Fête, or whatever it may be. Miss Wren squeezes among the crowd, and looks about her. Presently she sees some great lady very superbly dressed in the highest fashion. Jenny carefully studies her. She observes the material, the shape, the change from the last fashion. Then she scampers home and cuts accordingly, and runs back again on the next occasion to compare her work with her model.

"There was Lady Belinda Whitrose," says Miss Jenny Wren, "I made her do double duty in one night. I said, when she came out of the carriage, 'You'll do, my dear!' and I ran straight home and cut her out and basted her. Back I came again, and waited behind the men that called the carriages. Very bad night too. At last, 'Lady Belinda Whitrose's carriage! Lady Belinda Whitrose coming down!' And I made her try on—oh! and take pains about it, too—before she got seated. That's Lady Belinda hanging up by the waist, much too near the gaslight for a wax one, with her toes turned in." The delightful grotesqueness of such a conceit is entirely peculiar to the humor of Dickens.

So he has a magical touch of romance in describing the most commonplace objects and scenes. This is shown in "Our Mutual Friend," by his treatment of the river life along the Thames, in London. An ordinary sailor's porter-house; the boats upon the water; the shipping, the wharves, the bridges, the steamers, the fog, the doubtful river-side people—all that is most familiar to a Londoner, or to any modern man in a modern city near the water, becomes as romantic and poetic under his touch as the Rialto or the Grand Canal in a moonlight of the Middle Ages. And it is the London Thames and the London street of to-day with which he deals. It would be a cunning hand that could make South Street, and the Fulton Market, and West Street, and the oyster boats at the foot of Canal Street, weird and fascinating and solemn, bewitching them into a spectral reality, as Dickens does the banks of the Thames. Other English novelists describe the Club, and the Park, and the Ball-room, as we all know and see them. Life at an English country-house, too, is often and faithfully depicted. But it is done with no spell of imagination—none of that poetic glamour, in which the familiar fact does not cease to be real, while it is curiously strange and remote and enchanted. The dull, damp obscurity of a misty night by the water-side—the lights gleaming through the moisture—the men moving about—and all the rest, are as exact as the photograph, but a certain vague impressiveness and mystery are shed over them, as in Turner's pictures upon the Alps, or in Doré's drawings upon a street or a house.

A striking single illustration of this power is in the description of the house of Mrs. Clennham in "Little Dorrit." It is like a hundred other old houses in London; but its mystery, its dreariness, its terror, become at length so impressive, although the feeling is most subtly and unconsciously conveyed, that when Blandois at last sits saucily in the window smoking and singing, with his Mephistophelian mustache jeeringly curling upward, the imagination is entirely captive, and is relieved when the old shell collapses and crumbles away. A little thought will perhaps reveal a very curious and interesting resemblance in many points between the genius of Dickens and that of Gustave Doré.

There are many good novels now publishing, but whatever you omit we advise you to read "Our Mutual Friend."

If Horace Walpole were living he would delight in the illustrious addition to his catalogue of royal and noble authors of the greatest of living emperors writing of the greatest of the dead: "Caius Julius Cæsar, the greatest name in history," says Merivale. The "History," written by the French Emperor, is an effort to preach the gospel of success: to show that a man of might is, in some sense, a Messiah, and to establish beyond all cavil, as one of the London critics humorously says, that chickens were made for foxes.

The history is carefully and accurately written. Its delineations of character are vivid and picturesque, and executed with unexpected literary art. The reflections are sometimes shrewd, sometimes puerile, often vague and of a French sentimental grandiloquence. But the wide experience of Louis Napoleon has sharpened his wits, and his reflections upon the conduct of men in great emergencies are well worth pondering. His own career is more romantic than that of Cæsar, or any of the characters he describes, while Cæsar's faith in himself and his purpose could not have surpassed Louis Napoleon's confidence in his star. Of all nations the French are most sensitive to ridicule, and of all living men Louis Napoleon was the most ridiculous after his performance at Strasbourg and Boulogne. Yet despite of the double ridicule, he quietly persevered, his star ascended, and France is proud of him to-day as her Emperor.

In 1849 the debate took place in the French Republican Assembly, whether Louis Napoleon Bonaparte should be allowed to return to France. It was in the days when this Easy Chair rolled along the Boulevards and planted itself at the doors of cafés upon the pleasant pavement. The debate was interesting and exciting, and lay chiefly between the moderate and radical Republicans. "If we suffer him to return," said the latter, "his mere name, whatever his character and purpose, will set France by the ears. In a time of civil tumult the presence of a Bonaparte in Paris will create a party in spite of himself. While he is elsewhere we are safe. Besides, he is known only as a pretender to the throne. Has he ever renounced his aspirations? Can we even justly confide in his intention to renounce them if he finds himself hurried by events toward a crown? There are risks, there are palpable dangers if he returns. There is no risk if he remains absent. Is France to-day in a condition to take risks?"

Such were the arguments passionately urged by the orators of "the Mountain" of '48. Lamartine replied to them; Lamartine, then at the height of his exaltation, a dreamer directing a revolution. Yet France and civilization owe Lamartine an eternal debt of gratitude. For the few months that he was in power he used that power to pacify France and to conciliate the world. When he stood at the Hôtel de Ville, and with a proud and inspiring eloquence recalled the mob of Paris to the noblest memories of the nation and saved the tri-color to France, he did a work for which France ought to have made him her care forever, and not have sufferred the man who had as truly saved the country as ever Cicero saved Rome to beg his bread in foreign lands by soliciting subscriptions to his works. French history will show among her public men many names of higher executive ability, of the genius of permanent command, but none which are associated with purer patriotism or vital service than Lamartine.

He it was who replied to the objections and advocated the return of Louis Napoleon. "France," he said, with lofty declamation, "is noble, is just, is forgiving. In this great hour France has no need to remember offenses nor to anticipate harm. The people, confiding in themselves and their noble purpose, are generous and heroic. The people, with their republican instincts, are stronger than the traditional idea of Bonaparte, or of Bourbon. They do not fear. There is no man who can make them tremble. Least of all this man, Louis Bonaparte. Has he given France occasion to fear him? Is he an imposing figure? Does majestic, magnanimous France dread the hero of Boulogne? No: let him return. He will be lost among his fellow-citizens. He will cease to have the importance of a political exile. If he tries to seduce Frenchmen from allegiance to their own liberty, he will be overwhelmed by the indignation of a great, a just, an honorable people."

Lamartine did not indeed say one of these words, but every word he said meant precisely this. Public opinion seconded him. "Why," said the cafés, "make a somebody out of nobody? Who is this Louis Napoleon? A heavy, dull booby; son of Hortense and a Dutch admiral, who, because his name is Bonaparte, has played the part of the frog to the ox, and is the laughing-stock of mankind. It is an insult to speak as if France could fear him. He could not make trouble if he tried. Don't, for Heaven's sake, dignify and distinguish him by voting him dangerous to the Republic."

So the dull man returned to France. In a short time he appeared in the Chamber as a representative. That was a significant indication of the power of his name. It showed to every body, what nobody had denied, that the name was still a charm. "But of what use is a magic key to him who does not know how to use it?" said the cafés. "If he were an able man he might become dangerous, because he now sees the practical proof of the value of his name. But this heavy-eyed, stolid Franco-Dutchman can not use his own power."

Louis Napoleon had the genius of silence then as now. He made no striking impression in the Assembly. He leaned toward the popular side, but was not a leader. But very soon after his return it was evident to every shrewd observer that there was a new element in the political combinations, and that its scope was incalculable. The election of President followed. On the one side the sincere republican, General Cavaignac; on the other the silent, shadowy, mysterious Louis Bonaparte. Cavaignac was known only by his liberal antecedents, his military skill, his lofty, simple character, and his fidelity to the republic. Louis Bonaparte was known solely as an aspirant to the throne. France elected him, and thereby chose the empire. The election showed that the Napoleon prestige was stronger in France than the wish of public liberty or of popular government. On the day of his inauguration President Bonaparte rode through the city in the military procession. The excitement was intense. Paris thronged the streets and hovered at the windows. It was a dream. Here was the city adorned and shouting. 1814 was undone. Waterloo was avenged. That passive figure upon which all eyes are bent, and which sits the proud horse well, is a Bonaparte. This day is more than the return from Elba; it is the return from St. Helena; and as the splendid pageant swept by a point in the Champs Elysées, where the Easy Chair was standing, he heard from two invalid veterans of the great Emperor who stood beside him the irrepressible cry, "Vive l'Empereur!"

Louis Napoleon fully comprehended the meaning of his election. It was upon that perception he relied in the coup d'état. Nobody, and especially no Frenchman, had a right to be surprised when it was found that Louis Napoleon was driving after the reins had been put into his hands. France submitted to the empire she had invoked. To speak of the President as violating his oath was idle; for republican France forswore herself when she elected him. She invited him to perjure himself, and she acquiesces in his perjury.

The Emperor's "History of Julius Cæsar" is a declaration of his political philosophy; and it is a very old and very unsatisfactory one. Men of great executive genius, he says, are born to rule other men, and other men ought to submit. What are called crimes in such Heaven-appointed rulers are merely the severities necessary to destroy opposition to their rule. If people would only submit to them there would be no trouble. The proof that they are meant to rule is found in the character of the governments they establish. In which case, says an acute French critic of the History, Nero, Caligula, Domitian, Vitellius, prove that Augustus was a divinely-commissioned governor. It is very clear that, if the success of Cæsarism over the republic proves that it was right, the culmination of imperialism in revolting tyranny, ruin, and anarchy proves that it was wrong. In fact, the generalization is impossible. It may be very true that Julius Cæsar was the most available and the wisest governor for Rome when he ascended to power, but it can not follow that his system administered by any successor was necessarily the best. A great man, in a certain sense, justifies himself. Oliver Cromwell did that. But when Richard came Oliver could not help him. The fatal defect of this theory of great men is that the true point of interest in historical development is not men, but man. That is the truth which was practically announced in the world almost simultaneously with the career of Cæsar. The pagan system, of which Alexander, Cæsar, and Napoleon were the illustrations that the imperial historian cites, regards primarily the interests of certain men, and is selfish. The Christian system seeks the welfare of mankind, and is fraternal and charitable. Privilege, aristocracy, and despotism spring from the first. Popular government and absolute equality before the laws from the last.

Louis Napoleon's portrait of Julius Cæsar, although it is very vivid, adds nothing to the previous impression of that extraordinary man; and his "improvement" of Cæsar's life is not novel, although it has peculiar interest as the work of an Emperor. We would not wish to trifle profanely with the sacredness of the Imperial Majesty of France, but thinking of the silent Louis Bonaparte of twenty years ago smoking and playing billiards in Leicester Square in London, and of the present genius of the Tuileries extolling Cæsar, it is impossible not to think also of a successful gentleman of the road publishing with appropriate reflections the History of Mr. Jonathan Wild the Great.

THE name of Jean Léon Gerome is probably not familiar to a great many of our readers, but possibly some of his pictures may be better known to them, for he is one of the most conspicuous of living French artists, and some of his most characteristic works have been exhibited at Goupil's Gallery in the city of New York. They have been criticised with great care and thoughtfulness by many of the brethren of the daily press, and are well worthy the attention and study of every body. The three most familiar by photographs are the Duel after the Masked Ball, the Death of Cæsar, and the Gladiators saluting the Emperor in the Coliseum as they go to death.

All three of these works, although the Death of Cæsar has been seen here, are known to us chiefly in the comparatively small reproductions. They immediately impress every spectator with a double feeling—first, a sense of horror at the tragedy, and then the utmost admiration of the technical skill with which they are executed. In the Duel after the Masked Ball two Pierrots—the conventional clowns of the French carnival—have rushed from the opera-house to the Bois de Boulogne, and there in the chill, gray, foggy morning they fight with swords, and one has fallen. The ghastly contrast between the masquerading dress and the mortal combat, and the subtler contrast suggested between the scene of brilliant gayety and frivolity they have just left, and the cold, sullen gloom of wintry day-break and the death-wound—these are the first expression, and the firmness, the force, the delicacy, and vivid reality of representation are the second.

In the Death of Cæsar the deed is accomplished. The tumultuous throng of Senators is retiring in the middle distance from the Senate House. The throne is overturned, and Julius Cæsar lies dead, stretched upon the floor. Opposite his body are the solemn ranges of the empty seats of the Senators. The solemnity of this picture is startling. The vastness and solitude of the hall; the terror of the empty seats; the evident horror of the withdrawing crowd at their own deed, not one daring to look back upon the dead Cæsar; and the awful motionless arm of the imperial figure, lying there like the corpse of Rome itself, can not be forgotten. It is a work of remarkable imagination, and of masterly simplicity and grandeur.

The third picture is that of the Gladiators going to death. The mighty Coliseum swarming to the roof with the eager and cruel Roman mob, a soft, vast, luminous distance is the back-ground of a group of noble barbaric forms who lift their shields and salute the beast Vitellius, who looks stolidly down upon them from his purple seat—Hail Cæsar! the doomed salute thee! It is pure tragedy: and he is very dull who does not see in it the contemporary criticism of common sense upon "The History of Julius Cæsar."

These three works show a creative imagination such as no other modern French painter displays. Couture painted one great picture, "The Decadence of the Romans;" but the characteristic of Vernet, of Delacroix, of Delaroche was technical skill. Ary Scheffer has an exquisite sentimentality; Diaz, certain marvelous effects of color; Troyon has a tender and poetic feeling; Rosa Bonheur, a wonderful eye and hand in a special department; Français, Lambinet, Couturier, Meissonier, Fichel, Frère, and others, great felicity of detail. They are all excellent and delightful artists. But without depreciating them in any point of their undisputed superiority, a high or poetic imagination will scarcely be claimed for any of them. But that imagination the painter of the Death of Cæsar and of the Gladiators certainly has. It will not be easy hereafter to read of the Coliseum and its sanguinary scenes, or of the fall of the great Roman, without a consciousness that the effect of each is heightened to the mind by these pictures. They are henceforth a part of that history, as Ophelia's song is part of St. Valentine's day.

That it is not the highest imagination in art is very clear, and we are very far from saying that Gerome is one of the great artists of the world. In all these works of which we speak he follows most French artists in pointing events. But his superiority is that he paints them not only exactly but imaginatively: the imagination revealing itself in the choice as well as in the treatment. "It is manifest," says a thoughtful critic in the Evening Post, "that the greatness of Gerome is not the greatness that has made the world echo the names of Titian, of Angelo, of Veronese; for he has not the largeness and splendor of style of the last, the grandeur of the second, nor the richness of the first." This is true, but is it not like saying that Gray, or Burns, or Tennyson are not like Shakespeare, Milton, and Spenser? Does it follow that Gerome is not a great artist because his greatness is neither of the kind nor the degree of the greatest masters?

This remark was made, indeed, in speaking of the last work of Gerome's which has been exhibited here—the original painting itself—of the Almee or Egyptian dancing girl. This picture belongs to another group of his works, in which the object is an exact realism—a kind of idealized photographic reproduction of the fact. In other words, as a critic in the World says of them, they are studies. Indeed, all such works are studies however carefully elaborated. The Candaules, of which we have seen only the engraving, and the "Prayer on the Desert," and the "Egyptian Butcher," of which the originals are in the Goupil Gallery, are of this kind. The two last represent characteristic incidents and figures with perfect fidelity. The butcher is like any butcher boy in Cairo, and is painted with a delightful knowledge and confidence; but its sole value is the skill with which it is done. The "Prayer on the Desert" is interesting from the elaborate and vivid detail of a picturesque scene. The great expanse of the desert over which stretches far and far away the line of a caravan, the wall of sand-mountains along the horizon, and the erect figure of the Arab who has left the caravan and stands upon his cloak praying, the whole flooded with the full sunshine of the desert, make what is like an Oriental ballad, in which every accessory is carefully studied and wonderfully reproduced.

But of all such works the Almee is the most interesting. The scene and the figures are so exact to nature that whoever has been in Egypt will think, as he looks at the picture, that he remembers the identical café, and Arnaouts, and the old man and woman with the "tar" and "rabab," a kind of violin and tambourine, and the luxuriant Ghazeeyeh herself, for so Mr. Lane tells us that we must call the dancing girls. The vigor, the richness, and the beauty of this picture are very remarkable. The flesh painting is masterly. The details, as of the ornaments upon the dancer's arms, the fringes of the Arnaouts' head-dresses, and the effects of blue sky and sunshine through the lattice-work, are truly exquisite. Such a woman as Gerome has here represented is of the most abandoned class in Egypt, but Mr. Lane does not hesitate to say that they are the finest women in the country. This truth will save Gerome from the suspicion of representing the dancer, for the sake of effect, more finely formed than such a woman would be. She looks the very genius of sensual delight, an impression which is deepened by the squalor of the scene, the dull brutishness of the musicians, the gleeful applause of the black soldier, and the cruel, sullen gaze of the Arnaouts. The work has exactly the moral of the actual scene. It is a full revelation of the social state of the country. The condition of women is the test of civilization, and that of the East does not transcend this. She is the Mohammedan woman. Raphael's Madonna di Sisto is the Christian woman. Is a work entirely useless which gives such emphasis to the difference? We do not suppose that Gerome had any such intention in painting the picture, but the significance of every actual scene inevitably reappears in its skillful representation whether the artist was conscious of it or not.

Such pictures as these of Gerome's merely realistic style are of the greatest use to all students, for they show the value of the most careful and conscientious detail. Breadth, force, movement, are not gained by obscurity, by vagueness, by rapidity, in painting more than in literature. Nature is an infinite series of details, and in reproducing her there are no short cuts to her effects. The hasty charcoal lines of Michael Angelo are full of expression, but only because Michael Angelo was the absolute master of drawing. One sweep of Turner's brush, the critic of the Post tells us, was, sometimes, according to Ruskin, more effective than the untiring manipulation of days. But it was the untiring manipulation of days alone that gave Turner's brush that power. It is by such patient study, such undaunted industry as these pictures of Gerome's show, that great talent and great genius secure their fame and their influence.

We would gladly linger longer and chat more before these works, but the doors of the new hall of the National Academy are opening as we write. The artists are "at home;" and the Easy Chair, with all his brethren, is ready to begin his fee, faw, fum. He smells the blood and will have some!

"OLD STOCK" complains that the Easy Chair, in the March Number, winks at the "small crime and evasion" of Mr. A. and Mr. B., who exchanged their tickets upon a certain evening train. It was between Springfield and Boston. The conductor would not stop the train for a through passenger from Albany to Boston, but he would do it for one from New York, and Mr. A., knowing this unjustifiable whim of the conductor, exchanged his Albany ticket with that of Mr. B. from New York, and would have been put off at the point nearest his home, but that somebody told the conductor, who thereupon told Mr. A., that he had discovered the trick, and refused to stop, whereby nobody gained any thing, and Mr. A. was delayed for some hours or for a whole night in reaching his home.

"Old Stock" insists that Mr. A. did really tell a lie when he offered his ticket from New York instead of Albany, and that if such moral obliquities are condoned by Easy Chairs and other censors,

"our few existing ideas of moral right and wrong" will be obliterated. But now let us ask frankly—is our moral condition in more danger from the exchange of tickets or from the "smartness" which tells the conductor and keeps a man away from his home? If there were any reason in the conductor's whim, the whole case would be different. The question is whether there be any harm in outwitting a whim which is of advantage to nobody by a stratagem which injures nobody. Of course, if one of the innocent strategists is forced to say what is not true, it is a pity; but there is no bad intention to deceive. It is not a malignant falsehood nor an immorality. It is no more a moral offense than it would be if "Old Stock," in replying to an invitation which he was glad to escape, should say that he "regretted he could not accept."

Therefore the Easy Chair must persist that the exposure of the innocent plot with the disagreeable consequences of the exposure did show a mean spirit, and that a good-humored winking at the outwitting of the conductor would have been courteous and pleasant, if not so "smart." That our morals are in danger from such harmless little conspiracies to thwart the disagreeable exercises of small power is something that the Easy Chair can not see; and he remains of opinion that, under the circumstances, Mr. A. and Mr. B. were "free of censure."

Editor's Drawer.

A FRIEND who is out in the "Oil-can" sends the three following:

Some years ago there lived in Central Pennsylvania a quite talented lawyer named W. Van G——, who, from his frequent pleadings at the "public bar," was sometimes unfitted for his legal duties, yet in his worst conditions never lost sight of the fact that he belonged to that honored fraternity. On returning home one night, after having been "hand and glass" with some of the "stars," he was met at the door by his wife, who accosted him with, "Van G——, you're drunk!" Assuming a somewhat lawyer-like yet quizzical expression, he replied, "Mrs. Van G——, I beg your Honor's pardon, but that is a question which admits of argument."

THOSE acquainted with Pennsylvania politics have no doubt heard of Morrow B. L——, the Senator from the northwest. Two years ago, when the State Senate was a tie in politics, by reason of the detention of the noble Major Harry White in a Southern prison, and when they had endeavored for a long time to effect an organization, but without success, Senator L—— was on the Chicago and Fort Wayne Road, when an accident occurred which precipitated from the car and considerably stupefied him. On being approached by his friends his first exclamation was, "Well, I'm dead! Now the Democrats can organize the Pennsylvania Senate with perfect impunity."

A SHORT time ago you published an anecdote in which a man named Ross figured as one of the characters. Ross has lately "wrapped his mantle" about him and departed to the shades, and was honored with an obituary—"He was an honest man and a good violinist." Some days ago a friend of the writer's was passing the farm of the departed in company with a man who uses big words, when my friend was somewhat amused at being informed that it was "Ross's deceased place" they were passing.

In the palmy days of the town of Steubenville, Ohio, boasting of its score of factories and the celebrity of its legal talent, no two individuals divided a greater share of public attention than one Davy Gay and Tommy Tolland. These illustrious men were disciples of St. Crispin—that is, cordwainers, or shoemakers. Thither did big and little go for measurement of their understandings. Gay was at one time a leader in a popular church, and Tolland in another; but they sadly fell from grace in course of time, and took to drinking so pertinaciously that, besides the danger of losing their own souls, they were almost incapable of mending or making better the soles of others.

Gay and Tolland were generally seen together after nightfall in the neighborhood of the groceries, their sole business being to drink. One night the two had left a well-known haunt. Gay was stripped, having spent his all; but he knew that Tolland had one solitary sixpence, which was good for two drinks, and he was determined to have a drink at the cost of his friend. Davy proposed to Tommy that each should compose, on the spot, two lines; the one which should rhyme the best to be treated by the other. Tolland agreed to it. So Gay essayed to commence, and got rid of the following:

"Here's Davy Gay
To this day."

Tolland was so much struck by the beauty of Gay's effort that it was some time before he could collect his thoughts and produce the following lines:

"Here's Tommy Tolland
To this day too."

Davy was highly elated, and called on Tolland to treat, as the victory was his. Tolland would not or could not see it, when a young man passing by was consulted on the subject, and decided in favor of Gay. The young man who was the arbiter on the momentous question is now a distinguished divine, an honor to the town of his birth, and a shining light in the Church.

AN incident in the youth of Vice-Admiral Farragut is furnished by a correspondent of the Drawer:

During the war of 1812 the British man-of-war Plantagenet, 74, fell in with our cruiser, the President, off Charleston, South Carolina. The President being much inferior to the Plantagenet both in men and guns, her commander did not think it right to risk a battle with the Englishman, and so he crowded all sail to escape her by running into the harbor. This, of course, encouraged the Plantagenet to chase. The wind being fair, both ships were soon rapidly nearing the bar. The commander of the President knew that the Englishman drew too much water to get in, and felt confident that his ship could, if the tide served. Just as he had made up his mind to run boldly in the wind died away, leaving both ships nearly becalmed almost within gun-shot of each other. Then while trying to coax enough wind into his sails to carry his ship to the bar, the American determined to send Midshipman Farragut in a boat to sound the channel. The boat was called away, and left the ship with little Farragut, then about fifteen years old, seated grimly in the stern, with his hand on his sword and his eye on the bar.

Imagine the little fellow's consternation when, looking back, he saw his ship making all sail toward the Plantagenet with a freshening breeze, while he could distinctly hear the call to quarters. The wind had shifted and grown quite fresh, cutting the President off from all chance of getting into Charleston harbor, and her captain at once determined to attack the Englishman boldly. And thus it happened that the little midshipman Farragut stood stamping his tiny feet in a rage of disappointment, while the President sailed away from him to fight the Plantagenet. "I'll be on board to fight the Plantagenet yet!" quoth Farragut—"I will, I will! Set the sails, men! Be alive—be alive! Don't stand with your mouths open!" "Please, Sir," said the cockswain, "this boat is very crank, Sir, and the breeze is fresh, Sir. I know she'll go over if we do." "Set the sail!" cried Farragut; "I'll be on board before that ship takes the Plantagenet, or drown you all!" The sail was set, and the little boat began to plow through the water. Said Farragut, "Wet the sail, men, and don't lose an inch! What fine fat hams and pet pigs those Englishmen have; a good time we'll have to-morrow in our mess! We'll take this fellow before night!"—and he handled his sword. Just then a squall struck the boat, and into the water went Midshipman Farragut with his boat's-crew. "Oh! what will the Captain say to me for upsetting the boat and losing the oars and tackle; and I've lost the fight too!" cried Farragut, as his head came up out of the water. He began to sneeze the salt-water out of his eyes and nose, as he looked round at the men's heads popping up, one by one, out of the waves. "It's bad enough to lose the tackle; and now you've not only lost the fight for me, but you want to drown yourselves too. I'll kill the first man that dares to drown!" and little Farragut sputtered and scolded away at the men to keep afloat, until they all got on the bottom of his boat, where he bewailed his sad fate in missing the action.

The result, however, was different from what every one expected. When the captain of the Plantagenet saw that the President intended to fight him he suddenly changed his course, and absolutely ran away, much to the satisfaction of all, particularly Farragut, who was picked off of the bottom of his boat in a short time, wet and disconsolate. The Englishman, it was afterward discovered, had declined to fight because his men were in a state of mutiny; and upon his arrival at home a Court of Inquiry justified him.

In the year 1720 a sect arose in New London, Connecticut, called, from their leader, "Rogerenes." Many anecdotes are related concerning them, one of which is the following: Among other violations of law and order by the "Rogerenes," they took to themselves wives without complying with the requirements of law and decency. One day, as Governor Saltonstall was sitting in his room smoking his pipe, a man by the name of Gorton came in with a woman, and, addressing the Governor, said:

"Sir, I have married this woman, and that, too, without the authority of your magistrates and ministers."

The Governor turned round, took the pipe from his mouth, and in a stern voice said, "Gorton, have you taken this woman for your wife?"

Gorton replied, "Yes, I have."

The Governor turned to the woman, and inquired, "Madam, have you taken this man for your husband?"

She replied, "Indeed, Sir, I have."

"Well, then," said the Governor, "by authority of, and according to the laws of Connecticut, I pronounce you lawfully wedded, husband and wife!"

Gorton was astonished, and, after a pause, replied, "Thou art a cunning creature!"

On a monument in the ancient burying-ground on the banks of the Connecticut River, at Middletown, laid out in 1650, is the following inscription:

"Here is interred the mortal remains of Dr. John Osborn.—Ask nothing further, traveler; nothing better can be said, nor nothing shorter. Ob. 31st May, Æt. 40.—Life how short; Eternity how long."

In England the death of John Anvil, blacksmith, occasioned the following epitaph:

My sledge and hammer lie reclin'd;
My bellows too have lost their wind;
My fire's extinct, my forge decay'd;
My vice is in the dust all laid;
My coal is spent, my iron gone,
My nails are drove, my work is done.

I GIVE you a reminiscence of our first assault upon Vicksburg:

Early in the engagement, when the rebels had just fairly opened upon the Second Division, and Battery B, Second Illinois Light Artillery, had begun to answer shell for shell, General D. Stuart, who is very short-sighted, rode up to the forge of "B," which was standing some distance in the rear of our thundering guns, and called out, "Why don't you get this piece into position and answer the rebels? They'll shell us out directly!"

The Dutch smith, standing near, replied, "Well, Sheneral, me has noting to schute mit te blacksmitt shop but hos-schoes!"

The infantry support roared, and the "Sheneral's" duties called him to another part of the field very suddenly.

A BURLESQUE.

IN IMITATION OF "ENCHANTED PASTORAL."

'Twas morning, and Mary arose,
Her stockings and garters put on;
Instinctively follow'd her nose,
And walk'd with her back to the sun.

She smil'd and the woods were illum'd,
She sigh'd and the vales were depress'd;
She breath'd and the air was perfum'd,
She frown'd and saw nature distress'd.

She nodded—the trees nodded too,
She murmur'd, and so did the rill;
She wept, and the evening dew
Fell in tears on the neighboring hill.

She stopt and fair flow'rs sprang up,
She blush'd and the rose look'd more red;
She was hungry—she went home and suppd,
She was tir'd—and so went to bed.

THE mistakes of our colored brethren are sometimes rather ridiculous. Lieutenant —, of the Fifth United States Artillery, has a servant called George. George is a round-shouldered, well-shaped plump little darkey, and since the blessing of education has been extended to his race has become a profound adept in the formation of polysyllables.

Among other goods and chattels possessed by the Lieutenant is a pair of boots, which, alas! like many other articles now seen in camp, are somewhat the worse for wear. One day it was deemed advisable that the boots should receive a slight rubbing previous to guard mount, and George was accordingly sent for.

"George," said the Lieutenant, "I want these boots of mine ornamented."

"Yah, Sir," was the reply.

"Do you know, George, what the word 'ornamented' means?"

"Yah, Sir—I knows."

"What does it mean, then?" was the next inquiry.

"Why it means, of course, that you wants the boots half-soled."

The fact was obvious enough to every one present, and all joined in a hearty laugh at the avowal.

GEORGE's predecessor in office was named Henry, and was in the main a pretty intelligent darkey also. Last summer he paid a visit to the city of Philadelphia, and on his return to the army he was in the habit of giving a daily account of the wonders he had seen in that place. One morning his master happened to ask him if he had been to the theatre during his absence.

"Oh yes, Sah," was the reply; "I's been to the theatre a good many times. Still I don't like the theatre half as well as the opera." This was said with a sentimental air which reflected infinite credit on the speaker.

"Do you admire the opera very much?" said the Lieutenant.

"Very much indeed," answered Henry. "I goes every night when I possibly can."

"Which sort of pieces do you like, the German or Italian?" was the next inquiry.

"Don't know, Sah," was the answer; "but I always likes that kind of pieces where the young lady jumps through the hoops."

It was evident from this that Henry had confounded the opera with the circus.

THE following literal copy of a bona fide application received by a government officer in this city is rather funny, as a specimen of King's English with a Bohemian idiom. It is plainly written, and the author is evidently an educated man, and has studied English from the books:

Mrs. President of the Hall for furnishing military clothings:

MADAME!—I beg your pardon in intervening for misery: The Bearer, a bohemian woman, is namely a very poor mother from four children, and a misfortunate wife of a permanent sick husband.

In witnessing it I implore your mercy for this family, assuring that Madam performs a devote work in giving that woman occupation.

Please to accept the thanksgiving in advance, when regarding mine prayers, the thanksgiving of Madame,

Very respectfully,

Dr. B—.

We see nothing "funny" in this letter. It is a tender and touching letter, creditable to the heart and head of the foreigner who wrote as well as he could in a strange language. We like his spirit and his argument, and hope his appeal was successful.

AN Iowa patriot writes to the Drawer: Your story of the Minnesota sheriff is a good one, but is "no whar" when compared with one we used to have in this State. It was at the first term of Judge M'F—'s Court, held in B— County, that the following "good un" was really perpetrated:

A new sheriff had just been elected, and the Judge, wishing to have every thing done in order, called the newly-elected official into his room to instruct him as to his duties, and finding said official decidedly verdant as to the proper manner of opening court, wrote out the entire proclamation and gave him all necessary instructions in relation thereto. Now it so happened that F—, of P— County, a fun-loving attorney, was sitting by at the time, and seeing a chance for fun ahead, prepared another proclamation, and by a little legerdemain succeeded in substituting it in the sheriff's hat for the one given him by the Judge. Eleven o'clock came, and so did the order from Judge M'F—: "Sheriff, open court." Drawing his instructions deliberately from his hat he commenced, in a stentorian voice: "Hear ye! hear ye! hear ye! The Honorable District Court of the County of B— is wound up and all ready to grind. All having grists may pitch in, and their grists shall be ground!" The laugh that came in can only be appreciated by Western men.

A BILL for the adjustment of the foreign debt of the State of — was before the House, and was eliciting considerable feeling and discussion, when a member from one of the northern counties tied up all debate by submitting the following:

Resolved, That it is imperative that the old bonds of indebtedness be taken up.

Resolved, That, in order to take up the aforesaid old bonds, new bonds be issued.

Resolved, That the new bonds do not be issued until the old bonds are surrendered.

IN one of the eastern counties of Ohio lives a popular doctor, who has a little son who always takes a great interest in the fine-blooded sheep upon his grandfather's farm. When about five years old, and a few weeks before the customary yearly shearing, little "Bob" had one evening a slight attack of croup. The next night, saying his usual evening prayer, when he came to the line—

"If I should die before I wake," a thought of his previous ailing crossed his mind, and he vehemently added, as an after-thought: "But please let me live till after grandpa shears sheep;" and then proceeded as calmly as though nothing out of the ordinary course of things had happened.

HERE is a specimen of literalism with a witness:

In the year A.D. 1855 one James Orchard, who had obtained from the United States a land warrant for his services as a soldier in the Mexican war, came to Lucas County, Iowa, for the purpose of locating the same; and after traveling over the county found a tract which exactly suited him. Getting off his horse he took from his pocket his land warrant for 160 acres, opened and laid it upon the ground, at the same time saying, "In the name of the United States I lay my land warrant upon this tract." He got on his horse and rode off, leaving his warrant spread upon the ground, fully of the opinion that he had laid his warrant as the law intended he should.

ONE of the Michiganders uses the goose-quill to some purpose in the three that follow:

A local preacher was "churched" for trapping on Sunday. He plead in excuse that one of his traps was set immediately by the path that led to his morning's appointment, and seeing a fox caught by the leg in it, he thought it better to put the thing out of its misery than to let it suffer till next day. This was received as satisfactory, till one of his examiners asked whether he had not set the trap again? "Well," said he, with a most expressive gesture with his thumb and forefinger, "I barely set it!"

A LADY once remarked of a certain D.D. "that she had done him injustice in thinking he had but two sermons, when in fact he had three."

It is not unfrequent in the West, when a preacher has closed a controversial discourse, to invite any one present to reply. On a certain occasion a Campbellite said that before finishing his sermon he had a few horses that he wished to "curry down." So he led out the black horse and the bay and the gray (Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Methodist), and gave them a thorough scoring upon their peculiarities. He then invited any one who was inclined to make some remarks to take the stand. A very quiet working man arose, and said that "his Brother had proved himself a very good hostler, but he had left for him the most disagreeable job—that of currying the Jack!"

IN the course of my parochial visits—writes a pastor—I called one day on a worthy lady of my parish, who had in her younger days been a school-teacher with good success; but, as Daniel Webster used to say of his Latin that he was "afraid to quote without brushing up his memory," so the lady referred to evidently needed to brush up her English. I found her quite unwell, and her physician had but just left the house. On inquiring what was the difficulty, with half-impatient sadness she exclaimed, "Oh! I don't know. The doctor says I've got the sore eucus embrane!" She was suffering with sore throat and inflammation of the mucus membrane. She was evidently cousin to Mrs. Partington, and sister to the lady who was troubled with a "spine in her back."

SOME few years ago there was a notary public in Washington, an old and highly-respected gentleman, who had held his office through all the political twistings and turnings of our capital for nearly twenty years. A young friend was in his office one day, and while sitting by the table picked up a small, old, leather-covered book which, upon being opened, proved to be "Thaddeus of Warsaw." He casually remarked to Mr. Smith, the notary:

"I see you have a copy of Thaddeus of Warsaw here."

"Thaddeus of Warsaw!" was the reply. "What do you mean?"

"Why, this is a copy of it."

"Thaddeus of Warsaw!" exclaimed the old gentleman. He snatched the book, gave one glance at it, and then cried out, "For twenty years I have been swearing people on that book, thinking it was a Bible! All those oaths ain't worth the paper they are written on!"

That very day he patronized the Bible Society Agency, and got a finely-bound copy, which could by no possibility be mistaken for a novel.

SOME time in September, 1863, the Twelfth United States Colored Infantry was camped at Estell Springs, Tennessee. An officer went home on leave of absence. He wore private's trowsers, and his badges of rank were covered by a cavalry great-coat. Both his hair and beard were exceedingly black. On the cars he got into conversation with a rustic gentleman, who finally inquired to what regiment he belonged. "The Twelfth United States Colored Infantry," was the reply. "Why!" said the astonished inquirer, gazing intently, "I thought you was a white man!"

WE had two men in our employ, twin-brothers, so much alike, that they were frequently mistaken the one for the other, even by those who were well acquainted with both. This similarity has led to many laughable mistakes, a couple of which I send you as an offset for the frequent chuckles I have had over the Drawer.

I had bought a quantity of grain from a retired captain near me, and agreed to send men to sack it, the captain driving the grain down to the warehouse where it was to be stored. The one brother was sacking the grain in the captain's barn; the other was receiving it at the warehouse and emptying it. The captain made two or three trips, and it was evident something was puzzling him most woefully. At last he burst out—"How did you get here before me? I left you filling above; I've driven fast and watched, and here you are before me again!" On the matter being explained, the captain declared he had sailed the world over and never been so completely taken in before.

My friend's husband, an officer in the United States Navy, has been on service for the past year or so, and is a stranger, in consequence, to the many encroachments of our sex upon masculine attire. Having stolen your caps, cravats, coats, and waistcoats, we now at your "continuations" "look and long, but dare not."

My friend lately sent to her lord a "carte de visite" of her charming self, taken in full out-of-door costume. In reply, that benighted individual sends the following:

"Which is Mr. W., and which is Mrs. W.?"

"Just which you please, my little man; you pays your money and takes your choice."

THIS is from little Delaware:

Down in our shop the men often try to get ahead of each other in the way of hard yarns, but it's hard to beat Alick. One of the men the other day, who had been on the Ohio, was speaking of the light draught of some of the steamers out there, when Old Uncle Bill spun a long yarn about a steamer he saw down country that could go over any meadow with a light dew on it. When he had finished Alick came in with—"Oh! that's nothing. When I was working at Sam Harlan's, last spring, he launched a steamer for Morgan that didn't touch the water by an inch and three quarters!"

THE following touching poem comes to us from Minnesota:

DEAR SIR—the enclosed verses are the first I ever wrote if they suit your magazine, you may have them for your own price as I never wrote for any magazine or paper before I do not know what it is worth I have some more that I will send you if you will accept this one I remain yours truly,

S. B.

my Father Land.

When on yon plain, I languid stand,
The flowers around me springing;
It is then that I think, on my Father Land;
On my dear; Dear Father Land.

On my Father Land, so long ago,
In Childhood where I spent;
My playful hours, in Laurel bowers,
Where shadows came, and went.

And then as I stand, where the waters rush,
In ripples at my feet;
I think on mine own sweet land again,
Away across the deep.

And again as I sit, in the leafy Woods;
The wild Flowers, scattered around me;
I think on my Father Land once more,
To which my Heart, has bound me.

ONE of our Baltimore constituents tells this good story:

A rather pretentious-appearing person entered a store, and laying a small port-folio on the counter stated to the merchant that he was giving instructions in the art of detecting counterfeit money by an original and practical method of his own. He had instructed several tellers in leading banks, all of whom testified to the superiority of his method. "Well," said Mr. B——, the proprietor, "what is your peculiar method?" Said the stranger, "I show you good money and bad money together; show and explain the difference in the engraving; show you the difference in the lathe-work and fine lines of the vignette"—remarking that he was a practical engraver himself, and that he could in forty minutes' time instruct any person of the least observation in rules that would be infallible in detecting the finest executed counterfeit ever issued.

"Well, what are your terms?" said Mr. B——, looking intently at the man, as though somewhat incredulous as to the profundity of his wisdom on the subject.

"My terms are five dollars for full instructions," he replied.

"I can't give it," responded B——; "I would probably forget it all in a week."

"Well," replied the instructor, with an eye to business, "I have spent some time talking with you, and if you are anxious to learn, I will charge you but three dollars."

"Well, I will go three dollars on it," said B——, "and run the risk of all the good it will do me."

So they proceeded to business at once. The stranger opened the port-folio, produced a quantity of bank-notes, good and bad; the fine lines and lathe-work were duly compared, expatiated upon, and explained. He found a ready scholar in B——, who in half an hour's time was an adept in picking out the good from the bad ones.

The lesson ended, B—— expressed himself well satisfied, and stepping around to his cash-drawer fumbled over some bills for a moment, with which to pay for his tuition, remarking to the stranger that he had nothing less than a ten, and asking him if he could give him seven dollars, which the stranger promptly did, B—— giving him in return a well-executed counterfeit ten-dollar note, with which he had been “stuck” some weeks previous, and which had since been lying in his drawer.

The stranger pocketed the bogus “ten,” expressed his thanks, and left—leaving B—— his tuition and seven dollars in good money.

A FRIEND of ours, who is a clerk in a New York mercantile establishment, relates a colloquy from which a sprightly youth in the same store came out second best. A poor boy came along with his machine, inquiring,

“Any knives or scissors to grind?”

“Don’t think we have,” replied the young gentleman, facetiously; “but can’t you sharpen wits?”

“Yes, if you’ve got any!” was the prompt retort, leaving the interrogator rather at a loss to produce the article.

THIS comes from an officer of the army in Virginia:

During the last few weeks we have had much cold weather for this climate, and at one time the Chesapeake Bay was so heavily frozen as to delay the boat from Baltimore to Norfolk for several days. During this time many passengers had collected in Baltimore, and from frequent visits to the boat to see what were the prospects for starting, we became quite well acquainted. In this way I became acquainted with a Mr. George, a Norfolk lawyer, whom I found to be a whole-souled fellow, with a good deal of dry humor. By the time the boat started we had become very good friends. As we went down to the boat together for the last time, we saw such a crowd of people of both sexes ahead of us that I despaired of getting a state-room, and communicated my feelings to Mr. George. (From some cause or other Mr. George had quite a scratch upon his face.) He replied that he supposed it was customary to reserve some of the best rooms for the ladies, and he would try and get one of them for our use, and asked me to await his return while he crowded to the ticket-window and procured tickets for both. In an incredibly short time he was at the window, when, with a confident voice, I heard him ask for a state-room for a man and wife. This, it appeared, was no new dodge; and my hopes sank as I heard the clerk put the positive question to him, “Have you a wife?” This did not disconcert our young lawyer, for he promptly replied, “How do you suppose I got these scratches on my face if I have no wife?” He got the state-room, and, snugly tucked in our berths, we sympathized deeply with our fellow-passengers who had to sit in their chairs all night.

PAT CASEY, as the name indicates, was a native of the land whence its patron saint banished the ophidians, etc., and, like the majority of his countrymen, was not well provided with the wealth nor luxuries of this world, and therefore deemed it best to make a pilgrimage to the newly-discovered mines of Colorado, which he did, in search of gold. When Fortune made her grand drawing, a lucky number fell to Pat; that is, in his researches among the peaks of Clear Creek he was fortunate enough to “strike a lead,” which proved to be one of the richest in that region of remarkably rich quartz deposits. A happy man was Pat! And in due course he pocketed the “Peters” to the tune of several hundred thousand dollars. Of course he was soon largely impressed with a sense of the importance of wealth in general and of himself in particular. One day, after he had become aware that he was one of the solid men of the country, and had proved the fact by setting up a sort of bank and discounting-shop in one of the mountain towns, one of his old chums and fellow-miners met Pat in the street.

“How are ye, Pat?” was the salutation, in the old familiar way.

Pat was rich now, and “couldn’t see it,” as the slang phrase goes, and this was his reply:

“Bedad, Sir, yer mighty fray, Sir! ‘Pat’ is it now? ‘I’ll be afther lettin’ ye know, Sir, that me name is P. D. Casey, Sir, and if ye’ve ony business, Sir, it’s mysel as has an office in Central, Sir, and me office hours are from P.M. in the forenoon till A.M. in the afternoon, Sir. Ye can call on me clarks, Sir. D’ye mind that?” And Pat concluded with a move of the head that would have done honor to a patrician.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Drawer in Iowa says:

While comparing a deed in the Recording Office in this county, we came across the following piece of original composition. It was an ordinary warranty deed, which, after describing the land intended to be conveyed, closed with the following language: “Witness our hands this the 8th day of November A.D. 1864; and the grave-yard, as now fenced, is reserved.”

SOME time ago a stranger remained for six consecutive weeks on board a steamer going up and down the Rhine—from Rotterdam to Mentz, and from Mentz to Rotterdam. Nobody on board knew any thing of him, except that he was an Englishman—which, of course, it required no great discerning power to find out. He never cared for and seldom spoke to any one; nevertheless, contrary to many of his country people, he was not fastidious, and did not make it a rule to find fault with every thing only because it is not English. His natural wants regulated all his actions; his stomach was the only time-piece he ever consulted, and he therefore ate, drank, and did every thing without any regard to the hour or place. His meat was generally mutton-chops, his drink mostly beer and rum. He read the Times and Punch, smoked cigars, and every now and then enjoyed a nap to the highest credit of his conscience: he snored like an engine.

On a fine morning he was enjoying his cigar on deck, apparently looking with delight and admiration at every thing around him. The scenery was fully calculated to excite such feelings; it was one of the most remarkable that the Rhine can offer. The master of the steamer, who had long been at a loss to account for the motives that could induce a man to remain so long on board with no apparent object, availed himself of this opportunity to speak to that mysterious, or at least curious, individual. “We see, Sir,” said he, “that you are an admirer of the beauties of nature; you are, as I perceive, contemplating the magnificent scenery about us.” “No, no,” answered the Englishman. “I was not thinking of that just now; but I must tell you, captain, you have got a first-rate cook! Upon my word, his mutton-chops are the best I ever ate in all my life!”
